SMITHSBOROUGH, a village in the parish of Clones, and barony and county of Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the Ulster Canal, and on the road from Monaghan to Clones, 5 miles west-south-west of Monaghan, and 5½ north-east of Clones. It has two meeting-houses and a small spade manufactory; and in its vicinity are a Roman Catholic chapel and the seats of Loughbooney, Lakeview, and Springmount. In 1843, the Smithsborough Loan Fund had a capital of £614, circulated £2,627 in 800 loans, expended for charitable purposes £3, and had 13 depositors or proprietors of its capital. A Mr. Smith, who died before the close of last century, founded the village, gave to it his name, and established in it spirited and well-attended monthly fairs for cattle; but in consequence of the proprietorship of it being disputed after his death, the village speedily declined, and appeared for a time to be passing to extinction. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 244; in 1841, 276. Houses 48.

SMITH-HILL, a residence in the parish of Cloon-craff, and 1 mile east-north-east of the episcopal town of Elphin, barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. This was the residence of the Rev. Oliver Jones, curate of Elphin, and grandfather of Oliver Goldsmith; and, according to some accounts, it was also Goldsmith's birth-place.

SMITHSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilskeary, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 122. Houses 15.

SNAIVE (THE), a rivulet flowing into Glengariff bay, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster.

SNAMLUTHER, the site of an alleged ancient monastery, in the barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. "An abbey," says Archdall, "was founded here by Columban or Colman, the son of Euchodius, a disciple of the great St. Columb, and, as we are told, his charioteer. We know nothing further of this abbey."

SNEEM, a rivulet, a harbour, and a village, in the parish of Kilcrohane, barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. The rivulet rises among the mountains, and runs 5 miles south-south-westward to the head of the harbour, immediately below the village. The harbour is an estuarial bay of the Kenmare estuary, 1½ mile in length, extending southward from the mouth of the rivulet, proportionally very limited in breadth, and partially closed across the entrance by Pigeon Island. The principal part of the large bog of Bally [see BALLY] is a basin lying at the foot of the mountains, around the head of Sneem harbour, and cut into two sections, as well as nearly embraced, by the two lower ridges of Aska and Dirreenavurrig. Clear and rapid streams career along the hollows, and are usually fringed or belted along the edges by a little green land. The lower part of the basin is entirely occupied by bog; round the upper edge of it is a narrow zone of patches of cultivation; and above that is boggy and rocky mountain. The village stands on the road from Kenmare to Cahirciveen, 11½ miles west by south of Kenmare, and 13 north by east of Waterville. It contains a church, a chapel, schools, a dispensary, a post-office, a small court-house, and a small inn. "It is situated," says Mr. Fraser, "in a little creek running off Kenmare bay; and its picturesque harbour, numerous coves, wooded islets, and indented shores, add much to the interest of this very picturesque part of the coast." The dispensary is within the Kenmare Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,520; and, in 1839-40, it expended £73 8s., and made 777 dispensations of medicine to 367 patients. Fairs are held on March 17, May 20, June 29, Aug. 9, Sept. 24, Nov. 18, and Dec. 18. A court of petty-sessions is held on the first Thursday of every month. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 217. Houses 46.

SOLAR, a parish near the centre of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It has ceased to be recognised in the civil parochial divisions, and is mixed up with the parishes which constitute the benefice of Connor. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 7 furlongs. Pop., in 1831, 259.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CONNOR [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £19 17s. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4 Churchmen, 163 Presbyterians, and 104 Roman Catholics.

SOLDIERSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Aghalee, barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the Lagan Canal and on the southern verge of the county, 1½ mile north by west of Moira, 2 miles south-east of the village of Aghalee, and 6 west by south of Lisburn. It contains a church; and within a mile of it are the seats of Primrose-Hill, Laurel-Grove, Mount-Prospect, Friars'-Hill, Broom-Mount, Tullynery-house, and Rockhill. Limestone abounds in the vicinity, and great quantities of it are quarried, and sent along the Lagan Canal. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

SOLLOGHOBEG, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 2½ miles north by west of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, northward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,210 acres, 1 road, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 738; in 1841, 911. Houses 120. The surface lies on a base of about 260 feet above sea-level, and consists, in general, of good land. The principal hamlet is Boheratreen.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CULLEN [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £110 8s. 11d.; glebe, £10. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics, and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SOLLOGHODMORE, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 3½ miles north-west of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, northward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 6,637 acres, 1 road, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,791; in 1841, 2,852. Houses 372. The surface extends upon the western verge of the county, lies on a base of from 208 to 373 feet above sea-level, and consists for the most part of good land. The road from Tipperary to Limerick passes across the interior. The chief residence is Ballykisteon-house. On the Limerick road is a constabulary station.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CULLEN [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £318 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £52. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 2,934; and 5 daily schools—each of which was salaried with £25 a-year from Lord Derby—had on their books 178 boys and 104 girls.

SOMERVILLE, the demesne of Sir William Somerville, Bart., 3½ miles west-south-west of the village of Duleek, and partly in the barony of Skreen, but chiefly in that of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. The mansion and the larger portion of the demesne are in the parish of Kentstown; but the demesne extends also into the parishes of Ballymagarvey, Piercetown, and Danestown. The house occupies an elevated and commanding site, and is a spacious and very respectable structure. The demesne is of great extent and beauty; it presents many inequalities of surface favourable to picturesque of close view; it is watered and beautified not only by the stream, but by a lacustrine expansion, of Nanny Water; and its plantations contain numerous fine specimens of old trees, and are so extensive, and spread so far along the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, as to form a striking and very agreeable feature of scenery in a great district of country.

SONNA, or SONNAGH, the extensive demesne of H. M. Tuite, Esq., in the parish of Templeoran, barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is situated 5 miles north-west by west of Mullingar, and is bounded along the north-west side by the road thence to Longford. Its name means the stone castle, and indicates that the original mansion was an edifice of military strength. The present mansion is a light and elegant edifice; and the grounds around it are well planted, and have on one of their borders a small but charming lake. "This place," said Mr. Brewer in 1826, "has constituted the seat of the Tuite or De Tuyte family for more than 600 years. Sir Hugh De Lacy, Lord of Meath, granted the manor of the Sonnagh, with other estates, to Richard De Tuyte, one of his principal followers, about the year 1180; and it must be noticed as a rare circumstance of good fortune, in this country of political troubles, that the manor has ever since remained vested in the descendants of the said Richard, without any interruption whatever. In a more extensive work, it might not prove uninteresting to trace the annals of a family, thus riding securely amidst all the storms of state for so many centuries. Sir Oliver Tuyte, of the Sonnagh, was created a baronet in 1622, and was progenitor of the present baronet Sir George; and likewise of Hugh Morgan Tuyte of Sonna, Esq., who served the office of high-sheriff of Westmeath in the year 1822."

SORREL-HILL, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Blessington and Boystown, 3½ miles east-south-east of the town of Blessington, barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It screens part of the south side of the glen or upper vale of the Liffey; and lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,915 feet above the level of the sea.

SOW (TUE), a rivulet of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It rises on the south side of Oulart Hill, a little north of the village of Ballaghkeen, and runs 7 miles south-westward, southward, and south-south-eastward, through the baronies of Ballaghkeen and East Shelmalier, and almost wholly along the boundaries of parishes, to the commencement of an estuarial expansion, or of an arm of Wexford Harbour, at the village of Castle-Bridge. The district which it traverses and drains is a large basin-shaped tract of country; and a large portion of it, usually called Ithybog, is an expanse of waste but easily reclaimable lands, which are expected to undergo the improvements pointed at and encouraged by the new drainage act.

SPA, a small village, and watering-place, in the barony of Trughenackny, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated on the north shore of Tralee Harbour, 2½ miles west-north-west of the town of Tralee. Pop. not specially returned. See TRALEE.

SPANCEL-HILL, a village noted for its horse-fairs, in the parish of Clooney, barony of Upper Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the road from Quin to Gort, near its intersection with that from Ennis to Scarriff, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-west of Quin, and $\frac{3}{4}$ north-east of Ennis. Fairs are held on June 24, and Aug. 20. Within a mile of it are the seats of Crangher-house, Castletown-house, Durra-cottage, and Cahareiny-house,—the first the residence of B. Blood, Esq. Area of the village 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 169. Houses 26.

SPANISH COVE, a tiny and open bay, in the parish of Kilmoe, western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated between Crook-Haven and Barley-Cove, on the south-east side of the peninsula which terminates in Mizen Head.

SPANISH POINT, a headland in the parish of Kilfarboy, barony of Ibrickane, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated on the south side of the entrance of Liscannor bay, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles south of Hagg's Head, and 2 west-south-west of the town of Milltown-Malbay. At this place two of the ships belonging to the famous Spanish armada were wrecked.

SPERRIN MOUNTAINS, a range of lofty mountains in the counties of Tyrone and Londonderry, Ulster. It extends chiefly along the mutual border of the two counties; and forms the backbone or culminating part of the Tyrone and Londonderry highlands. It commences on the west at Butterlope Glen, $\frac{6}{8}$ miles north-east of Newtown-Stewart, and 8 east-south-east of Strabane; and extends about 10 miles east-north-eastward to the upper part of Glenroe, or the remotest sources of the river Roe. Its principal summits, named from west to east, are Mullaghearn, 1,701 feet of altitude above sea-level; a height east of Mullaghearn, 1,890 feet; Straw Mountain, 2,085 feet; Dart Mountain, 1,612 feet; a height east of Dart Mountain, 2,037; Sawel, 2,236 feet; Muinard, 1,550 feet; and a height on the flank of Glenroe, 2,064 feet. Over most of its length it screens the north side of the picturesque highland vale or defile of Glenelly, whose south side is screened by the mountains of Munterlony and Slievemore, and whose low ground is traversed by the road from Newtown-Stewart to Draperstown. The range, however, is often understood in a sense much more extensive than we have assigned to it; as in the following passage of Mr. Fraser's excellent Hand-Book: "They extend in a curving line from the vicinity of Strabane to within 4 miles of Garvagh, a distance of 36 (statute) miles, following the outline of the range, and in that space are intersected by four glens, through which roads are carried. Sawel mountain may be said to be the centre and highest point of the range. It is 2,236 feet high; and from it the chain gradually descends, on the one hand, to 1,000 feet near Strabane, and on the other, to 1,200 feet near Garvagh. In this, however, there are intermissions where the hills do not exceed 800 feet. The glen, which lies between the Sperrin and the Munterlony mountains, and through which the road from Newtown-Stewart to Draperstown is carried, is watered by the Glenelly river, which falls into the Owenkillew about 4 miles above Newtown-Stewart. For the greater part of the way, that is from Newtown-Stewart to Sperrin, a distance of 15 miles, the glen is thickly inhabited, and contains various schools and places of worship. And from the greater altitude of the mountains and the depth of the lateral glens, the scenery in some places more striking than in the more southerly and more ramified glens connected with the Munterlony range."

SPIDDAL, a hamlet and a fishing harbour in the parish and barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated on the north side of Galway bay, and on the road from Galway to Costello bay, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles west of Barna, 7 south-west of Moycullen, and $\frac{8}{8}$ west by south of Galway. A new road has been made by government from this place, across the great moor of Iar-Connaught, to the ferry on the middle of Lough Corrib; and connects the north shores of Galway bay by a direct route, with Oughterard and the interior of Cunnemara. The hamlet stands upon the estate of Mr. Conyn; and is likely to grow into a village of some importance. Some of the best turbot banks of the bay of Galway lie in the immediate vicinity. The harbour is a mere cove, dignified with the name of a bay, and provided from public funds with a pier; it is much frequented by both coasting and fishing craft; it is dry at low water, and has a depth of about 10 feet at high water; its entrance is about 150 feet wide, between rocks, and dry at low water; and its interior, within the pier-head, is a clean sandy cove about $\frac{1}{4}$ acre in area. "The pier," reports Mr. Donnell, "is 216 feet in length from the root. There is a walling surrounding a basin in different directions to the extent of 770 feet; but there is but little depth along these walls, and they are a very inferior kind of work that cannot be expected to stand long without repair and improvement, which their utility does not merit."

SPIKE ISLAND, an island in the parish of Great Island, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It lies on the west side of Cork Harbour, north by west of the entrance of that harbour, and about half-a-mile south of Cove. It has an area of 180 acres; and lies in such a position as to protect the deep and capacious sea-basin of Cove from southerly winds and the fury of the sea, and to contribute largely to render that noble basin completely landlocked. It was private property till the commencement of the wars of the French Revolution; but was then purchased by the British government from Mr. Nicholas Fitton, and was begun to be strongly fortified for the defence of the harbour. In 1791, Fort Westmoreland Battery, intended to mount 100 guns, was commenced to be erected, under the superintendence of Colonel afterwards General Vallancey; in 1806, the barracks were built; and since that period, the works intended for the fortification of the island have received various accessions at very considerable cost; yet they have never been completed to the extent originally planned. Colonel Vallancey, while superintending the erection of the battery, commenced the study of the Irish language, under the instructions of one of the stone masons employed upon the works; and laid the foundation of the extensive philological knowledge and antiquarian research in Hibernian matters which have so singularly identified his name, though an Englishman, with Irish or rather Erse literature. "However fanciful and visionary the theories of Vallancey may be considered," remarks a recent writer, "no one can deny that his inquiries and learning have brought to light many, very many, verbal and other coincidences too extraordinary not to afford subjects for deep reflection to an inquiring mind." Pop. of the island, in 1831, 205. Houses 40.

SPIRE HILL, a densely wooded hill in the Earl of Portarlington's demesne of Emo, barony of Portneinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It acquires its name from being surmounted by a spire-like but rude tower; and though attaining an altitude of only 423 feet above the level of the sea, it forms a very conspicuous and noble feature in the landscape, and commands a very extensive panoramic view of the circumjacent region of flat demesnes, and dead, brown bogs.

SPRINGFIELD, a village in the parish of Belfast, barony of Upper Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is picturesquely situated at the base of Davis Mountain, 2 miles west of Belfast. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 547. Houses 66. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 15; in manufactures and trade, 78; in other pursuits, 1. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 27; on their own manual labour, 66.

SPRINGFIELD, a hamlet and seat of manufacture, in the parish of Magheralin, 2½ miles south-west of Moira, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. A muslin manufacturing and bleaching establishment here employed at one time about 1,000 persons, and annually finished and sent to the Dublin market about 15,000 pieces; but, in consequence of the extensive introduction of English cotton goods to the Irish market, it suffered a fearful reverse.

SPRINGFIELD, co. Galway. See ARDAGH.

SPRINGVILLE, a village in the parish of Burry, 2 miles west-south-west of Kells, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 171. Houses 33.

SQUIRE'S CARN, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Culfadd and Upper Moville, 2½ miles west by north of the town of Moville, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It attains an altitude of 1,058 feet above sea-level; and it overhangs the west side of the cultivated glen, whose east side is screened by the mountain of Craignamaddy, and whose low ground is traversed by the road to Culfadd.

STABANNON, a parish in the barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. It contains the villages of Droimgoolestown and Stabannon: see DROIMGOOLESTOWN. Length, eastward, 3 miles; breadth, from 1 to 2½; area, 4,376 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,221; in 1841, 1,234. Houses 402. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,884. Houses 324. The land is of prime quality. The highest ground is at Drumcassel fort, and has an altitude of 250 feet above sea-level. The river Dee runs along the southern boundary. The principal seats are Drumcassel-house, Mountview, Roodstown-house, Charleville, and Braganstown-house; and the principal hamlets are Ruthstown, Pollbrook, Ballyregan, and Narrowlane. The road from Ardee to Castle-Bellingham passes through the interior. The village of Stabannon stands on this road, 3 miles south-west of Castle-Bellingham, and ¼ east-north-east of Ardee. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 279; in 1841, 243. Houses 37.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Armagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £12 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £208 10s.; and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The vicarages of Stabannon and RICHARDSTOWN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Stabannon. Pop., in 1831, 2,758. Gross income, £212 10s.; nett, £188 6s. Patrons of Stabannon, the vicars choral of St. Patrick's, Dublin; and of Richardstown, the archbishop of Armagh. The church was built in 1826, by means of a loan of £784 12s. 3d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 110; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilsaran. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 2,042; the Protestants of the union to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 2,536; and 2 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 75 boys and 45 girls.

STACKALLEN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 2 miles; breadth, from 1¼ to 1½; area, 2,351 acres, 30 perches, —of which 20 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 837; in 1841, 748. Houses 137. The land is aggregately good; and declines slowly south-eastward to the Boyne. The interior is traversed by the road from Navan to Slane. The seats are Hornmanstown-house, Causes-town-house, Firmount-house, and Stackallen or Boyne-house,—the last the former residence of Viscount Boyne.—This fine residence is situated, with impressive propriety, near the banks of the river, which imparts a title to its noble owner, and was the scene of the exploits which led to the selection of that title, when his lordship's ancestor was advanced in the Irish peerage. Gustavus, first Viscount Boyne, among other important services in the wars consequent upon the expulsion of the Stuart family, headed a regiment at the battle of the Boyne, and narrowly escaped death, having his horse killed under him. He was created Baron Hamilton of Stackallen in 1715, and Viscount Boyne in 1717. His lordship died September 16th, 1723, in the 84th year of his age, and is buried in the church of Stackallen, where also are interred his lady, and many other members of this distinguished family.—The village of Stackallen stands on a cross-road, half-a-mile north of the Navan and Slane road, 3½ miles north-east of Navan, and 3¼ west-south-west of Slane. It contains the parish-church and a recently established college for communicating a knowledge of the Irish language to students of divinity belonging to the Established church.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £192; glebe, £24. The rectories of Stackallen, GERANSTOWN, and DUNMOR [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Stackallen. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 1,874. Gross income, £551 10s. 4d.; nett, £457 10s. 3d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built about 200 years ago. Sittings 140; attendance, from 40 to 50. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 124; and the Roman Catholics to 693; the Protestants of the union to 158, and the Roman Catholics to 1,731; two daily schools in the parish were partially supported by respectively the rector and the Hon. Mrs. Hamilton, and had on their books 45 boys and 60 girls; and there was also a daily school in Geranstown. In 1843, a National school at Stackallen was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 76 boys and 58 girls.

STACKS MOUNTAINS, a range of hills on the mutual border of the baronies of Trillickenackmy and Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. It commences in the eastern vicinity of the old episcopal village of Ardfer, and extends 6½ miles eastward, separating the valley of Tralee on the south from the moorish country around the sources of the Brick on the north, and connecting on the east with the Clarruddery mountains, and through them with the vast upland region of Kerry, Limerick, and Cork.

STACUMNEY, a parish in the barony of South Salt, 1¼ mile south by west of Leixlip, co. Kildare, Leinster. It lies on the eastern verge of the county, and approaches within a few perches of the river Liffey. Length, southward, 1¼ mile; breadth, 2; area, 568 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 112; in 1841, 157. Houses 23. Part of the land is poor, and part is excellent. The principal residences are Stacumney-house and Stacumney-cottage.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LEIXLIP [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £42 11s. 5d. In 1831, the parishioners consisted of 17 Protestants and 95 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

STAFFORDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of SKREEN, 4 miles east-south-east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 616 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1841, 81. Houses 9. The pop. of 1831 is not returned in the Census, and is mixed up by the Ecclesiastical Authorities with that of Follestown. The interior contains Staffordstown-house, and is traversed by the road from Navan to Duleek.—This parish is wholly inappropriate, yet is attached to the benefice of Skreen, in the dio. of Meath. In 1834, the parishioners, jointly with those of Follestown, consisted of 4 Protestants and 137 Roman Catholics.

STAGONIL. See POWENCOURT.

STAGS, a cluster of rocks off the east side of the entrance of Cork Harbour, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster.

STAGS OF BROADHAVEN, a cluster of seven rocky islets, 1 mile north of Bewee Head, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Erris Head, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. They rise precipitously on all sides from the ocean, to the altitude of about 300 feet; but in consequence of vicinity to the stupendous cliffs of the coast, they do not seem to the eye of a spectator on land to be more than one-half of their real height.

STAGS OF CASTLEHAVEN, three high rocks about a mile south of Toe Head, eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. They look like three towers, soaring sheer up from the water; and are seen at a great distance.

STAHALMOC, or STAHOLMOG, a parish in the barony of Lower Kells, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,109 acres, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 756; in 1841, 579. Houses 107. The land in the south-west is boggy and very inferior; but that in the other districts is good. The road from Nobber to Kells traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £110; glebe, £47. Gross income, £137; nett, £145 18s. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent is non-resident; and the curate of the adjoining parish is paid £10 a-year for performing the occasional duties. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbeg. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was no school.

STAIGUE, or STAIGUE-AN-OR, a very ancient and curious Cyclopean fort in the parish of Kilerohane, barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated a little north of the road from Kenmare to Waterville, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the shore of the Kenmare estuary, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of the village of Sneem. Its name means 'the staired place of slaughter.' The fort is a circular stone structure, crowning a rising ground, within a deep hollow, which is surrounded by mountains, and open only toward the sea. The area is 89 feet; the wall is admirably constructed, and has a thickness of $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet; the periphery is divided into ten compartments of steps or seats, ascending to the top; and the moat which surrounds the whole is 26 feet wide and 6 feet deep. General Vallancey regarded it as a unique structure, and pronounced it a Phœnician amphitheatre; but several other erections, very similar to it, or differing in no characteristic features, have, since he wrote, been discovered in the very same parish, as well as in other parts of the kingdom. Mr. Windele pronounces it 'a remnant of the primitive Cyclopean or Pelasgic-Irish architecture, used in the early fortresses of Ireland, and indifferently called Cabir, Boen, and Caisiol.' A model of Staigue fort may be seen in the Dublin Society House.

STALEEN, a village in the parish of Donore, barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands near the river Boyne, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Drogheda; and within a mile of it are a Roman Catholic chapel, Douthmoat, and the seats of Staleen-cottage, Donore-house, and Douth-house.

STAMCARTHY, STONECARTHY, or STUMCARTY, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Knocktopher, and partly in the baronies of Kells and Knocktopher, but chiefly in that of Shillelogher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south by westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Kells section, 55 acres, 36 perches; of the Knocktopher section, 210 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches; of the Shillelogher section, 1,224 acres, 5 perches. The Knocktopher section is uninhabited. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 355; of the Kells section, 22; of the Shillelogher section, 333. Houses in the Kells section, 4; in the Shillelogher section, 49. The ecclesiastical parish is much more extensive than the civil one; and is returned by the Ecclesiastical Authorities as having had, in 1831, a pop. of 1,066. The Census of 1831 does not notice the parish. The surface consists of good land. The highest ground is on the southern boundary, and has an altitude of 430 feet above sea-level.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Kells [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £33 3s. 2d.; glebe, £1 1s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £65 7s. 11d.; and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Christ-church cathedral, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel at the village of Stoneford—which is situated quoad civilia in Church-Jerpoint, but quoad sacra in Stamcarthy—has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Derrynabinch, Kilkeasy, and Aughville. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 65, and the Roman Catholics to 1,006; and 2 daily schools and an infant school were supported in a great degree by Mrs. Flood, and had on their books 53 boys and 77 girls.

STAMULLEN, a parish in the barony of Upper Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the villages of Gormanstown and Stamullen. See GORMANSTOWN. Length, north-eastward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,144 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,322; in 1841, 1,484. Houses 233. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,126. Houses 185. The surface consists of good land. The eastern border touches the Irish sea over a distance of about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile; and the southern boundary is traced by the rivulet which here divides co. Meath from co. Dublin. The summit of the Four Knocks is on the south-west boundary, and has an altitude above sea-level of 507 feet. The principal seats are Gormanstown-castle, Herbertstown-house, Moate-hill, Clonstown-house, Stedalt-house, Preston-hill, Balloy-house, and Deben-lodge,—the first and the second the beautiful and well-wooded residences of respectively Viscount Gormanstown and M. O'Farrell Cadell, Esq. The village of Stamullen is situated on the southern verge of the parish, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of Gormanstown, $3\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of Balbriggan, and 6 south-south-east of Drogheda. A dispensary here is within the Drogheda Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 5,144 acres, with a pop. of 1,322; and, in 1839-40, it expended £72 13s. 7d., and administered to 686 patients. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 198. Houses 37.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of JULIANSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £75; glebe, £27 19s. 2d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £350; and are inappropriate in George Pepper, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kinnogue. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 5 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 1,351 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools were partially supported by respectively Lord Gormanstown and Mr. Caddell, and had on their books 63 boys and 33 girls.

STAPLESTOWN, a benefice or parochial union, in the barony and county of Carlow, Leinster. Its seat or centre is the hamlet of Staplestown, situated in the parish of Ballinacarrig, and on the river Burren, 2 miles south-east of the town of Carlow. The benefice is in the dio. of Leighlin, and comprises the rectories of BALLINACARRIG and TULLOWMAGRINAGH, and the vicarage of BALLYCROGUER: see these articles. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 1,796. Gross income, £418 3s. 6d.; nett, £374 8s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the prebend of Tullowmagrinagh, in the cathedral of Leighlin. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1821, by means of a private donation of £92 6s. 1½d., and a loan from the late Board of First Fruits of £830 15s. 4½d. Sittings 140; attendance 60. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Tullowmagrinagh. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 137 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 1,589 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools had on their books 181 boys and 134 girls. In the vicinity of the hamlet of Staplestown are the residences of Staplestown-house, Staplestown-lodge, Kilmeany-house, Tinney-park, Park-house, Bennickerry-house, Busherstown-house, Ballinakill-house, and Viewmount.

STARBOG MOUNTAINS, a tract of dreary, moorish upland, in the baronies of Clogher and Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It commences in the northern vicinity of Ballygawley, and extends 7½ miles north-westward to the southern vicinity of Omagh; and its highest ground, the summit of Shantavny, occurs near the commencement of the tract, and has an altitude of 1,035 feet above the level of the sea. The rock of the region is sandstone, and the surface is a dismal sheet of heath and shallow bog, occasionally chequered with patches of green sward and arable land.

STAGFORT. See STAGUE.

STATION-ISLAND, one of the islets of Lough Derg, co. Donegal, Ulster. See DERG.

STEP-ASIDE, a village in the parish of Kilgobbin, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Enniskerry, near the base of the Three-Rock mountain, 2½ miles south-south-east of Dundrum, and 5½ south-south-east of Dublin. It contains a constabulary barrack; and within about a mile of it are a church, a paper-mill, the hamlet of Golden-Hall, and the seats of Kilterman-house, Taylor's-folly, Kilterman-lodge, Rockville, Glenamuck, Jamestown-house, Jamestown-lodge, Kilgobbin-cottage, Lakefield, Elmfield, Farmyard, Kilgobbin-house, Leopardstown, Murphys-town, Rockland, and Sandymount. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 149. Houses 26.

STEWARTSTOWN, a small market and post town, in the parish of Donagherry, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the road from Armagh to Coleraine, 2½ miles west-north-west of the nearest part of Lough Neagh, 2½ north by east of Coal Island; 4½ south-south-east of Cookstown, 6 north-north-east of Dungannon, 8 south of Moneymore, 16½ north of Armagh, 35½ south of Coleraine, 40 west of Belfast, and 78½ north of Dublin. The surrounding country is undulated and fertile, but subsides into low, flat, and marshy land toward Lough Neagh. Within about 2 miles of the town are an old burying-ground, the site of an old monastery, the ruins of Mountjoy-castle, the church of Clonoe, and the residence of Mullantian, Mrs. Hall.—Bellmount, Mr. Bell.—Stewart Hall, the Earl of Castle-Stewart,—and Burnhill, Belleville, and Bloomhill. The town itself has a neat and cheerful appearance; is a well-built and thriving place; and contains a church, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, a Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, a loan fund, and several schools. The dispensary is within the Cookstown Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 54,788 acres, with a pop. of 26,298; and, in 1839-40, it expended £127 3s. 6d., and administered to 1,625 patients. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £3,389, circulated £15,537 in 4,740 loans, cleared a nett profit of £157 10s. 3d., expended for charitable purposes £130, and had 30 depositors or proprietors of its capital. The town, till a few years ago, carried on a considerable trade in the manufacture of linen and union cloth. Fairs are held on the Wednesday on or after the 12th of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Tuesday. In 1838, the public conveyances were a caravan to Armagh, and the mail-coach in transit between Armagh and Coleraine. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Armagh takes designation from Stewartstown, and has chapels here and at Coal Island. Area of the town, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,010; in 1841, 1,062. Houses 197. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 55; in manufactures and trade, 143; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 131; on their own manual labour, 73; on means not specified, 5.

STICKILLEN, a parish in the barony of Ardee, 1½ mile east of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, nearly 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,361 acres, 3 roads, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 295; in 1841, 348. Houses 54. The surface consists of good land. The river Dee flows along the northern boundary; and the road from Ardee to Duncuir passes through the interior. The seats are Stickillen-house and Harristown-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDEE [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Vicarial title composition, £16 14s. 6d.; glebe, £1 16s. 11d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £100; and are inappropriate in Viscount Ferrard. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

STILLORGAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 639 acres, 3 roads, 23 perches,—of which 7 acres, 4 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 2,145; in 1841, 1,550. Houses 264. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,495; in 1841, 939. Houses 157. But these statements of the pop. of 1831, which are those of the Census, include the parochial chapelry of Kilnacul, whose pop., in 1831, was 144. The surface is one of the most luscious portions of the southern sea-board of Dublin bay, approaches within 3½ furlongs of the shore in the vicinity of Blackrock, is traversed by the western and seemingly beautiful road from Dublin to Bray, or that by way of Cabinteely, and is very nearly all occupied with villas, chiefly of a superior and pretending character. Stillorgan-park, the residence of Mr. Verschoyle, is one of the oldest residences of the district, and, when in the possession of Lord Carysfort, was one of the most ornate in Ireland; but the demesne, which even originally did not comprise 150 acres, and displayed a profusion of gardens, groves, and water, has been subdivided into a series of villa grounds, and has, in consequence, lost much of its former splendour. "In the year 1216, Raymond de Carew, a Strongbonian baron, was lord of the manor of Stillorgan, at which time he granted the parish-church and an adjacent townland to the prior and canons of Christ-church. This place, together with other lands in the counties of Dublin and Meath, passed into the family of Plunkett of Rathmore, by the marriage of Marian, daughter and heir of Sir Christopher Cruise, with Thomas Plunkett, chief-justice of the king's bench. The family of Wolveston also were seated at Stillorgan through several descents, one of which family was indicted for adhering to the rebellious party in 1641. Stillorgan gives the title of baron to the family of Allen, Viscount Allen. At this place is a square obelisk of stone, of considerable height, placed on a rustic base. From the platform which encompasses the obelisk, are obtained extensive views, comprehending the bay of Dublin and the Irish channel." In the year 1716, a curious sepulchral work was discovered at Stillorgan, of which Sir Thomas Molyneux and Mr. Harris give the following account. The place of inhumation was "a cavity only two feet long, sixteen inches wide, and about fourteen inches deep, the two sides and ends whereof were lined with four rude ag-stones, set edge-ways, over which was placed a covering of one huge massy stone, that ten men could not lift, lying two feet beneath the surface of the ground." This kistvaen contained several fragments of human bones "lying promiscuously dispersed within the hollow of the grave, near which stood an urn, containing nothing but loose earth, that accidentally fell in as the workmen were opening the grave."—[Brewer.] The principal residences, additional to Stillorgan-park, are Riversdale, Stillorgan-castle, Obelisk-park, Stillorgan-house, Landsend, Carysfort, Marino-house, the Cottage, Riddesdale-house, Clannore-house, and Walter's Land.—The village of Stillorgan stands on the road from Dublin to Cabinteely, and on that from Kingstown to Dundrum, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-west of Blackrock, $\frac{1}{4}$ east of Dundrum, $\frac{2}{4}$ west of Kingstown, and 4 south-east of Dublin. A dispensary here is within the Rathdown Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 2,795; and, in 1839-40, it expended £67 9s., and administered to 1,210 patients. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 650; in 1841, 611. Houses 107. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 74; in manufactures and trade, 27; in other pursuits, 25. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 28; on their own manual labour, 88; on means not specified, 6.—Stillorgan parish is nominally a perpetual curacy, but practically a rectory, in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes are compounded for £110 10s. 9d.; and are nominally appropriated to the dean of Christ-church, but have been given as an endowment to the curacy. The curacy of Stillorgan, and the chapelry of KILMACD [see that article], constitute the benefice of Stillorgan. Pop., in 1831, 2,145. Gross income, £187 0s. 9d.; nett, £164 11s. 0d. Patron, the dean of Christ-church. The incumbent holds also the trusteeship of Kildare cathedral, but is resident in Stillorgan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built about 100 years ago, at a cost not now known; and was enlarged in 1812 by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance, from 400 to 550.

* Mr. Twiss, in his 'Tour in Ireland,' observes that the hill of Howth on the opposite shore, when viewed from the platform of the Stillorgan obelisk, appears exactly like the rock of Gibraltar.

In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 721 Churchmen, 9 Protestant dissenters, and 1,271 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 827 Churchmen, 9 Protestant dissenters, and 1,309 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools were supported by subscriptions and collections, and had on their books 56 boys and 80 girls. In 1843, a male school at Stillorgan, an infant school at Stillorgan, and a female school at Relesdale, were salaried with respectively £12 13s. 4d., £10 13s. 4d., and £15 from the National Board, and had on their books respectively 94, 100, and 48 scholars.

STONECARTHY. See STAMCARTHY.

STONEHALL, a parish in the barony of Cork-aree, $\frac{5}{4}$ miles north of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,106 acres, 16 perches,—of which 106 acres, 36 perches are in Lough Dereveragh, and 14 acres, 4 perches are in Lough Patrick. Pop., in 1831, 632; in 1841, 635. Houses 112. Lough Patrick lies wholly in the interior, and sends its superfluous waters to the rivulet Gaine, which traces a small part of the southern boundary. Only the upper part of Lough Dereveragh is in contact with the parish; and it is here extensively beautified with the woods of Moninton. The parochial surface consists, for the most part, of good land. The highest ground is on the western border, and has an altitude of 659 feet above the level of the sea. The principal hamlet is Golmoylestown.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate curacy, yet nominally a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. The vicarage is part of the benefice of TACHMON; which see. The tithes are compounded for £90, and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Headford. The curacies of Stonehall and MULTIFARNHAM [see that article], constitute the benefice or perpetual curacy of Stonehall. Pop., in 1831, 2,105. Gross income, £113 2s. 3d.; nett, £111 11s. 9d. Patron, the incumbent of Taghmon. The church is situated nearly in the centre of Stonehall, and was built in 1809, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 10 to 25. A Roman Catholic chapel and a friary are in Multifarnham. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 603; the Protestants of the union to 72, and the Roman Catholics to 2,055; and there was a daily school in Multifarnham.

STONEHALL, a village in the parish of Kilcornan, barony of Kenry, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on the road from Kildimo to Askeaton, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west of Kildimo, $\frac{2}{4}$ south-south-east of Pallas-kenry, and $\frac{4}{4}$ east by north of Askeaton. Fairs are held on May 14 and Sept. 25. In the vicinity are the seats of Curragh and Hollypark. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 187. Houses 35.

STONEPOUND, an alias name of the village of CLONROACHE; which see.

STONYFORD, a village in the parish of Church-Jerpoint, barony of Knocktopher, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Knocktopher to Kilkenny, with that from Kells to Thomastown, a little south of the King's river, 1 mile west of the river Nore, 2 miles east by south of Kells, 3 north of Knocktopher, and 7 south of Kilkenny. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, a fever-hospital, a dispensary, two schools, and a constabulary barrack. The two medical charities are within the Poor-law union of Kilkenny, and serve for a district containing a pop. of 8,790; and, in 1839, they expended £131, admitted 126 intern patients, and administered to 2,056 extern patients. In 1843, a loan fund in the village had a capital of £210, circulated £625 in 235 loans, realized a nett profit of £3 5s. 5d., expended for charitable purposes

£3 5s. 3d., and had two depositors or proprietors of its capital. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. Within a mile of the village are the seats of Johnswell-house, Mount-Juliet, and Kellsborough-house. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 445; in 1841, 413. Houses 72. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 40; in manufactures and trade, 29; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 37; on their own manual labour, 37; on means not specified, 1.

STONEFYORD (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Meath and Westmeath, Leinster. It rises in the Meath barony of Demifore, a little south of Slieve-Nataliagh, and runs $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-eastward, through the Westmeath barony of Delvin, and the Meath barony of Lune, to the river Boyne, at a point about 4½ miles above Trim.

STRABAE. See STRABANE.

STRABANE, a barony, forming the north-west district of the county of Tyrone, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Londonderry; on the east, by the county of Londonderry and the barony of Dungannon; on the south, by the barony of Omagh; and, on the west, by the county of Donegal. Its length, north by westward, is 19 miles; its greatest breadth is 18 miles; and its area is 240,490 acres, 3 perches,—of which 636 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are tideway of the river Foyle, and 1,233 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are water. The north-west district is a rich, beautiful, and diversified portion of the valley of the Foyle; the north district consists of part of the Sperrin mountains, and the whole of the picturesque highland vale of Glenny; the east district is part of the wild upland moor of the central mountains of north-western Ulster; and the southern, central, and western districts are a series of pleasant and often highly picturesque vales, traversed by the numerous head-streams of the Foyle, and screened and separated by finely outlined and very diversified hills and mountains. Two heights in respectively the extreme north-west and the vicinity of Strabane, but both overhanging the Foyle, are called Duntornon-hill and Knockivoe, and have altitudes of respectively 416 and 969 feet above the level of the sea. Slievekirk, on the north-western boundary, and near the Foyle, has an altitude of 1,225 feet. Four heights, eastward between Strabane and the commencement of the Sperrin mountains at Butterlope-Glen, have altitudes of severally 1,094, 1,343, 969, and 617 feet. The principal summits of the Sperrin mountains in the interior are Mullaghearb, 1,701 feet, a height $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east of Mullaghearb 1,890 feet, and Straw mountain 2,085 feet; and the principal summits of these mountains on the boundary, are Dart mountain 1,612 feet, a height 1 mile east of Dart mountain 2,037, Sawel 2,236, Minard 1,550, and a height $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile east of Minard 2,064. The principal summits of the range which flanks the south side of the vale of Glenny are called Munterlony and Slievemore, and have altitudes of respectively 1,432 and 1,262 feet. Broughderg, the loftiest summit of the moorlands in the east, has an altitude of 1,088 feet. A mountain between the Owenkillew and the Aghnacree rivulets has an altitude of 1,006 feet. Two mountains in the southern district, and from 4 to 5 miles north-north-east of Omagh, have altitudes of respectively 1,381 and 1,778 feet. Mary Grey and another height, in the triangle between the Strule rivulet, the Moyle rivulet, and Atavawn-Glen, have altitudes of respectively 826 and 1,370 feet. The hills Bessy Bell and Meaghy, west of the Strule rivulet and south of the Derg rivulet, have altitudes of respectively 1,380

and 808 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Upper Cumber, Termonmaguir, and Cappagh, and the whole of the parishes of Ardstraw, Lower Badoney, Upper Badoney, Camus, Dough-eady, Leckpatrick, and Urney. The towns and chief villages are Strabane, Newtown-Stewart, Ballymagorry, Gortin, Ardstraw, Douglas-Bridge, Dunnamanagh, and Clady. Pop., in 1831, 71,625; in 1841, 71,145. Houses 12,548. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 8,431; in manufactures and trade, 3,976; in other pursuits, 798. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 235; on the directing of labour, 3,676; on their own manual labour, 9,140; on means not specified, 154. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 11,328; who could read but not write, 7,165; who could neither read nor write, 11,775. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,979; who could read but not write, 10,966; who could neither read nor write, 15,985.—Strabane barony is distributed among the four Poor-law unions of Strabane, Gortin, Castle-Derg, and Omagh. The total number of valued tenements is 8,074; and of these, 3,309 were valued under £5,—2,210, under £10,—982, under £15,—567, under £20,—350, under £25,—201, under £30,—202, under £40,—72, under £50,—and 91, at and above £50. The barony has recently been divided into two baronies, Lower and Upper. The annual valuation of Lower Strabane for the poor-rate amounts to £40,692 9s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840 were £3,274 5s. 2d. and £3,300 4s. 6d., and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £3,757 14s. 6d. and £3,249 13s. 5d. The annual valuation of Upper Strabane for the poor-rate amounts to £18,300 9s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £1,890 6s. 1d. and £2,393 14s. 3d., and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,401 5s. 4d. and £2,129 17s. 1d.

STRABANE,

A market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parishes of Leckpatrick and Urney, but chiefly in the parish of Camus-juxta-Mourne, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the river Mourne, and on the mail-road from Londonderry to Dublin, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south-east of Lifford, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Castle-Finn, $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Dunnamanagh, $7\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Newtown-Stewart, $8\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Castle-Derg, 10 north-west of Gortin, $10\frac{1}{2}$ east by north of Stranorlar, $11\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Londonderry, $20\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Omagh, $20\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Dungiven, 81 west by north of Belfast, and $102\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Dublin.

Environed.—The Mourne river, on which the town is situated, and which combines at Lifford with the Finn to form the Foyle, is, as to at once its volume, its current, and the natural character of its banks, one of the most beautiful rivers in Ireland. The valleys of the Mourne, the Finn, and the Foyle, vie with one another in luxuriance and loveliness; and their plain of convergence around Strabane and Lifford is environed with such a cordon of mountains, at the remotest distance compatible with perfect distinctness of minute feature, as to form a very noble natural amphitheatre. The Sperrin mountains constitute an imposing background on the east; the mountains which screen the valleys of the Strule and the Mourne continue the upland boundary round to the south and the south-west; the frontier mountains of Donegal sweep round by the towns of Stranorlar, Letterkenny, and Rannellon, to Lough Swilly; and the lofty hills overhanging the Foyle, and situated on the boundary with the county of Londonderry, close up the north. A perfect circle of heights, of fine fanns, and at most picturesque distances, thus sweeps round the whole horizon, and renders the rich valley-ground in their centre a brilliant and beautiful region of apparent seclusion from the coldness and coarseness of the common world. The summit of the hill of Knockivoce, on the nearest frontier of the heights connecting with the Sperrin mountains, commands an imposing view of both the grand limits of the panorama, and its intersecting and diversified valleys. In the northern vicinity of the town is Strabane Glen; immediately beyond this glen is Holly-Hill, the seat of J. Sinclair, Esq.; at the south end of the town is Milltown-lodge, the residence of Major Humphries, agent of the Marquis of Abercorn, the proprietor of the town; and within 2 miles, all toward the south-east, south, or south-west, are the seats of Beechmount, Millmount, Castletown-house, Gallanty-house, and Urney-park.

The Interior of the Town.—The Urney section of the town is situated on the left bank of the Mourne, and connected with the centre of the main body of the town by a single bridge; and it consists principally of an irregular and curved street, extending 350 yards westward, along the road to Donegal. The Leekpatrick section consists principally of a small portion of the northern outskirts, lying around the canal basin, and leading out the thoroughfare to Londonderry and the old road to Lifford, but no where approaching within 180 yards of the river. The principal parts of the Camus section or main body of the town, are a street of 1,200 yards in length, extending north-westward near the edge of the river, and parallel to its course; a street of 50 yards in length, coming up north-eastward from the bridge; a very spacious street of 150 yards in length, going off westward at a point 150 yards north-west of the bridge, and sending off from its north side two other very spacious but shorter streets, toward respectively the north-east and the north, and toward such a mutual junction as to form with itself a triangle; and a series of lanes, very narrow streets, and a fine open oblong to the south and south-east. All the older streets are confined, inconvenient, and ill-suited to business; but the modern streets and openings are airy and well-edified, and have both good dwelling-houses and good shops. "Strabane," says Mr. Inglis, "I found a remarkably neat and pretty looking town, with several streets, which contain excellent houses and capital shops. In spite of the obstacle offered to improvement by the refusal of the Marquis of Abercorn to grant good leases, the town advances nevertheless." But, says Mr. Fraser, "Though in comparison with other towns respectably inhabited and well circumstanced in all the localities appertaining to a country town, it is far from being neat, clean, or orderly,—circumstances the more remarkable, as there are few existing leases, comparatively speaking, and the town is wholly the property of the Marquis of Abercorn."—The public buildings are a church, on the northern verge of the Camus section; a Roman Catholic chapel, near the south end of the Camus section; a Roman Catholic chapel, in the Urney section; two Presbyterian meeting-houses; two Methodist meeting-houses; a number of schools; a sessions-house, in the Leekpatrick district; a bride-well; a fever hospital, at the southern extremity of the Camus section; and the workhouse of a Poor-law union. A Franciscan friary at one time stood in the town; but the history of it is lost.

Poor-law Union.—The Strabane Poor-law union ranks as the 31st, and was declared on April 8, 1839. It lies partly in co. Tyrone, and partly in co. Donegal, and comprehends an area of 134,209 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 62,084. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are, in co. Tyrone, Strabane, 5,556,—Camus, 2,870,—Glenmoruan, 1,784,—Ballymagerry, 3,723,—Dunmalong, 3,107,—Mount-Castle, 2,026,—Ballyneaney, 1,656,—Dunnamanagh, 2,171,—Douglas-Burn, 1,831,—Newtown-Stewart, 2,376,—Baron's-Court, 3,093,—Churchlands, 2,975,—Altacleday, 2,143,—and East Urney, 2,779; and in co. Donegal, West Urney, 1,897,—Cloghard, 2,244,—Castle-Finn, 2,993,—Figgert, 1,983,—Raphoe, 2,632,—Feddylglass, 1,876,—Treantagbmucklagh, 1,986,—St. Johnstown, 2,465,—North Clonleigh, 2,852,—and South Clonleigh, 3,058. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 5 and 25; and 2 of the latter are elected by the division of Strabane, and 1 by each of the other divisions. All the Tyrone divisions are in the barony of Strabane; and all the Donegal divisions are in the barony of Raphoe. The number of valued tenements in the former is 3,956,—in the latter, 2,639,—in the entire union, 6,595; and of this total, 2,441 were valued under £5,—1,487, under £10,—833, under £15,—624, under £20,—424, under £25,—252, under £30,—274, under £40,—115, under £50,—and 145, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £80,886 9s. 5d.; the total number of persons rated is 6,595; and of these, 503 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—736, not exceeding £2,—499, not exceeding £3,—403, not exceeding £4,—and 366, not exceeding £5. The work-house was contracted for on Nov. 4, 1839,—to be completed in June, 1841,—to cost £6,885 for building and completion, and £1,355 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 9 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches, obtained as a free gift from the Marquis of Abercorn, subject only to a payment of £60 of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Nov. 18, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £4,070 14s. 2½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £552 16s. 2d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 222. The medical charities within the union are the Donegal county infirmary at Lifford, a fever hospital at Strabane, and dispensaries at Strabane, Clonleigh, Dunnamanagh, Newtown-Stewart, and Raphoe; and, in 1839, they received £312 10s. 5d. from subscription, £1,273 11s. 3d. from public grants, and £171 9s. 6d. from other sources,—expended £680 2s. in salaries to medical officers, £160 19s. 10d. for medicines, and £919 11s. 9d. for contingencies,—and administered to 249 intern and 9,340 extern patients. The fever hospital at Strabane is not statistically reported on. The dispensary at Strabane serves for a district of 30,240 acres, with a pop. of 17,701; and, in 1839, it expended £135, and administered to 3,722 patients.

Trade.—Strabane was, at one time, one of the best linen-markets of Ireland; and it will probably reacquire its former prosperity and pre-eminence. The export trade in provisions and agricultural produce is comparatively extensive; and is greatly aided, not only by the town's advantageous position in reference to the surrounding rich country, but by a canal navigation connecting it with the naturally navigable part of the Foyle. This canal commences at the north end of the town, and extends about 3½ miles northward, nearly parallel with the Foyle, to the mouth of the Donnet Burn, and there, on the northern boundary of the parish of Leekpatrick, it makes a junction with the Foyle. Vessels frequenting the canal are tugged on the Foyle, by a small steamer, between the end of the canal and the city of Londonderry. "Strabane," says an official report, "is a place of considerable trade and agricultural produce, of which a large proportion, purchased in the Strabane market, is transmitted by a canal and by the river Lough Foyle, for exportation to Derry. By an Act of the Irish Parliament (31 George III., c. 427), debentures to the amount of £3,703 12s., bearing interest of four per cent., were granted to the then Marquis of Abercorn, to enable him to make a canal from a place adjacent to Strabane to the river of Lough Foyle. The canal was formed. Complaints are made of the amount of tolls levied on the transit of goods, which, according to the statute above referred to, and a preceding Act of Parliament (29 Geo. III., c. 33), the Marquis of Abercorn was empowered to impose to the amount of 2s. per ton. The facilities, however, afforded by the canal for conveying agricultural produce to the place of export, have been among the causes of the remarkable improvement which has occurred in the markets of Strabane. The town is well situated for the purposes of a corn-market. Several roads, leading from extensive tracts of tillage land, converge at Strabane, or in its neighbourhood; and there is no other considerable market for corn within a distance of many miles." The comparative local insignificance of Lifford, combined with its political importance as the county town of Donegal, and with its almost immediate juxtaposition to Strabane, throws into the latter town very nearly all the trade advantages arising from the assizes, general sessions, and county meetings of Donegal, and renders it, in every practical point of view, exceedingly more the county town or capital of Donegal than Lifford itself. Strabane, in fact, is the grand emporium for all the central and south-eastern districts of Donegal, and for most of the eastern, south-eastern, central, and northern districts of Tyrone; and, even if its strictly local advantages were greatly inferior to what they are, it could scarcely fail to be a seat of much business and prosperity. "There is," said Mr. Inglis in 1834, "an excellent retail trade, and an improving linen trade, which averages a sale of about 500 pieces weekly. I saw little or nothing of rags in Strabane: there was a respectable look about the people, and every thing else. The poverty-stricken appearance of the Irish towns was fast disappearing. I perceived that I was verging towards the north, and getting among a different race of men. I heard few complaints of want of employment about Strabane; and temperance is the usual rate of wages." Fairs are held on Feb. 1, May 12, Aug. 1, and Nov. 12. The town has two inns and posting establishments; and it has branch offices of the Belfast Banking Company, and the Provincial Bank of Ireland. In 1838, the public conveyances were a mail-car to Castle-Derg, a mail-car to Ramelton, a mail-coach in transit between Londonderry and Dublin, a coach between Londonderry and Enniskillen, a coach between Londonderry and Omagh, and a mail-coach between Londonderry and Sligo.

Municipal Affairs.—Strabane was incorporated by charter of 10 James I.; and its incorporation formed part of the plan for the plantation of Ulster. The limits were not assigned by charter, yet are found recorded in a bye-law of 1769; and they extend $3\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles from south to north, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from east to west. The corporation was styled, "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Strabane;" and consisted of a provost, 12 free burgesses, and an indefinite number of commonalty. No Roman Catholic was permitted to become a member of the corporation. The freedom of the corporation is of no substantial value, and is not an object of ambition. A court of record was created by the charter, to be presided over solely by the provost, to be conducted in the usual manner of courts of record, and to exercise civil jurisdiction to the amount of £3 6s. 8d. Courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions are held in the town,—the latter on the second Monday of every month. Strabane is the head-quarters of one of the five districts of the constabulary force of co. Tyrone. The property of the corporation consists of the tolls of the fairs and markets, the town-hall, and the shambles,—principally the first. So great and rapid has been the recent increase in the local sales of the agricultural produce, that a spacious market has been erected by the corporation, at the cost, including the purchase money of part of the site, of no less than £15,000. The annual income of the corporation during the years 1823—1833 varied from £307 16s. 7½d. Irish to £666 17s. 11d. British; and the surplus of their annual income over their annual expenditure during these years varied from £23 16s. 11d. Irish to £116 10s. 5d. British. The borough, or rather the Marquis of Abercorn as its "patron," sent two members to the Irish parliament. A water cess is levied upon each house in the town, at the rate of 3d. per £1 upon houses of from £5 to £10 of rent, 4½d. upon houses of from £10 to £20, and 6d. upon houses of £20 and upwards.—A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland has its seat in Strabane, exercises inspection over 10 congregations, and meets on the first Wednesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. Two of the congregations of this presbytery meet in Strabane, two in Newtown-Stewart, two in Ardstraw, and four in respectively Clady, Glenelly, Douglas, and Urney.—Strabane gives the subordinate title of Baron in the peerage of Ireland to the Marquis of Abercorn.

Statistics.—Pop. of the town, in 1831, 4,700; in 1841, 4,704. Houses 776. Area of the Camus section, 148 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,701; in 1841, 3,611. Houses 599. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 135; in manufactures and trade, 466; in other pursuits, 145. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 31; on the directing of labour, 416; on their own manual labour, 275; on means not specified, 24. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 770; who could read but not write, 304; who could neither read nor write, 389. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 580; who could read but not write, 531; who could neither read nor write, 651. Area of the Leckpatrick section, 36 acres. Pop., in 1831, 304; in 1841, 503. Houses 86. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 34; in manufactures and trade, 39; in other pursuits, 18. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 38; on their own manual labour, 41; on means not specified, 4. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 75; who could read but not write, 42; who could neither read nor write, 64. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 88; who could read but not write, 68; who could neither read nor write, 105. Area of the Urney section, 69 acres. Pop., in 1831, 635; in 1841, 590. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 29; in manufactures and trade, 57; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 59; on their own manual labour, 43; on means not specified, 2. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 105; who could read but not write, 54; who could neither read nor write, 80. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 78; who could read but not write, 80; who could neither read nor write, 127.

STRABAGY, or STRABEGAGH. See STRABRE-AGA.

STRABOE, a parish in the barony of Rathvilly, 3½ miles north-west by north of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, east by southward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,104 acres, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 195; in 1841, 214. Houses 36. The surface consists of prime land; and is traversed by the road from Tullow to Castle-Dermot. Straboe rath, on the southern border, has an altitude above sea-level of 395 feet. The other antiquities are the ruins of Templeboy church, and the site of a castle. —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHVILLY [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £115 10s. 3d. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

STRABOE, or SHANE, a parish in the barony of East Maryborough, 2½ miles north-east by north of the town of Maryborough, Queen's county, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 4½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2; area, 5,757 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,176; in 1841, 2,002. Houses 341. The surface comprises a large quantity of bog, and, in general, consists of but indifferent land. The road from Maryborough to Dublin, and that from Mountmellick to Stradbally, intersect each other in the interior. A chief object of interest is the castle of SHANE: which see. At Straboe proper are the ruins of a church, and a once celebrated well. The seats are Shane-house and Bloomfield-house. —This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MARYBOROUGH [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £92 6s. 2d., and the rectorial for £184 12s. 3½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in William Lewes, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dysertenois and Maryborough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 2,175.

STRABREAGA, a bay on the west coast of the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is the most northerly bay in Ireland, and, in hazy weather, has frequently been mistaken by seamen for Lough Swilly. Its exterior part is an open sweep of the sea, between Malin Head and Dunaff Head, measuring nearly 7 miles across the entrance, and penetrating the land 3 miles east-south-eastward; and its interior part—to which the name of Strabreaga is often restricted—opens at the head of the former, with a width of 1½ mile, and penetrates the land 4½ miles south-eastward, sending off a small ramification to the south, and attaining an extreme interior width of nearly 1½ mile. The parish of Cloncha lies on the north-east shore; the parishes of Donagh and Clonmany lie on the south-west shore; the village of Malin is situated about the middle of the north-east side; and the town of Carndonagh stands within 2 miles of the head. The coast outward, from both sides of the entrance of the inner bay, is very rocky, and is swept by exceedingly rapid tidal currents; the entrance itself is encumbered with rocks and with a high bar, and is considerably perilous; and the interior, though offering accommodation to vessels of 150 tons burden, has only a stripe of navigable channel, and is to a very great extent dry at low water. Strabreaga, in consequence of being mistaken for Lough Swilly, has been the scene of some melancholy shipwrecks.

STRADBALLY, a barony in the eastern part of Queen's county, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Portnebhinch; on the east, by the county of Kildare, and the barony of Ballyadams; on the south, by the barony of Ballyadams; and on the west, by the baronies of Cullinagh and East Maryborough. Its length, southward, is 10 miles; its breadth varies from a few perches to 5½ miles, and in general is greatest in the north, and tapers to a point in the south; and its area is 27,895 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 18 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches are water. The northern district is low, but aggregately ornate and beautiful; and the southern district is hilly, and contains two heights of respectively 783 and 1,079 feet of altitude above the level of the sea. The Athy branch of the Grand Canal connecting the Barrow navigation with Dublin, crosses the north-east wing. —This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballyadams, Dysertenois, Timahoe, Killeel, and Tullomoy, and the whole of the parishes of Curraclone, Killyenny, Moyanna, Stradbally, and Timogue. The only town is Stradbally. Pop., in 1831, 8,328; in 1841, 8,736. Houses 1,444. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,117; in manufactures and trade, 280; in other pursuits, 164. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 40; on the directing of labour, 541; on their own manual labour, 929; on means not specified, 51. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,502; who could read but not write, 855; who could neither read nor write, 1,457. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,036; who could read but not write, 1,065; who could neither read nor write, 1,776. —Stradbally barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Athy. The total number of valued tenements is 1,375; and of these, 746 were valued under £5,—228, under £10,—131, under £15,—63, under £20,—49, under £25,—22, under £30,—34, under £40,—19, under £50,—and 83, at and above £50.

STRADBALLY, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,466 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,392; in 1841, 2,588. Houses 442. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 593; in 1841, 906. Houses 154. The surface consists of light, undulated, arable land, wholly profitable; and a large proportion of it is occupied with the demesnes of Stradbally-hall and Brockley-park, the residences of respectively Thomas Cosby, Esq., and William D. Ferrar, Esq. These two demesnes, and that of Ballykilcavin in the adjoining parish of Curraclone, are fused into one another, and form an expanse of park and forest scenery, very similar in style and surface to the best specimens of the embellished champaign grounds of England. The demesne of Stradbally-hall is finely undulated and otherwise irregular in surface, and though not very extensive, is well-wooded and beautiful; and the mansion is a commodious edifice, with the style of entrance characteristic of the old English hall. On this demesne formerly stood one of the strongest castles of the O'Mores; and much of the property of these ancient toparchs, together with their principal seat, was granted to the family of Cosby. The following story respecting this property is told by Sir Charles Coote, the statish of the county: "An Irish chief, envying that the estates of the O'Mores should have been transferred to English adventurers, sent the Cosbys a haughty message, that he on a certain day would cross the bridge of Stradbally with his soldiers, and demanded for that purpose a pass; which was the reputed form of a challenge in those times. To allow it would be acknowledging the inferiority of the Cosbys, and a mark of pusillanimity which never was the characteristic of that race. They, of course, prepared to give the Irish battle, and were ranged to dispute the pass with the enemy, who came in great numbers at the appointed time. The issue of the battle was long doubtful, which was fought with great bravery and perseverance; and at many times each party seemed certain of success. Victory at length determined in favour of the Cosbys; but amongst the brave men who fell that day, were included the chiefs on both sides. With Cosby, also fell his brother, the joint possessor of the estate; and each had the benefit of survivorship. Their deaths were beheld by their ladies from a window in the castle, which overlooked the scene; and one of them at the instant her husband was killed, called out to other witnesses, "Remember my husband did not fall first, consequently the estate descended to him, and is now the property of my eldest son;" which remarkable saying could not be forgot in the presence of so many witnesses, and determined the point in favour of the child of this lady; whose wary prudence, and unprecedented resolution, showed a presence of mind as strong and superior to her sex, as her hardness of heart and want of tenderness were unbecoming of it." Brockley-park mansion was formerly a residence of the Earls of Roden, and was built in 1768, on the site of a former mansion, within the lands of Derrybrook, under the direction of Ducaut, an Italian architect. The rivulet Straid, a small affluent of the Barrow, flows eastward, past the town; and the roads from Abbeyleix to Dublin, from Maryborough to Athy, and from Mountmellick to Carlow, intersect one another in the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition, £69 4s. 7d.; glebe, £35 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £139 9s. 7d.; and are inappropriate in the provost, fellows, and scholars of Trinity College, Dublin. The vicarages of Stradbally and MOYANNA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Stradbally. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 4,051. Gross income, £242 18s. 9d.; nett, £216 0s. 2d. Patron, Thomas Cosby, Esq. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Drumgath, in the dio. of Drogheda, but is resident in Stradbally. The church was built about 78 years ago by subscription.ittings 300; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,655; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Timahoe. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 364, and the Roman Catholics to 1,982; the Protestants of the union amounted to 489, and the Roman Catholics to 3,461; and 9 daily schools in the union—7 of which were in the parish—had on their books 397 boys and 301 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board.

STRADBALLY, a small market and post-town in the parish and barony of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the western mail-road from Dublin to Cork, with the road from Mountmellick to Carlow, 5 miles south-south-east of Emo, ½ east by south of Maryborough, 6½ west by north of Athy, 7½ north-north-east of Timahoe, 18½ south of Portarlington, 9 south-south-west of Monastereven, 9½ north-east of Abbeyleix, 15½ north-west by north of Carlow, and 40 south-west of Dublin. The town is beautifully situated, on a charmingly and softly picturesque reach of the rivulet Straid, in the midst of a profusely wooded plain, nearly surrounded by finely curved and warmly tinted hills. Its streets are spacious; some of its houses are respectable; and both its outskirts and its interior are shaded by rows of elms, and numerous scattered trees. Sir Charles Coote asserts it to be "by far the neatest inland town in this county, or anywhere else he knows of;" yet it strikes a stranger less by its interior cleanliness, comfort, or appearances of prosperity, than by its obvious capabilities of improvement, and the beauty of its situation, and particularly of its environs. The bridge which here spans the Straid has three arches. The church is an elegant and venerable edifice, and succeeded one which was built by the ancestors of Mr. Cosby early in the 17th century. The original church, or that in use previous to the 17th century, stood at Ochmills, and was converted into the cemetery or mausoleum of the Cosby family. The Roman Catholic chapel is a spacious building. A monastery for conventual Franciscans was founded at Stradbally, in the 12th century, by one of the O'Mores; and, in 1592, it was granted to the family of Cosby. The small court-house is a neat structure; and the bride-well is a clean and regularly kept small prison, and has two day-rooms to separate the sexes. Courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions are held in the town,—the latter on every Wednesday. The town is the head-quarters of one of the 7 districts of the constabulary of Queen's county, and it has a dispensary and a savings' bank. The dispensary is within the Poor-law union of Athy, and serves for a district of 51,142 acres, with a pop. of 11,343; and, in 1839-40, it expended £160, and administered to 2,411 patients. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on May 6, July 10, Aug. 21, Sept. 14, and Nov. 21. The public conveyances in 1838, were a caravan in transit between Dublin and Mount-rath, and a mail-coach in transit between Dublin and Cork. The main trunk of the southern system of railways projected by the Public Commissioners, passes within 7 statute miles of Stradbally. Area of the town, 79 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,799; in 1841, 1,682. Houses 288. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 108; in manufactures and trade, 162; in other pursuits, 87. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 21; on the directing of labour, 176; on their own manual labour, 127; on means not specified, 33.

STRADBALLY, a parish on the coast of the barony of Dunkellin, 3½ miles south-south-east of Oranmore, co. Galway, Connought. It contains the villages of Stradbally and Clarin-Bridge: see CLARIN-BRIDGE. Length, south-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 4,167 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 144 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 1,063; in 1841, 1,264. Houses 185. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 784. Houses 110. The surface descends to the middle of the head of Galway bay, is crossed by the mail-road from Galway to Limerick, and consists of light limestone land, much encumbered with naked rock. A long narrow inlet of the sea, called Dumbulcaun bay, projects from Galway bay and forms a considerable part of the north-western boundary of the parish. The village of Stradbally stands on this bay, nearly a mile west of the Galway and Limerick road; and it is a fishing station, and has a small pier, and a few fishing-boats. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 280. Houses 47. The hamlets are Gortare, Taramud, Kilcornan, and Weir.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £31 10s., and the rectorial for £118 2s.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop and the archdeacon of Kilmacduagh. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Clarin-Bridge, and has an attendance of about 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,124; a boarding and daily school was situated at the monastery of the monks of the order of St. Patrick, was taught by two of the monks, was endowed with a small bequest of land by the late Mr. Redington of Glen-law, and partially aided by Mrs. Redington, and had on its books 165 boys; a school at Stradbally for girls was salaried with £25 a-year and other advantages from Mrs. Redington of Kilmoran, and had on its books 66 girls; and a pay daily school at Kilcolgan-Bridge was usually attended by about 12 scholars.

STRADBALLY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the north coast of the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 4,103 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,253; in 1841, 1,202. Houses 170. Area of the village, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 425; in 1841, 336. Houses 52. The surface extends round the greater part of Brandon bay, and sends a narrow wing up the acclivities of this overhanging mountain. See BRANDON.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFLYN [which see], in the dio. of Ardferit and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £60; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

STRADBALLY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the coast of the barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south by westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 10,917 acres, 1 road, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 3,406, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,642; in 1841, 4,419. Houses 626. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,634; in 1841, 3,605. Houses 508. The number of townlands is 35. About 2 per cent. of the whole surface is meadow; about 38 per cent. is arable land; and all the remainder is pasture and bog. One height in the north has an altitude above sea-level of 379 feet; one a little north of the centre has an altitude of 390 feet; and two summit-cliffs on the coast have altitudes of 243 and 254 feet. The Tay and the Dalligan streams run through the interior to the ocean. The coast or sea-board abounds with copper and lead ores; and it is indented by the three coves of Stradbally, Ballyvish, and Ballyvoney. The natural manures in use are sand and sea-weed. The seats are Sarahville, in the northern district; Carrickbarraha-house and Carrickanna-house, in the central district; and Woodhouse, on the coast, and in the south-western vicinity of the village. The last is the residence of Robert Uniacke, Esq.; and is charmingly situated amid a beautifully wooded demesne, in the sheltered glen of the Tay. "On the sea-coast, at the distance of 6 miles from Kilmaethomas," says the Rev. R. H. Ryland, in an occasional notice of the parish, "is the village of Stradbally, consisting of one long and irregularly built street. The church, which is a modern building, stands on the site of the old church; near it are the ruins of an abbey of Augustinian friars, the last of whom, called the White Friar, is still the hero of many legendary tales. At Ballyvoney, the traces of an extensive building are still discernible; the length was an hundred and fifty feet, the breadth ninety feet. An open well in front of the building communicated by a subterraneous passage of two hundred feet, with another well within the walls. The water which supplied these wells was brought through an aqueduct, extending nearly half-a-mile. This building was supposed to have been one of the Knights Templars' houses, of which establishments this county only contained four, the sites of which are all known. Adjoining the village of Stradbally, and immediately contiguous to the sea, is Woodhouse, the seat of Robert Uniacke, Esq. It is mentioned in Smith's History of Waterford, that in the year 1742, an ancestor of the present proprietor obtained a premium for having planted 152,640 trees; and it is added, 'were they properly taken care of, they would in time make a noble plantation.' Notwithstanding their proximity to the sea, these trees have flourished in a remarkable manner, and now demonstrate the practicability of growing timber in almost any situation, provided the requisite care and expense be afforded. Woodhouse was anciently called Torc-Raith; it was the residence of part of the sept of the Geraldines, and the scene of much valorous contention. The ruins of many castles are still discernible in this and the neighbouring parishes. At Temple Bric, a vast rock in the sea, distant about forty yards from the shore, there are traces of an ancient building supposed to have been the residence of O'Bric, the chief of the southern Decies. A species of hawk, remarkable for great strength and courage, frequented this rock, and is occasionally seen there at the present time. About two miles to the south-west of Stradbally, are the ruins of a castle, called in Irish 'the house of fortification'; it is situated on a very steep cliff which overhangs the sea, and was defended on the land side by a deep trench, over which was a drawbridge. This castle was built by the Fitzgeralds, and was inhabited at no very remote period. A little beyond this, near the river Dallygan, there stood for many years a representation of a human figure, rudely cut out of a rock; it was considered by the country people as the image of a saint, and was presented by travellers with a green branch, a leaf, a flower, and a heap of these always lay before it. It was afterwards removed, and cast into the sea. There are in this parish the relics of Druidical works, if we may judge from their appearance. At Drunulohan is an enclosure of an oval form, 182 feet in length and 133 feet in its greatest breadth; in the centre is a large stone, around which some of smaller size are raised. A subterranean circular chamber, thirty feet in diameter, and roofed with flags which met in a point at top, was discovered a few years ago near Woodhouse, and is also supposed to be of Druidic origin. Whilst enumerating the wonders of this neighbourhood, Clough-lowrish, or 'the speaking stone,' must not be omitted. This is an enormous rock or mountain mass, which seems to have rolled down from the adjoining hill, and is now firmly fixed in the centre of a stream near the road from Waterford to Dungarvan. The stone is split in a remarkable manner, the fissure dividing the mass into two nearly equal parts. There is a tradition that some person, as he passed this rock, expressed a wish that it might speak and divide into two parts, if the declaration which he was making were not true; the story goes, that the stone did split and also speak, and the appellant was also convicted of falsehood. The rock is a very coarse pudding-stone, and might have been induced to convict the perjurer, by the influence of frost upon water, which can easily percolate the mass: whether the sound emitted on the occasion was an articulate one, it is not easy to determine." The village of Stradbally stands on the road from Bonmahon to Dungarvan, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Bonmahon, 5 south-south-west of Kilmaethomas, and 7 east-north-east of Dungarvan. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Friday of every month; and fairs are held on June 1, and Sept. 14. Area of the village, 42 acres. Pop., in 1831, 752; in 1841, 814. Houses 118. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 82; in manufactures and trade, 42; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 64; on their own manual labour, 78; on means not specified, 13.—Stradbally parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £295 4s. 4d., and the rectorial for £500; and the latter are impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The vicarages of Stradbally, CLONEA, and BALLYLANEEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Stradbally. Length, south-westward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 4½. Pop., in 1831, 7,900. Gross income, £665 3s. 8d.; nett, £388 13s. 8d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1802, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and received the addition of a gallery in 1830, at the cost of £60. Sittings 150; attendance 85. The Stradbally, Faba, and Ballylaneen Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 800, and 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Clonea. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 112, and the Roman Catholics to 3,676; the Protestants of the union to 242, and the Roman Catholics to 8,114; 4 daily schools in the parish had on their books 152 boys and 106 girls; and 10 daily schools in the union had on their books 447 boys and 209 girls. One of the schools in the parish was in connection with the London Hibernian Society; and each of two was salaried with £15 Irish a-year from a bequest by the late Pierce Berron, Esq. In 1843, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Stradbally.

STRADBALLY, co. Limerick. See CASTLE-CONNELL.

STRADE. See STRAID.

STRADONE, a post village in the parish of Larah, barony of Upper Loughree, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Ballyhaise to Virginia, with that from Cavan to Sherecock, 5 miles south-south-east of Ballyhaise, 5 east by south of Cavan, and 5½ north-west of Dublin. Fairs are held on Feb. 7, March 28, May 10, June 24, Aug. 16, Oct. 10, Nov. 10, and Dec. 18. A dispensary here is within the Poor-law union of Cavan; and, in 1839-40, it expended £57 15s. 9d., and administered to 3,245 patients. Adjoining the village on the west is Stradone demesne, the beautiful residence of Robert Burrows, Esq.; and within a mile are the churches of Larah and Lavey, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 250; in 1841, 322. Houses 50.

STRAFFAN, a parish in the barony of North Salt, 2½ miles south-west of Celbridge, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, north-eastward, 2½ miles; breadth, from ¾ to 1½; area, 2,28½ acres, 2 roads, 18 perches,—of which 24 acres, 3 roads, 19 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1831, 727; in 1841, 834. Houses 122. The river Liffey describes the whole of the south-east boundary. The parochial surface is a fertile, beautiful, and ornate portion of the valley of the Liffey; and is traversed by the roads from Dublin to respectively Clane and Naas. The seats are Irishtown-house, Barberstown-castle, Barberstown-cottage, and Straffon-house,—the last the handsome and charming residence of Hugh Barton, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILDROUGHT [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial title composition, £50; glebe, £42. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £80; and are impropriate, and claimed by William Whitelaw, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Celbridge. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 702; and two pay daily schools had on their books 46 boys and 17 girls.

STRAID, or STRADE (THE), a rivulet of the eastern district of Queen's co., Leinster. It rises on the north-west side of Scotland-Hill; and runs 4½ miles north-north-eastward through the baronies of Cullennagh and Stradbally, to the village of Stradbally, and about the same distance eastward to the Barrow, at a point 4 miles above Athy. It is a beautiful little stream.

STRAID, or STRADE, a village in the parish of Ballinure, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Ballinure to Carrickfergus, with that from Carnmoney to Larne, ¼ mile south-east of Ballinure, 4½ north-west of Carrickfergus, and 7 south-west of Larne. Fairs are held on Sept. 4 and Oct. 23. Pop. not specially returned.

STRAID, or TEMPLEMORE, a parish in the barony of Gallen, 3½ miles south-south-west of Foxford, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, north-westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from ½ to ¾; area, 9,462 acres, 3 roads, 36 perches,—of which 724 acres, 1 road, 13 perches lie detached, 238 acres, 1 road, 3 perches are in Lough Cullen, and 146 acres, 1 road, 4 perches are in the river Moy and in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,135; in 1841, 4,251. Houses 749. The surface is low and flat, and comprises a considerable quantity of bog. Lough Cullen lies partly within the north-west corner; the river Moy flows across the north-west district; and the river Cylidagh or Castlebar describes the western boundary. The road from Foxford to Castlebar and Manilla passes through the interior; and is overlooked by the hamlet of Straid. The other hamlets are Springhill, Doolaina, Derryneer, Cullyaun, and Bleanmore. The principal residences are Ballyvalton-house, Burrisfield, Pollagh-house, Tawnagh-cottage, Stradlodge, Fencelield-house, Longfield-house, and Ashbrook-house. The chief antiquities are the ruins of an abbey and of Ballyvalton-castle. The abbey is situated at the hamlet of Straid, and was founded by the ancient family of MacJordan for friars of the Franciscan order; but, in 1252, was given, by Jordan of Exeter, Lord of Athlethan, or by his son Stephen, to the Dominicans. "A very small part of this friary remains," says Archdall, "but the walls of the church, which was singularly beautiful, are still entire, and the high altar is adorned with Gothic ornaments; in the centre of the altar is an image of our Lord and Saviour when an infant, in the Virgin's lap, and a person in relieve within a compartment on each side. Here is also a tomb adorned with curious reliefs of four kings, in different compartments, one of whom is kneeling before a mitred person; near to which is another relieve of the saints Peter and Paul." Fairs are held at Straid on May 31, July 30, Oct. 23, and Nov. 27. The village is a constabulary station.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £139 15s. 8d.; and the latter are impropriate in Sir William Henry Palmer. The vicarages of Straid, KILLASSER, TOOMORE, BUCHOLLA, and KILLEDAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Straid. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 23,691. Gross income, £493 8s. 2d.; nett, £841 14s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. One curate, employed at Foxford in Toomore, receives a salary of 100; and one, employed at Ballinamore in Killedan, receives a salary of £75. Two churches are situated at respectively Foxford and Ballinamore; and the former has an attendance of 90, and the latter of 10. Six Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice have attendances of 1,600, 1,700, 1,200, 1,800, 4,000, and

1,000; and five of these chapels are situated at respectively Straid, Foxford, Bueholla, Callow, and Ballinamore. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 4,420; the Protestants of the union to 216, and the Roman Catholics to 25,211; 4 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 172 boys and 69 girls; and 20 daily schools in the union had on their books 1,313 boys and 605 girls. In 1843, the National Board had a temporary school at the village of Straid.

STRAIDKELLY, a village in the parish of Tickmacrevan, barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the coast, and on the road from Glenarm to Cushendall, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-west of Glenarm. Pop. not specially returned.

STRANCALLY-CASTLE, a demesne, and an old castle, in the parish of Kilcockan, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. The demesne is situated on the lower side of the confluence of the Blackwater and the Bride, 5 miles east-south-east of Tallow, and 7 north of Youghal. The Blackwater here expands into a bay, affords anchorage to sea-borne vessels, is overlooked on both banks by a series of ornate demesnes, and displays a profusion of the rich and lovely features which pre-eminently distinguish the whole of its lower valley. Strancally-castle is the residence of John Keely, Esq.; and is a modern castellated Gothic structure, built from designs by G. R. Payne, Esq. of Cork. The porch front is high, and tastefully executed, and commands a noble view of the voluminous and sylvan confluence of the rivers; and the irregular embrasure towers and other ornamental parts of the mansion, soaring above the foliage of a great expanse of forest, and appearing to overhang the very edge of the water, possess a very picturesque character, and produce a most imposing effect. The old castle of Strancally crowns a rock on the edge of the Blackwater, 3 miles south of the demesne, and adjacent to a residence called Strancally-house; and it was a stronghold of the Earls of Desmond, and rendered infamous as the scene of unvoted barbarities during their feudal wars. "The castle of Strancally," says the Rev. R. H. Ryland, "is situated on a high rock on the bank of the Blackwater, which is here of considerable breadth. The castle enjoyed a bold and commanding situation, was fortified, and in every respect a place of strength. From the foundation on which it stood, an extensive subterranean cave, with a passage communicating with the river, was cut through the solid rock, and thus provided, the worthy Lords of Desmond were no contemptible imitators of the ancient giants. It was the custom of these gentle lords to invite their wealthy and distinguished neighbours to partake of the festivities of Strancally; and having thus gotten them into their power, the victims were carried through the rocky passage into the dungeon, where they were suffered to perish, and from thence, through an opening which is still visible, their corpses were cast into the river; thus disposed of, their fortunes became an easy prey. These practices continued for a long time, until at length, one, more fortunate than his fellow-prisoners, escaped the final doom, and gave information of the facts to government. The castle and cave were immediately ordered to be demolished by gunpowder. The plate of Strancally-castle in Grose's 'Antiquities of Ireland,' admirably displays the effect of the explosion; the cave is entirely laid open, and one-half of the walls of the castle removed, thereby exposing to view the entire arrangement of the interior of the building."

STRANDTOWN, a village in the parish of Hollywood, barony of Lower Castleragh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the road from Belfast to Hollywood, adjacent to the shore of Belfast Lough, and to the east end of Ballymacarret, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile east by north of Belfast, and $\frac{2}{3}$ miles south-west of Holly-wood. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 109. Houses 24.

STRANGFORD, a small port, market, and seaport town, in the parish of Ballyculter, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the west shore of the sound or entrance of Lough Strangford, 5 furlongs south-west, by water, of Portaferry, 6 miles north-east by east of Downpatrick, $\frac{7}{8}$ north-north-east of Ardglass, 27 south-east of Belfast, and 79 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Dublin. It is a neat little town, and occupies a beautiful situation. Adjoining and almost embracing it is Viscount Bangor's improved and charmingly situated demesne of CASTLE-WARD [which see]; and within a mile, and on the same side of the lough, are the seats of Green-house and Templemount. Of 27 castles which were built by John De Courcy on the shores of Lough Strangford, 4 are in the vicinity of the town.—Kilief-castle, near the entrance of the sound,—Portaferry-castle, at Portaferry,—Audley's-castle, half-a-mile north-west of the church of Strangford,—and Walsh's-castle, a little above Audley's, and inhabited by the family of Anderson, who have possessed it since the reign of Charles I. An interesting view of the town, with Audley's-castle and Lord Bangor's demesne, is obtained in a slanting position from a projecting point of the south shore of the sound. The public buildings are a chapel-of-ease to the parish-church, a small Methodist meeting-house, a custom-house, and a quay,—the last chiefly for the accommodation of fishing vessels, and of the boats employed in the ferry across the sound. Fairs are held on Feb. 28, June 5, Aug. 12, and Nov. 8. The exports and imports of Strangford include those of Portaferry, Downpatrick, and the other seats of population on the shores of the lough; and, in 1835, they amounted in estimated value to respectively £79,633 6s. 4d., and £20,498 8s. The chief items of the exports were £59,220 16s. of corn, meal, and flour, £16,641 13s. 4d. of potatoes, £1,648 of cows and oxen, £865 1s. of miscellaneous goods, £420 of butter, £340 of horses, £280 of kelp, and £120 of linen;—and the chief items of the imports were £9,849 15s. of coals, culm, and cinders, £3,566 8s. of miscellaneous goods, £2,446 of corn, meal, and flour, £1,815 of unwrought iron, £1,660 of oak bark for tanners, £720 of herrings and other fish, £161 of corn and malt, and £120 of unwrought lead. Strangford is alleged to have derived its name from the strong ford or current of the tide in the sound; and it gives the title of Viscount in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Smythe. In 1628, Sir Thomas Smythe was created Viscount Strangford; and, in 1825, Percy-Clinton-Sydney, eighth Viscount, who had been ambassador to the courts of Portugal, Sweden, Turkey, and Russia, and who published a translation of the smaller poems of the Portuguese poet Camoens, was created Baron Penshurst in the peerage of Great Britain. Area of the town, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 588; in 1841, 571. Houses 111. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 28; in manufactures and trade, 59; in other pursuits, 46. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 43; on their own manual labour, 49; on means not specified, 29.

STRANGFORD (LOUGH), a large and long sealoough or lagoon, in the county of Down, Ulster. It consists of a sound or entrance-channel, a main body or interior expanse, and two small offset bays or estuaries. The sound enters between Ballyquintin Point on the north-east, and Killard Point on the south-west; it has a commencing and maximum width of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, a minimum width of 3 furlongs, and a mean width of about 5 furlongs; it extends 4½ miles north-westward, to the south-east corner of the main body or interior expanse; it lies between the parishes of Witter, Ballyphilip, and Ardquin, in the barony of Ardes, and the parishes of Ballyculter and Kildief, in the barony of Lecale; and it has the town of Portaferry on its east coast, and the town of Strangford on its left coast, both about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the commencement of the main body. A tidal current, alternately filling and emptying the interior expanse and the estuaries, sweeps the whole sound with such rapidity and power as sometimes to carry sailing vessels against the wind, and generally to force the ferry-boats far off the straight line, or into a diagonal course from shore to shore. This current runs, in the upper part of the sound, at the rate of 6 miles an hour; and is locally but erroneously reputed to be the strongest in Europe. An eddy or miniature whirlpool, called the Ranting Wheel, and occasioned by the rush of the current over a rock which is mostly under water, occurs at the entrance near Ballyquintin Point, and is very dangerous for boats. A ledge of rocks, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in length, stretching from south to north, and bearing partly the name of Garter Rock, but chiefly that of Angus Rock, extends up the sound from a point near the entrance; and it is washed on each side, but particularly on the west, by a deep and navigable current, and is overlooked by rocky and somewhat perilous shores. Another and smaller ledge occurs further up, and near the east shore, and, by a vessel entering, must be left to the starboard. A sand bank, called Bankmore, lies about a mile south of Portaferry; and a sunk rock lies before Ballyhaven water, in the immediate vicinity of Portaferry; and to avoid the latter danger, "the sailor must bring the saddle of two hills which are on the west shore opposite to him, and then he may go in boldly, but let him take care to come no nearer than in 4 feet fathom water, the ground being everywhere foul and stony." The asylums or anchoring grounds within the sound, and free from the careering sweep of the tidal current, are, on the west side, Cross-Road, Strangford Harbour, Audley-Road, and, on the east side, the creek of Bankmore, Portaferry Harbour, and Ballyhenry-Road.—The main body or interior expanse of the Lough commences with a width of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and attains a maximum width of $4\frac{1}{2}$; it extends $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles northward to Hare-Island, opposite Greyabbey, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-westward from Hare-Island to its termination in the southern vicinity of Newtown-Ardes; and it sends off the larger of its estuarial creeks south-westward from its south-west corner to the vicinity of Downpatrick, and the smaller of them, from its west side, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles below its head, west-north-westward to the village of Cumber. The breadth of the tideway—or portion alternately left and covered by the tide—is inconsiderable in all the lower parts except the estuary toward Downpatrick, but is so great as to obtain in several places a breadth of two miles round the head and along the upper part of the sides. The navigation of most of the main body is comparatively facile, yet it is so shallow, and so encumbered with islets, shoals, and sand banks, as to be of not much value, but nevertheless is aided and accommodated with several quays and numerous anchoring-grounds and landing-places. The barony of Ardes extends along the whole of the east side, the barony of Lecale along the foot, and the baronies of Dufferin and Lower Castlereagh along the west side; and the parishes upon the shores are Ardquin, Ardkeen, Innishargy, and Greyabbey, in Ardes, Saul and Inch in Lecale, Killyleagh and Killinehy in Dufferin, Tullynakill and Cumber in Lower Castlereagh, and Newtown-Ardes in Lower Castlereagh and in Ardes. The aggregate area of silty and sloppy ground exposed at low water, is so great as to give the tideway portions of the lake a disagreeable and even very repulsive appearance. Six islands, varying in area from 16 to 130 acres, and bearing the names of Island-Bawn, and Castle, Red, Wood, Taggart, and Magee island, are inhabited. The chief of the numerous isles, islets, and rocks, permanently surrounded with water, are MacCulley's Rock, Pig Island, North Rock, South Rock, East Boretree Island, West Boretree I-land, West Boretree Rock, Whelp Rock, Whaup Rock, Gabbock Island, the Two Bagheres, Horner's Rock, Bird Island, Selk Rock, Bullock Rock, Sheelagh's Island, the Pound, Downey's Rock, Gull Rock, Eel Rock, Strife Rock, Long-Skirt Rock, Newtown Rock, Lithe Rock, Calf Island, Trasnagh Island, Innisaroon, Craigaveagh, Michael's Rock, South Dogherty, Dulisk Rock, Washer Rock, Bird Island, Woman's Rock, Innisianen, Conly Island, Roe Island, Partan Island, Drummard Island, West Rock, South Rock, North-east-Bucky Rock, South-west-Bucky Rock, Little Minnis, Great Minnis, Sand Rock, Slave Rock, Green Island, Castle Island, Dunsy Island, Illanmore, Boyde's Rock, Long Island, Paul Island, Round Island, Simmy Island, Dunnyneill Island, Green Island, Jackdaw Island, Ballyhenry Island, Little Ballyhenry Rock, John's Rock, Chapel Island, and the Walter Rocks; and the chief lying partly or wholly within the portion dry at low water, are Black Island, Rough Island, Black Island Rock, West Rock, Peggy's Island, Chapel Island, Hare Island, Mid Island, South Island, Horse Island, Calf Rock, Duck Rock, Cross Island, Rolly Island, Long Island, Wood Island, Watson's Island, Magee Island, Rainey Island, Skettrick Island, Hen Island, White Rock, Horse Island, Feehary Island, Shamrock Island, Bush Island, Marl Island, Black Rock, Near-Craiglee Rock, Sconce Rock, Pherson's Island, Ballywollen Island, Taggart Island, Gibb's Island, Castle Island, Gore's Island, Shane's Island, Long Launche's Island, Little Launche's Island, and Shark Island.—"The coast from Tara bay to Strangford Lough," says Mr. Nimmo in the official report of his Coast Survey, "is rocky and dangerous, and incapable of affording any shelter. The south extremity of the peninsula of Ardes runs out in low skares at Ballyquintin Point; and beyond that the bar of Pladdy is a sunk rock, having 11 feet water at spring ebb, on which there is frequently a heavy breaking sea. The term pladdy, plate, or pladdin, signifies, on this coast, 'a fat sunk rock.' When the rock is always above water so as to form a low rocky island, it is named a skerry; and when connected with the land, so as to form a reef running out across the beach, it is named a skare or sker. Between the bar Pladdy and the skares of Ballyquintin, there is a navigable passage called Nelson's Gut. It is rather dangerous for a stranger; but having been marked by Mackenzie as the fair way, it has in all probability been the cause of many shipwrecks. The bar Pladdy is also very erroneously laid down by Mackenzie; to the general accuracy, however, of his charts and soundings, I beg to add my testimony. The fair way into Strangford is on the west of the bar Pladdy, and is much more favourable than Mackenzie has represented. Nor is the violent tide which sets into and out at Strangford, and which makes a heavy swell when running against the wind, attended with much danger to persons acquainted with this harbour. Strangford is, besides, an important station; for though not much frequented by strangers, it owes, including Portaferry, Killyleagh, and the other places in the Lough, a greater quantity of shipping than any of the minor ports of Ireland, and is extensively engaged in the fishery, having 80 smacks, wherries, and cutters, and nearly 100 yawls and row-boats in the Lough. * * * In the upper part of this Lough there is at times a considerable herring fishery; there is no need of building piers for the sake of shelter; and there are already small landing quays at Stranford, Portaferry, Killyleagh, the quay of Down, and Kircubbin."

STRANOCUM, a village in the parish of Ballymoney, barony of Upper Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Dervock to Broughshane with that from Ballymoney to Ballycastle, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Dervock, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Ballymoney. Fairs are held on Feb. 10, March 10, April 20, June 16, July 14, Aug. 8, Sept. 28, Nov. 8, and Dec. 29. In the vicinity are the seats of Stranocum, J. Thompson, Esq.: Bushbank; Clark-hill; and Clover-hill. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 132; in 1841, 140. Houses 27.

STRANORLAR, a parish in the barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the towns of STRANORLAR and BALLYBOPEHY: which see. Length, south-westward, 9 miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; mean breadth over two-thirds of the length, about 1 mile; area, 15,508 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches,—of which 158 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,128; in 1841, 5,061. Houses 1,073. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,613; in 1841, 4,904. Houses 873. The vale of the Finn passes through nearly the broadest part of the parish; and exhibits a series of pleasing and even rich features, from the productive grazing land to the well-cultivated farm and the beautifully embellished demesne. The other districts of the parish, excepting one in the north-east, are prevailing moorish, and consist, in general, of either waste ground or pasture. The small lake Mourne lies on the south-east boundary. The seats are Tyrrellen, the residence of the late Henry Stewart, Esq., situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-east of Stranorlar, in the midst of a hilly and beautifully planted demesne, and constituting a remarkable and most refreshing feature in a great region of unwooded country; Drumboe-castle, the residence of Sir Edmund Hayes, Bart., situated in the vale of the Finn adjacent to Ballybopehy, and surrounded by ornate grounds and extensive plantations; and Grove-Hill, situated on the verge of the parish, 3 miles west-north-west of Ballybopehy. The principal village is Lettermakenny, situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Stranorlar. The road from Strabane to Glenties, that from Londonderry to Donegal, and that from Letterkenny to Pettigoe, intersect one another in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £485; glebe, £29 19s.* Gross income, £514 19s.; nett, £428 14s. 2½d. Patron, the Crown. The church is an old building. Sittings 400; attendance 430. A Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Synod of Ulster, has an attendance of 300. A Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Secession Synod, has an attendance of 85.

*—Two perpetual cures, one named Stranorlar, and the other Kiltreavock," says the Report of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenues, "had been established within the rectory and vicarage of Stranorlar parish, which was appropriated to the deanery of Raphoe, but by an order in council, of 24th March, 1835, the rectory and vicarage of Stranorlar were disappropriated from and out of the deanery, and the aforesaid rectory and vicarage, with the perpetual cure of Stranorlar, were erected into a separate and distinct parish or benefice, it being provided, however, that the incumbent thereof shall pay, from and after the 25th March inst., to the perpetual curate of Kiltreavock, the same salary or allowance as is now payable by the dean of Raphoe."

The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kiltreavock. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,603 Churchmen, 796 Presbyterians, and 4,354 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 102 scholars; and 8 daily schools had on their books 300 boys and 185 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £30 a-year from the Fund of Erasmus Smith; one, with £2 from subscription, and £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction; one, with £12 from subscription, £12 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a gratuity from the London Hibernian Society; and three, with respectively £5, £6, and £15, from subscription. In 1843, the National Board had schools at Ballybopehy, Doosh, and Meenbane, salaried with respectively £12, £12, and £8 a-year, and having on their books aggregately 137 boys and 114 girls.

STRANORLAR, a small market and post town, in the parish of Stranorlar, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the river Finn, and at the intersection of the road from Strabane to Glenties with the mail-road from Londonderry to Sligo, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile north-east of Ballybopehy, 6 miles west of Castle-Finn, 9½ south of Letterkenny, 11 west by south of Strabane, 13 east-south-east of Finntown, 14 north-north-east of Donegal, 22 south-west of Londonderry, and 113 north-north-west of Dublin. The surrounding country has been considerably improved; and the estate of Cloghan, in particular, exhibits features of singular interest to a geologist. See CLOGHAN. The seats and demesnes, noticed in the preceding article, combine with the natural features and cultivated condition of Glenties, to render the immediate environs not a little delightful. Several extensive bleaching-grounds are situated near the town, and down the vale of the Finn; and at one time, all the linen cloth sold at the weekly markets of the place was delivered at the expense of the Marquis of Conyngham, the proprietor of the town, to purchasers at any distance not exceeding 20 miles. Stranorlar consists of one irregularly built street; and contains a church, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, a Roman Catholic chapel, a Poor-law workhouse, and a comfortable little inn and posting establishment. Fairs are held on March 28, June 11, July 5, Aug. 12, Oct. 10, and Dec. 10. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. Ballybopehy, however, besides having fairs of its own, is the seat of most of the business which nominally belongs to Stranorlar, the scene of its weekly markets, and the source of its retail supply of miscellaneous goods to the surrounding mountainous country. Yet both towns have been suffered to sink into neglect and dilapidation; they experience little or no encouragement from their proprietors; and they acquire marvellously little practical benefit from great advantageousness of geographical position for conducting a large inland trade. In 1843, a loan fund in Stranorlar had a capital of £2,073, circulated £9,034 in 2,534 loans, realized a nett profit of £140 18s. 5d., expended for charitable purposes £100, and had 35 depositors or proprietors of its capital. Area of the town, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 641; in 1841, 585. Houses 66. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 23; in manufactures and trade, 41; in other pursuits, 13. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 44; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 3.

Stranorlar Poor-law union ranks as the 124th, and was declared on Dec. 10, 1840. It lies wholly in the county of Donegal, and comprehends an area of 113,955 acres, which contained in 1831 a pop. of 23,450. The number of its elected and its ex-officio guardians is respectively 18 and 6. Its electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are Glenelly, 690; Knock, 312; Killygordon, 411; Stranorlar, 929; Lettermore, 268; Cloghan, 545; Altinapost, 291; Doobish, 247; Goland, 167; Convoys, 698; and Meencagagh, 92. Excepting part of the last of these divisions, which is within the barony of Kilmacrenan, the whole union lies within the barony of Raphoe. The number of valued tenements within the Kilmacrenan district is 22,—within the Raphoe districts, 4,631,—within the union, 4,653; and of this total, 2,948 were valued under £5,—927, under £10,—326, under £15,—167, under £20,—107, under £25,—54, under £30,—67, under £40,—21, under £50,—and 36, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £29,479 17s. No statistics of the workhouse are contained in even our latest reports. The total expenditure up to Feb. 6, 1843, was £310 15s. 5d. The only medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Stranorlar and Killygordon. The Stranorlar dispensary serves for a district of 56,639 acres, with a pop. of 10,418; and, in 1839-40, it expended £148 0s. 8d., and made 2,936 dispensations of medicine to 1,085 patients.

STRATFORD-UPON-SLANEY, a small manufacturing town in the parish of Rathbran, barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the river Slaney, and on the road from Dublin to Newtownbarr, 3 miles south-west by south of Donard, 3½ north-north-east of Balingglass; 11½ south-south-west of Blessington, and 20½ south-south-west of Dublin. It was built about the year 1790, by the Earl of Aldborough; and was designed to contain 4 squares, and 12 streets rectangularly arranged; and to be both a large and a beautiful seat of manufacture. But the success of the manufacturing establishments has hitherto, and is likely to continue, very limited; and the town has never acquired a bulk larger than that of a respectable village. The factory is situated in the valley, upon the Slaney, and is devoted to the printing of calicoes; its tall chimneys and large outline form a feature in the landscape as striking as they are unusual; it belongs to the Messrs. Orr, who leased from Lord Aldborough upwards of 300 acres of land, including the site of the town; and in prosperous seasons, particularly during the European war, it gave employment to about 400 workmen. The town surmounts a beautiful bank or hill which rises about 200 feet above the level, and from the side, of the site of the factory; and it figures both conspicuously and charmingly in the scenic view of a large stretch of the valley of the Slaney. "The dulness and monotony of the six miles to the north," remarks Mr. Fraser, "are agreeably relieved by the tall chimneys and extensive buildings connected with the calico printing works of Messrs. Orr; the workmen and managers' houses; detached and grouped trees; the square fields and rising grounds enclosed with hedge-rows; the village and parish-church, and its rude tower topping the hill above the factory; and the euphony of the name Stratford-on-Slaney, strongly reminds us of the earlier factories in the rural districts of England." The town contains a fever hospital, a church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The fever hospital is within the Balingglass Poor-law union; it contains 20 beds, but might accommodate 30 patients; it is intended for fever cases occurring in the county of Wicklow, but admits some from the neighbouring parts of the counties of Carlow and Kildare; it is supported almost entirely by county grants; and, in 1839-40, it expended £282 3s. 9d., and admitted 198 patients. Fairs are held on April 21 and Sept. 7.

Area of the town, 41 acres. Pop., in 1831, 952; in 1841, 618. Houses 90. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 37; in manufactures and trade, 72; in other pursuits, 38. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 61; on their own manual labour, 60; on means not specified, 23.

STREAMSTOWN, a bay in the parish of Omev, barony of Ballineinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It opens between Inisturk and Omev Island; it penetrates the land east-south-eastward, to the extent of 3½ miles; it is broadest near the head, yet even there attains a maximum breadth of only half-a-mile; and it is nearly dry at low water, and possesses little capacity or aid for navigation. Near its head are a copper mine, a marble quarry, and the hamlet and seat of Streamstown.

STREAMSTOWN, a village in the parish of Ardnercher, barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands at the inter-section of the road from Ballymore to Kibbegan, with that from Monte to Mullingar, 4½ miles south-east of Ballymore, and 6 north-east by east of Monte. It contains a police barrack; and in its vicinity are Streamstown-house, and Streamstown-cottage. Pop. returned with the parish.

STREET, a parish, partly in the barony of Ardagh, co. Longford, but chiefly in the barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length of the Longford section, south-east ward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,377 acres, 4 perches. Length of the Westmeath section, south-south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, from 2 to 5; area, 13,345 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches,—of which 390 acres, 3 roods are in Lough Dereveragh, and 156 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches are in the river Inny and small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,302; in 1841, 3,905. Houses 648. Pop. of the Westmeath section, in 1831, 2,993; in 1841, 2,732. Houses 450. The village of Street is situated in the Westmeath section, 2 miles north-north-east of Rathowen, and 11 north-west of Mullingar. The surface of the parish is low, flat, and featureless; a large tract of it in the east is bog; and most of the remainder is good arable land. The foot of Lough Dereveragh lies within the eastern boundary; and the river Inny traces the whole of that boundary both above and below the lake. The small lakes are Ruddan and Dooloughan. The rivulet Riffey flows along the southern boundary, to a confluence with the Inny. The hamlets in the Westmeath section are South Tinode, Middle Tinode, North Tinode, and Boherquill; the seats are Kildevin and Coolamber, the former the residence of Robert Sproule, Esq., and the latter of Philip O'Reilly, Esq.; and the other objects of interest are a police barrack, Mount Land, and the site of Kinard nursery. Considerable improvements have been achieved on an expanse of bog situated to the south of Kildevin-house. The Longford section is much less bleak than the Westmeath section; and it contains a police barrack and Cloonsannah-house. A dispensary in Street is within the Granard Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 23,577 acres, containing a pop. of 5,941; and, in 1839-40, it expended £82 10s., and administered to 738 patients.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £184 12s. 3d.; glebe, £16 10s. Gross income, £201 2s. 3d.; nett, £173 15s. 1d. Patron, Fulke Greville, Esq. The incumbent holds also a stipendiary curacy in the dio. of Cork, and is non-resident in Street. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £184 12s. 3d., and are impropriate in Fulke Greville, Esq. The church is an old building. Sitings 180; attendance 160. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 150 to 2,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 454, and the Roman Catholics to 3,613; and 6 daily schools had on their books 205 boys and 163 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £5 a-year from Mr. Blackall, £2 from Miss Blackall, and £3 from the Ardagh Association; one, with £5 from Mr. Blackall, and £3 from the Ardagh Association; and each of two, with £8 from the Association for Discourteous Vice, and £10 from subscription. In 1843, two National schools at Lisnacaffrey were salaried with jointly £26 from the Board, and had on their books 145 boys and 132 girls.

STREEVE, a mountain on the southern border of the barony of Kenaught, and of the county of Londonderry, Ulster. It is situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Dungiven; and it lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,280 feet above the level of the sea.

STROKESTOWN, a market and post town, partly in the parish of Kiltrustan, but chiefly in that of Bunlin, barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the road from Elphin to Lanesborough, and on that from Longford to Ballaghaderreen, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Elphin, $5\frac{1}{2}$ east of Tulse, 7 north-north-west of Lanesborough, 10 north-north-east of Roscommon, 10 west-north-west of Longford, $13\frac{1}{2}$ south-east by east of Frenchpark, and $59\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by west of Dublin. A feature more conspicuous than the town itself, and expanding athwart the greater portion of the environs, is Lord Hartland's demesne of Bawn or Strokestown. This demesne closely adjoins all the east side of the town, and spreads away eastward through a large part of the parish of Bunlin; and it comprises an area of 1,456 acres,—323 of which are in the deer-park. Though the grounds are richly wooded, and appear as if bringing upon the town an enormous invasion of forest, they are less remarkable for either the large masses, the groves, and the clumps of their wood, than for the noble form and the luxuriant growth of many of their individual trees. A long straight row of lime trees, richly furnished, and of great height, separates the ornamental part of the demesne from some outlying fields; and the trees, in all the conspicuous parts of the grounds, have been so long and sedulously protected from the approach of cattle as to be free from the formality of the horizontal browsing-line, and to fling their broad branches in pendant and feathery curvatures down to almost the surface of the ground. The mansion is situated a brief distance east of the town, and upon a lower site. "Originally, it was in the old massive style, so common in the country, with wings advancing at right angles considerably beyond the line of the front; but it underwent an alteration under the direction of Mr. Lyne, an English architect, who has contrived to give a light and pleasing appearance to the main or central part of the edifice; but the old wings with their heavy roofs which still remain, detract from the general effect of the whole. The entrance in the central compartment is composed of an Ionic portico, with a flat roof, surmounted by a balustrade."—The principal street of the town commences at the entrance of Lord Hartland's demesne, ascends with a moderate slope westward to the church, and is so uncommonly spacious and airy as to have a width of 150 feet. The only other street of importance ascends from south to north, crosses the principal street at right angles, and has a width of 63 feet. The broad spaces between the carriage-ways and the houses, are either wholly waste, or occupied only at fitful intervals by wheel-wrights, coopers, and other artificers who partially perform their work or deposit its materials in the open air; and they, therefore, contribute none of the beauty and enjoyments which might easily accrue from them were they disposed in garden-plots, or in malls. The streets, as to edifying, are much superior to those of most other Connaught towns; yet they are far from being unencumbered and degraded with mere butts both frail and filthy. In 1830, the entire town consisted of 37 slated two-story houses, 63 thatched two-story houses, and 161 thatched cabins; but several houses of superior character were in progress. Siliceous sandstone of very beautiful colour may be obtained within a few miles of the town; but blue floetz limestone lies still nearer, and, in consequence of being less expensive, has been in more common use. Slates from the celebrated Killaloe quarries in Lough Derg, might have been brought to within 5 miles of the town by water-carriage; yet the slates used in roofing the 37 slated houses were imported from Wales to Sligo, and brought thence a distance of 33 miles by land-carriage. The public buildings are a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a sessions-house, a bridewell, a dispensary, and an inn and posting establishment. The dispensary is within the Roscommon Poor-law union, and serves for an undefined district; and, in 1839-40, it received £88 15s. 6d., and expended £96 4s. 2½d. The weekly markets are well attended, and give the town a lively and hustling appearance. "I have never," says Mr. Weld, "seen in Ireland so picturesque a market as that of Strokestown; first, from the ample space which was afforded for the detached grouping of the people; secondly, from the relief of the figures by the buildings, and the rich woods of Lord Hartland's demesne; thirdly, from the colours of the dresses of the females, in which deep brown, almost approaching to black, and bright scarlet, predominate." Fourteen or fifteen years ago, about 7,000 barrels of wheat were annually sold in the town, and the markets were improving; yet the artificer population generally complained of paucity of employment. Fairs are held on the first Tuesday after the 12th of May, June, Oct., and Nov. Strokestown is the head-quarters of one of the 7 districts of the constabulary force of the county; and the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter on the 2d Thursday of every month. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 1,547; in 1841, 1,611. Houses 250. Area of the Bunlin section, 47 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,503. Houses 232. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 75; in manufactures and trade, 146; in other pursuits, 69. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 29; on the directing of labour, 141; on their own manual labour, 109; on means not specified, 11. Area of the Kiltrustan section, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 108. Houses 18.

STROKESTOWN, co. Meath. See MITCHELLSTOWN.

STRUEL, a townland, remarkable for its reputedly holy wells, in the parish of Downpatrick, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of the town of Downpatrick, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. The wells are named sometimes after St. Patrick, but more frequently after the townland on which they are situated; and, on Midsummer Eve, and the Friday before Lammas, they are the resort of great numbers of the Roman Catholic peasantry,—some in quest of health, and others to perform penances. They are 4 in number, and communicate with one another by subterraneous channels; each is covered with a vault of stone; and the largest and most celebrated has a vault of 16 feet by 11. The vaults appear to be ancient; and near one of them are the ruins of an old chapel. The Struel Wells, as a resort of superstition, rank in the sauc category with LOUGH DERG, CLONMACNOISE, CROAGHPATRICK, and ARDMORE: which see.

STRUEL, or STRULE (THE), a river of the co. of Tyrone, Ulster. It is formed by the confluence of the Camowen and the Fairy Water rivulets at a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Omagh; and flows $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by westward, to the influx of the Moyle, in the eastern vicinity of Newtown-Stewart, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-westward, past Newtown-Stewart, to a confluence with the Derg, and the formation of the Mourne. Over nearly its whole course, it is a stream of much beauty.

STRUVE POINT, a small projection of Innishowen Head, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster.

STUMCARTHY. See STAMCARTHY.

SUBULTER, a parish in the barony of Duballow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Kanturk, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 742 acres. Pop., in 1831, 208; in 1841, 273. Houses 39. The surface consists of good land.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £63 6s.; nett, £59 11s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefices of Kilbrin and Liscarroll in the dio. of Cloyne. There is no church. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 4 boys and 56 girls.

SUCK (THE), a river of the province of Connaught. It belongs slightly to the county of Mayo, but chiefly to the counties of Roscommon and Galway. It rises in several head-streams, among hilly grounds, in the Mayo barony of Costello, and the Roscommon baronies of Frenchpark and Castlereagh; yet it is popularly regarded as issuing from Lough O'Flynn, situated several miles south-east and south-west of the sources of these streams, and lying on the western border of the barony of Castlereagh. The river flows $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward from Lough O'Flynn to the town of Castlereagh, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-eastward from the town of Castlereagh to the boundary between the counties of Roscommon and Galway; and thenceforth, excepting over a detour of $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles into the county of Roscommon in the vicinity of Athleague, it flows uniformly upon that boundary, south-south-eastward to Ballinasloe, and south-eastward from Ballinasloe to the Shannon, at a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Shannon-Bridge. Its length of run, from the point of its first contact with the county boundaries down to its confluence with the Shannon, is $22\frac{1}{2}$ miles measured in straight lines, but at least double that distance measured along the sinuosities of its channel. Some of the river's windings, particularly one near Castle-Strange, and another round the lands of Curraghmore, are very sweeping and not a little curious. Though the transverse distance between two certain points near Castle-Strange is only 132 perches, the distance along the course of the stream is no less than 936 perches, or upwards of sevenfold; and the sweep round Curraghmore is so great that, but for the antagonist and stronger interests of a mill at Athleague, a new channel would have been cut to direct the waters away from the enormous sinuosity. The surface elevation of the Suck above sea-level is 255 feet at its debouch from Lough O'Flynn, and 115 feet at its embouch into the Shannon; so that the total fall of the river is 140 feet. Mr. Weld, however, represents the elevation above sea-level at the embouch into the Shannon at 104 feet, and the elevation at the town of Castlereagh at 198 feet; and he computes as follows the distances and falls of the successive reaches of the river:—from Castlereagh to the influx of the Ballyhaigue river, a distance of 7 miles, and a fall of 22 feet; from the influx of the Ballyhaigue river to Donamon, a distance of 7 miles, and a fall of 6 feet; from Donamon to Castle-Coote, a distance of $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and a fall of 5 feet; from Castle-Coote to Castle-Strange, a distance of 2 miles, and a fall of 10 feet; from Castle-Strange to Athleague, a distance of $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and a fall of 1 foot; from Athleague to Mount-Talbot, a distance of 7 miles, and a fall of 19 feet; from Mount-Talbot to the influx of the rivulet Shivan, a distance of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and a fall of 5 feet; from the influx of the Shivan to Ballyforan, a distance of 2 miles, and a fall of 4 feet; from Ballyforan to Ballinasloe, a distance of $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and a fall of 17 feet; and from Ballinasloe to the Shannon, a distance of $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and a fall of 5 feet. The principal affluents of the Suck are the Ballyglass rivulet and 5 or 6 other tiny streams from the east, and the Ballyhaigue, the Shivan, the Ahascragh, and various smaller streams from the west. Floods of great extent occur upon several of the reaches of the river, occasioned partly by artificial obstructions and partly by natural sluggishness, and producing a great aggregate of mischief upon meadows and other low lands. The bridges across the river occur at Castlereagh, Wellsborough, Ballymoe, Donamon, Castle-Coote, Castle-Strange, Athleague, Rockwood, Mount-Talbot, Ballyforan, Ballygill, and Ballinasloe. "The Suck," observes Mr. Weld, "has been described as nearly analogous, in its character, to the Shannon; that is, the beds of each river are traversed by ledges, composed sometimes of limestone, but more commonly of compact limestone gravel, which damming up the waters, divide the rivers into long reaches, in many instances nearly on a dead level. But although the Suck expands in several places, more particularly in the broad valleys where the bottoms are boggy and marshy, yet it has no lakes like the Shannon. Over the shallows formed by these bars, and at the falls usually found below them, the waters run with considerable velocity, and in periods of floods with impetuosity; but in many of the reaches, for several miles together, the current is deep and smooth, in some few places almost imperceptible; in others rolling in circling eddies amongst the islands with which the river Suck abounds. The scenery amongst these islands, tufted with thickets and bordered with reeds and sedge, is occasionally pleasing, and it is still more so where the river winds, as it does in several parts of its course, under high banks covered with dense woods, or at the base of gently swelling grounds clothed with rich verdure, and enlivened by herds of cattle. But where the river pursues its way through the bogs and marshes, nothing can well be imagined more ugly or dreary. Near its junction with the Shannon there are bogs of more than a mile in breadth, extending for a considerable distance along the margin of the river. The most interesting parts of the Suck, as it appeared to me, are about Mount-Talbot, Rockwood, Castle-Strange, Curraghmore, where the banks, occasionally high, are diversified by considerable reaches of woods and plantations; the river also makes some very beautiful bends. Immediately above the bridge at Ballinasloe, the scenery is also pleasing, the stream gliding amongst tufted islands, with a brisk current, and keeping the gay painted little boats, riding at anchor before the town, in constant movement, swinging from side to side. About Donamon, the breadth of the valley is considerable, and the bottoms being overspread with marsh and bog, the Suck is nearly lost to view, from the Roscommon side, or is only distinguishable where it dilates into pools, for lakes they do not deserve to be called. Donamon-castle, which stands on the Galway side, appears surrounded with woods, but the valley beneath is a dreary scene."—The Suck has, at its mouth, the appearance of a very fine navigable river; yet, except for row-boats and for flat-bottomed boats of light burden, it is not navigable even to Ballinasloe. A favourite project was long entertained of opening a navigation upon it to Ballinasloe, and it occasioned the making of various surveys at different periods commencing in 1802; but it was, at length, practically terminated by the questionable measure of cutting a canal to Ballinasloe, in extension of the Grand Canal. "If," says Mr. C. W. Williams, the active and enlightened promoter of steam navigation, "the £40,000 granted for the Ballinasloe Canal had been accompanied by an obligation to pay interest, it would not have been asked for probably. The Company might have expended the money so as to produce more immediate profit. The Suck, for example, it is said, might have been made navigable to Ballinasloe for half the sum." "This river, from its junction with the Shannon to Ballyforan Bridge," says Mr. Thomas Rhodes, "is for the principal part so fine a river, and of such noble dimensions, and so capable of being made navigable at all seasons, that it would seem almost a perversion of reason to think of making canals in the line of its vicinity, when facilities offer themselves, as they do, of a much less expensive nature and superior description, for internal traffic by the river."

SUGARLOAF, a hill in the parish of Kilburne, barony of Middlethird, co. Waterford, Munster. Like other hills and mountains of the same name, it has acquired its designation from the circumstance of possessing an abrupt and conical outline. At this hill is a very noble cromlech, the most perfect in the county. "Four oblong masses of rock, elevated on their extremities, support a table-stone or altar of considerable magnitude, the height of which is about 20 feet. The workmanship is altogether rude and unpretending. Within the space enclosed by the uprights or pillars, a single stone stands entirely detached from the sides and covering of the altar." The cromlech stands in the direction of east and west; and its covering stone is chlorite slate,—its upright stones, siliceous slate. Adjacent to the cromlech are the ruins of a church, supposed to have been one of the most ancient in the county.

SUGARLOAF, co. Cork. See GHOUZ.

SUGARLOAF (GREAT), a mountain in the southern district of the parish of Kilmacnoage, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated 2½ miles south by east of Enniskerry, and 3½ south-south-west of Bray; it lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,631 feet above the level of the sea; it forms a noble background to a series of views, particularly to one southward from the Scalp; it has at first a spreading outline beautifully surfaced with cultivation, but eventually soars into a cone of quartz-rock; it is of easy ascent from the higher part of the road from Dublin to Roundwood and Glendalough; and it commands a magnificent view of a vast expanse of ocean and mountain scenery, with all the diversities of glen, valley, plain, forest, and upland, which so powerfully and richly characterize the northern section of Wicklow. The mountain, on a close view, and seen out of grouping with adjacent mountains, loses much of its sublimity; but seen at such a distance, particularly from the Scalp, as to be the prominent one of various features in a general landscape, it makes a mighty display of many of the best elements of the picturesque. "Looking across a broad, deep, and shadowy glen," says the author of the 'Guide to Wicklow,' "the greater Sugarloaf raises its imposing form against the south. As a picturesque object, it varies according to the position of the sun, or the varying disposition of the heavens. We have seen it from this point, upon a cloudless noon, across the clear gray interval of interposing air, vast, shadeless, but clothed in its garb of mountain hues, with, perhaps, some three or four figures in the distance, toiling up its sultry side. Again we have seen it from the same point, upon some shadowy day, standing like a mountain monarch amidst its levee of subject hills, attired in a splendid robe of beams, which seemed to fall down over its graceful shoulders, from a superb tiara of clouds over head, among which the sun lay like a chrysolite of purest fire. For these effects the pedestrian must choose his day—we recommend the shadowy, as harmonizing by far the best with the general character of the scenery."

SUGARLOAF (LITTLE), a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Bray, Delgany, and Kilmacnoage, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Its summit is situated 1¼ mile north-east of the summit of the Great Sugarloaf, 1½ west-north-west of Bray Head, and 2 south of the town of Bray; it possesses an altitude above sea-level of 1,120 feet; and it is easy of ascent, and commands a better view than even that obtained from Bray Head, of the Wicklow coast and the adjacent country. The mountain "forms a remarkable feature in the landscape, and, from its isolated position and breadth of base, breaks and diversifies into the most pleasing forms the country lying immediately around it." In a number of views, it groups magnificently with the Great Sugarloaf; and, in common with that superb mountain, is seen to best advantage from the Scalp. Its north-east side is steep and grandly featured, overhangs the richly wooded parks of the noble demesne of Kilruddery, and is partly disposed in the deer-park attached to that demesne, and partly in recently-formed and very beautiful drives and promenades.

SUIR (THE), a great and beautiful river, partly of the counties of Kilkenny and Wexford, Leinster, but chiefly of the counties of Tipperary and Waterford, Munster. It rises at the south-west extremity of the parish of Bourne, barony of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, in the near vicinity of the sources of the Nore, and on the mountain of Borresroe, one of the loftiest of the Devil's-Bit range, 2½ miles south-east of Moneygall. It flows 7½ miles eastward, south-eastward, and southward, chiefly through the barony of Ikerrin, but partly between that barony and Eliogurty, to Templemore; 8 miles southward, through Eliogurty, to Thurles; 3½ miles southward and westward, through Eliogurty, to Holycross; 9 miles south-south-westward, through Eliogurty, between Middlethird and Kilmacanagh, and through Clanwilliam to Golden-bridge; 8½ miles south by eastward, through Clanwilliam, between Clanwilliam and Middlethird, and through West Ifa and Offa, to Cahir; 7 miles south-south-eastward, south-eastward, and eastward, through West Ifa and Offa, to the boundary with co. Waterford; 6½ miles northward, eastward, and east-north-eastward, along the boundary between co. Tipperary and co. Waterford, to Clonmel; 10 miles eastward, along the boundary between co. Tipperary and co. Waterford, to Carriek-on-Suir; 1½ mile eastward, along the same boundary to the first point of contact with Leinster, at the influx of the Lennane; 12 miles eastward, south-eastward, south-south-eastward, north-eastward, and south-eastward, along the boundary between co. Kilkenny and co. Waterford, and through the liberties or parliamentary borough of Waterford, to the city of Waterford; 3½ miles eastward and east-north-eastward, through the liberties of Waterford, and along the boundary between co. Waterford and co. Kilkenny, to Cheekpoint, the magnificent influx of the Barrow; $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward and south-eastward, along the boundary between co. Waterford and co. Wexford, to Passage; and 61 miles southward, under the name of Waterford Harbour, and on the boundary between co. Waterford and co. Wexford, to the ocean. But all these distances are measured in a series of straight lines; so that the sum of them is far short of the distance actually run by the river along the sinuosities of its bed. The principal affluents of the Suir upon its left bank, are the Black river above Thurles, the Honor between Clonmel and Carrick-on-Suir, the Leenane $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Carrick-on-Suir, the Pill $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below the influx of the Leenane, the Blackwater 2 miles above Waterford, and the Barrow at the junction-point of the counties of Waterford, Kilkenny, and Wexford,—the last so mighty a river as boldly to compete with the Suir in both length and volume, and considerably to excel it in commercial importance. See BARROW. The principal affluents on the left bank, are the Clodiagh between Holy-cross and Golden-bridge, the Aherlow a little above Cahir, the Tar $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above the first point of contact with co. Waterford, the Nier at the first point of contact with co. Waterford, the Clodagh $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Carrick-on-Suir, and the St. John's at the city of Waterford. The fall of the Suir everywhere above Clonmel is sufficiently great to give the stream a purling, trotting, and merry current, perfectly free from the sluggishness and stagnancy of such streams as the Shannon and the Suck, and yet not so rapid as to become turbulent or impetuous. The scenery of the banks is everywhere beautiful, occasionally grand, sometimes lusciously lovely, often surpassingly brilliant, and aggregately replete with at once variety, power, and picturesque composition; it constitutes a main part of the attractions of the four very beautiful counties to which it belongs; it reciprocates beauties, both rich and numerous, with the principal towns upon its banks; and it comprises most of the gorgeous expanse of the Golden-Vale, and shares in the magnificence of the Devil's-Bit, the Bilboa, the Galtees, the Knockmeledown, the Cumberagh, the Slievenaman, and the Boley mountains. See TIPPERARY, WATERFORD, KILKENNY, WEXFORD, THURLES, TEMPLEMORE, HOLYCROSS, GOLDEN, CAHIR, CLONMEL, CARRICK, GALTEES, KNOCKMELEDOWN, CUMMERAGH, and SLIEVENAMAN. "When King William, in his march to Carrick," says Mr. Tighe, "gained the summit of the hills that overlook Iverk, and beheld the noble course of this river flowing through a district emphatically called the Golden-Vale, winding beneath the towers of two ancient towns, and emptying itself at last into a capacious harbour, where it meets its brother streams; when he beheld on its opposite bank steep hills presenting masses of foliage, backed by the rocky summits of a chain of mountains; when he beheld beneath him a country which nature had partly clothed with wood, which art had embellished with cultivation, and crowned with castles; he is reported by tradition, as soon as he recovered the first emotions of surprise, to have exclaimed, 'This, indeed, is a country worth fighting for.'"—The navigation of the Suir might, with the aid of a series of canals, be conducted for boats of light burden, so far up probably as Thurles; it might also, without any great achievement of engineering, be connected by canals with the navigation of the Blackwater and the Shannon; yet it actually extends, for practical purposes, no higher than to Clonmel; it is effected even thither with great difficulty, the boatmen expending no small labour in forcing barges through the numerous shallows and rapids; and it has drawn proportionably far less attention, and won for its improvement a far smaller amount of public money, than most of the other natural inland navigations of Ireland. Vessels of nearly 800 tons sail up to the quay of Waterford; and vessels of 120 tons are navigated up to Carrick-on-Suir. In 1838, the trade-boats plying to Clonmel belonged to 10 proprietors, averaged from 20 to 40 tons burden, and usually carried, in the course of a year, about 3,000 tons. No tolls are levied; and the freights charged per ton are 3s. 9d. for timber, 4s. for salt, coals, and general merchandise, and 4s. 6d. for agricultural produce. Most of the salmon fisheries on the Suir are private property; and the fishing has greatly increased,—the fish greatly diminished.

SULLANE (THE), a rivulet of the western district of the county of Cork, Munster. It rises among the Derrynasaggart mountains, on the western verge of the county, and runs $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward to Macroom, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile eastward to the influx of the Glashyduff, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile southward to a confluence with the Lee. Its last stretch of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile is on the boundary between West Muskerry and East Muskerry; and the whole of its previous course is within the former of these baronies. Its principal affluents are the Foharus and the Glashyduff, both from the north, and the former $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Macroom; but it receives also several other rivulets from lateral glens, and numerous rills and mountain torrents from the adjoining uplands; and it possesses a considerably larger volume than might be anticipated from the comparative brevity of its course. On the banks of this stream was fought and won a fierce battle by Brian Boromh. See LANNEY.

SULLATOBBER (THE), a rivulet of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. It issues from beneath a limestone rock about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the town, turns a corn-mill in its progress to the sea, and falls into Belfast Lough at the suburb called the Scotch Quarters.

SUMMERHILL, a small post-town in the parish of Laracor, barony of Lower Moyferagh, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Tim to Kilcock with that from Dublin to Mullingar, 5 miles south-south-east of Trim, $5\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Kilcock, 9 east-south-east of Ballivor, 10 west-north-west of Dunboyne, and 18 west-north-west of Dublin. It is a neat well-built place, in the midst of one of the richest portions or the rich plain of Meath; yet it is in a state of decay. The demesne of Summerhill adjoining it on the south, and of great extent, was, not many years ago, regarded as one of the finest in Ireland; but it has been nearly denuded of its venerable and magnificent woods, and is in the fair way to become a scene of comparative desolation. The mansion was a splendid specimen of Grecian architecture; but is now reduced to a condition too sadly in keeping with the demesne. The estate of Summerhill was the property of the ancient and opulent family of Rowley, and still belongs to their descendant, Lord Longford. "This estate," says Brewer, "was possessed, in the early part of the 17th century, by the baronet family of Langford, from whom it passed by marriage, in the person of Mary, eldest daughter and heir of Sir Hercules Langford, in the year 1683, to the family of Rowley, ennobled in 1765. The titles of Viscount Langford and Baron Summerhill became extinct on the decease of Hercules, the first Viscount, whose mother had been advanced to the peerage as Viscountess Langford and Baroness Summerhill, with limitation of those honours to her heirs male by her husband, the Right Hon. Hercules Langford Rowley. This and the other estates of the family of Rowley, descended, on the above event, to Frances Rowley, niece of the deceased nobleman, who married her first cousin, Clotworthy, third son of Thomas, Earl of Beetive, who has assumed the name and arms of Rowley, and was created Baron Langford of Summerhill in the year 1800." Within a mile of the town are also the seats of Spring-valley and Ballygortagh; and in the near vicinity are the vestiges of the interesting quondam demesne of DANGAN: which see. Fairs are held at Summerhill on April 30, June 9, Sept. 22, and Nov. 25. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath takes name from Summerhill, and has chapels here and at Dangan. Area of the town, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 331; in 1841, 287. Houses 46.

SUMMER'S COVE, a hamlet in the parish of Ringcoran, east side of Kinsale harbour, barony of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster.

SUMMERVILLE, a fishing hamlet in the parish of Corbally, barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. It is situated on the east side of Tramore harbour, at the strait or channel between Tramore bay and the Back Strand; but though a coast-guard station, and one of the principal fishing villages of the barony, it is a very poor place. Immediately adjoining it is the villa of Summerville, the lodge of Earl Fortescue.

SUNDERLIN, a lake in the parishes of Killare and Ballymore, half-a-mile north of the town of Ballymore, barony of Rathconrath, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains some islets. Its length is $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; and its area within Killare is 49 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches,—and within Ballymore, 91 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches.

SUNFISH-BANK, a large and interesting fishing-bank off the west coast of co. Mayo, Connaught. Its centre is situated 12 miles north-west by west of Innisboffin, 15 $\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Clare Island, and 24 south-west of Slievemore in Achill. "Just within sight of the highland of Achill Island," says Mr. Nimmo, "is the ground called the Sunfish-Bank; we are on it with Slievemore-Achill, about east-north-east per compass, 70 to 90 fathoms. This bank is remarkable from the break of the tide on it, with ebb and flood, and is supposed to be a ridge of land extending from the Blaskets to Erris Head, in about 70 fathoms. Half-a-mile farther off, we have 15 fathoms more water, and the increase of depth is also considerable within it; the water outside deepens quickly to 100 fathoms and upwards; and the probability is, that this bank is near the edge of soundings. This place is frequented in spring by the sunfish or basking shark, the best season being the last week in April, or first in May; they come hither from the north, and are seen from Tory Island to beyond the Blaskets; in fine weather they come to the surface in the morning and evening, when they are pursued and struck with harpoons, for the sake of their oil, of which one fish will yield to the extent of 7 to 10 barrels. The fish are in considerable numbers together, and easily got at in a fine day; but the weather at this season is very uncertain, and the swell so great, that frequently there are hardly any fish caught; in 1822, for example, there were only two killed. Should a fine day or two occur, during the season, there may, however, be from 30 to 40 killed; but in such a case, the fish make off speedily to the south, as the fishermen say, whenever they smell the blood."

SUTTONS AND HORSEWOOD, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ferns, and co. of Wexford, Leinster. Post-town, Priesthaggard.

SWANLINBAR, a small post-town in the parish of Kinawley, barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the rivulet Cloddagh, and on the road from Enniskillen to Ballinamore, 5 furlongs south of the boundary with co. Cavan, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Florence-court Cross-roads, 8 north-west of Ballyconnell, and 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Enniskillen. Though the country so near as Florence-court is lusciously beautiful; yet the district immediately around Swanlinbar is wild, mountainous, and almost savagely romantic, and is closely connected on the west with the congeries of dreary alpine uplands which lie around the sources of the Shannon. The summit of Cratty, 1,215 feet in altitude, is situated 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Swanlinbar; that of Legavagra, 1,279 feet, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east; and that of Cuilcagh, 2,188 feet, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west. The only seat in the vicinity, within co. Cavan, is Tircahan-lodge. A chalybeate spa at Swanlinbar long drew to the town considerable numbers of invalids and ennuyées in quest of health and recreation. The well is situated within an ornamental enclosure, laid out with shrubberies and gravel walks. The town contains a church, a Methodist meeting-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, and a constabulary barrack; and it is the head-quarters of one of the 7 districts of the constabulary of Cavan. The dispensary is within the Poor-law union of Enniskillen; and, in 1839-40, it expended £128 10s. 5d., and made 3,296 dispensations of medicine. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. Fairs are held on Feb. 2, March 30, May 18, June 29, July 27, Aug. 18, Sept. 14, Oct. 13, Nov. 27, and Dec. 21. Area of the town, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 398; in 1841, 492. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 27. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 51; on their own manual labour, 39; on means not specified, 8.

SWANTONSTOWN, a village in the parish of Skull, and vicinity of Ballydehob, western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster.

SWATTERAGH, or SWATRAGH, a village in the parish of Maghera, barony of Loughisholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands at the northern extremity of the parish, on the river Clody, and on the mail-road from Coleraine to Armagh, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Maghera, 4 south by east of Garvaghy, and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Kilrea. The summit of Cairntogher, 1,521 feet in altitude, is situated 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the west-south-west; and the bill of Swatteragh is so near as to send down its eastern skirts to the village. Here is a Presbyterian meeting-house. Fairs are held on March 5, May 17, July 17, and Dec. 3. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 214; in 1841, 238. Houses 46.

SWEEP (THE), a hamlet in the parish of Kilmadan, barony of Middlethird, 4 miles south-west by west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. In its vicinity are the seats of Whitfield, and Mount-Congreve, Butlerstown, Wood-villa, and Ballyduff.—the first and the second the beautiful residences of respectively William Christmas, Esq., and John Congreve, Esq.

SWILLAN (LOUGH). See SILLAN.

SWILLY (THE), a rivulet of the baronies of Kilmacrenan and Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It rises near the south-west extremity of the parish of Conwal; it runs 10 miles east-north-eastward, past Letterkenny to the commencement of an estuarial expansion at Barn-Hill, 3 miles below Letterkenny; and it proceeds 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-eastward as an estuary, with an extreme breadth of 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, but reduced at low water to mere river volume, to a full expansion into Lough Swilly, 2 miles above Inch. The basin of the stream, from its source to the demesne of Foxhall, 3 miles above Letterkenny, is a picturesque mountain glen; and thence to Lough Swilly, it is a pleasant and fertile valley, screened with considerable hills, whose heights and escarpments are a brilliant diversity of moorland, pastoral verdure, tillage-ground, woodland, craggy knoll, and rocky precipice.

SWILLY (LOUGH), a large, long, and ramified inlet of the sea, in the county of Donegal, Ulster. It, in a general view, extends southward, between the peninsula of Innishowen and the main body of the county; and has the barony of Innishowen on the east, the barony of Raphoe on the south, and the barony of Kilmacrenan on the west. The parishes of Innishowen upon its shores are Clonmany, Desertegney, Lower Fahan, Upper Fahan, and Burt, besides that of Inch, lying insulated in its bosom; the parishes of Raphoe upon its shores are All-Saints, Raymoghly, and Leek; and the parishes of Kilmacrenan upon its shores are Aghanushin, Aghnish, Tullyferri, Killygarvan, and Clondeavaddock. The towns and principal villages upon its shores are Buncrana, in Lower Fahan; Churchtown, in Upper Fahan; Newtown-Conyngham, in All-Saints; Manor-Conyngham, in Raymoghly; Ramelton, in Aghnish; and Rathmullen, in Killygarvan. The Lough enters between Duaff Head on the east, and Fannat Point on the west, and has a width at the entrance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and it first extends 5 miles southward to Dunree-Fort, with a maximum width of 4 miles, and a minimum width of 2 miles; it next extends 4 miles south-east by southward to Buncrana, with a maximum and a minimum width of respectively 2 miles and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; it next extends 3 miles southward to Inch Island, with a maximum and a minimum width of respectively 2 miles and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; it then sends off a subordinate branch round the east and south sides of Inch, with a maximum and a minimum width of respectively $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile and $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; and it extends its main body in two stretches, the first $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward and southward to the foot of the estuary of the Swilly, with a maximum and a minimum width of respectively 2 miles and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and the second $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward up the estuary of the Swilly, with a maximum width of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile. The principal creeks or offsets are Ballyviesloker bay, in the parish of Clondeavaddock; Owenamara, Lamb's-Head, Mill, and Kerr's bays, all tiny creeks, in the parish of Killygarvan; Portbane, a little cove, in the parish of Desertegney; the small harbour of Buncrana, in Lower Fahan; a comparatively large expansion, of the nature of a lagoon, opposite the south-east extremity of Inch Island; the comparatively large estuary of the Leenane, up to the town of Ramelton; a considerable expansion in All-Saints, up to Newtown-Conyngham; and the navigable water-way of the river Swilly, up to the vicinity of Letterkenny. In the first stretch of the Lough, or between its entrance and Dunree Fort, are the rocks called the Five Fingers, those called the Swilly Rocks, and some tiny islets near the west shore. Between the entrance and Buncrana, are Dunree Fort on the east shore, and two batteries on the west shore. At Fannat Point is a lighthouse showing a fixed light, and indicating the entrance to the Lough; and the cost of maintaining this lighthouse during 1840, was £428 12s. 2d.,—during 1843, £282 17s. 8d. Spring tides rise within the Lough to the height of 18 feet. The shores below Buncrana are prevaillingly bluff and cliffy, and are washed to the edge at low water; but those above Buncrana rapidly soften in feature, and aggregately glide off into extensive strands at low water; and the bed of the Lough round the east and south sides of Inch, and within the estuary of the Swilly, is nearly all dry at low water. The capacities of the Lough for navigation and anchorage are singularly rich, yet minister surpassingly little to the purposes and prosperities of actual commerce. The immediate sea-boards from the entrance up to Inch Island are mixedly hilly and mountainous, and aggregately grand and imposing; and those above Inch Island exhibit such free and incessant intermixtures of low grounds, undulations, gentle hills, and the diversified features produced by different soils and treatments, as to be of decidedly pleasing character, and to present a considerable amount of middle-rate picturesqueness. The principal heights, from the entrance to Inch, are, on the east shore, Raghtenmore, 1,656 feet in altitude,—Milltown, 1,373 feet,—Aghaweel, 1,106 feet,—Clonglash, 855 feet,—Craig, 749 feet,—and Scalp, 1,589 feet; on Inch itself, a height of 757 feet; and on the west coast, Elagh Hill, 506 feet,—a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Elagh Hill, 751 feet,—Knockalla, 1,196 feet,—Croghan, 1,007 feet,—and Mass Hill, 1,132 feet. In 1841, about 2,000 acres of the bed of Lough Swilly were reclaimed from the tide, embanked, and completely drained by an English Company.

SWINEFORD, a small market and post town in the parish of Kilconduff, barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Dublin to Ballina, by way of Strokestown and Ballaghaderreen, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Kiltamagh, $5\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Bellaghy, 9 east-south-east of Foxford, $12\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by east of Castlebar, 14 west by north of Ballaghaderreen, 16 south-east by south of Ballina, and $102\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Dublin. It is washed by one of the numerous small head-streams of the river Moy; and it borrows embellishment from the adjoining demesne of Brabazon-Park, the residence of the late Sir William Brabazon, Bart. This demesne is rather a poor and ill-conditioned place for a baronet family; yet it forms both a conspicuous and a grateful feature in the midst of a flat, tame, treeless, and dreary expanse of country. The town is in an improving state; and it possesses a church, a parsonage, a Roman Catholic chapel, a market-house, a sessions-house, a poor-law workhouse, a dispensary, a constabulary barrack, several good shops, and an inn and posting establishment. Fairs are held on March 17, May 25, June 12, July 2, Aug. 18, Oct. 31, and Dec. 18. The town is the head-quarters of one of the nine districts of the constabulary of Mayo, and the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter on the second Tuesday of every month. In 1815, building leases were granted in the town by its proprietor, Sir William Brabazon; and, previous to that period, the place was a miserable village. Area of the town, 60 acres. Pop., in 1831, 813; in 1841, 1,016. Houses 146. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 50; in manufactures and trade, 78; in other pursuits, 35. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 84; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 12.

The Swineford Poor-law union ranks as the 23d, and was declared on April 2, 1840. It lies partly in co. Sligo, but chiefly in co. Mayo; and comprehends an area of 133,026 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 65,965. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are, in co. Sligo, Achonry, 5,119,—and Kilmacteigue, 7,620; and in co. Mayo, Swineford, 5,951,—Killasser, 6,581,—Tuamore, 3,576,—Meelick, 3,491,—Bohola, 3,658,—Killeaden, 5,741,—Knock, 3,036,—Aughamore, 7,062,—Kilmolvee, 5,491,—and Kilbeagh, 8,639. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 7 and 21; and of the latter, 3 are elected by the division of Kilbeagh, 2 by each of the divisions of Swineford, Killasser, Killeaden, Aughamore, Kilmovee, Achoury, and Kilmacteigue, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The two Sligo divisions lie within the barony of Leney; the divisions of Knock, Aughamore, Kilmovee, and Kilbeagh, lie within the barony of Costello; and the remaining divisions lie within the barony of Gallen. The number of valued tenements in the Leney districts is 2,657,—in the Costello districts, 4,265,—in the Gallen districts, 5,273,—in the entire union, 12,195; and of this total, 8,949 were valued under £5,—2,647, under £10,—316, under £15,—99, under £20,—50, under £25,—36, under £30,—30, under £40,—18, under £50,—and 50, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £57,561 15s. The workhouse was contracted for on Oct. 16, 1840,—to be completed in Feb. 1842,—to cost £7,100 for building and completion, and £1,300 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £18,—and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The total expenditure up to Feb. 6, 1843, was £615 3s. The only medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Swineford, Foxford, and Kiltamagh; and, in 1840-41, they expended £526 7s.; and administered to 9,047 patients, while the Swineford dispensary alone expended £187 17s., and administered to 2,974 patients.

SWORDS (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Meath and Dublin, Leinster. It rises in two head-streams, the one on the south border of the barony of Ratoath, the other on the north border of the barony of Dunboyne; and it runs $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward to the town of Swords in co. Dublin, and thence 1 mile north by eastward to a confluence with the Broadmeadow river; and the united stream now turns eastward, and falls almost immediately into the head of Malahide bay or estuary. The Swords rivulet sometimes bears the name of the Ward; and it pursues part of its way along a beautiful dell or mimic glen, and is there crossed by the Dublin and Drogheda road upon a causeway and bridge of considerable height.

SWORDS, a parish, partly in the barony of Coolock, but chiefly in that of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. The Nethercross section contains the town of Swords: see next article. Length, southward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Coolock section, 5 acres, 3 roads, 20 perches; of the Nethercross section, 9,668 acres, 3 roads, 31 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,722; in 1841, 3,638. Houses 670. Pop. of the Coolock section, in 1841, 5. House 1. Pop. of the rural districts of the Nethercross section, in 1841, 1,845. Houses 321. The Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96, transferred the townland of Ballymadrough from the barony of Balrothery to that of Nethercross, and the townland of Swords glebe from the barony of Nethercross to that of Coolock. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land, lying low, yet gently diversified with undulations, considerably embellished with culture, and pleasantly watered by the Swords and Broadmeadow rivulets to the head of Malahide bay. The highest ground is in the extreme north-west, and has an altitude above sea-level of 100 feet. The road from Dublin to Drogheda, by way of Balbriggan, passes through the interior. The principal rural residences are Brackenstown-house, Richard Manders, Esq.; Knocksedan-house; Rathingle-house; Little-Forest-house; Kileronan-house; Mount-Gamble; Swords-house; Mantua-house; Newport-house; Lissenhall; Maiden-house; Seafield, John Arthur, Esq.; Little Lissenhall; Roganstown-house; Saucerstown-house; and Rathbeal-house. The principal antiquities, apart from those in the town, are the ruins of a castle, the ruins of Forest-house, the ruins of Glasmore-abbey, St. Cronan's-Well, and Sunday-Well. The principal hamlets are Sunday-Well and Murray's-bridge.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £67 3s. 10½d.; glebe, £107 5s. One portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £204 3s. 9d., are appropriated to the prebend of Swords; and another portion, compounded for £205 17s. 4d., are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The vicarages of Swords and KINSEALY, and the curacies of KILLOSSORY and KILLEEK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Swords. Pop., in 1831, 4,927. Gross income, £334 6s. 10½d.; nett, £311 14s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1818, by means of a loan of £2,307 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 150. Two Roman Catholic chapels in the parish have an attendance of respectively 1,500 and 75; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Malahide. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kinscally and Killossory. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 541, and the Roman Catholics to 3,712; the Protestants of the union to 605, and the Roman Catholics to 4,845; 3 daily schools in the parish had on their books 264 boys and 218 girls; and a daily school in Kinscally had 28 boys and 42 girls. One of the schools in Swords parish was a day school held in the Roman Catholic chapel; one was aided with a grant of £15 a-year from the National Board; and one was a public free-school, for the children of residents within the old borough of Swords, supported out of the annual proceeds of the sum of £15,000, granted as compensation for the disfranchisement of the borough at the Legislation Union.

SWORDS,

A market and post town in the parish of Swords, barony of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the Swords river, and at the intersection of the road from Malahide to Ashbourne with the east road from Dublin to Drogheda, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Malahide, $3\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Santry, $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-east by east of Ashbourne, 7 north by east of Dublin, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Balrothery, and 16 south by east of Drogheda.

Environ.—The steep banks and lovely features of the dell of the Swords river, some tumulation of ground immediately adjacent to the dell, the rich soil and fine cultivation of the surrounding fields, and the profusion and variety of the neighbouring villas and villa-demesnes, render the site and environs of the town more pleasing than those of most in an equally flat district of country. "A very interesting road leads from Swords to Brazeel, the ancient residence of the Bolton family. It winds on a terrace overlooking the glen and rivulet which run through Swords; presently Brackenstown-house appears in view on the opposite descent of the glen, with the mills in the depth of the valley, and, lastly, the ruins of the old house of Brazeel. On the opposite side of the road is a fine fort, about 24 feet in diameter, and 50 feet in height, with one yet distinguishable fosse which opened into the river, whence it could be filled when its defence required such a measure." The group of the principal public buildings of the town, situated on the summit of a rising ground, and consisting of the modern Gothic church, the massive square of a quondam abbey church, and a tapering and perfectly preserved pillar-tower, forms a picturesque, striking, and unique feature in the midst of a large region of low rich country.

The Town and its Public Buildings.—The principal street of Swords extends about half-a-mile along the Dublin and Drogheda road, and consists chiefly of small houses; and the entire town has a meagre and poor appearance as to nearly all its modern condition, yet makes a powerful impression upon a stranger, particularly upon an antiquary, by its ancient public buildings and its many historical associations. "Like most of our ancient towns," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, who, however, adopts both the language and the blunders of most popular authors in Irish ecclesiastical antiquities, "Swords appears to be of ecclesiastical origin. A sumptuous monastery was founded here in the year 512, by the great St. Columb, who appointed St. Finian Lobair, or the leper, as its abbot, and to whom he gave a missal or copy of the gospels, written by himself. St. Finian died before the close of the 6th century. In course of time, this monastery became possessed of considerable wealth, and the town rose into much importance. It contained within its precincts, in addition to St. Columb's church, 4 other chapels, and 9 exterior chapels subservient to the mother church. Hence, on the institution of the collegiate church of St. Patrick, it ranked as the first of the 13 canonries attached to that cathedral by Archbishop Comin, and was subsequently known by the appellation of the golden prebend. There was also a nursery here, the origin of which is unknown. To this monastery, the bodies of the monarch Brian Boromh and his son Morogh, were conveyed in solemn procession by the monks after the memorable battle of Clontarf; and after remaining a night were carried to the abbey of Duleek, and committed to the care of the monks of St. Cieran, by whom they were conveyed to Armagh." A re-edification of the Culdean pile founded by St. Columb, and eventually devoted to the use of monks, and constituted in the true sense of the word an abbey, is said to have been a structure of much architectural beauty; and its church was long used as the parochial place of worship, but, with the exception of the tower or belfry, was all swept away to make place for the present modern parochial church. The tower stands detached on the north side of the present church; it presents no indications of a higher antiquity than the 14th or 15th century; and it is a massive and rather lofty square structure, undistinguished by any remarkable architectural features. The present church was completed in 1818, after a design by Mr. Trench of Heywood, and superintended by Mr. Farrel; and is a substantial edifice of cut stone, in the modern pointed style of architecture. But "though imposing in its general appearance," remarks the writer already quoted, "it is but a spurious and jejune imitation of the pointed or Gothic style of architecture, and such as might have been expected from minds so wanting in good taste and feeling as those which permitted the removal of the beautiful ruins of the ancient abbey to erect it on their site. Similar acts of wanton destruction are now unfortunately of daily occurrence, and are any thing but honourable to their perpetrators, who, though they may regard such remains as vestiges of ancient superstition, should still remember, as Byron says, that

Of any worship wake some thoughts divine.'

We are told that the inhabitants of Swords feel proud of this pretending but tasteless structure, and we believe it possible; but if the principles of a refined and educated architectural taste should ever again be generally disseminated in Ireland, they will indulge in a very different feeling. In this country, we have yet to learn that elegance of form and correctness of design in ecclesiastical buildings, are, in the hands of a judicious and educated architect, quite attainable even with the limited means usually appropriated to the purpose." The interior of the church has no division, and is neat, but possesses no architectural embellishment. The west end has a gallery or organ loft, and the east window is filled with modern painted glass, pleasingly executed. Bell says, respecting the quondam monastic buildings, with their church, "Their remains are chiefly of the pointed Gothic order, but from its appearance it must have been one of the earliest specimens after its introduction into Ireland. The arches, as was usual at that early period, are of a mixed style, some circular, others pointed, but generally of rude workmanship. The present walls enclose an area of great extent, and several parts indicate that they were founded as much for strength and protection as for any other purpose. They were strongly fortified with towers, and their exterior presents an embattled front, of an imposing appearance, and from the constant ravages which this abbey suffered from their Danish neighbours, it is evident that these fortifications were not uncalled for." A few yards to the north of the tower of the old church, and standing, like it, in an isolated position, is the pillar-tower of Swords, one of the plainest of the curious antiquities of its unique class, but maintained in a state of high preservation. The tower is 73 feet in height, and terminates in a conical capping, which, at a date long subsequent to that of the tower's own erection, came to be surmounted by a cross. Near the summit are four round-headed apertures, facing the cardinal points; and in different stages of the ascent are four other apertures, small and square. The doorway faces the east, but is now walled up, and, in consequence of the gradual accumulation of soil round the base of the tower, is now on a level with the surface. Archdall says that two of the chapels in Swords, which stood apart from the church of the ancient monastery, were dedicated to respectively St. Finian and St. Bridget; that the latter "was on the north side of the town, not far from the gates of the old palace;" and that in the vicinity of it stood an ancient cross, called 'Pardon Crosse.' The castle or palace of Swords was, from an early period, one of the residences of the archbishop of Dublin; and Harris notices that Archbishop Comin obtained from King John a license for an annual fair at Swords during 8 days after the festival of St. Columb. The palace was built in the castellated style of architecture, of such strength and appearance as to accord with the turbulence and perilousness of the times in which it was erected; but, though still surviving in some interesting remains, it was so freely used as a mere quarry for the general supply of the population, as to be now reduced to mere ranges of embattled wall, flanked with towers, and enclosing a court which is now converted into a garden, but which formerly contained the domestic palatial buildings. "Descending from the churchyard, by a fine old village elm," says a writer in the Irish Penny Magazine, "and crossing the little stream that waters this town, the visitor approaches the embattled enclosure, which yet presents considerable remains of the archiepiscopal palace and of the old chapel of St. Columb, as it is popularly called; the warders' walk round the castle walls, and several watch-towers, are still traceable. On the line of the walls, at one side, is the outer gate of a building popularly said to have been that in which the parliaments that have met at Swords were assembled. The window in this is very remarkable for the mullions and casements, which are all of a red sandstone unknown in this country. The whole interior of the edifice, as also of several others, which were included in the existing walls, have been removed, and the circumscribed area cultivated as an orchard. Here is also a new chapel, built about 1827, with a conspicuous steeple, but not very remarkable either for its beauty or commodiousness." The other public buildings are an infantry barrack, the endowed school, and the bridge.

Trade, &c.—Almost the only trade is the retail supply of miscellaneous goods to the surrounding country. Fairs are held on March 17 and May 9. In 1838, the public conveyances were 3 cars to Dublin, a coach, a caravan, and a mail-car, in transit between Dublin and Drogheda, a coach between Dublin and Belfast, 2 cars between Dublin and Balbrigan, and a coach between Dublin and Armagh. In 1843, the Swords Loan Fund had a capital of £221, circulated £816 in 281 loans, realized a net profit of £8 12s. 9d., and had two proprietors or depositors of its capital. A dispensary in the town is within the Balrothery Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,063; and, in 1839–40, it expended £203 10s., and administered to 1,844 patients.

Municipal Affairs.—The town of Swords is recognised as a borough by a charter of Richard I.; and it had a previous charter of John, Earl of Morton, and a subsequent one of 5 James II. The borough limits extended, on the north, about 1½ mile from the centre of the town, to Balhary; on the east, a little less than a mile, to Lissenhall river; on the south, about a mile, to Driinan; and on the west, about ¾ of a mile, to Moorestown. The only public officers were a portreeve of the borough, and the seneschal of the manor of St. Sepulchre, which is part of the possessions of the archbishop of Dublin. The portreeve was annually appointed by the archbishop of Dublin, and sworn at the Michaelmas court-leet of the manor of St. Sepulchre in Dublin. Two commons, designated East and West, or the Commons of Drynan and the Commons of Swords, and comprising respectively about 20, and upwards of 100 acres, were formerly maintained for the uses of the inhabitants; but, between the years 1800 and 1833, they were so completely encroached upon, that, in the latter year, only about 20 perches remained unenclosed. A portreeve's court, acting as a branch of the seneschal's court of St. Sepulchre, and exercising jurisdiction in all cases arising within the manor, was formerly held once a-week, but was discontinued about the year 1828. A court of petty-sessions, presided over by the magistrates of the county, is held on every Wednesday. The public peace is maintained by a party of the county constabulary. A lock-up place under the police barrack is the only apology for a prison. The principal street of the town is part of a turnpike road, and is kept in repair by the trustees; and the other streets or bye-ways are repaired by county presentments. The resident householders of the borough sent two members to the Irish parliament; and the sum of £15,000, granted as compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union, was vested in a body of governors, to be secured in the government funds, and the interest of it to be applied, "in the first place, to the maintenance of one or more schools to be established within the borough, under proper instructors, and the surplus of the occurring interest, after paying all expenses of maintaining the establishment for education, in apprenticing the children educated in the said school to useful trades and occupations; and that any further surplus still remaining should be applied in premiums for the general encouragement of agriculture and manufactures, or in such other manner and under such regulations as the trustees should think would most effectually tend to promote the Christian religion, morality, good order, sobriety, cleanliness, industry, and wealth, within the said borough; and that a sum of £1,875, being the interest on the said sum, due on the 25th June, 1803, should be applied in obtaining ground for a site, and in purchasing, repairing, building, or fitting up proper school-rooms for the purposes of the establishment." The surplus of the interest, after all the expenses of the schools are defrayed, is applied to the support of the town's dispensary, and of a coal store for supplying coals at a reduced rate to the poor. The officers of the governors are a treasurer, a superintendent, a master of the boys' school, a mistress of the girls' school, and a physician for the dispensary. The children admitted to the schools are not limited in number, but they must be the children of parents who have for 5 years been resident within the town or liberties; 6 boys and 6 girls are apprenticed out every year, and the sum of £12 paid with each apprentice; and the children selected to be apprenticed must be 14 years of age, and taken from the first class for best answering. Another public fund, arising from lands called Economy lands, is applied in repairing the parish-church, and otherwise relieving the parishioners from church rates.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 104 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,537; in 1841, 1,788. Houses 348. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 210; in manufactures and trade, 149; in other pursuits, 87. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 164; on their own manual labour, 255; on means not specified, 10. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 358; who could read but not write, 155; who could neither read nor write, 236. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 282; who could read but not write, 176; who could neither read nor write, 389.

History.—Swords was anciently called the City of St. Columbkille, and long figured as a place of great importance. In 1012, and again in 1016, it was burned by the Danes. In 1035, Conor O'Melaghlín laid waste Swords, in retaliation of Sitric, the Danish king of Dublin, having devastated Ardbraccan. In 1069, and again in 1130, 1138, and 1166, Swords was greatly injured by fire. In 1191, Archbishop Comin granted to St. Patrick's church the tithes of all his mills, excepting those of Swords, which he had previously granted to the monastery of Grace Dieu. In 1336, the celebrated William of Wykeham, famous for his artistic achievements in architecture, and afterwards bishop of Winchester, held the prebend of Swords along with eleven benefices in England. In 1423, the prebend of Swords was conferred by the king upon Brande, Cardinal of Placentia. In 1431, this prebend, hitherto called the Golden Prebend, and now become notorious as an object of cupidity to cardinals and other favourites of the Roman see, was divided into three portions, one assigned to the prebendary, one assigned to the perpetual vicar, and one conferred on the chapter of St. Patrick's cathedral for the maintenance of six minor canons and six choristers, and for the defraying of lights, repairs, and other necessary expenses. In 1474, an act of parliament granted an annuity to the prioress of the nunnery of Swords, and to her successors. In 1585, Swords sent its first members to parliament. In 1641, the first Irish army of the Pale assembled at Swords, preparatory to the commencement of the great civil war which desolated the kingdom; and this army was afterwards attacked by Sir Charles Coote, and driven from its intrenchments with considerable loss.

SYBIL-HEAD, or CAPE-SYBIL, a lofty and picturesque cape, at the north-western extremity of the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Cork, Munster. It screens the north side of Ferriters Cove; and is situated $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Dunourlin Head, and 4 north of Dunmore Head. The cliffs of the cape itself and of the stretch of coast onward to Dunourlin Head are soaring and romantic; and on their summit, near the latter headland, are the remains of the Fort-del-ore, which was occupied by the Spanish troops, who landed in the vicinity, and were attacked and hewn down in the reign of Elizabeth.

SYDDAN, or SIDDAX, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Lower Slane, 4 miles east-south-east of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,163 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,212; in 1841, 1,357. Houses 231. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Kells to Ardee. The seats are Mooretown-house, Bigstone-lodge, and Keeran-house. The village stands in the western district, and is the site of the church. A dispensary here is within the Ardee Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 17,837 acres, with a pop. of 5,853; and, in 1839-40, it expended £145 8s. 6d., and administered to 1,266 patients. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 121. Houses 20.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial title composition, £83 1s. 6d.; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £253 16s. 1d.; and are inappropriate in J. P. Eyton, Esq. The vicarages of Syddan and KILLEARY, and the rectory of MITCHELLSTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Syddan. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 3,658. Gross income, £291 3s. 9d.; nett, £251 3s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1753, by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 150; attendance, from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels of Syddan, Lobbinstown, and Heronstown, have an attendance of respectively from 400 to 500, 500, and 500; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 1,200; the Protestants of the union to 123, and the Roman Catholics to 3,861; 2 pay daily schools at Newtown and Greenhills, in the parish, were usually attended by about 96 scholars; and 5 other daily schools in the union had on their books 127 boys and 71 girls.

SYNGENSTOWN. See BALDRASHANE.

TA, or LADY'S ISLAND (LOUGH), a sea-lough or lagoon in the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is connected with the ocean by a narrow and brief strait, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Carnsore Point; and it penetrates the land nearly 2 miles north-north-eastward, with an extreme breadth of about 7 furlongs. It has the parish of Tacumshane on the west, that of St. Iberius on the north-west, that of Lady's Island or St. Mary's on the north-east, and that of Carne on the east. Its shores are all low; and the tiny peninsula between it and the sea consists of sheer sand. Near its head is the small island or peninsula of Lady's Island; and near its centre are two islets called Inches.

TABLE-MOUNTAIN, one of the central alps of co. Wicklow, Leinster. Its summit forms part of the watershed between the river-systems of the Slaney and the Ovoca; and is situated at the junction-point of the three parishes of Hollywood, Knockrath, and Donaghmore, and of the three baronies of Lower Talbotstown, South Ballinacor, and Upper Talbotstown; and it has an altitude above sea-level of 2,312 feet. But so nearly fused is this cloud-cleaving summit into the great general ridge of the Slaney and Ovoca watershed, that the "gap" which affords a path of communication between Glenmalur and the Glen of Inail, and which is situated about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of the summit, has an altitude above sea-level of 2,296 feet. The road which climbs over so enormous an elevation is of course a mere bridle-path, quite impracticable for wheeled vehicles; yet—excepting the road through Wicklow gap, which passes over an elevation of 1,569 feet, and is only a degree more practicable—it forms the only communication between the western and the eastern districts of the county within a range northward and southward of 16 miles.

TACUMSHANE, a parish on the south coast of the barony of Forth, 2 miles south-west of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south by westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,153 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 11 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 907; in 1841, 961. Houses 140. The surface is part of a low and flat expanse of rich land; but, according to the honest admission of Mason's statist, is "too level to admit of beauty, and is not enriched with any natural curiosities." The lagoon of Ta or Lady's Island [see TA] bounds part of the east; and the strictly similar lagoon of Tacumshane bounds part of the west. The latter lagoon is connected with the ocean by a narrow and brief strait 4 miles west-north-west of Carnsore Point; it penetrates the land $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile northward, with an extreme breadth of 2 miles; it has within its area two islets, and is bounded by the parish of Tombhaggard on the west, the parishes of Lhartmon and Ballymore on the north, and the parish of Tacumshane on the east; and, except at the narrow connecting strait, it is separated from the ocean by two tiny peninsulæ of sheer sand. The greater part of the strand or shore of the parish is either a firm sandy bathing-ground, very grateful in summer for sea-bathing, and in all weathers and seasons for exercise; or a soft and permeable series of low sandhills, occupied as a vast rabbit-warren, and annually producing an enormously large supply of rabbits. The statist in Mason, speaking of all the parishes in the benefice of Tacumshane, says, "There is not a river in this country; streamlets there are which become dry in summer. In this extremity cattle are driven for water to marl pits, with which it abounds, that are never exhausted. Into these many sporting gentlemen are unexpectedly precipitated; and whether they will or not, must submit to a dip into a cold bath, to the no small amusement of their comrades in the field." Pigeons abound and thrive, and are a considerable source of economical profit. Myriads of wild fowl feed richly upon a peculiar grass or sea-weed found on the coast, and have a taste and flavour superior to those of almost any other district. "To the Wexford oyster, so celebrated by travellers," says the statist, "we should do injustice if we passed it by in silence. The principal bed which is dredged for this fish is directly opposite to the rector's house: the scene is very interesting, on account of the number of boats employed, the dexterity of the men, and the various changes in the colour according as the rays of the sun bear upon them. These oysters are to most tastes superior to any others in this or the sister country, inasmuch as they are more salt and savoury; they answer best for pickling on this account, and continue for weeks in that state unimpaired. In that truly plentiful and most hospitable town of Wexford, this fish is prepared for table in many ways and relished in all." "This coast is remarkable for the quantity and quality of its lobsters, the sale of which produces a good sum yearly to those employed, and causes a great supply of common round fish." The only seat in the parish is Bennetstown-house; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a church and five castles, the latter uniform with one another, and with the very numerous old castles of Forth and Bargie.—Tacumshane parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £224 18s. 11½d. The parishes of Tacumshane and Ballymore constitute the perpetual curacy, and the separate benefice of CHURCHTOWN: which see. The rectories of Tacumshane, BALLYMORE, ROSLARE, KILSCORAN, and KILLILANE, the vicarage of KILRANE, and the impropriate curacy of ST. MARGARET [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tacumshane, and the corps of the chancellorship of Ferns cathedral. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4; but these measurements are exclusive of an uninhabited sand-bank of 3 miles. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of the two parishes in the perpetual curacy of Churehtown, 2,493. Gross income, £1,036 14s. 7d.; nett, £874 12s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates are employed, each on a salary of £75. The church of Tacumshane, situated near the north-east extremity of Lough Tacumshane, is the parochial place of worship of the benefice of Churchtown. The church of the benefice of Tacumshane is in Kilsoran, and has an attendance of 200. Roslare Fort, in the parish of Roslare, is also used as a parochial place of worship. There are Roman Catholic chapels in Roslare, Kilrane, Tacumshane, and Ballymore. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish of Tacumshane amounted to 95, and the Roman Catholics to 836; the Protestants of the benefice of Tacumshane—exclusive of the parishes of Tacumshane and Ballymore—amounted to 204, and the Roman Catholics to 2,351; and 4 daily schools in the benefice of Tacumshane had on their books 60 boys and 56 girls, and were usually attended by about 35 other children.

TADON (LOUGH), a lake in the parishes of Runn, Rath, and Killenaboy, barony of Inchiquin, co. Clare, Munster. It lies 3 furlongs east of the village of Inehiquin, measures 8 furlongs by 5, and is one of a series or cordon of lakes.

TAGGART, an inhabited island of Lough Strangford, co. Down, Ulster. It lies on the west side of the lough, on the line between the tideway and the permanent lough, nearly a mile north-north-east of the town of Killyleagh; it measures ¾ of a mile in length from north to south, but is disproportionately small in breadth; and it belongs to the parish of Killyleagh, and barony of Dufferin.

TAGGART, an islet in the parish of Kilmeena, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies near the head of Clew bay, 3¼ miles west-north-west of Westport. It is sometimes called Illan-taggart.

TAGHADOE, TEAGHDOE, or TAPTOO, a parish in the barony of North Salt, 2 miles south-south-west of Maynooth, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, northward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,126 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches. Pop., in 1831, 467; in 1841, 423. Houses 64. The surface consists, in general, of second-rate land, and is traversed by the road from Maynooth to Naas, and watered northward by the rivulet Lyrcan. The seats are Newtown, Brooklawn, Lady's-chapel-house, and Windgates. The hamlet of Taghadoe is situated on the north verge of the parish; and is the site of the parish-church, upon ground 220 feet in altitude above the level of the sea, and of the remains of a pillar-tower, beautiful in situation, and one of the finest edifices of its unique class.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £220; glebe, £12 12s. Gross income, £232 12s.; nett, £220 6s. 5d. Patron, the corporation of the city of Dublin. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of St. Andrew's, in the city and dio. of Dublin, but occasionally visits Taghadoe. A curate is employed upon a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 20; attendance 15. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 470 Roman Catholics.

TAGHBAY, or TAUGHBOY, a parish 5½ miles south-east of Athleague, and partly in the barony of Killyn, co. Galway, but chiefly in the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length of the Galway section, south-south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 5,134 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches,—of which 104 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are water. Length of the Roscommon section, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 8,861 acres, 3 roods,—of which 129 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,906; in 1841, 3,825. Houses 676. Pop. of the Roscommon section, in 1831, 2,564; in 1841, 3,001. Houses 540. The river Suck, pursuing a southerly course, forms the boundary-line between the two sections; and is here crossed by Ballyforan bridge. Most of the surface of the Galway section is bog; and the remainder is light land. In this section are Muckloon-house, and a police barrack. Most of the surface of the Roscommon section is profitable light land; yet a considerable proportion, especially in the north-west, is bog. The rivulet Ballyglass and the road from Roscommon to Ballinasloe traverse the interior. The seats are Ballina, Cloonagh-house, Claremont-house, and Turrock-house; and the principal hamlets are Thomas-street, Commons, and Creekarinore.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TESSARAGH [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £58 3s. 1d., and the rectorial for £38 15s. 4½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. One Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Thomas-street, and another in the vicinity of Claremont-house and of the Suck; yet, though there is one also in Tassaragh, only two are returned as within the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 3,504; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 102 boys and 39 girls. In 1843, a National school at Ballyforan was salaried with £15 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 85 boys and 39 girls.

TAGHEEN, or TAGHEEN, a parish in the barony of Clannorris, 2½ miles north-north-east of Hollymount, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 6,837 acres, 38 perches,—of which 60 acres, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,561; in 1841, 3,084. Houses 572. Part of the surface is bog; but most is very good land. The highest ground is in the northern border, and has an altitude above sea-level of 212 feet. The drainage is effected by the river Robe; and the interior of the south-east district is traversed by the road from Hollymount to Clannorris. The small lake Dean lies on the south-west border, and has a surface-elevation of 152 feet above sea-level. The seats are Cappagh-house, and Hollybrook-house; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of Tagheen church and Altina-castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCOMON [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £104 2s. 5d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Crossboyne. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 2,743; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 112 boys and 32 girls.

TAGHMACONNELL, a parish in the barony of Athlone, 4½ miles north-north-east of Ballinasloe, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 18,826 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 215 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,445, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 4,418; in 1841, 4,807. Houses 841. The surface comprises a considerable proportion of bog, and contains very little good land, and no elements whatever of fine landscape. One height, called Feacle Hill, on the northern border, has an altitude above sea-level of 391 feet; and another height on the southern border has an altitude of 235 feet. Lough Corkip, a little upwards of 1 mile in length, lies on the north-eastern boundary; a loughlet of the name of Doo lies on the southern border; and the small Lough Gore lies in the western district. The river Suck runs, for 2½ miles, along the western boundary. The road from Ballinasloe to Athleague and Roscommon passes through the interior. The seats are Keoghville, Feacle-house, Bellfield-cottage, Camlagh-house, Glenmore-house, and Clooncoran-house; and the principal hamlets are Castle-Sampson, Killeglan, Cregganycavan, Dundonnel, Lower Carrowreagh, Upper Carrowreagh, and Cuilmore.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CREACH [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £108; glebe, £2 18s. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £39 13s. 10½d., is appropriated to the bishop and dean of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200. In 1834, the parishioners, with one exception, were all Roman Catholics; and 3 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 150 scholars.

TAGHMON, a parish in the barony of Corkaree, 5 miles north-north-east of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-north-eastward, 2½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2; area, 3,452 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches,—of which 14 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches are in Lough Deraveagh. Pop., in 1831, 922; in 1841, 938. Houses 173. The surface consists, in general, of good tillage land, declines to the head of Lough Deraveagh, and is traversed by the road from Mullingar to Oldcastle. The hamlets are Rathcloghrin, Taghmon-Bridge, and Crooked-Wood; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a chapel, and of Tobberallen church.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Menth. Tithe composition, £133 16s. 7d.; glebe, £80. The rectories of Taghmon and MULTIFARNHAM, and the vicarage of STONEHALL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Taghmon. Gross income, £306 4s. 11½d.; nett, £285 2s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefices of Taghmon and Multifarnham were united by Act of Council in 1809; and the parishes of Stonehall and Multifarnham constitute the perpetual curacy of STONEHALL. The church of Taghmon is an old building of unknown date and cost. Sittings 100; attendance, about 15. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Mountain; and has an attendance of from 500 to 600. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 52, and the Roman Catholics to 875; and 2 pay daily schools at Monkton and Tubberquill, had on their books 78 boys and 35 girls.

TAGHMON, a parish, partly in the barony of Barge, but chiefly in that of West Shelmalier, co. Wexford, Leinster. The Shelmalier section contains the town of TAGHMON; see next article. Length, south-south-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the Barge section, 1,386 acres, 3 roods; of the Shelmalier section, 8,738 acres, 37 perches,—of which 1,812 acres, 2 roods form a detached district of about 2 miles by 1½ lying a little to the east. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 2,803, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,175; in 1841, 3,737. Houses 602. Pop., in 1841, of the Barge section, 316; of the rural districts of the Shelmalier section, 2,118. Houses in these, respectively 54 and 362. The eastern portion of the detached district is part of the Forth mountains; and the western portion of that district has on the boundary a water-elevation of 245 feet above sea-level. The main body of the parish consists, for the most part, of good arable land; and has on the south and on the north two water-elevations of respectively 110 and 105 feet above sea-level. The principal rural residences are Coolcull-house, Blastknock-cottage, Hullburn-house, Clover-valley, and Slevoy-castle,—the last the seat of Col. Pigott; and the other chief objects of interest are a woollen factory, the ruins of seven castles, the ruins of four churches, the ruins of a windmill, and a Quakers' meeting-house and burying-ground.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £446 13s. 6d. The rectories of Taghmon, BALLYCONNICK, and BALLYMITT [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Taghmon, and the corps of the prebend of Taghmon. Gross income, £674 9s. 8½d.; nett, £568 18s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is employed upon a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 80. The Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of 25. The Taghmon and the Trinity Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,800 and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kilgarvan. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Ballymytty. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 141 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 3,060 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 172 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 3,951 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school in the parish was maintained by contributions from the rector, the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and the Sunday School Society, and had on its books 15 boys and 10 girls; and 7 daily schools in the union—5 of which were in the parish—had on their books 195 boys and 99 girls. One of the daily schools in the parish was aided with from £5 to £15 a-year, and other advantages, from the rector; and one, with £4 a-year from a local association. In 1843, a National school at Taghmon was salaried with £20 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 68 boys and 35 girls.

TAGHMON, a small market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Taghmon, barony of West Shmalialier, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Enniscorthy to Bannow, with the old road from Wexford to New Ross, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Foulkes'-Mills, $6\frac{1}{2}$ west by south of Wexford, 9 north-north-east of Bannow, 11 south by west of Enniscorthy, $12\frac{1}{2}$ east-south-east of New Ross, and 73 south of Dublin. The town is approached by some of the worst roads in Leinster, and is a decayed and poor place, consisting principally of cabins; yet it is surrounded by a populous, fertile, pleasant, and well-cultivated country. It is washed by a rivulet, tributary to the Slaney; it stands not far from the west end of the Forth mountains; and it contains the parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a small inn and posting establishment, a dispensary, a loan fund, a small court-house, a constabulary barrack, an old and curious stone cross, and some vestiges of a monastic foundation, and a castellated building. The town was anciently called Teach-Munee or Teach-Mun; and it is said to have acquired this name from a St. Munno or Fintan, the alleged founder of its abbey. Hagiologists say respecting St. Munno and his supposed monastic foundation, that he had 152 disciples of great sanctity,—that he and they were zealously attached to the ancient manner of celebrating Easter,—that he died on Oct. 25, 634,—that the abbey was plundered by the Danes in 917,—and that it was given by Dermot MacMurrough, king of Leinster, to the abbey of Ferns. The dispensary is within the Wexford Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 9,863; and, in 1839-40, it expended £129 2s. 9½d., and administered to 1,625 patients. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £845, circulated £4,224 in 1,118 loans, realized a nett profit of £100 9s., expended for charitable purposes £206 13s. 2d., and had 18 depositors or proprietors of its capital. A court of petty-sessions is held on every Wednesday. Fairs are held on Jan. 2 and 16, Feb. 1 and 16, March 1 and 18, April 3 and 15, May 2 and 28, June 20, July 16, Aug. 2, Sept. 7, Oct. 1 and 21, Nov. 4, and Dec. 1. One of Bianconi's cars passes through the town, in transit between Wexford and New Ross. The Commissioners of Municipal Corporations report concerning Taghmon, "There was a corporation here formerly, but there is no trace of any remaining at present, neither sovereign, portreeve, Burgess, nor any thing connected with a corporate system. We have not been able to discover any charter relative to the borough of Taghmon, but we find mention in an inquisition of the county of Wexford, bearing date the 22d August, 7 Charles I., of land stated to be in the town of Tamun; and within the burgages of Tamun; and a later inquisition of the 25th April, 1663, makes mention of lands in the town and fields of Taghmon, within the borough of Taghmon; and in the Union Compensation Returns mention is also made of the portreeve and burgesses of Taghmon. There is not any property, either landed or other, belonging to this borough. Customs were collected here until of late. This borough sent members to the Irish Parliament, to the time of the union, and the compensation of £15,000 on account of the loss of its representative franchise, was awarded to the portreeve and burgesses of the borough, and the Right Honourable Henry King and Robert French, Esq., executors and trustees named in the will of Henry Bruen." Area of the town, 49 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,109; in 1841, 1,303. Houses 286. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 142; in manufactures and trade, 110; in other pursuits, 69. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 124; on their own manual labour, 173; on means not specified, 16.

TAGOAT, a village in the parish of Roslare, barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the southern verge of the parish, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of the nearest part of St. George's channel, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the south-east extremity of Wexford Harbour, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the village of Broadway. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, and a constabulary barrack; and in its vicinity are St. Mary's-Well and a parish-church. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ferns, takes designation from Tagoat, and has chapels here and at Kilrane.

TALANSTOWN. See TALLANSTOWN.

TALBOT. See DUBLIN (CITY OR).

TALBOTSTOWN, a hamlet in the barony of Upper Talbotstown, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Baltinglass, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It seems to have anciently possessed some little importance; but it is now notable only for giving name to the baronies of Lower and Upper Talbotstown.

TALBOTSTOWN (LOWEN), a barony in the extreme north-west of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the county of Dublin; on the east, by the baronies of Rathdown and North Ballinacor; on the south, by the barony of Upper Talbotstown; and, on the west, by the county of Kildare. Its length, south-south-westward, is $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is 9 miles; and its area is 83,964 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 87 acres, 9 perches are water. The northern district, and the northern and middle parts of the western district, consists of the glen or upper valley of the Liffey and its mountain-screens; and the other districts are a congeries of lofty heights intersected by Glen-Bride, the glen of the King's river, and the small glens of various tiny affluents of the Liffey, and head-streams of the Slaney. The principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, on the northern boundary, three heights of respectively 1,532, 2,033, and 2,364 feet, and Kippure, 2,473 feet; on the eastern boundary, three heights of respectively 2,364, 2,783, and 2,307 feet, and Thonelagee, 2,683 feet; on the southern boundary, three heights of respectively 2,095, 1,037, and 861 feet; on the western boundary, Slieveroe, 1,093 feet, and Coreen-Hill; on the north-western boundary, a height of 1,308 feet; and, in the interior, Butter mountain, 1,459 feet,—Sorrel-Hill, 1,875 feet,—a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Sorrel-Hill, 1,551,—and Slieve-Gradoe, 1,791 feet. The agricultural condition of the barony may be inferred from the remarks in the following article upon Upper Talbotstown.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Blessington, Boystown, Burgence, Cryhelp, Donard, Hollywood, and Kilbride. The towns and chief villages are Blessington, Donard, and Dunlavin. Pop., in 1831, 14,784; in 1841, 14,638. Houses 2,203. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,791; in manufactures and trade, 443; in other pursuits, 212. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 55; on the directing of labour, 920; on their own manual labour, 1,392; on means not specified, 79. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write,

TALBOTSTOWN (UPPER), a barony in the western division of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Lower Talbotstown; on the east, by the barony of South Ballinacor; on the south, by the county of Carlow; and on the west, by the county of Kildare. Its length, south-eastward, is 11½ miles; its greatest breadth is 10½; and its area is 65,403 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches. The eastern district is part of the alpine country around the monarch mountain Lugnaquilla; the western district is part of the comparatively low hilly country, which glides down from the Wicklow mountains to the plains of Kildare; and the central district is part of the upper valley and hill screens of the river Slaney. The principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, on the northern boundary, three heights of respectively 861, 1,037, and 2,005 feet; on the eastern boundary, Lugnaquilla, 3,039 feet; on the western boundary, Timorin, 1,023 feet; and in the interior, Mount Culdeen, 2,143 feet, and a height 3 miles west of Mount Culdeen, 1,256 feet. The barony of Upper Talbotstown was selected by the Commissioners for inquiring into the condition of the poor, as the most suitable specimen-ground of the county of Wicklow; and it figures in their report, with an interest and a fulness not a little instructive. "The dairies in this barony," they say, "form the chief feature in its rural economy. The size of the dairies is from 5 to 20 cows; and the system adopted by different farmers, or in mountain and lowland farms, varies very little, although the produce does very considerably. The average of the smaller dairies is not more than 1 cwt. of butter (besides rearing a calf) per cow in the year, and that of larger dairies about nine stones; while some gentlemen farmers average from 1½ to 1½ cwt. per cow. The same superiority is found in the quality of the butter. Such is the general absence of the accommodation, cleanliness, and system which are considered in all the countries indispensable to successful dairying, that it is perfectly unaccountable how the farmers here can produce butter of so good a quality, and it must arise, in a great measure, from the excellence of the soil and climate for that purpose. Some of the smaller farmers churn the whole milk, but the more general practice is to take off the cream with about one-fourth of the whole depth of the milk in the tub or pan; it stands from two days to a week before being churned, according to the weather, season, and extent of the dairy. Some farmers put down the butter in the cask as soon as it is made; others wait until they have enough to fill the firkin. Large upright churns are used, which are worked by one or two persons, by means of a frame fastened to one of the beams of the ceiling, and in large dairies by means of a horse-mill in an adjoining room; they are heavy machines, and constructed with little regard to the economy of labour. The system of letting dairies is sometimes practised here. The owner provides everything,—farm, cows, &c., the person who hires the dairy having only to manufacture the butter, or to fatten calves. The best dairies let at £6 per cow; the usual ones at £5. Vealing, or feeding calves for veal, is practised by many farmers; their system is much the same as that pursued in England for the London market. The calves are usually suckled on the cows until 12 or 14 weeks old, having as much milk as they will take for the last six or seven weeks, and nothing else. They usually cost 12s. or 15s., and sell when fat for about £4. The rotation of crops is exceedingly good in this barony with all but the holders of a few acres of land, who require it all for potatoes and corn. This rotation resembles the Scotch system, except that here the land is left longer under grass. The first year they grow oats after breaking up the grass lay; second year, potatoes; third a corn crop, in which they sow clover and grass seeds, leaving the land under grass during from 4 to 20 years, according to their convenience, the size of the farm, and the state of the grass. They thus go all through the farm, except the low and boggy lands which are too wet for tillage. Contrary to the effect generally experienced in England, it is commonly found here that both the quantity and quality of the grass deteriorate by the land remaining under it for many years, although the rapidity and kindliness with which the land takes to grass (that is, forms a thick natural sward) is truly wonderful. Turnips, however, are scarcely grown at all in this barony, though the soil, being generally light and dry, is extremely well-adapted for them. The farmers all plough with two horses, and use Scotch ploughs, or light ones of a similar construction. No other modern implements are at all generally used. The mountain 'sack,' which is a very strong spade, of a long, narrow, and almost pointed shape, like an English draining spade, is, besides the plough, almost the only other implement used for cultivating the ground, and on mountain land the only one. It is well calculated for strong and rocky ground. But the long handles of that and of all other Irish tools, though they may relieve the back, certainly impede the progress, and diminish the power and celerity of the workmen. The only manures used besides animal manure, are lime and 'bog stuff' (peat). The use of lime is increasing, although no limestone is found in the barony. There is much room for its profitable application here, in reclaiming bog and mountain land. Limestone gravel, an excellent material for improving bog soils, is easily obtained. The use of 'bog stuff' for mixing with dung, ashes, and other refuse of the house or yard, is rapidly increasing as a manure for potatoes, and it enables the poor who are near enough to bogs to double the extent of their potato crop. This barony presents an immense field for increased cultivation upon its extensive range of mountains. Here are thousands of acres capable of profitable cultivation, either by the capitalists, or by labourers' families for their own support. Hundreds of those families would be found in the barony itself, ready to undertake such cultivation for their maintenance even without any assistance whatever, and only upon the condition of having it for a certain number of years rent free, or at a small annual payment; and many more would only require a very small aid in the commencement of their labours. Another remarkable feature of this barony is the great improvement which has taken place of late years in the cattle stock, by the general introduction of the Durham or short-horn breed. In most districts, good cattle are to be found on the farms of gentlemen and resident proprietors; but here excellent half-bred stock is seen on the smallest farms, and beautiful thorough bred animals upon the land of several farmers. The sheep kept on the mountains are of a peculiar breed, and either originally natives, or long since become indigenous to these mountain ranges. They have of late years been improved in shape and wool, by crossing them with English breeds. A cross with South Downs was tried, which turned out well for meat and shape, but the weight of wool being now the chief consideration, the Leicester breed is preferred. They weigh about 15 lbs. per quarter, and the fleece from 3 to 4 lbs. The pigs generally seen in this barony are of a bad breed—long-legged, large-boned, and coarse—but this is accounted for by the circumstance that very few are bred here, almost all being purchased out of the Connaught droves.—The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one townland of the parish of Balinglass from the barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, to that of Rathvilly, co. Carlow,—pop., in 1841, 88; and 10 townlands of the parish of Dunlavin, two townlands of the parish of Tobber, and two townlands of the parish of Rathtoole, from the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, to that of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow,—pop., in 1841, 978. The barony of Upper Talbotstown, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Balinglass, Dunlavin, Kilteggan, and Tobber, and the whole of the parishes of Balinure, Donaghmore, Freynestown, Kilranelagh, Rathbran, Rathsellagh, and Rathtoole. The only towns or even considerable villages are Balinglass and Stratford-on-Slaney. Pop., in 1831, 18,512; in 1841, 18,631. Houses 2,854. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,278; in manufactures and trade, 603; in other pursuits, 301. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 92; on the directing of labour, 1,119; on their own manual labour, 1,846; on means not specified, 125. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,539; who could read but not write, 1,620; who could neither read nor write, 2,973. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,245; who could read but not write, 2,345; who could neither read nor write, 3,578.—Upper Talbotstown lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Balinglass. The total number of tenements valued is 2,761; and of these, 1,306 were valued under £5,—369, under £10,—275, under £15,—190, under £20,—152, under £25,—106, under £30,—114, under £40,—90, under £50,—and 159, at and above £50.

TALL, or TALL-WATER (THE), a rivulet of the northern division of co. Armagh, Ulster. It rises between Hamilton's-Bawn and Rich-Hill, and flows past the latter town, and through the parishes of Kilmore and Loughgall, northward and westward, to the river Callan, a short distance above its confluence with the Blackwater. Its length of course, exclusive of numerous secondary sinuosities, is about 9 miles.

TALLAGHOBIGLY, a chapelry and a Roman Catholic parish in the civil parish of Clondehorky, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. The pop.—town is Duffnaghy. The church was recently built, by means of a contribution of £619 11s. 4d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and contains 160 sittings. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Gortyhurk.

TALLAGHT, a parish in the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the villages of GREENHILLS and TALLAGHT. See these articles. Length, southward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 21,868 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,646; in 1841, 4,921. Houses 742. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,450. Houses 668. The northern district is part of the higher border or hill-screened region of the great rich plain which spreads away from the metropolis; it comprises about one-fifth of the whole parochial area; it is comparatively rich in soil, and poor in cultivation; it exhibits, like the rest of the environs of Dublin, a profusion of villas, but possesses fewer of a mansional or sumptuous character; and it is watered along the east side by the rivulet Dodder, and in other parts by small affluents of that stream. The other districts, comprising about four-fifths of the whole parochial area, are mountainous, pastoral, and grandly picturesque; they consist chiefly of a portion of the Kippure nodule of alpine mountains, the whole of Glenismole or the upper and mountain valley of the Dodder, the whole of the lofty dingle or defile called Ballinascorney Gap, the small glens of the head-streams of the rivulet Slade, and a considerable portion of the east side of Glen-Saggart. See SAGGART and KIPPURE. The principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, on the southern boundary, Kippure, 2,475 feet, and Slieve-Bane, 2,128 feet; on the western boundary, Mount-Seskin, 1,049 feet; on the eastern boundary, Killakee Hill, 1,271 feet; and in the interior, the magnificent panorama-viewing hill of Tallaght, 1,263 feet. The rivulet Dodder rises in two head-streams, on the north-east side of Kippure, at elevations above sea-level of respectively 1,424 and 1,441 feet; it and its two earliest affluents, Slade Brook and Cot Brook, have elevations immediately below Heathfield-house of respectively 688, 785, and 670 feet; and the united and accumulated volume, after rolling on to near the point at which it leaves the parish, has an elevation of 238 feet. The Slade or Saggart rivulet rises on the south-west side of Tallaght Hill, at an elevation of 900 feet or upwards; and it runs nearly 3 miles within the parish to near the point of departing into Saggart, and has there an elevation of 802 feet. The road from Dublin to Blessington enters the parish of Tallaght at the hamlet of Templeogue, and proceeds west-south-westward to the village of Tallaght, and thence south-south-westward up the east side of Glen-Saggart, so as to run 5½ miles within the parish of Tallaght, and 1½ mile on the boundary between it and the parish of Saggart; and the route along it, within these limits, is noticed in the following effective manner by Mr. Fraser:—"On clearing the plantations connected with Terenure and Bushy-Park, a magnificent view of the Dublin mountains, and of the rich intervening country, is obtained on the left, while on the right the view is limited by the plantations connected with the numerous villas which stretch from Terenure* to Templeogue; among which we may notice the handsome residences of Fortfield and Cypress-grove. Passing the plantations and church ruins of Templeogue, the country assumes a different aspect; the villas are of a more humble character, and thinly scattered; the soil, however, is rich, and although in the immediate vicinity of the city, we regret to say, but poorly cultivated. Templeogue is an old residence of the Downville family, but now occupied by Charles Lever, Esq. On the south, in addition to the general range of the Dublin mountains, we have a view of Glenismole, in the upper end of which the Dodder has its source, as also of Mount-Pellier, the Tallaght hills, and the more lofty mountain of Seehen, all of which respectively limit this fine glen, as also of the hamlet of Fir-House, several paper mills and villas in the foreground, the romantic little hills around the gap of Ballinascorney, which embosom the sequestered hamlet of that name, as well as the commencement of the road which at a very high elevation is carried across the base of Seefinigan mountain to the valley of Kippure, can also be traced. On the north we have the beautifully undulating tract known as the Green-Hills, in which the old castle of Tymon, originally granted by King John to Henry de Loundres, archbishop of Dublin, is a striking feature. We now remark that Castle-Kelly, the romantic seat of G. Grierson, Esq., is at the head of Glenismole, and Friarstown, P. Shaw, Esq., at the foot of it.

* * * About 2 miles from Tallaght we commence the ascent to the high valley reaching from the head of the Glen of Saggard to Balinglass, a stretch of 26 miles, and through which our road lies; and as we ascend we gradually obtain a view of that vast champaign tract lying around Dublin,—the largest, the richest, and the most important plain in the kingdom. For many miles from the base of the hills, the more prominent features in the flat can be traced. To the east, overlooking the city and the bay, the view is limited by the point where the sea and sky seem to meet; westward, the eye ranges over illimitable space; and on the north, the distant mountains of Louth, Armagh, and Down, can be distinctly traced. From the heights adjacent to the road, of course more extensive prospects of this apparently boundless plain are obtained; but from these higher elevations, this fine tract of country is not presented in so favourable a point of view.

We may observe that this magnificent scene is more strikingly displayed in approaching than in leaving the city. In the latter case, it is gradually disclosed; in the former, the eye having been long confined to the mountain valley, the whole scene at once bursts on the astonished sight." The quondam palace of the archbishop of Dublin will be noticed, in next article, in connection with the village. The other principal residences, additional to those noticed in the extract from Mr. Fraser, are Mount-Seskin-house, Ballinascurry-house, Heathfield-lodge, Annmount, Foxhall, Ballymaior-house, Marfield, Johnville, Kiltallan-house, Jobstown-house, Killinardan-house, Glenville, Bohernabreena-house, Montpelier-house, Orlagh-house, Old-Court-house, Ballycullen-house, Allenton-house, Ellenborough, Fettercairn-house, Newhall-cottage, Bellguard-castle, Newland-house, Whitehall, Kilnamanagh-house, Airmount, Tymon-castle, Willington-house, Balrothery, Spawell-house, Cherryfield, Charleville, Ballyroan-house, Delaford, Sallypark, Haerlem, Knocklyon-house, Sabine-cottage, Tymon-lodge, and Killiminy-house. The other most noticeable objects are Firhouse Convent, St. Anne's monastery, two police stations, various paper and corn mills, the ruins of a sporting lodge, the site of St. Anne's chapel, Cromwell's fort, Oliver's Corner, a cromlech, the ruins of a castle, the rath and old guard-house of Greenhills, and the conspicuous and interesting castle of TYMON: see that article.—This parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £88 3s. 1d.; glebe, £42 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £300 15s. 5d.; and are inappropriate, in the proportion of £369 4s. 7d. to the dean of St. Patrick's, and in the proportion of £221 10s. 9d. to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's. The vicarages of TALLAGHT and WHITECHURCH, and the rectory of CAVAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tallaght. Pop., in 1831, 5,862. Gross income, £381 17s. 9d.; nett, £237 11s. 10½d. Patron, alternately the diocesan and the Bryan family. Within the union is the perpetual curacy of WHITECHURCH; and the following statistics are all exclusive of that district. The church of Tallaght was built in 1829, by means of a loan of £2,770 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450; attendance, from 100 to 200. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rathfarnham and Crumlin. The nunnery chapel has an attendance of about 150; and is under the care of a special chaplain. In 1834, the Protestants of Tallaght amounted to 326, and the Roman Catholics to 4,214; the Protestants of Tallaght and Crugh to 461, and the Roman Catholics to 5,240; 4 daily schools in Tallaght—one of which was partly conducted and wholly supported by the community of St. Anne's monastery—made no proper returns of their attendance; and 3 other daily schools in Tallaght—one of which was supported by £8 a-year from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and a sum not reported from public collections, one salaried with £18 a-year from the National Board, and one chiefly supported by the nuns of Firhouse Convent—had on their books 83 boys and 200 girls.

TALLAGHT, a post village in the parish of Tallaght, barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on a small affluent of the Dodder, and on the road from Dublin to Blessington, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile west of the Dodder, $\frac{1}{4}$ south-south-east of Clondalkin, $\frac{1}{4}$ west-south-west of Rathfarnham, 5 east by north of Rathcoole, and 5 south-west of Dublin. It is also sometimes called Tallagh; and it was anciently called Tamlact or Taimlact; and "according to fabulous historians," says Brewer, "it is the Taimlact-inuinter-Pharholan, mentioned in Irish annals; so called from 'the Phœnician or Grecian colony which Partholanus led into Ireland in the year of the world 1956, where this colony subsisted 300 years.' It was then swept away by the plague, and the bodies were buried altogether in one grave or tomb, in this neighbourhood; 'whence,' add these fanciful writers, 'the village obtains the appellation of the Taimlact, or tomb of the race of Partholanus!'" Some sort of ecclesiastical institution, usually alleged to have been an abbey, was founded at Tallaght in the early ages of Christianity in Ireland, by a St. Moeluan, and was presided over in the year 824, by a St. Ængus. The last person connected with this institution who figures in record is the Professor Moelsuthunius, who died in 1125. The parish-church is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient abbey; and is a neat building, in the modern pointed style of architecture, with an ancient tower or belfry. This tower is square, of greater height than most country church-towers in Ireland, and having a curious embattlement, and niches for three bells. Mr. Brewer, speaking of the church to which the tower properly belonged, and which stood till about 15 years ago, says, "The interior facing of the walls was formerly ornamented with armorial bearings, belonging to the archbishops and to the families of respected parishioners and benefactors. But, with equal want of reverence and taste, a coat of white-wash has been suffered to obliterate, or much injured, these memorials of departed greatness and worth. As an occurrence of some antiquarian interest connected with this church, it must be recorded that, on removing the wainscot of a pew, a few years since, there was discovered a cavity in the wall, containing a chalice of glass and human skulls." The principal feature of Tallaght, during many ages, and down to quite a recent period, was the palace of the archbishops of Dublin, originally a castellated edifice of considerable strength, and eventually a modernized and plain mansion. "We are told by Warc," says the writer already quoted, "that Archbishop Alexander de Bicknor, who died in 1349, 'built the episcopal palace at Taulaght'; but it is not made evident by any authority, that a palatial residence was then first erected on this spot. The present structure is a spacious but long and narrow building, composed of the grey stone of the country, and is destitute of pretensions to architectural beauty. The interior contains many apartments of ample proportions, but none that are highly embellished. The hall into which the visitor is conducted by a flight of stone steps, measures 21 feet square, and is lighted by two tiers of windows. The dining-room is 25 feet in length by 21 in width, and is ornamented with the archiepiscopal arms, impaled with a shield quarterly, charged in the first quarter with a pigeon. The date is 1729, and above is the crest, a hawk perched on a round ball. Underneath the coat of arms is the following inscription: 'Johannes Hoadly, hanc Domum refecit.' The great drawing-room or saloon, measures 33 feet by 21, and contains the only portrait in the palace, —a full length of Archbishop Hoadly, who was translated to the see of Dublin in January 1729. The library is a small apartment, having a window of large dimensions, from which, as from all the windows of the reception-rooms, very fine views are obtained of Montpellier hill, and the adjacent tract of captivating scenery. The gardens are disposed with unpleasant formality; but the antiquary will derive some gratification from finding here the remains of a tower, which constituted an integral part of the former palace. Archbishop Fowler, translated to Dublin in 1778, surrounded the demesne with a wall, and bestowed other improvements; but the situation of Tallaght is unfavourable to the residence of the prelates, and the palace has, in late years, been forsaken by its dignified owners. In early periods this place was continually exposed to the hostile visits of the native clans,* and the strongbonian feudal chiefs. In recent times it has been rendered almost equally undesirable by the depredations of outlaws and robbers, who have peculiarly infested this neighbourhood. In 1803, the archbishops of Dublin ceased to reside at Tallaght; and, in 1822, their quondam demesne was let to Mr. Lenteigne, who has erected a neat dwelling-house near the site of the former mansion. The village is a constabulary station, and the seat of a monthly court of petty-sessions. A dispensary here is within the South Dublin Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 21,799 acres, with a pop. of 7,940; and, in 1839, it expended £120 11s. 6d., and administered to 1,000 patients. Area of the village, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 359; in 1841, 348. Houses 57.

TALLANSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Ardee, 2 miles south of Louth, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2; area, 3,210 acres, 25 perches,—of which 15 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,074; in 1841, 933. Houses 155. The surface consists, for the most part, of excellent land, and possesses a large amount of artificial embellishment. The river Glyde traces the whole of the northern boundary; and the road from Louth to Ardee passes across the interior. The hamlet of Tallanstown stands on the Glyde, and on the road at the northern verge of the parish; and, in 1831, it had 8 houses, and 60 inhabitants. The principal country residences are Arthurs-town, the seat of T. W. Filgate, Esq.; Lisrenny, the beautiful seat of W. Filgate, Esq.; and Louth Hall, the baronial mansion, and well-wooded demesne of Lord Louth.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CHARLESTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £44 10s., and the rectorial for £215 13s. 8d.;

* As an instance of the fidelity of this remark, it may be noticed that, in the year 1331, O'Toole, dynast of Inislayle, at the head of a numerous train of armed followers, plundered the palace, carried away a prey of 300 sheep, slew many of the bishop's servants, and defeated, in a pitched battle, Sir Philip Brit, and a body of Dublinians who were sent against him.

and the latter are inappropriate in Baron Foster. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 930; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Reastown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 195, and the Roman Catholics to 970; and two daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and the other supported by Mrs. Filgate and the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 18 boys and 68 girls.

TALLERATH, TELLERUGHT, or TULLY-RATH, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Shelburne, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 24 miles; extreme breadth, 14; area, 1,653 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 468; in 1841, 381. Houses 52. The surface is traversed by the road from New Ross to Fethard; and consists variously of arable, pasture, and meadow land. The only noticeable objects are a Roman Catholic chapel, the site of a church, the hamlet of Lookon, and a constabulary station.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Mary's of New Ross, in the dio. of Ferns. See ROSS (New). Tithe composition, £80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cushinstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 478; and a pay daily school was usually attended by from 70 to 80 scholars.

TALLOW, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, southward, 32 miles; extreme breadth, 24; area, 5,026 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches,—of which 12 acres are tideway of the river Bride. Pop., in 1831, 4,716; in 1841, 4,867. Houses 725. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,718; in 1841, 1,868. Houses 309. The river Bride traces the whole of the northern boundary; and is navigable for barges of 40 tons, to the vicinity of the town. The northern district is the broadest, and consists of a beautiful and comparatively rich portion of the valley of the Bride; and the southern district, to the extent of 13 mile inward from the apex or point in which the parish terminates, is upland, or poor billy ground, and lifts a summit to the altitude of 673 feet above the level of the sea. The mail-road from Cork to Waterford traverses the interior. The principal rural residences are Kilbeg-cottage, Kilmore-house, Kilmore-cottage, Roseville, and Kilmore-hill,—the last the seat of the Rev. M. Percival.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7d.; glebe, £10. The rectory of Tallow, and the vicarage of KILWATERNMOY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Tallow. Length, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 31. Pop., in 1831, 7,244. Gross income, £404 0s. 8d.; nett, £402 13s. 8d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. A curate is employed upon a salary of £80. The church is situated at the town of Tallow, and was built in 1800, by means of private subscription. Sittings 300; attendance, about 150. There is a church also in Kilwatermoy. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house is attended by 24; the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by 40; and the Roman Catholic chapel of Tallow, by 4,000; and the last has two officiates, and is the only chapel of its parish. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilwatermoy. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 352 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 4,504 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 448 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 7,124 Roman Catholics; and 13 daily schools in the union—11 of which were in the parish—had on their books 442 boys and 293 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board; one, with £12 from the National Board, and £7 10s. from Col. Curry; one, with £32 from the Fund of Erasmus Smith, and from the rector; and one, with £18 from subscription, and a sum not reported from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society. In 1843, the National Board had a school at Castle-Richard, and a boys' school and a girls' school at Tallow.

TALLOW, a post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Tallow, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the right bank of the river Bride, and on the mail-road from Cork to Waterford, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Lismore, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Cappoquin, 8 north-north-west of Youghal, 10 east by north of Ratlicormack, $10\frac{1}{2}$ east by south of Fermoy, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by south of Dublin. Though usually stated to lie on the Bride, it is really half-a-mile distant. The environs are pleasant; and many vantage-grounds command views of a long stretch of the spreading valley and slowly ascending hill-screens of the Bride, down to the superb valley of the Blackwater. The town itself has a common-place and decayed appearance. The church is a handsome modern edifice. The Roman Catholic chapel is a large but plain building. The market-house, the sessions-house, and the other public structures, are senseless of any pleasing or remarkable architectural feature. Here are a small convent, several schools, two small almshouses, a fever hospital, and a dispensary. A manor gaol, which disgraced the town, was noticed as follows in 1824: "The gaol consists of two apartments, each 20 feet by 18; it is a manor gaol, though frequently used as a place of confinement for persons committed by the magistrates of the county. There is no day-room, no classification, employment, or instruction. On some occasions, prisoners committed by the county magistrates are confined here for many weeks." The fever hospital is within the Lismore Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,243; it possesses a very indifferent character as to at once arrangements, discipline, and efficiency; it is not made available to near the extent of its capacity; and, in 1839, it expended £142 15s., and admitted 230 patients. The dispensary serves for the same district as the fever hospital; and, in 1839, it expended £85 10s., and administered to 1,031 patients. Many old castles and fortified mansions, chiefly belonging to the Earls of Desmond, formerly stood in the vicinity of Tallow; and some vestiges of one may still be seen at the town. In 1641, intrenchments were thrown up, and regular gates erected, by the great Earl of Cork, to protect the town from the rebels.—Previous to the Legislative Union, when it ceased to send members to parliament, Tallow was a place of considerable importance and business, and was for many years the scene of singular electioneering contests; but ever since that period, it has suffered a steady decline in industry and trade. Though the Bride is navigable to the vicinity for barges of 40 tons, and though the surrounding country is rich, productive, and populous, yet almost the only trade is some small retail business, and some unimportant traffic in flour and corn. The greater part of the agricultural produce of the valley of the Bride is sent by water to the markets of Youghal. Tallow has a flour mill, and a small inn and posting establishment. Fairs are held on March 1, Oct. 10, Dec. 8, and Trinity Monday. The only public conveyance is the mail-coach in transit between Cork and Waterford.—Tallow was incorporated by charter of 11 James I. The borough limits were a circle described upon a radius of $1\frac{1}{2}$ statute mile from the parish-church. The corporation consisted of a suffraigne, from 13 to 24 free burgesses, and a commonalty; and were styled, "The Suffraigne, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Tallagh." This corporation, however, either never existed or became very early extinct; and the right of sending members to parliament, which was vested in it by the charter, was for very many years previous to the Legislative Union, enjoyed by the resident householders. At the Union, when the franchise was destroyed, a claim of compensation for it was made by the Duke of Devonshire, and allowed; and the sum of £15,000 was awarded to a trustee, to the use of the Duke and others, entitled under the will of the last Earl of Cork and Burlington. The Duke of Devonshire is lord of the manor of Tallow; and, till 12 or 14 years ago, appointed a seneschal, who at one time held a court of record, with jurisdiction to the amount of £15 Irish. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. Area of the town, 78 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,998; in 1841, 2,960. Houses 416. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 147; in manufactures and trade, 299; in other pursuits, 122. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 26; on the directing of labour, 354; on their own manual labour, 175; on means not specified, 13. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 635; who could read but not write, 178; who could neither read nor write, 431. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 341; who could read but not write, 283; who could neither read nor write, 790.

TALLOW-BRIDGE, a village in the parish of Lismore and Mocollop, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the left bank of the river Bride, and on the mail-road from Cork to Waterford, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile north-north-east of Tallow, and 4 miles south-west by south of Lismore. About $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile above it, and on the margin of the Bride, is Lisfinny-castle, formerly one of the numerous strongholds of the Earls of Desmond, and now the residence of Capt. Croker. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 258. Houses 45.

TALT (LORON), a lake in the parish of Killnachteigue, barony of Leney, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies among the Ox mountains, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Tobbercurry; and it extends a little upwards of one mile south-eastward, and has a mean breadth of about 3 furlongs. Its surface elevation above sea-level is 455 feet. "It is situated," says the Rev. James Neligan, "in the midst of high mountains, that seem to have been thrown up from the valley where the lake lies by some extraordinary convulsion of nature. These mountains are very rugged, and nearly perpendicular, presenting, in the summer season, a most romantic and picturesque appearance. There may be seen large herds of goats, some sheep, and a few young cattle, browsing on the sides of the rocky precipices, and in continual danger (as it would seem to the anxious spectator) of being hurled headlong into the lake which washes their base: accidents of this kind sometimes happen. The inaccessible cliffs near the summit afford a safe retreat to the eagle, who nestles there every year, yet without increasing his species, as there is never more than one pair known to breed there at the same time. A city alderman might envy this monarch of Crummu his daily fare; his kitchen being well-supplied not only with kid, lamb, hares, rabbits, but with every species of game, which is to be found in great abundance on his ample demesne, and within his immediate grasp. The lake is well-stocked with trout of a small size, where a tolerably good angler, with the assistance of a boat, may take five or six dozen in a part of a day. There are two small rocky islands in this lake, which in summer are thickly covered with gulls of different kinds, that breed there in great numbers; and, from their continual noise and incessant flying to and fro, afford some variety and entertainment to the passenger, as the road from Ballina to Tobbercurry and Boyle passes close to its verge."

TAMLAGHT, a parish 3½ miles south-south-east of Moneymore, and partly in the barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, partly in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. The Tyrone section contains the village of COUGH: which see. Length of the Londonderry section, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2; area, 2,506 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches. Length of the Tyrone section, southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,447 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,854; in 1841, 3,006. Houses 523. Pop. of the Londonderry section, in 1831, 1,334; in 1841, 1,433. Houses 245. Pop. of the rural districts of the Tyrone section, in 1831, 1,127; in 1841, 1,185. Houses 203. The river Ballinderry traces the boundary between the two sections; possesses some celebrity for its trout; and is spanned at Cough by a good stone bridge. The number of townlands is twelve. About two-thirds of the surface are arable land; and the other third is variously bog, meadow, and pasture-ground. There are no mountains; and the bogs are of small extent. The ash and various kinds of fir trees flourish on the soil. Lime is the principal manure; and is manufactured from a yellowish white limestone, raised from several good quarries within the parish. Numbers of neat houses, in the cottage style, occur in all the districts. The residences of Tamlaght, Ruskey, and Silver-Hill, are slated two-story houses, very neat and ornamental. Six high roads radiate from Cough. A Druidical altar, commonly called Cloghtoght, stands on the glebe near the public road; and consists of a stupendous, high stone, superincumbent on six other stones. The linen-manufacture is carried on in every townland.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £73 16s. 11d. Gross income, £273 16s. 11d.; nett, £227 2s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is employed upon a salary of £50. The church was built in 1781. Sitings 170; attendance 250. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 200 to 400; the Baptist meeting-house, by 40; and the Wesleyan Methodist place of meeting, by from 30 to 40. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 615 Churchmen, 1,690 Presbyterians, 9 other Protestant dissenters, and 845 Roman Catholics; one Sunday school made no return of its attendance; 3 other Sunday schools were usually attended by about 350 scholars; 5 daily schools had on their books 218 boys and 86 girls; and one other daily school was usually attended by 15 or 16 scholars. The parochial daily school was salaried with £10 10s. a-year from the rector; the daily school at Cough was wholly supported by Mr. Cunningham, and restricted to the children of his tenants; and the daily school at Agharey was salaried with £4 a-year from the rector, and £6 6s. from the London Hibernian Society. In 1843, the National Board had a school at Agharey.

TAMLAGHT, a quoad sacra parish in the barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. It consists merely of a small townland in the quoad civilia parish of Kiltel; and is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of KILKEEL [which see], in the dio. of Down. The remains of the old chapel can still be traced.

TAMLAGHT, a village in the parish of Tam-laght O'Crilly, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the road from Bellaghy to Coleraine, 3½ miles south-south-west of Kilrea, 4½ north-east of Maghera, and 5½ north-north-west of Bellaghy. It has a dispensary and is the site of the parish-church. The dispensary is within the Ballymoney Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 14,720 acres, with a pop. of 8,390; and, in 1839-40, it expended £62 18s., and made 11,140 dispensations of medicine to 1,690 patients. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 188; in 1841, 211. Houses 40.

TAMLAGHTARD. See MAGILLIGAN.

TAMLAGHTFINLAGAN, a parish in the barony of Keenaught, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the villages of BALLYKELLY, CRINDLE, and MOYS: see these articles. Length, north-north-eastward, 8½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 4½; area, 17,402 acres, 1 perch,—of which 81 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,356; in 1841, 7,252. Houses 1,295. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,616. Houses 1,173. The parish extends from near the summit of Legavannon in the south-south-west to the bend of the Roe at the base of Benyevenagh on the north-north-east; it lies all under the eye of a spectator on either of these lofty and panoramic-viewing summits, or on several of the frontier declivities of the highland district of the county; it possesses 4½ miles of coast-line upon Lough Foyle, from near the middle of Walworth Wood to the mouth of the river Roe; it is bounded over nearly all the long east, and over the whole of the short north, by that beautiful river; it comprises the western environs of Newtown-Linavaddy, an exquisite portion of the vale of the Roe, a large portion of the rich low tract called the Myroe, and a portion, amounting to about one-sixth of its own area, of the mountain region of the county; it boasts a comparatively large aggregate of demesne ground and woodland; and, in a general view, it is one of the most diversified, beautiful, and fertile parishes, of Londonderry. See ROE, MYROE, BENYEVENAGH, NEWTOWN-LINAVADDY, and FOYLE (LOUGH). The road from Coleraine to Londonderry passes westward through the interior. The seats north of that road are Finlagan, Rush-Hall, Ardmoyle, Outlands, Wheatfield, Culmore, and Walworth,—the last, part of the estate of the Fishmongers' Company, and now the residence of the Rev. G. V. Sampson. The seats south of the road are Sheephill, Bessbrook, and Roe-Park,—the last the beautiful and well-wooded demesne of E. C. MacNaghton, Esq., in the vicinity of Newtown-Linavaddy, and having in the neighbourhood of its mansion an ancient round tower. A Culdean establishment is said to have been founded at Tamlaghtfinlagan, by St. Columb, and placed under the superintendence of his disciple, St. Finlagan or Fionlugin, from whom the place has its name.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £1,000; glebe, £235. Gross income, £1,235; nett, £1,104 14s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is employed upon a salary of £75. The church was built in 1795, by private subscription, principally of the late John Beresford, Esq., and Lord Bristol, late bishop of Derry. Sitings 100; attendance 100. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance, the one of 150, and the other of from 800 to 1,000. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Balteagh and Drumachose. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 877 Churchmen, 4,627 Presbyterians, and 1,858 Roman Catholics; a daily school at Listrohl was usually attended by about 155 scholars; and 2 daily schools at Ballykelly, and 12 at respectively Burnally, Dromore, Tamlaght, Tartmahilly, Ballinarragh, Drumruglin, Moys, Largy, Shanreagh, Crindie, Carrymenagh, and Carryreagh, had on their books 272 boys and 203 girls. The two schools at Ballykelly and that at Listrohill were provided with houses by the Fishmongers' Company, and supported by school-rates of 3s. per quarter for each scholar, one-half paid by the Fishmongers' Company and one-half by the parents if able, and the whole by the Company if the parents are not able to pay part; the school at Tamlaght was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, £4 from the rector, and £1 from the landlord; and the school at Largy was salaried with £3 3s. a-year from the landlord. In 1843, one National school at Carrymenagh was salaried with £7 6s. 8d., and had on its books 50 boys and 39 girls; one at Ballinarragh, with £15, and had 64 boys and 50 girls; one at Largy, with £8, and had 33 boys and 17 girls; one at Crindie, with £8, and had 25 boys and 16 girls; and one at Dromore, with £8, and had 43 boys and 27 girls.

TAMLAGHT-O'CRILLY, a parish, partly in the barony of Coleraine, but chiefly in that of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. The Loughinsholin section contains the villages of TAMLAGHT and INNISRUSH, and part of the town of PORTGLENONE: see these articles. Length, north-north-westward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the Coleraine section, 1,334 acres, 2 roads, 14 perches; of the Loughinsholin section, 15,504 acres, 2 roads, 32 perches,—of which 46 acres, 3 roads, 23 perches are in the river Bann. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,070; in 1841, 10,400. Houses 1,888. Pop. of the Coleraine section, in 1831, 759; in 1841, 845. Houses 153. Pop. of the rural districts of the Loughinsholin section, in 1831, 8,684; in 1841, 8,975. Houses 1,615. The upper or south end of the parish is bounded, over 2 miles of the east, by the river Bann; and the whole parish, in a general view, consists of part of the west side of the spreading valley of that river, and is an expanse of low, light, arable land, with a large aggregate of bog and morass. The road from Maghera to Kilrea, that from Armagh to Coleraine, and that from Antrim to Londonderry, traverse the interior. The principal hamlets are Clady and Glenburn; and the chief country residences are Glenburn, Innisrush, and Harvey-Hill.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £435 10s.; glebe, £522 2s. Gross income, £938 1s.; nett, £786 14s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is employed upon a salary of £92 6s. 1½d. The parochial church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 170; attendance 50. A perpetual curacy has been erected within the parish, but is often regarded as a mere chapelry. The church or chapel of this curacy was built about 67 years ago, at the private expense of Lord Bristol, late bishop of Derry. Sittings 160; attendance 70. Stipend payable to the perpetual curate by the rector, £92 6s. 4d.; glebe, £18 15s. Gross income, £115 8s. 10d.; nett, £113 6s. 10d. Patron, the incumbent of Tamlaght-O'Crilly. The Covenanters' meeting-house has an attendance of 360. The Presbyterian meeting-house belonging to the General Assembly, and formerly Secessional, has an attendance of 150. The Roman Catholic chapels at Drumgardner and Greenlough have an attendance of respectively 1,650 and 1,130; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Desertoghill. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 877 Churchmen, 4,627 Presbyterians, and 1,858 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools in respectively Harvey-Hill, the parochial schoolhouse, Tamlaght schoolhouse, the church, Glenone, and Tyance schoolhouse, were usually attended by about 207 scholars; a Roman Catholic Sunday school in Drumgardner chapel, was usually attended by about 300 scholars; and a parochial school, and 18 daily schools at respectively Killymack, Tamlaght, Killygullib, Boveedy, Lisnoyle, Drumgardner, Lisnagrot, Drumgardner, Eden, Innisrush, Drumnicaunon, Tivaconavy, Tyance, Glenone, Greenlough, Glenone, Monysally, and Gortnacran, had on their books 705 boys and 474 girls. The parochial school was salaried with £10 a-year from the rector; the daily schools at Tamlaght, Killygullib, Eden, Innisrush, Drumnicaunon, Tivaconavy, Monysally, and Killymack, and one of those at Drumgardner, with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society; that at Boveedy, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and £1 from the rector; that at Lisnoyle, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and £2 from the Mercers' Company; that at Lisnagrot, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and £3 from the Mercers' Company; that at Tyance, with £8 from the National Board; one of those at Glenone, with £5 from subscription; that at Greenlough, with £8 from the National Board; and that at Gortnacran, with £3 from Mr. Hyland. In 1843, one National school at Glenone was salaried with £17 10s. a-year from the Board, and had on its books 44 boys; another at Glenone, with £8, and had 75 girls; one at Tyance, with £12, and had 60 boys and 26 girls; one at West Tyance, with £12, and had 45 boys and 42 girls; one at Reastown, with £12, and had 60 boys and 36 girls; one at Greenlough, with £24 6s. 8d., and had 80 boys and 66 girls; one at Drumgardner, with £13 10s., and had 58 boys; and another at Drumgardner, with £10 10s. 8d., and had 62 girls.

TANDERAGEE—anciently TAWNATCLEE—a market and post town in the parish of Ballymore, barony of Lower Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on the river Cushier, and at the intersection of the road from Portadown to Newry, with that from Rich-hill to Banbridge, 14 mile west of the Newry Canal, 2 miles south-west of Guilford, 4½ south-south-east of Portadown, 4½ north-west by west of Loughbrickland, 4½ east-south-east of Rich-hill, 4½ north-east of Market-hill, 5½ west by north of Banbridge, 26 south-west of Belfast, and 63 north of Dublin. The immediately circumjacent country is rich, fertile, luxuriously featured, and beautifully improved; and lies in close juxtaposition to some of the most charming portions of the county of Down. The Newry Canal, not alone offers all its important facilities of communication for trading with the great emporiums of Newry and Belfast; but brings up a profusion of lime, on cheap and easy terms, for the powerful fertilizing of all the soil of the environs. The town stands on the estate of the Duke of Manchester, and borrows great embellishment, not alone from the georgical improvements athwart that estate, but especially from the woods and lawns of its immediately adjoining demesne. "The approach to Tanderagee from the county of Down," said Sir Charles Coote in 1804, "is really charming. The neat appearance of the town, its gradual elevation from a valley through which a beautiful stream winds between lofty and undulating banks, which are thickly wooded on the one extremity, and the demesne which, on the other, crowns the summit of the hill, afford a pleasing prepossession to the traveller; nor are his expectations balked in viewing the town and its vicinity; every place corresponds with this engaging picture. The demesne of Tanderagee had an immense quantity of full-grown timber, which has lately been greatly diminished; but a sufficiency remains to decorate the bold and abrupt eminences, which it has been justly celebrated for. Nature still triumphs in her display of wild and irregular charms, which are of that description that, we should suppose, would rather be injured than improved by modern innovations. The present proprietor has added some plantations, to supply the timber he has felled, with an infant nursery in good management, and he has already nearly completed a very capital and extensive garden." The present mansion or castle of Tanderagee is a large, modern, baronial pile, erected by the Duke of Manchester, when Viscount Mandeville, and occupying the site of an ancient castellated and fortified residence which, in the reign of James I., was forfeited by the O'Hanlons, and granted to Sir Oliver St. John. Other country residences than the Duke's within $\frac{1}{4}$ mile of the town are Orange-hill, Springfield, Violet-hill, Bunker's-hill, and Athole-cottage; and the environs, in a general view, are respectively inhabited, and afford marked indications of comparative comfort and prosperity in the social condition of their people. The town itself has a neat and creditable appearance; and possesses a handsome church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, two small Methodist meeting-houses, some well-built private houses, a female orphan asylum, a Mont de Piete, a loan fund, a fever hospital, a dispensary, a clothing fund, and several schools. The Duke of Manchester was the founder, and is the main supporter of several of the charitable institutions; he has various schools and other appliances of popular well-being in different other parts of his estate; and he gives annually at his castle a festival to all the children in attendance on his schools. In 1843, the loan fund of the town—whose accounts, however, were completely mixed up with those of the Mont de Piete—had a capital of £4,731, circulated £17,075 in 4,521 loans, and realized a nett profit of £101 8s. 8d. The fever hospital and the dispensary are within the Banbridge Poor-law union, and serve for a district of 12,000 acres, with a pop. of 10,000; and, in 1830, they expended £85 13s., admitted 42 intern patients, and administered to 683 extern patients. In the vicinity of the town are flour, meal, and flax mills. Considerable quantities of flax, and of all kinds of agricultural produce, are sold at the weekly markets. The weekly sales of linens sometimes amounted, about the end of last century, to the sum of £7,000; but so early as the year 1804, it decreased to an average of only about £2,000; and it has since experienced great fluctuation, and is at present much less inconsiderable than it was about 8 or 10 years ago. Fairs are held on the first Monday of every month, and on July 5, and Nov. 5. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Armagh takes designation from Tanderagee, and has chapels at Ballyorgan, Poyntz-Pass, and Mullaghrack. Area of the town, 55 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,559; in 1841, 1,562. Houses 265. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 70; in manufactures and trade, 197; in other pursuits, 46. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 187; on their own manual labour, 101; on means not specified, 9.

• "This Society," says the official report, "is worked in connection with a Mont de Piete, and the accounts of the two institutions are so mixed up that the managers state they are unable to render a separate account for each. The stock account of the loan fund for 1843 is credited with an advance to the Mont de Piete of £789 13s. 10d. From the manner in which the accounts are mixed up, no fair approximation can be made of the average cost of each loan."

TANEY, TAWNEY, or CHURCHTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Dublin, but chiefly in that of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the villages of DUNDUM and WINDMILLS: which see. Length, northward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the barony of Dublin section, 6 acres, 17 perches; of the Rathdown section, 4,556 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,020; in 1841, 3,848. Houses 626. Pop. of the barony of Dublin section, in 1841, 81. Houses 9. Pop. of the rural districts of the Rathdown section, in 1841, 2,982. Houses 483. The parish descends from the summit of the Two-Rock mountain, northward, to the river Dodder, at a point 2½ furlongs south of the village of Donnybrook. The southern district, extending $\frac{1}{4}$ mile in length, with an extreme breadth of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile, is wholly mountainous; and has on its southern boundary the summit of the Two-Rock mountain, and on its eastern boundary the summit of the Three-Rock mountain, which command the most extensive and gorgeous views of the coasts, bay, city, and county of Dublin, and have altitudes above the level of the sea of respectively 1,763 and 1,479 feet. The central and the southern districts possess some agreeable diversities of surface; but, on the whole, are a portion of the rich and luscious plain of Dublin, profusely embellished with landscape culture, very thickly powdered with respectable habitations, and not a little celebrated for salubrity of climate. The river Dodder runs upwards of a mile along the northern boundary. The summit of the Two-Rock mountain is crowned by a ruin called Fairy-Castle. The road from Dublin to Enniskerry traverses the interior, and passes through the village of Dundrum; and Mr. Fraser, noticing its route southward from that village, and within the middle district of the parish, says, "Here we commence the ascent of the eastern slopes of the Three-Rock mountain, along which we continue till we reach the Scalp, a distance of 5 (statute) miles; and here also the aspect and character of the country change, the surface becomes wild and rugged, and the detached granite rocks of the upland, which follow the limestone of the plain, are protruded and strewn around; the villas become thinly scattered; and the cottages of the peasantry are of a very humble and rural character; and nowhere is the contrast between the environs and the adjacent country more sudden or striking than here." The principal country residences south of Dundrum are Aimmount, Eden, Rockmount, Dundrum-house, Farnley, Runnemed, Ballinteer-house, Taney-lodge, Bellevue-park, Hilltown, Ludford-park, Balally, Merreen, Pover-house, and Kingstown; and the principal north of Dundrum are Churchtown-house, Woodville, Taney-hill, Goat-town, Thornhill, Mountainville, Lyndhurst, Belfield, Roebuck-park, Roebuck-hall, Castlevue, Mount-Merrion, Owens-town-house, Roebuck-castle, Mount-Dillon, Roebuck-house, Roebuck-Grove, Farrarboley-cottage, Woodview, Richview, Beech-hill, and Springfield. The hamlet of Clonskeagh stands upon the Dodder. The old church of Taney stands at Churchtown, in the vicinity of Dundrum; and is a small building of little interest. In the adjoining churchyard are several monumental inscriptions deserving of notice, particularly one to the memory of Mr. William Halliday, who died in 1816, and who, although then but 24 years of age, had acquired an accurate knowledge of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and most of the European languages, and had 'fathomed all the depths, explored the beauties, and untravelled the intricacies' of the Hiberno-Celtic. The modern church is a spacious fabric, surmounting elevated ground, serving as a landmark to mariners, and commanding 'very fine views over the city, the bay, and a lovely expanse of country, the numerous ornamental plantations of which combine, at this point of observation, into a massive richness.' The edifice itself, however, is as artistically defective, as it is pretending and substantial. 'The plan is cruciform, and the pointed style is adopted in the detail, but without due attention to any consistent order of that style. Stone tinted in various hues, is used in different parts of the structure; and, with a fanciful effort towards novelty, which is quite unworthy of imitation, the mullions of the windows, on the exterior, are of a deep yellow, whilst the crocketed pinnacles at the angles of the tower are black.'—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Peter's, in the dio. of Dublin. See DUBLIN (COUNTY OF THE CITY OF). Tithe composition, £415 7s. 8d. A curate is employed upon a salary of £75. The church was built in 1818, by means of a loan of £3,969 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,200; attendance, from 300 to 500. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,059 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 2,957 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools had on their books 193 boys and 203 girls. The parochial school for boys, and that for girls, were each supported by a charity sermon, a grant from the London Hibernian Society, and £2 a-year from the rector; the two Roman Catholic free schools were supported by a charity sermon, and a grant from the National Board, the latter of which had been recently withdrawn; the London Hibernian Society's school was supported by a grant from the Society, private subscriptions, and scholars' fees; and the infant school was supported by private subscriptions and donations. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Dundrum were salaried with respectively £20 and £18 from the National Board, and had on their books 191 boys and 148 girls; and a boys' school and a girls' school at Sandford were salaried with £15 a-year each from the National Board, and had on their books 162 boys and 123 girls.

TANEY, or TAWNEY, a village in the parish of Clondeavodlock, barony of Kilmacrenn, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands in the peninsula of Fannat, about 5 furlongs north by west of Rosmakill, and 6½ miles north of Millford. Adjacent to it are the small Lough Taney, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the residences of Springfield and Croghan. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 128. Houses 24.

TANKARDSTOWN, a townland or quasi-parish, in the barony of Rathvilly, 2½ miles north-east of the town of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. It figures in some documents as a parish, in the dio. of Leighlin; and in others as merely a townland of the parish of Tullow. It contains the hamlet of Tankardstown Cross-roads; and is traversed by the road from Tullow to Hacketstown. In 1831, its pop. was 1,051; and, in 1834, the Protestants amounted to 42, and the Roman Catholics to 1,059; and two pay daily schools had on their books 101 boys and 72 girls.

TANKARDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Coshma, 2 miles west-north-west of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,710 acres. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 613; but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 523; in 1841, 630. Houses 103. The surface, with the exception of a few acres, consists wholly of profitable land. The river Maig effects the drainage; and the road from Kilmallock to Croon passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Linerick. Tithe composition, £125; glebe, £36. Gross income, £161; nett, £143 15s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the vicar-generalship of Limerick; and is non-resident in Tankardstown. A curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £5. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 20 boys and 15 girls.

TANKARDSTOWN, a parish 3½ miles south-south-east of Athy, and partly in the barony of Ballyadams, Queen's co., partly in the baronies of East Narragh and Rheban and Kilkea and Moore, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length of the Queen's co. section, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,472 acres, 13 perches,—of which 26 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches are in the river Barrow. Length of the Kildare section, south-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the East Narragh and Rheban section, 440 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches,—of the Kilkea and Moore section, 4,437 acres, 10 perches,—of which 40 acres, 3 roods are in the river Barrow. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,918; in 1841, 1,914. Houses 313. Pop., in 1841, of the Queen's co. section, 947; of the Narragh and Rheban section, 20; of the Kilkea and Moore section, 938. Houses in these respectively, 164, 4, 145. The surface consists in general of light, low land; and two principal swells of it in the Kildare section have altitudes of respectively 239 and 243 feet above sea-level. The river Barrow traces the boundary between the Queen's co. and the Kildare districts; and a canal sweep of the Barrow navigation extends along the left bank of the river, within the Kildare district. The principal residences in the Queen's co. district are Barrow-lodge, Moneybrook-house, Millford-house, and Kilmorany-house; and the other objects of chief interest are a police barrack, a Roman Catholic chapel, the site of two castles, and the ruins of Tankardstown church, the last situated on the margin of the Barrow. The principal residences in the Kildare district are Heath-house, Leinster-lodge, Dollardstown-house, Snagborough-house, Spring-lodge, Farnhill, Grangemellon-house, Grangeford, and Levittstown-house; and the other objects of chief interest are a police barrack, a burying-ground, and the site of St. Leger's-castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATHY (which see), in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £325 19s. 4d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of St. Michael's of Athy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 97, and the Roman Catholics to 1,866; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £40 a-year from the National Board—were usually attended by about 115 scholars.

TANKARDSTOWN, a small limestone territory, near the coast of the eastern district of the barony of Decies-without-Drum,—the district which was recently transferred from the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. The discovery of limestone here, about a quarter of a century ago, was regarded as an event of great moment, and a great tract of country in which lime manures were previously scarce and dear.

TANKARDSTOWN, a demesne in the parish of Gernonstown, barony of Upper Slane, 3½ miles north-west of the town of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It adjoins the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry; and is the residence of the Right Hon. F. Blackbourne.

TAR (Ture), a rivulet of the barony of West Iffa and Olla, co. Tipperary, Munster. It rises in the parish of Templetenny, and on the western border of the county, at an elevation of 307 feet above the level of the sea; and it flows 11 miles eastward, along the valley between the Galtee and the Knockmeledown mountains past the town of Clogheen, and through the parishes of Templetenny, Shanrahan, Tullaghoron, and Ballybacon, to the river Suir, at a point about 1 mile above the village of Newcastle.

TARA, a small bay on the east coast of the parish of Witter, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It opens $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by east of Ballyquintin Point; and though small in capacity, possesses much comparative importance for both the fisheries and the coasting-trade of the county. Mr. Nimmo, in the report of his Coast Survey, says, "Tara bay is the best situation for a harbour on all this coast. It is already naturally sheltered from all winds but north-east; and on that side a rock called Craiganely may be built up in the way of a breakwater, which would make this, though only a tide harbour, one of the safest I have seen. It is already much frequented in bad weather by the fishing vessels, though it possesses few of its own, namely, five yawls and four smacks, and when the tide does not admit of entering Strangford, would be a good place of shelter for vessels in the coasting trade. The inhabitants seem to think a small pier from the point next to Folly-house would answer the purpose; but as the bottom and depth of water there are not favourable, I would rather recommend the plan annexed, which, by covering the whole creek of about fifty English acres, would upon occasion protect all the boats connected with the fishery. The inside of Craiganely being deepened will be a good boat-quay; but a jetty may run out in any other place where a wharf is required. Estimated expense of a breakwater pier in Tara bay £3,806."

TARA (THE), a rivulet of co. Armagh, Ulster, and co. Louth, Leinster. It rises to the east of the town of Newtown-Hamilton; runs nearly parallel to the Newtown-Hamilton river, and about 3 miles distant from it; and falls into the Castletown or Dundalk river, or rather is one of the forming waters of that stream, in co. Louth.

TARA, a hill in the parishes of Kiltennel and Kiltcavan, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. Its summit has an altitude of 826 feet above sea-level; is situated $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of the nearest part of the coast, $\frac{2}{3}$ miles north-east of Gorey, and $\frac{3}{4}$ south-west of Kilmichael Point; is a conspicuous object from the sea; and commands an extensive and interesting view of the coast, away to the vicinity of Wexford.

TARA, TARAH, or TARAUGH, a parish, containing a village and a celebrated hill of the same name, in the barony of Skreen, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, west-north-westward, 3 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{2}{3}$; area, 3,364 acres, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 641; but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 688; in 1841, 586. Houses 100. A prominent feature, not only of the parish, but of the vast rich plain in the midst of which it lies, is the far-famed hill of TARA: see next article. All the rest of the surface is flat, and consists of excellent land. The principal residence is Tara-hall, a small plain modern house, the seat of Patrick Lynch, Esq.; the principal hamlets are Ross and Moortown; and the principal antiquities, additional to those on Tara-hill, are the ruins of Odder-nunnery, Odder-castle, Riverstown-castle, another castle, and the old church of Tara. The village of Tara stands on the east side of Tara-hill, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile west of the road from Navan to Dunshaughlin, 2 west of Skreen, 5 north-north-west of Dunshaughlin, and $\frac{5}{8}$ south-south-east of Navan. The modern parochial church stands adjacent to the village, on a shoulder or summit of the hill, and is a conspicuous feature in the views of the hill from the east. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 126. Houses 23.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £22 10s. The rectories of Tara and DUNSANT, and the vicarage of KILLEEN (see these articles), constitute the benefice of Tara. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $\frac{2}{3}$. Pop., in 1831, 1,567. Gross income, £521 10s.; nett, £413 7s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Yagoe, in the cathedral of St. Patrick's. The church was built in 1823, by means of a gift of £500 from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £700 raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 110; attendance, from 20 to 30. There is a Roman Catholic chapel at Dunsany. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 640; the Protestants of the union to 128, and the Roman Catholics to 1,489; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £4 a-year from the rector—had on their books 17 boys and 19 girls; and there was also a daily school in Dunsany.

TARA, TARAH, or TARAUGH, a celebrated hill, the subject of great antiquarian and literary interest, in the parish of Tara, barony of Skreen, co. Meath, Leinster. It is a verdant, moundish, flowingly-outlined mass, about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile in length from north to south, rather less than $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile in extreme breadth,—possessing a wavy, tumulated, tabular summit,—lifting up a large, solitary standing stone or monumental pillar on the crown of one of its tumuli,—sharing with the hill of Skreen, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the east, and 507 feet in altitude, the power and interest of relieving the monotony of the vast central expanse of the plain of Meath,—and commanding a panoramic, minutely featured, and warmly tinted view of that brilliant expanse,—rich, fertile, and as capable of the most finished culture and the most ornate loveliness as a garden. Its original name was Teagmhor, 'the great house,' or Teaghmorreagh, 'the great house of the king,' and was abbreviated or vulgarized into successively Teamor and Tara. A triennial convocation of provincial kings, Druids, and bards, is usually alleged, but on very apocryphal authority, to have been held on Tara Hill, from an early period till about the end of the 6th century, for the election of a monarch or supreme ruler, and the management of the affairs of the monarchy. A supposed record, called the Psalter of Tara, or sometimes Senachasmore or 'great antiquity,' figures in tradition as the written depository of the decrees of the convocation, but is not known to literature as an actual record. The famous coronation-stone which formed the palladium of the kingdom of Dalriada, at Dunstaffnage, on the shores of the Deucaledonian sea, and afterwards became the palladium of Scotland at that kingdom's coronation-ground in the vicinity of Perth, and eventually was removed to Westminster by Edward I. to be the coronation-chair of the kings of England, is alleged to have been carried to Dunstaffnage by way of Iona from the hill of Tara, to have figured in courtly belief at Tara as the pillow of stone on which Jacob slept at Bethel, and to have found its way to Tara in the course of the alleged Milesian immigrations from Spain. The principal palace of the early monarchs of Ireland, and an university or cluster of colleges supported by their munificence, are alleged to have stood on the hill of Tara, and have been the topic alike of the most magniloquent and florid descriptions by early annalists and later credulous historians, and of the most conflicting theories, intricate investigations, and antagonist discussions, among the majority of Irish antiquaries. Whatever structures, dignified with the names of palaces, halls, and colleges, really at any time existed, were probably of a temporary and fragile character, quite unworthy to be designated architectural, and have long ago so utterly disappeared, as not to have left a single vestige of either wall or foundation; and the only antiquities, additional to the pillar-stone, which now exist, are numerous circular earthworks, possibly enough indicating quondam places of national assembly and royal residence, yet strictly resembling in appearance and character the ordinary 'raths,' which abound in most districts of the kingdom. At Tara Hill, in 980, the Danes sustained a signal defeat; Roderick, the last native monarch of Ireland, concentrated his forces, preparatory to attacking the English in Dublin; in 1589, O'Neill assembled his followers, after laying waste the surrounding country; in 1798, a skirmish was fought between the insurgents and a detachment of fenibles; and in 1843, was held one of the largest and mightiest of the monster meetings of the agitation for repeal of the Legislative Union. In the skirmish of 1798, the insurgents were totally defeated, with the loss of 400 men killed and wounded, 300 horses, and all their provisions, arms, ammunition, and baggage; and the royal forces had 20 men killed and wounded of the Reay fenibles, and 1 man killed and 5 men wounded of the Upper Kells infantry.

A very long and elaborate paper, written by Mr. Petrie, and published in the 'Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy,' contains ample information for such readers as can luxuriate in the antiquarian associations of Tara. But Mr. and Mrs. Hall, so nicely epitomize this paper, and so agreeably decorate their epitome with original description and remark, that most popular readers will greatly prefer their brief essay to even Mr. Petrie's lengthened dissertation. 'From Navan,' say they, 'we proceeded about 4 miles on the Dublin road, to visit the renowned 'Hill of Tara,' taking with us the long and elaborate 'Essay' of Mr. Petrie, and recalling the words of one of the sweetest of the 'Melodies.' 'We were not sceptical enough to throw aside, as fabulous, the ancient histories of Tara; although they may exist, exclusively, in the compositions of the old bards. Yet certainly, when we ascended to the summit, after having carefully perused the two hundred and thirty-two quarto pages of Mr. Petrie, published in the 'Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy,' and examined the maps and plans by which his essay is illustrated, finding that nothing met the eye but a succession of grass-covered mounds, with a single rounded stone, of no very great size, planted, as it were, upon the highest of them, we were, for the moment, tempted to exclaim with the 'Critic,'—

* The Spanish fleet thou canst not see, because It is not yet in sight.'

• The harp that once thronged Tara's halls
The wail of music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls
As if that soul were fled.

So sleeps the pride of former days,
So glory's thrill is o'er,
And hears that once beat high for praise,
Now feel that pulse no more.

No more the chiefs and ladies bright
The harp of Tara swells:
The chord alone, that breaks at night,
Its tale of ruin tells.

Thus freedom now so seldom wakes
The only thrub she gives,
Is when some heart indignant breaks,
To show that still she lives.'

Farther consideration, however, and farther reflection, even without the aid of imagination, induced a conviction that we stood in the centre of an early Irish city; and a brief stretch of fancy might have summoned around us 'chiefs and ladies bright,' and awakened the echo of the harp in 'the halls' of Tara, in all their pride of 'former days.' From the main road there is a considerable ascent, for about a mile, before we arrive at the commencement of the mounds, which are evidently artificial. It then seems to the superficial observer, a mere assemblage of hillocks, the largest of which is about 30 yards long, and of an equal breadth; upon this stands the marvellous pillar-stone, — to which we shall refer presently, — nearly in the centre.† There is, according to Cambrensis, 'in Mieth, an hill, called the Hill of Taragh, wherein is a plaine twelve score long, which was named the Kempe his hall, where the countrie had their meetings and folkemotes, as a place that was accounted the high palace of the monarch. The Irish historians hammer manie fables in this forge, of Fin MacCoile and his champions. But doubtlesse the place seemeth to beare the show of an ancient and famous monument.'‡ Mr. Petrie, as we

† This hillock is now — alas for the degradation! — known as 'Croppie Hill,' from the fact that a large number of insurgents were buried there in 1798. The pillar originally stood upon another and smaller hillock; it was moved to its present place to mark the spot (and to dignify it) in which so many 'slaughtered patriots' were interred. It was fixed there, however, only so recent as fifteen years ago. Its weight is prodigious; and it excited our astonishment how it could have been conveyed, without the aid of machinery, to its present destination. Upon this subject we conversed with a peasant, one 'Paddy Fitzsimmons,' who assisted at the ceremony. He stated that it was effected by no more than twenty men, who performed the work gradually, an inch at a time; they sunk it about six feet into the ground, directly over the bodies of their old friends, relations, or companions; and perhaps in the world there does not exist so singular a monumental stone."

‡ Mr. Wright, to whose kindness we have been so frequently indebted, informs us that the original name of the Hill of Tara was Liathdrum, that is, 'the grey eminence;' and according to Keating, Thes, the wife of Heremon, the first monarch of Ireland, ordered a palace to be built on it for herself, whence it was called Temora (Temur), that is, 'the house of Thes.' But according to the Dinn Seanchers, an ancient Irish topography, the etymon of Temur is 'the house of music,' from Teadh, a musical choral, and Mur, a house; and it was so called, adds that valuable MS., 'from its celebrity for melody above all places in the world.' The word Tara (Teamhair), denotes a pleasant and agreeable place with a covered or shaded walk, upon a hill, for a convenient prospect; and accordingly some tourist describes this hill as a miniature resemblance of Mount Tabor. Its ancient magnificence has been the dream of the Philo-Milesian, and has been as sturdily denied by writers of the Ledwich and Pinkerton schools, one of whom has gone so far as to deny that there are any architectural remains on the Hill of Tara. Feircerteine Fíle, the bard, who lived in the first century, mentions that Óllamb Fódhla, the 21st monarch from Heremon, erected at Tara the Mur Ullanahin, or 'college of sages,' and also instituted the celebrated Feis of Tara, which was an assembly of all the states of Ireland. This assembly, which probably resembled the wittenagemot of the Saxons, is described by Eochaidh (Hector) Ó'Flinn, a bard of the tenth century, as meeting every third year. He says that it was convoked by the monarch three days before the day of Saman, (answering to our 1st of November), and continued for three days after. This week was spent in festivity, in making laws, and correcting the annals and antiquities of Ireland. The same author adds, that during the sessions of the Feis, whoever committed murder or theft, or was convicted of quarrelling, &c., forfeited his life; although at other times these crimes were punished by fines. In an ancient Irish manuscript, preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, the following curious description is given of the Hall of Tara, in the reign of Cormac Uíada, in the third century:— 'The palace of Temur was 800 feet square; the diameter of the surrounding rath, 7 din or casts of a dart; it contained 150 apartments and 150 dormitories; the height was 27 cubits; there were 150 drinking horns, 12 porches, 12 doors, and 1,000 guests daily, besides princes, orators, and men of science, engravers of gold and silver, carvers and modelers, &c.' The truth of this account is attested by the number of gold and silver ornaments, beautifully carved and modelled, dug up in the neighbourhood of Tara and other places. The manuscript goes on to state that the hall had twelve divisions on each wing; sixteen attendants on each side, eight astrologers, historians, and secretaries, in the rear of the hall, and two to each table at the door; 100 guests in all; two oxen, two sheep, and two hogs at each meal, divided equally to all. In have intimated, does not thus briefly dismiss the 'ancient and famous monument.' His authorities are chiefly the Bards and the Bardic traditions. It would far exceed our limits to introduce even an abridgment of the essay of the learned antiquarian—to whom Ireland is so largely indebted. He has laboured to collect an amazing number of facts in support of the theory—borne out, indeed, by incontestable evidence, that Tara is the place celebrated in Irish history, as having been for ages the chief seat of the monarchs of Ireland—whence their laws were promulgated; the resort of its Druids and 'musicians,' and the great stronghold of Druidism for centuries; having become the residences of its kings on the first establishment of a monarchical government under Slanige, ruler of the Fir-bolgs or Belgae, and so continuing until the middle of the sixth century—'a period during which reigned 142 monarchs, viz., 136 Pagan, and 6 Christian.' A considerable portion of his work is occupied by details of the contests between St. Patrick and the Druids,—a subject into which he enters with singular minuteness; tracing the history of the Hill, down to its abandonment in 565, as the seat of monarchy, 'in consequence of the curse of St. Ruadhan,' who, 'with a bishop that was with him, took their bells that they had, which they rung hardly, and cursed the king and place, and prayed God that no king or queen ever after would or could dwell in Tarach, and that it should be wast for ever without court or palace—as it fell out accordingly.' The most interesting

the convention of Tara, the monarch occupied an elevated seat in the centre of the hall, with his face towards the west. Facing him sat the king of Leinster, the king of Ulster on his right, the king of Munster on his left, and the king of Connaught behind him. Long-extended seats were disposed in rows; in the first of which were the Druids and bards, or philosophers (Fidhirs), and in the other rows were respectively placed the antiquaries and genealogists (Seanchaich), the musicians (Oiridhighe), and after them the chiefs and brachas, or representatives of the towns and villages. The first two days were celebrated in friendly intercourse, the third in celebrating the feast of Saman, or the moon. Another interpretation is given of this word in Part IX. of our work. Saman (Samhien), has also been rendered 'heaven,' similar to the Shamien of the Hebrews, and the Samothracians. The assembly was opened by the chief bard delivering an ode accompanied by the music of the Oiridhighe. The Druids rites being completed, the fire of Saman was lighted, and the blessing of the tutelary divinities invoked. The three succeeding days were spent in festivity, after which the proper business of the convention commenced. In that part of the palace of Tara already referred to, called Mur Ollamhain, or 'the House of the Sages,' the youth were instructed in poetry and music, and initiated into the mysteries of 'the hidden harmony of the universe.' In further illustration of the customs observed at the convention of Tara, we may quote a passage which may at once be regarded as an interesting description, and a most unquestionable proof. It is from the Teagaisc 'Plathin' or 'Instruction of a Prince,' ascribed, on the most satisfactory grounds, to one of the very 'kings of Temora' themselves—Cormac Uafadha (long beard), already mentioned. He says, 'a prince on the day of Saman should light his lamps and welcome his guests with clapping of hands, procure comfortable seats: the cup-bearers should be respectful and active in distributing of meat and drink; let there be moderation of music; short stories; a welcoming countenance. . . . Let the prince appear splendid as the sun in the house of Midheburta (that is, the middle house of Tara).' To this valuable native authority, which possesses in the original internal marks of extreme antiquity, we shall add a foreign testimony, that of an ancient Scandinavian manuscript, translated in Johnson's Celts-Scandinavian Antiquities: It alludes to Tara, and is as follows. 'In this kingdom (Ireland) there is also a place called Temor, formerly the chief city and royal residence. . . . In the more elevated part of this city, the king had a splendid (splendidum) and almost Paradisean castle; within the precincts of the castle he had a palace superb in its structure and splendour (nitore). And we may observe further, that none will be surprised at such descriptions as these, when we find, at a still earlier period, Ptolemy noting on his map of Ireland fifteen cities, on two of which he bestows the epithet of 'splendens' (splendens); and it is worthy of remark that these two cities in the Greek geographer correspond (with the exception of the error in the assigned localities) to the Eman and Tara of the native writers. If we admit (which is extremely probable), that Ptolemy has here, as else, where, mistaken the latitudes for the longitudes, he has indicated the exact sites of Tara and Emania.'

parts of Mr. Petrie's book, however, are those which explain an accompanying 'plan of the earthen works still existing on the Hill of Tara.' The principal in extent is Rath-Riogh, the next is Rath-Laogaire, the next Rath-na-Seanadh, the next Rath-Eachhor, and the next Rath-Grainne. Within the enclosure of Rath-Riogh, are the ruins of the house of Cormac,* the mound of the Hostages, the 'Teach Miodhehuarta,' or banquetting-house 'Tobar Finn,' the well, and the two 'clanciferts;' of these the northern was famous for the slaughter of the virgins by the Lagenians on Saman's day; and the southern, for a false sentence pronounced there by a king named Lughardh MacCon, for which he was afterwards destroyed. Mr. Petrie's object has been to compare the ancient Bardic accounts with the existing evidence supplied by the remains; and he has found them to agree with exceeding accuracy. The most singular of all these ancient monuments, however, is that which still exists comparatively unimpaired by time—the pillar-stone to which we have already

* "The old bardic 'historians' celebrate the wisdom and genius of Cormac, the grandson of 'Con of the hundred battles,' the wisest, bravest, and most accomplished of all the Irish kings. He ascended the throne of Tara at the middle of the third century, and attempted to reform the religion of the Druids by substituting for their polytheism the more rational and sublime belief of one infinite and eternal Being, who was the author of the universe. His subjects, in consequence, rebelled against him; and, in one of his battles, he lost an eye, by which, being rendered unfit for government, according to the custom of Ireland, he resigned the crown to his son Cairbre of the Liffy, and retired to his cottage of Cletty, near the Boyne, where he devoted the remainder of his life to philosophic contemplation. During this time he wrote many works for the use of his son and successor of Tara, among which may be reckoned his Royal Precepts and Instructions, which he is said to have written at Cairbre's request, and to have drawn up in answer to different questions proposed by his son upon various subjects relative to government and general conduct. The Druids finding the son regulated by the counsels of the father, and desirous to poison the good monarch. The 'Royal Precepts or Instructions' have been translated by J. O'Donovan. They are so full of beauty, wisdom, and virtue, that we cannot resist a desire to extract some of the passages:—'O grandson of Con, O Cormac,' said Cairbre, 'what is good for a king?' 'That is plain,' said Cormac:—'It is good for him to have patience without debate; self-government without anger; affability without haughtiness; diligent attention to history; strict observance of covenants and agreements; strictness mitigated by mercy in the execution of the laws; peace with his districts; lawful wages of assualage; justice in decisions; performance of promises; hosting with justice; protection to his frontiers, honouring the neuada (nobles); respect to the flann (priests); adoration of the great God.' 'O grandson of Con, O Cormac,' said Cairbre, 'what is good for the welfare of a country?' 'That is plain,' said Cormac:—'Frequent convocation of sapient and good men to investigate its affairs, to abolish each evil, and retain each wholesome institution; to attend to the precepts of the elders; let every neuada (assembly of the elders) be convened according to law; let the law be in the hands of the nobles; let the chieftains be upright, and unwilling to oppress the poor; let peace and friendship reign—mercy and good morals—union and brotherly love; heroes without haughtiness—sternness to enemies, friendship to friends, generous compensations; just surities; just decisions; just virtues; mild instruction; respect for soldiers; learning every art and language; pleading with knowledge of the Finechaca (law); decision without delay; giving alms; giving alms, clarity to the poor; surities for covenants; lawful covenants; to hearken to the instructions of the wise; to be deaf to the mob; to purge the laws of the country of all their evils, &c. &c. All these are necessary for the welfare of a country.' 'O grandson of Con, O Cormac,' said Cairbre, 'what are the qualifications of a prince?' 'Let him be vigorous, easy of access, and affable; let him be humble, but majestic; let him be without (personal) blemish; let him be a hero, a sage; let him be liberal, serene, and good-hearted; mild in peace, fierce in war, beloved by his subjects, discerning, faithful, and patient; righteous and abstemious; let him attend the sick; let him pass just judgments; let him support each orphan; let him abominate falsehood; let him love truth; let him be forgetful of evil, mindful of good; let him assemble numerous meetings; let him communicate his secrets to few; let him be cheerful with his intimates; let him appear splendid as the sun at the banquet in the house of Midheburta (that is, the middle house at Tara); let him convene assemblies of the nobles; let him be affectionate and intelligent; let him depress evil; let him esteem every person according to his honour—close surities—let him be sharp but lenient in his judgments and decisions. These are the qualifications by which a king and chieftain should be esteemed.'

made some reference. This is the 'Lia Fail,' the celebrated coronation-stone of the ancient Irish kings. It is composed of granular limestone, and is at present 'about 6 feet high above the ground, but its real height is said to be 12 feet.' At its base it is perhaps 4 feet in circumference; but it tapers somewhat towards the top, not unlike the round towers. Some remarkable relics of antiquity are also to be found in the grave-yard of a church near the summit of the hill; it is modern, but occupies the site of a very ancient structure, and which was also built upon the spot on which it is said formerly existed a Pagan temple. 'Admann's Cross' is still standing here; and it points out the place where, in the fifth century, stood 'the house from which Benen, the disciple of St. Patrick, escaped, and in which Lucad the Bald, the Druid of King Loagaire, was burned.*' Whether we reject these Bardic histories as mere fables, or only accept them as poetic exaggerations—it is impossible to consider the 'Hill of Tara' in any other light than that of a place in which multitudes formerly assembled; there is abundant and conclusive evidence of this, apart from apocryphal authorities, not alone in the valuable ornaments in gold which have been, from time to time, dug up in the vicinity, a few of which are deposited in the museum of the Royal Irish Academy, and which are rightly assigned to a date long prior to the sixth century—in the existing names of the several neighbouring localities, still the same, or nearly so, as they bore many centuries ago—in the various roads that now lead to the hill of which distinct traces remain; but the character and appearance of the place remove all doubt as to its having been the work of human hands, and not the production of nature. The 'Halls of Tara' were composed of earth and wood; but, as Mr. Moore observes (in his 'History of Ireland'), 'this fact is by no means conclusive, either against the elegance of their structure or the civilization, to a certain extent, of those who erect them. It was in wood that the graceful forms of Grecian architecture first unfolded their beauties; and there is reason to believe that at the time when Xerxes invaded Greece, most of her temples were still of this perishable material.' And so we part from Tara; we shall not easily forget the morning we passed upon the hill, nor the magnificent prospect of a fair country we beheld from its summit:—although immediately around us we could see only high barriers without marble or a name:

— But where we sought for Hion's walk
The quiet sheep feeds and the tortoise crawls " "

*—The story of this event is very curious. All these things being done between the magician and Patrick, the king says to them, 'Cast your bows into the water, and him whose bows shall escape unharmed we will adore.' Patrick answered, 'I will do so;' and the magician said, 'I am unwilling to come to the trial of water with this man because he has water as his god; for he had heard that baptism was given by St. Patrick with water, and the king answering said, 'Allow it by fire;' and Patrick said, 'I am ready;' but the magician being unwilling, said, 'This man alternately in each successive year adores as god, water and fire.' And the Saint said, 'Not so, but thou thyself shalt go, and one of my boys shall go with thee, into a separate and closed house, and my vestment shall be on thee, and thine on him, and thus together you shall be set on fire.' And this council was approved; and there was a house built for them, the half of which was made of green wood, and the other half of dry; and the magician was sent into that part of the house that was green, and one of the boys of St. Patrick, Bineas by name, with the vest of the magician, into the dry part of the house. The house then being closed on the outside, was set on fire before the whole multitude; and it came to pass in that hour, by the prayers of Patrick, that the flame of the fire consumed the magician, with the green half of the house, while the garment of St. Patrick remained untouched, because the fire did not touch it. But the fortunate lieutenants, on the contrary, together with the dry half of the house, according to what is said of the three children, was not touched by the fire, neither was he annoyed, nor did he experience any inconvenience, only the garment of the magician which he had about him was burned."

TARBET, or TURBOT ISLAND, a small inhabited island in the parish of Omev, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connought. It lies off the north side of the entrance of Arilbear Harbour, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile west of the nearest part of the mainland, 4 miles west by north of Clifden, and 6 north-north-east of Slyne Head. It measures about 1 mile in length, and 3 furlongs in breadth. It is well cultivated, and has about 100 inhabitants.

TARBERT, a post, market, and sea-port town, in the parish of Kilnaughtin, barony of Iraghticonner, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the coast road from Limerick to Tralee, 3 miles west by south of Glinn, 4 north-east by east of Ballylongford, $\frac{1}{2}$ north of Nowtownsandes, 7 south-east of Kiltrush, 15 west by south of Askeaton, 18 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Listowel, 26 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Tralee, 29 west by south of Limerick, and 123 south-west by west of Dublin. The town is beautifully situated at the head of a small bay, opposite Clonderalaw bay in co. Clare, and within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the boundary of co. Kerry with co. Limerick. The little bay at the town bears the name of Tarbert bay; it is closed or sheltered on the north by an islet called Tarbert Rock; it unites with Clonderalaw bay to produce the appearance of an expanse or sweep of the estuary of the Shannon; and, in common with the adjacent parts of that beautiful estuary, it possesses intricate and delightfully picturesque shores. Tarbert Rock lies a mile north of the town; measures about $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile in length; is separated from the mainland, only by a narrow belt, which is alternately a sound and an isthmus; and is the site of a lighthouse, a battery, and a coast-guard station. The lighthouse exhibits a fixed light, and, jointly with the lighthouse on Loop Head, is the principal guide to the navigation of the estuary of the Shannon; and the maintaining of it during 1840, inclusive of the expense of erecting an iron bridge, cost £1,277 19s. 8d.,—and, during 1843, cost £308 9s. 10d. About $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile north by west of the town, magnificently situated on a bold and wooded peninsula which screens the west side of Tarbert bay and projects to the isthmus of connection with Tarbert Rock, are the demesne and mansion of Tarbert-house, the seat of Mr. Leslie, the proprietor of the town. The elevated position and the extensive plantations of the demesne render it a conspicuous and very ornate feature of the landscape, and a strong relief to an expanse of prevailing bleakness; and many parts of it command noble and brilliant views of the waters, islands, peninsula, shores and sea-board of the Shannon. Other country residences in the vicinity of the town are Ahanna, Leslie-lodge, Shamnon-lawn, Clareview, Ballydonohue, and Carrinakilly. The land throughout the environs consists, in general, of good soil; but displays comparative poverty and unskillfulness of cultivation. The seignior of Tarbert was granted during the reign of James I., and towards the close of Lord Chichester's government, to Patrick Crosbie, Esq., subject to the condition of his keeping on it several Irish families who were transplanted or banished hither from King's co.; it was sold by Mr. Crosbie's son, Sir Pierce Crosbie, to Allerman Dominick Roche of Limerick; it next passed by purchase to the family of Clare, who forfeited it in consequence of their attachment to the cause of James II.; and it passed, after the Revolution, to the family of Leslie.—The town of Tarbert has a much more clean and neat appearance than might be anticipated in so remote a situation; and it possesses a neat church, a small Methodist meeting-house, a commodious Roman Catholic chapel, several schools, a bridewell, a dispensary, and a small inn and posting establishment. The bridewell contains the usual accommodation; and the maintaining of it during 1843 cost £20 3s. 8d. The dispensary is within the Listowel Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,371; and, in 1839-40, it expended £74 8s. 6d., and administered to 628 patients. The town, though very favourably situated for both inland trade and seaward traffic, has hitherto had comparatively very little business; but it has strongly drawn the attention of several most powerful public bodies appointed to inquire into the best means of promoting national prosperity, and it promises speedily to become a seat of very considerable commerce. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, Easter Monday, June 22, Aug. 12, and Dec. 11. The steamers which ply between Limerick and Kilrush usually call off Tarbert both in upward and in downward transit; and they achieve an average passage hence to Limerick in 4 hours. See KILRUSH. Tarbert is the proposed terminus of the great line of railway, which the Public Commissioners projected to connect Dublin with Limerick, and to extend thence down the south shore of the Shannon. See SHANNON. Certain great improvements proposed to be made upon Tarbert Harbour by the Commissioners for improving the Navigation of the Shannon, are noticed as follows in the Commissioners' Report: "The first anchorage near the mouth of the river on the south side is at Tarbert 7 miles above Kilrush. Here an island, or rather a peninsula, (for it is only separated from the mainland for a short time at high tide,) affords excellent protection from the prevailing west and south-west winds; but the bay is open to considerable reaches of the river towards the north and east. Tarbert is well situated for collecting and embarking the produce of an extensive district, but is without any landing quay or accommodation, to which vessels can approach to take in cargoes; and it is this accommodation which we think it desirable should be established. The usual proposition for carrying that object into effect, has been to erect a stone pier at the north-eastern extremity of the island, which would increase the shelter, and, at the same time, afford a shipping place; but, as in several parts of the Shannon, and particularly in the bay of Tarbert, it may be observed that all solid projections, whether natural or artificial, have a tendency to induce a deposit of mud, and thereby create shoal-water where depth is most required, we consider that the erection of a solid stone pier would eventually prove injurious to the harbour; and, in lieu thereof, we recommend the construction of a wooden pier, consisting of a union of piles and timber framework, suited to the peculiar nature of the bottom, which, in some parts, consists of solid rock. A pier of this construction will answer all the purposes of a shipping quay, and, at the same time, (by affording a free passage for the current of the water through the wooden frames,) no accumulation of mud can take place within the pier-head. The plans and sections of the proposed work are given, and the estimated cost amounts to £8,600." Considerable quantities of pigs, butter, and corn are shipped for Limerick. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. Area of the town, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 956; in 1841, 1,024. Houses 177. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 62; in manufactures and trade, 79; in other pursuits, 52. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 20; on the directing of labour, 84; on their own manual labour, 76; on means not specified, 13.

TARMON (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Donegal and Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises on the north-west side of the mountain Crockinnagoe, near Lough Derg, and flows about 5 miles southward, past the village of Pettigoe, to Lower Lough Erne. The upper and chief part of its course is within the barony of Tyrhugh; and the lower part is on the boundary-line between the two counties.

TARMON, or TERMON, a hamlet, a hill, and a fishing harbour in the parish of Kilmore-Eriss, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaght. The hamlet is a coast-guard station, and is situated at the head of the harbour, on the west side of Blacksod bay, 1½ mile north-east of Blacksod Point, and 7 south by west of Binghamstown. The hill rises immediately west of the hamlet, and has an altitude of 342 feet above the level of the sea. The harbour is reported on as follows by Mr. Nimmo: "Rounding Blacksod Point, or Tarmon, we have a small bight within a spit of stones at the entrance of a sandy bay, where a little landing pier was begun in 1822. The neighbouring shore affords excellent blocks of granite, and thereby gave a temptation to the superintendent of this pier to form the face of the quay in hewn stone; and, as might have been expected, the sum allotted for the purpose was exhausted ere the pier was made of much use. I do not approve of what has been done here; and though this would be a useful place, it as yet only admits boats; and though the work is neatly executed, I am of opinion that the best thing to be done for making it a harbour, would be to take part of it down and rebuild it according to a different plan at the same place, and make more use of the isle or spit; for the present pier being short and with deep water beside it, it would be difficult to render it tolerably quiet without more room for the sea to spend away. There is a shallow bight in the spit well calculated for this, or for keeping boats in, but it has been shut out by the present construction; and the notion of deepening along the pier, which was entertained by Mr. Bald, must be given up on account of the expense. The present jetty, for one hundred and twenty feet, being raised to high-water mark, may stand; and the back of it, fourteen feet wide, walled up with rough stone. The portion between that and the isle is yet only about 6 to 8 feet high, to be taken down and relaid from the extremity of the isle, at an angle about 60 degrees from the present position, and down to low water, firmly paved on the back and end. The inner part of the isle is to be cut away to the same line, and the materials laid across the hollow between the east end of the isle and the main as a rough mole, 21 feet broad at top, sloping three to one to seaward; a rough parapet wall, similar to that at Cleggan, is then to be carried round from the land to the pier head, and the basin excavated as low as possible. It is chiefly bog. Estimate of the expense, £674 10s. This place will then have a tolerable inner harbour of 120 feet square, and clean ground along the outer pier, which may be extended, if thought proper, at any future time. It will be a valuable station for the white fishery. There is a considerable population about Tarmon, and the road is now extended to the pier, which will always be a convenient place for crossing to Achill or Ballycroy."

TARMONBARRY, or TERMONBARRY, a parish 7 miles east by south of Strokestown, and in the barony of North Ballintober, co. Roscommon, Connaght. It contains part of the village of ROOSEKEY: which see. Length, southward, 7 miles; breadth, from 3 to 2½; area, 9,235 acres, 12 perches,—of which 755 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are in the Shannon, and 15 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,048; in 1841, 4,279. Houses 707. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,986. Houses 657. The surface is bounded along the whole of the east by the river Shannon, and its expansion of Lough Forbes; and even in spite of the relief afforded by Castle-Forbes demesne on the Longford bank of the river, it has prevailing a flat, dreary, repulsive appearance,—the whole of it being low, two-thirds of it uncultivated bog, and none of it ornate or good land. The highest ground is in the south-west, and has an altitude of 205 feet above the level of the sea. The small lakes in the interior are two in number, and bear the names of East Loughan and West Loughan. The hamlets are Ballinahohill, Lodgetown, Shanvally, Cuilbeg, Pipers-town, and Tarmonbarry; and the other chief objects of interest are two police barracks, the parish-church, two Roman Catholic chapels, and the bridges across the Shannon at Tarmonbarry and Rooskey. The hamlet of Tarmonbarry stands on the Shannon, near the southern extremity of the parish, on the road from Strokestown to Longford; and in consequence of its being in the immediate vicinity of the villages of Churchtown, Cloondrah, and Richmond Harbour, and of the western terminus of the Royal Canal on the Longford bank of the Shannon, it often gives its name to all these places. See RICHMOND HARBOUR. The hamlet itself had fewer than 20 houses in 1841, but possessed in 1830, eight slated two-story houses, six thatched two-story houses, and seventy-one cabins; yet possibly the latter enumeration included the two neighbouring hamlets of Ballinahohill and Lodgetown. Tarmonbarry lies so far out of the way of the river or canal traffic as not to have participated in the bustle and prosperity of Richmond Harbour. The course of the Shannon from Rooskey to Tarmonbarry, or over the greater part of its connection with the parish, is noticed as follows by Mr. Weld: "Height of the river below Rooskey, 123 feet; height of the river at Lough Forbes, 122 feet; height of the river below Tarmonbarry, 116 feet; total fall, 7 feet. After passing the falls of Rooskey, the current again slackens, and becomes dull and sluggish, whilst at the same time the navigation is impeded in many places by immense quantities of reeds and bulrushes, which spring up from the muddy shoals. The sandstone mountains of Slieve-bawn, and the hills in continuation of the range, appear at the distance of some 4 or 5 miles from the river on the Roscommon side; and at their base lies an extensive tract of bogs elevated several feet above the level of the Shannon. These bogs are separated in part from the water by a narrow ridge of sound land; but after the river has dilated so as to form what is called Lough Forbes, the bogs become the immediate boundary of the lake on the Roscommon side. Nothing can be more dreary than this assemblage of bogs, marshes, reeds, and rushes; but on the Longford side, the monotony of the scene is somewhat broken by the extensive young woods and plantations of Castle Forbes, bordering upon the lough in that direction. The bogs in this district are represented by Mr. Edgeworth as easy to be reclaimed; and there are apparently few parts where planting would be more advantageous, owing to the contiguity of water carriage, either to Dublin or Limerick. As usual, at the shoals of Tarmonbarry, a bridge, or rather two bridges, have been thrown across the river, connected by an island, upon which an elevated causeway has been raised to accord with the level of the bridges." The old bridge on the Roscommon side was 60 yards in length, with seven arches; that on the Longford or Leinster side, 32 yards long with four arches; the causeway extended 34 yards, the whole together forming a straight flat passage of 126 yards in length and 16 feet in width. The arches were all rounded, and nearly of uniform architecture, and between them angular starlings rose to the top of the parapet, where the inner side of each starling was indented, to afford a recess for the convenience of foot-passengers; and altogether the structure had an imposing effect. The commissioners for improving the navigation of the river Shannon have erected a new bridge here, consisting of 6 arches, and a swivel bridge. And the grand-jury of county Longford have replaced the old bridge from Castle-Island to the bank of the river on their side by a new bridge of 3 arches of uniform construction with that erected over the main-stream. This bridge, or rather these two bridges, were thrown open to the public in October 1844. The commissioners are now deepening and widening the river so as to produce an even inclined plain, which will tend to facilitate the discharge of the flood waters. The navigation of the Shannon between the extremes of the Tarmonbarry improvements, passes into the Camlin river, and round the island of Cloondrah. See SHANNON. The Tarmonbarry and Rooskey dispensary is within the Longford Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,264 acres, with a pop. of 13,166; and, in 1830-40, it expended £82 12s. 5d., and administered to 1,892 patients.—The parish of Tarmonbarry is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £228; glebe, £16. Gross income, £244; nett, £201 11s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated at Rooskey, and was built in 1813, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 53. The two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 650 and 300. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39 and the Roman Catholics to 3,889; a Sunday school in the church was usually attended by about 25 scholars; two Sunday schools in the Roman Catholic chapels were usually attended by about 320 scholars; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 10s.—a year from the London Hibernian Society, and £3 3s. from the rector—had on their books 341 boys and 192 girls.

TARTARAGHAN, a parish 34 miles north-north-east of Loughgall, barony of West O'Neill-land, co. Armagh, Ulster. It contains the villages of MACHERY and MILLTOWN: which see. Length, northward, 6 miles,—inclusive of 2 miles in Lough Neagh; extreme breadth, 3½ miles; area, 11,612 acres, 35 perches,—of which 1,917 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches are in Lough Neagh, and 204 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 6,321; in 1841, 7,313. Houses 1,291. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,961. Houses 1,290. The surface is low and flat, consists, in general, of good land, and comprises the terminating part of the peninsula between the rivers Bann and Blackwater,—the former running 1½ mile on the eastern boundary, and the latter 2½ miles on the western boundary. Coney island in Lough Neagh belongs to Tartaraghan. Two lakes—one of them named Anagariff—lie in the western district of the parish. The principal hamlets are Derrycaveagh, Cranagill, Hunt's Corner, Green-Island, and Crow-Hill; and the principal country residences are Mount-Hall, Rosemount-house, Clontylea-house, and Crow-Hill-house,—the two last the seats of respectively E. Obrie, Esq., and J. Atkinson, Esq. An ancient work, called St. Patrick's road, is said to run through Anagariff lake.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 6d.; glebe, £50. Gross income, £326 18s. 6d.; nett, £265 1s. 4d. Patron, successively the diocesan, the Earl of Charlemont, and Charles Brownlow, Esq. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 8d., and has the use of the glebe-house and 10 acres of glebe land. The church was built in 1816, partly by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2d. from the late

Board of First Fruits, and partly by a sum of unrecorded amount raised by subscription. Sittings 450; attendance 430. A quondam Methodist meeting-house is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 160. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 150 in summer, and 100 in winter. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Loughgall. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,700 Churchmen, 359 Presbyterians, 11 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,100 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools in the church and at Teague, Derryarl, and Derryard, were usually attended by about 515 scholars in summer, and 320 in winter; 2 parochial daily schools had on their books 39 boys and 16 girls; and 7 daily schools at Derrylea, Derryagh, Derrykenip, Derryoor, Derryard, Derryard, and Teague, had on their books 239 boys and 140 girls. The parochial boys' school was salaried with £8 a-year from the Society for Discourtenancing Vice, £2 from the rector, and £2 from Mr. Obrie; the parochial girls' school, with £4 from the London Hibernian Society, and subscriptions from the rector and Mr. Obrie; the daily school at Derrylea, with £12 10s. and other advantages from Col. Verner; that at Derryard, with £8 from subscription; that at Teague, with an unreported sum from subscription; and that at Derryard with £7 from the London Hibernian Society, and £5 from Col. Verner. In 1843, a National School at Maghera was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 51 boys and 41 girls.

TASCOFFIN, or TISCOFFIN, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 3½ miles north-north-west of the town of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 6 miles; breadth, from ½ to 1½; area, 4,708 acres, 2 roads, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,283; in 1841, 1,314. Houses 200. The surface is undulated and hilly, yet consists, in general, of good tillage land. A height at the church has an altitude above sea-level of 477 feet; one on the south-west border has an altitude of 464 feet; one immediately beyond the eastern boundary, and within the parish of Gowran, has an altitude of 710 feet; and one immediately beyond the north-western boundary, and within the parishes of Rathcoole and Kilmadum, has an altitude of 1,099 feet. The drainage is effected southward by the Gowran rivulet. The principal hamlets are Freneystown and Castle-Warren; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of Freneystown-castle, the ruins of another castle, the site of Castle-Warren, and the ruins of the old church of Tascoffin. The mail-road from Kilkenny to Dublin passes across the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition and gross income, £185; nett, £156 5s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Borris-o'kane, in the dio. of Killaloe, and is resident in the village of Gowran. The church is situated at Freneystown, and was built in 1796, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, about 18. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Beelie, and has an attendance of 956; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Gowran, and to that of Pitt in the parish of Clara. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 1,281; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 82 boys and 49 girls.

TASHINNY, or TAGSHINNY, a parish 3 miles north-east of Ballymahon, and partly in the barony of Ratheline, but chiefly in that of Abbeyshruel, co. Longford, Leinster. The Abbeyshruel section contains the village of BARRY; which see. Length, westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 2½. Area of the Ratheline section, 409 acres, 3 roads,—of which 6 acres, 3 roads, 32 perches are in the river Inny. Area of the Abbeyshruel section, 4,470 acres, 3 roads, 3 perches,—of which 23 acres, 26 perches are in the river Inny. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,477; in 1841, 2,333. Houses 391. Pop. of the Ratheline section, in 1831, 181; in 1841, 184. Houses 33. Pop. of the rural districts of the Abbeyshruel section, in 1841, 2,024. Houses 338. The surface is low, and consists, for the most part, of good land.

The river Inny traces part of the southern boundary; and the Royal Canal passes along a large portion of the southern border. The village of Barry stands on the western border; the hamlet of Fairfield about ¼ a mile north-north-east of Barry; the hamlet of Tashinny near the centre of the parish; and the hamlet of Colehill, which has a post-office, about ¾ of a mile north-east of Tashinny. The principal seats are Hermitage, Colehill-house, and Doory-hall,—the last the handsome residence of F. Jessop, Esq. The road from Ballymahon to Mullingar passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £210; glebe, £52 4s. The rectories of Tashinny and ABBEYSHRUEL [see that article], constitute the benefice of Tashinny. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 3,708. Gross income, £364 16s. 10d.; nett, £297 9s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at Tashinny, and is an old building. Sittings 300; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 420, and the Roman Catholics to 1,890; the Protestants of the union to 610, and the Roman Catholics to 2,912; 4 daily schools in the parish had on their books 171 boys and 103 girls; and 7 daily schools in the union had on their books 236 boys and 169 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £8 a-year from the Society for Discourtenancing Vice, £4 from the Ardagh Society, and £8 and other advantages worth £4 from Lady Rosse; one was salaried with £20 and other advantages from Mr. William MacCann; one was salaried with £10 and other advantages from Mr. W. MacCann; and one at Doory-hall was supported with £45 and other advantages from Mrs. Jessop. In 1843, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Tenelick.

TASSAGGARD. See SAGGARD.

TATTYMOLE, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Clogher and Donacavey, 3½ miles south-south-west of Fintona, barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It is situated on the margin of the county; and is connected by hill ranges with the great mountain group of both Tyrone and Fermanagh. Its summit has an altitude of 1,031 feet above the level of the sea. The road from Fintona to Enniskillen passes its west base; that from Fintona to Fivemiletown, passes its east base; and a chalybeate well adjoins the former of these roads at its base.

TAUGHBOY. See TAGHBOY.

TAUGHBOYNE, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Raphoe, and of the county of Donegal, and in the vicinity of the liberties of Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the villages of St. JOHNSTOWN and CREAGHDOOS; see these articles. Length, north-east by northward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 15,773 acres, 3 roads, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,345; in 1841, 5,882. Houses 992. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,310. Houses 907. The surface is undulated, and partially hilly; it consists, for the most part, of good land; and it is bounded, for 4 miles along the east, by the river Foyle. The highest ground is situated on the southern border, bears the name of Binnion, and has an altitude above sea-level of 629 feet. The road from Londonderry to Raphoe passes through the interior. The principal hamlets are Carrickmore, Carrigans, and Churchtown; the principal country residence is Foyleview; and the other chief objects of notice are Fedydglass-wood, Mongavlin-castle, and a ferry across the Foyle. Tegh-baoithin was the original or uncorrupted form of the name Taughboyne, and means 'the house of Baithen;' and it is said to have been originally the designation of an ecclesiastical establishment founded here in the latter part of the 6th century, by St. Baithen, the son of Brendon, a disciple and kinsman of St. Colum, and his successor in the superintendence of the great ecclesiastical establishment of Iona in the Hebrides.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £1,569 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £260 6s. 5½d. Gross income, £1,829 11s. 1d.; nett, £1,497 5s. Patron, the Marquis of Abercorn. A curate is employed upon a salary of £80. The ecclesiastical parish of Taughboyne includes also the perpetual curacy of ALL-SAINTS: which see. The church was built in 1626; but the cost is now unknown. Sittings 230; attendance 215. The Presbyterian meeting-houses at St. Johnstown, Monreagh, and Ballylen-nan, have an attendance of respectively 450, 256, and 184. The Presbyterian meeting-house which formerly belonged to the Secession Synod has an attendance of 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Raymohy and All-Saints. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 790 Churchmen, 3,318 Presbyterians, and 2,207 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools at St. Johnstown, Churchtown, Ardach, Moncen, and Castletown, were usually attended by about 339 scholars; and 13 daily schools had on their books 271 boys and 145 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £5 a-year from subscription, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £15 from subscription; one, with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction; and one, with £3 from subscription.

TAUNAGH, or TAWNAGH, a parish in the barony of Tiraghbrill, 5½ miles south-south-east of Collooney, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, north-north-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,234 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches,—of which 15 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches are in Lough Moenaghen. Pop., in 1831, 1,508; in 1841, 1,597. Houses 269. The surface consists, for the most part, of good arable and pasture land; it is traversed lengthwise by the mail-road from Sligo to Dublin; and it is bounded over a brief distance on the east, by the river Ar-ror or Union.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BOYLE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £38 15s. 4½d. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Drum-collam, Ballinakill, and Ballysunagban, are compounded for £158 15s. 4d., and appropriated to the prebend of Kilmacallane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 142, and the Roman Catholics to 1,504; and a hedge-school had on its books 39 boys and 16 girls.

TAVNA, or TAWIN, an island in the parish of Ballinacourty, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies at the head of Galway bay, 3½ miles south by east of Galway, and 4½ south-west of Oranmore. It measures about a mile in length from east to west, and terminates in Kilcolgan Point.

TAWNATREE. See TANDERAGEE.

TAWNANELLY, a Roman Catholic parish in the co. of Donegal, and dio. of Raphoe, Ulster. It has only one chapel; and this is situated in the vicinity of the town of Donegal.

TECOLINE, a parish in the barony of Ballyadams, 4½ miles south-south-east of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,022 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 228; in 1841, 239. Houses 37. The surface consists of excellent land; and is traversed by the road from Stradbally to Carlow. The principal residence is Corbally-house; and the only other noticeable object is the ruin of the old church.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Leighlin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £33 9s. 2½d., and the rectorial for £61 3s. 3½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the representatives of General Eustace and Thomas Fitzgerald, Esq. of Corbally. The vicarages of Tecoline, DYSERTENOS, and KILTEALE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tecoline. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; but Tecoline parish is situated 3½ miles south-east of the nearest part of the other members of the benefice. Pop., in 1831, 2,698. Gross income, £241 0s. 9½d.; nett, £205 19s. 9½d. Patron of Tecoline, the diocesan; of Dysertenos and Kiltale, Lord Carew. The incumbent holds also the prebend of Tecoline in Leighlin cathedral, and the united benefices of Killegney and Chapel in the dio. of Ferns; but he is resident in Tecoline. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is situated in Dysertenos, and has an attendance of 35. The Roman Catholic chapel is also situated in Dysertenos, and has an attendance of 611; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, it is united to the chapels of Straboe and Maryborough. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 231; the Protestants of the union to 157, and the Roman Catholics to 2,523; and a Sunday school and a daily school were the only schools in the union, and were situated in Dysertenos.

TEDANO, a lake in co. Clare. See TADON.

TEDAVNET, TYDAYNET, or TEDONAGH, a parish in the barony and county of Monaghan, Ulster. It contains the villages of BELLANODE and SCOTSTOWN; which see. Length, south-eastward, 8½ miles; extreme breadth, 7; area, 26,302 acres, 3 perches,—of which 163 acres, 12 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 11,352; in 1841, 11,645. Houses 2,067. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 11,220. Houses 1,993. The surface descends from the culminating point of the Slieve-Beagh mountains, on the boundary with the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh, to within half-a-mile of the town of Monaghan; and it comprises every variety of soil, from wild upland and shivering bog to good arable land and warm demesne. The western and northern districts are, to a large extent, identical with a portion of the Slieve-Beagh mountains; and their highest ground has an altitude of 1,254 feet above the level of the sea. See SLIEVE-BEAGH. The north-eastern district is a great tract of dismal bog; and the other districts contain a sufficient supply of turbary. The annual rent of land per acre, varies from 15s to 50s. A principal head-stream of the river Blackwater issues from the loughlet Calluane, on the boundary with Tyrone, about a mile east of the summit of Slieve-Beagh proper; and runs south-eastward through the interior of nearly the greatest length of the parish. The chief of about 19 lakes within the limits are Loughs Meenish, Mullaghmore, North Mullaghinishigo, South Mullaghinishigo, Carrowhatta, Shee-trim, Lamb, and Slack's-Grove. The principal residences are Mount Louise, Clannamully, Slack's-Grove, Killater, Poplar-Vale, New-Grove, Drum-reask, Raconnell, Clontoe, Carrachor-house, and Gola. The roads from Monaghan to respectively Clogher and Brookborough pass through the interior; and the hamlet of Tedavnet, the site of the old church and of the Roman Catholic chapel, stands on the former of these roads, 3½ miles north-north-west of Monaghan. In 1843, the Tedavnet loan fund had a capital of £1,446, circulated £5,367 in 1,743 loans, realized a nett profit of 10s. 9d., expended for charitable purposes £9, and had 18 depositors or proprietors of its capital.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £664 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £80. Gross income, £744 12s. 3½d.; nett, £623 9s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £15. The church is of unknown date and cost, and was enlarged in 1830, by means of a loan of £471 1s. 5d., repayable by 5 annual instalments to be levied off the parish. Sittings 700; attendance 630. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 450. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,966 Churchmen, 993 Presbyterians, and 8,373 Roman Catholics; and 14 daily schools had on their books 883 boys and 465 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £3 12s. a-year from subscription; one, with £20 from the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society; one, with £8 from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and £5 and other advantages from subscription; two with advantages of unreported value from subscription; one, with £1 10s. from subscription; one, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £5 and other advantages from subscription; one, with £8 from the National Board, and £2 from subscription; and one, with £15 from the National Board, and £23 from subscription. In 1843, two National schools at Kpockattallen were salaried with respectively £12 and £8 from the Board, and had on their books 62 boys and 61 girls; one at Cornagilla, with £10 13s. 4d., and had 77 boys; one at Killeearname, with £15, and had 66 boys and 27 girls; one at Tedavnet, with £15, and had 88 boys and 42 girls; one at Tallycrummin, with £12, and had 52 boys and 31 girls; one at Ballybaaney, with £8, and had 78 boys and 58 girls; and one at Urble-shaney, with £10, and had 76 boys and 40 girls.

TEELIN, a small estuarial harbour on the mutual boundary of the parishes of Glencar and Glencollumbkill, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It opens 1½ mile east of Carrigan Head, and penetrates the land about 1½ mile northward, but has a very inconsiderable width, and is properly the estuary of a rivulet called the Glen river. It is wilder and more picturesque than the harbour of Killybegs, and can be approached from the east only by a precipitous descent which is very imposing in appearance, and is quite impracticable for either vehicle or horse. A small hamlet of the name of Teelin is situated near the head of the bay; a coast-guard station is situated near the west side of the entrance; and the village of GLENCAR [which see] is situated about 1½ mile to the east.

TEELIN-HEAD, a sublime cape in the parish of Glencollumbkill, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is the most south-westerly or seaward portion of the series of magnificent cliffs which commences at Carrigan Head, and sweeps round the greater part of the coast of Glencollumbkill, and which will be found noticed in our article on SLIEVE-LEAGUE: which see.

TEHALLON, TYHALLON, or TEHOLLAND, a parish, 2½ miles north-east by east of Monaghan, and partly in the barony of Crenmore, but chiefly in that of Monaghan, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Crenmore section, 823 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches; of the barony of Monaghan section, 5,126 acres, 1 rood. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,846; in 1841, 4,630. Houses 837. Pop. of the barony of Monaghan section, in 1831, 4,047; in 1841, 3,806. Houses 680. The land is of excellent quality. The Ulster Canal and the road from Monaghan to Armagh pass through the interior; and the river Blackwater flows along the north-western and the northern boundary. The principal residences are Dromore-house, Sallymount, Liscurty, and Killymeill-house; and the only other noticeable objects are a police station and the appliances of the linen manufacture. "St. Killian," says Archdall, "was bishop of Tegalain or Teachally in Orgiella; and his festival is holden on the 27th of May."—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £350; glebe, £80. Gross income, £430; nett, £377 9s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1788, by means of a sum of £276 18s. 5½d. raised from parochial assessment. Sittings 160; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 506 Churchmen, 300 Presbyterians, and 3,993 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools had on their books 291 boys and 97 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £11 4s. a-year and other advantages from subscription; one, with £1 from subscription; one, with £12 from the National Board; and one, with £10 from subscription. In 1843, a National school at Leitrim was salaried with £23 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 107 boys and 102 girls; one at Lappan with £15, and had 73 boys and 52 girls; and one at Feedoo, with £10 13s. 4d., and had 86 boys and 63 girls.

TEIGHSASSON, TISAXON, TISABRON, or TAX-AX, a parish in the barony of Kinsale, 2½ miles west-north-west of the town of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Length, south-south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1 mile; area, 1,347 acres. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 535, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 515; in 1841, 498. Houses 75. The surface extends along the left bank of the Bandon river, and is traversed by the road from Kinsale to Bandon. The land is, for the most part, of prime quality, and is chiefly disposed in pasturage. The principal residence is Ballywilliam.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition and gross income, £105; nett, £99 18s. 6d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the chaplaincy of Trinity chapel, Conduct-street, and the curacy of the Irish Episcopal chapel at St. Giles, in the city and dio. of London, and is resident in London. In 1834, the parishioners, with two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEIGHSHINOD, TAGHSHENOD, or TAUGHSHYNOD, a parish, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Ballymahon, and partly in the barony of Abbeyshrule, but chiefly in that of Moydoo, co. Longford, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2. Area of the Abbeyshrule section, 221 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches; of the Moydoo section, 5,491 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,553; in 1841, 2,533. Houses 428. Pop. of the Moydoo section, in 1831, 2,490; in 1841, 2,445. Houses 412. The land is, for the most part, good; and it lets, on the average, for 30s. per plantation acre per annum. The principal residences are Loughan-house and Richmond-hill; and the other chief objects of interest are the hamlet of Teighshinod, a Roman Catholic chapel, a constabulary station, and a loughlet of the name of Murren. The road from Ballymahon to Edgeworthstown passes across the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MOYDOO [which see], in the dio. of Ardlagh. Tithe composition, £182 15s. 5d.; glebe, £42 15s. 10d. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £32 5s. 9½d., is inappropriate in Messrs. Ponsonby and Palliser. The Roman Catholic chapel is under the care of two officiates, and has an attendance of 900. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 195, and the Roman Catholics to 2,341; and 2 daily schools—one of which was aided from a fund at the disposal of the rector—had on their books 67 boys and 40 girls.

TELLEROUGHT, or TELERATH. See TALLERAGHT.

TELLTOWN, TAILTEAN, or KILLALTON, a parish in the barony of Upper Kells, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by east of the town of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,266 acres, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,308; in 1841, 1,613. Houses 259. The surface, excepting a small district in the extreme north, consists of good land; and it is drained by the river Blackwater, and traversed by the road, from Kells to Navan. The principal hamlet is Horan's-cross; the principal seats are Hurdlestown-house, and Telltown-house; and the other chief objects of interest are a police station, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The statistics of Ardraacan in Mason's Statistical Survey, noticing a patron held at Telltown, and a fond tradition respecting the ancient dignity of the place, say, "It is said that Telltown, situated on the other side of the Blackwater, immediately opposite Martry, the place at which the patron is held, was the royal residence of a long line indeed of Irish princes, and a celebrated mart frequented by merchants, and other persons distinguished for excellence in personal or mental endowments; even the Irish fair condescended to display their captivating charms. At this renowned emporium, games similar to the Olympian, were held for fifteen days before and fifteen days after the first of August, and young persons were given in marriage. Taking this account to be true, it is probable, the present patron may be a continuation of this ancient custom; but this is a conjecture, hazarded merely for the consideration of those who have leisure, opportunity, and genius, to prosecute such inquiries."—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Meath; but is attached to the benefice of Donaghpatrick. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Orristown, and has an attendance of 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, it is united to the chapel of Kilberry. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 1,306; and two daily schools—one of which at Orristown was salaried with £16 a year from local subscription—had on their books 150 boys and 72 girls.

TEMPLEACHALLY. See TEMPLEKILLY.

TEMPLEADIGAN. See TEMPLEUDIGAN.

TEMPLEBEG, a parish in the barony of Upper Kilmennagh, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Borris-o'-leagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,427 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 1,221 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch form a detached district of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile by $1\frac{1}{2}$, situated $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the west. Pop., in 1831, 1,064; in 1841, 1,207. Houses 188. The main body or eastern district is watered by the Owenbeg river; and has an elevation of 565 feet above sea-level, at the point at which it is first touched by that stream. The detached or western district contains a police barrack and a Roman Catholic chapel, is traversed by the Anglesey road, and is washed by the Bilboa rivulet, from an elevation of 716 to one of less than 640 feet above sea-level.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Cashel. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Toom. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 1,116; and there was neither church nor school.

TEMPLEBODANE, or TEMPLEBODAN, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 5 miles south-east by south of Rathcormack, co. Cork, Munster. Length, eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,736. Pop., in 1831, 1,337; in 1841, 1,583. Houses 250. The surface has a southern exposure, shakes down the head-streams of the Middleton river, and is traversed by the road from Fermoy to Middleton, and by that from Rathcormack to Castle-Martyr. The land, in general, produces good crops of potatoes, oats, and barley. A conspicuous feature is the demesne of Cahirdogan.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £174 3s. 8d.; glebe, £10 14s. 6d. Gross income, £184 18s. 2d.; nett, £167 19s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £174 3s. 8½d.; and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Christ-church. The vicar is non-resident; and a curate is employed upon a salary of £37 10s. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 5. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 1,383; and a pay daily school had on its books 30 boys and 10 girls.

TEMPLEBOY, a parish in the barony of Tyerragh, 2 miles east by south of Dunmore-West, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, north by eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 9,112 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 384 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches lie detached on the coast, nearly a mile to the west. Pop., in 1831, 3,787; in 1841, 3,912. Houses 661. The parish is broadest near the coast; and it thence ascends the skirts and acclivities of the Ox mountains, gradually diminishing in breadth, and terminating in a point on the summit-line of the mountains. The whole of the southern district is mountainous, and either waste or wildly pastoral; and a summit a little beyond the eastern boundary, and near the southern extremity, has an altitude of 1,778 feet above the level of the sea. The central district is mixedly moorish, boggy, and arable; but, on the whole, is repulsive and of small value. The northern or sea-board district possesses a large aggregate of good arable land; and is embellished with the demesnes of Seaview and Corkhill, and enlivened with the hamlet of Aughris, the coast-guard station of Polbrian, several fishing stations, and the transit of the mail-road from Sligo to Bullina. The coast presents the conspicuous features of Anghris Head and Dunmorran Strand [see AUGHRIS]; and is pre-eminently bluff, rocky, and picturesque.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMACSHALGAN [which see], in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £210, and the rectorial for £350; and the latter are inappropriate in Robert William Illias, Esq. of Dublin. But a large denomination of land in the parish, belonging to Mr. Cooper of Marino-castle, is tithe-free. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 338, and the Roman Catholics to 3,622; and 5 hedge-schools had on their books 185 boys and 97 girls. In 1843, a National School at Lugdooon had on its books 57 boys and 26 girls.

TEMPLEBREADY. ST. MATTHEW, ST. BRIDGET, or TEMPLEBRIDGET, a parish in the barony of Kerrycurryhy, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Passage, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of CROSSHAVEN: which see. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 2,654 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,789; in 1841, 1,613. Houses 288. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 689; in 1841, 1,099. Houses 184. The surface comprises all the extreme part of the peninsula between the Annabuooy river on the north and the entrance to Cork Harbour on the east; it is diversified in character and outline, and both contributes and commands fine features of scenery; and, as to soil, it is light and middle-rate, and, for the most part, produces but indifferent crops. Camden Point forms the termination of the peninsula; and Camden fort, jointly with Carlisle fort on the opposite shore, commands the entrance of Cork Harbour. The parochial church, situated at Crosshaven, surmounts a high ridge, sends aloft a spire, and, being whitewashed and conspicuous, forms a landmark to mariners, and a curious feature to all observers. Hoddersfield, the beautifully situated residence of the Hodder family, occupies high ground on the shores of the Annabuooy estuary. Crosshaven-house and several other villas are situated in the vicinity of Crosshaven village. The heights at Camden fort, and elsewhere on the shore of the entrance of Cork Harbour, command interesting views of the eastern headlands, and a brilliant sweep of the coast and sea-board of Imokilly. Drake's Pool, a little above Crosshaven, was the scene of a curious naval incident in the year 1587. See ANNABUOY.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition belonging to the perpetual curate, £39 12s. 10d.; glebe, £11 8s. Gross income, £74 2s. 10d.; nett, £70 17s. 4½d. Patron, the dean of Cork. All the tithes, excepting those belonging to the perpetual curate, are appropriated to the deanery of Cork. The church was built about 87 years ago.ittings 140; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmoney, in the perpetual curacy of Tracton. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 101, and the Roman Catholics to 1,733; and 2 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 98 scholars.

TEMPLEBREDIN, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Emly, and partly in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, partly in the barony of Coonagh, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Tipperary section, 1,046 acres, 2 roads, 29 perches; of the Limerick section, 1,408 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 1,506, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,353; in 1841, 1,457. Houses 208. Pop. of the Limerick section, in 1831, 829; in 1841, 992. Houses 148. The surface consists of excellent arable and pasture land; and is traversed by the road from Emly to Pallasgreen. Within the Tipperary section are the ruins of Killeenacalline abbey.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £124 10s.; nett, £110 11s. Patron, the Earl of Kenmare. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £18; and are inappropriate, and reputed to belong to Mr. Massie. The incumbent holds also the perpetual curacy of Kileoleman, and the adjoining benefice of Killanear, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe; and is non-resident in Templebredin. A curate receives £5 a-year for performing the occasional duties. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Grean. In 1834, all the parishioners, with two exceptions, were Roman Catholics; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 110 boys and 74 girls.

TEMPLEBRICK, a small mineral field, in the portion of the barony of Decies-without-Drum which belonged till recently to the barony of Uppertird, co. Waterford, Munster. Veins of copper ore are known to exist here; but they have not yet been worked.

TEMPLEBRIDGET. See TEMPLEBREADY.

TEMPLEBRIEN, or TEMPLEBRYAN, a parish in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,189 acres. Pop., in 1831, 496; in 1841, 776. Houses 137. The land is tolerably good. "On the lands of Templebrien," says Mr. Brewer, "are some remains of antiquity, which exhibit, in a very curious and decisive manner, the readiness with which the early teachers of Christianity profited by the prevailing notions of sanctity attached to Pagan temples and erections, in their endeavours to divert the superstition of an ignorant people into channels favourable to the reception of a more rational faith. In our notice of those vestiges we are indebted, for many particulars, to the investigations of Mr. Townsend, whose opportunities, and diligence of research, have enabled him to correct several errors in the accounts published by Smith and Ledwich. The more ancient and pagan parts of these remains consist of a circle of upright stones; a single pillar-stone, which had formerly four subordinate stones in its contiguity, one of which is still to be seen; and a cave of considerable extent. These, with the exception of the stony circle, are now intermingled with the arrangements of a very old and decayed place of Christian worship; and the description will be more clear, if commenced with a notice of the ruined church. The church at Templebrien was evidently of very small dimensions, and, in the greater part, built without the use of lime, or other cement. It was placed in a small quadrangular enclosure; and at the distance of a few paces from its northern side, stands a single pillar of stone, from 14 to 15 feet in length, nearly five feet being beneath the present surface of the ground. It is, according to a measurement made by Mr. Townsend, about four feet in circumference, at the bottom, and tapers gradually in rising, approaching almost to a point at the summit. The form is quadrilateral but it has been rounded off at the angles; and there were formerly four stones, indented in such a manner as to fit exactly the four corners of the pillar. One of them is still remaining; and on one of its sides is the rude form of a cross, superadded by Christian piety. Mr. Townsend considers it to be doubtful whether this stone were really erected by persons practising what is commonly called the Druidical form of religion, as it bears, in the rounding of its angles, evident marks of the tool. But it is well known that the tool was used in parts of Stonehenge, and was, indeed, frequently employed in works rationally attributed to the Belgæ, in the latter and degenerated times of Druidism. In many instances, the cross is seen rudely engraved upon pillars, which, from situation and character, were manifestly erected in pagan ages. The quadrangular area, within which the church stands, is merely a central spot in a large oblong enclosure, containing about 4 acres. The whole of this enclosure was once surrounded by a wide ditch, of which some part is still remaining. 'On the north side,' observes Mr. Townsend, 'is a cave running from east to west, the sides being supported by walls and covered over with coarse slates, or flags, which are so near the surface as to be sometimes disturbed by the plough. As far as one can see, it appears to be low and narrow. Human bones are often found within the area of this singular enclosure.' Distant from the church about 400 yards, towards the south, is a circle of large stones, 30 feet in diameter. When the Bishop of Clogher visited this spot, in 1742, the remaining stones of the circle were 9 in number; but only 6 were left when Smith wrote his account of Cork, about 1748. No more than 5 now retain an upright position, besides a central stone, round and composed of white quartz, which is at present nearly hidden by a fence that divides the circle. The stones in the ring are dissimilar in size and form, but have uniformly a flat side towards the centre. It is observable that the neighbouring country people, who entertain much reverence for the ruined church, have no traditional respect for the vestiges of this circular temple.—Templebrien parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILNACROSS [which see], in the dio. of Ross. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £80, and the rectorial for £74 13s. 11d.; and the latter are appropriated to the see of Ross. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 401; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEMPLECARNAN. See TEMPLEKIERAN.

TEMPLECARNÉ, a parish, partly in the barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, and partly in the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The Donegal section contains part of the town of PETTIGOE; which see. Length of the mainland of the Fermanagh section, westward, 2½ miles; breadth, from ¼ to 2. Length of the whole of the Fermanagh section, westward, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,719 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches,—of which 4,399 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are in Lower Lough Erne, and 13 acres, 36 perches are in small lakes. Length of the Donegal section, south-westward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 6; area, 38,149 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches,—of which 2,140 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in Lough Derg, 1,072 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches are in small lakes, and 1 acre, 22 perches are in Lower Lough Erne. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,461; in 1841, 5,934. Houses 1,015. Pop. of the Fermanagh section, in 1831, 1,068; in 1841, 1,172. Houses 214. Pop. of the rural districts of the Donegal section, in 1841, 4,272. Houses 730. The Fermanagh section comprises 3½ miles of the shore of Lower

Lough Erne, south-westward from the foot of the Tarnon river, the western half of the large island of Boa, and the whole of the isles and islets of Lusty-more, Purgatory, Inniskearagh, Innismeeley, Innisturk, Long-Rock, Round Island, and Shallow Island; and it contains also Muckcross wood, a small quay, the hamlet of Waterfoot, and part of the lake of Loughawaddy. See ERNE and BOA. The Donegal section touches Lough Erne at the mouth of the rivulet Tarnon; is bounded partly by that rivulet on the east and partly by the river Derg on the north; and contains part of the picturesque district of the Pallans, the whole of the waters and islets of Lough Derg, part of the little lakes of Nearty, Allowney, Accapple, Lower Garlaghmore, Glaskeeragh, Nasmuttan, Natragh, Nosechoge, Afue, Barderg, and Golagh, and the whole of the little lakes of Dunragh, Middle Dunragh, Unan, Fad, Nasoogran, Illbooragh, Naskeagh, Bannus, Kip, Avehy, Nannamarve, Vennagreane, and Nageage. See DERG, PULLANS, and TARNON. Several considerable mountains diversify the surface; the chief of which are Crookmahunny, Minchifin, Knocken, and Rosharbour. "The face of the country here," remarks Mason's statist, "is wildly romantic and picturesque, and if well planted would be extremely beautiful. The whole road, indeed, from Pettigoe to Rosharbour, in the direction of Belleek, presents one of the most delightful views that can be imagined. Surrounded by woods on one hand, and hedged by Lough Erne on the other, whose broad expanse is interspersed as far as the eye can reach with innumerable islets, having in front a view of Castle Caldwell, and the rising fane of Belleek church, with the distant mountains in the background, arrayed in purple blue; the whole presents to the astonished stranger as grand a coup d'œil as is perhaps to be met with at the far celebrated Killarney." Only about one-sixth of the whole land in the parish can be used for tillage; and the greater part of the enormous remainder is so upland, moorish, and heathy, as to be of no other service than for coarse summer pasture to black cattle. Both the glebe-house and Waterfoot-house—the latter the seat of Col. Barton, the proprietor of Boa Island—are beautifully situated. The interior streams of the parish are the rivulets Omna, Rosharbour, and Letter; and these streams, as well as the Derg, the Tarnon, Lough Erne, Lough Derg, and all the mountain lakes, abound with trout, pike, eels, perch, and other fish. The woods of Muckcross and Tawnawaxny are the chief yet comparatively small remains of forests which anciently mantled most of the parish. Iron mines were formerly worked; but, in consequence of the exhaustion of timber, they were abandoned. Chalybeate and sulphureous springs are numerous. Large quarries exist of very fine millstones; very good quarries are worked of sandstone; a species of coarse dark marble is raised; and very plentiful supplies of limestone are found. Turbaries are so numerous and so generally diffused, that no fears can be apprehended of any failure, for many years to come, in the local supply of fuel. The shell of an old castle stands near the glebe-house, about a mile south-west of Pettigoe; it is said to have been the residence of the first bishop of Clogher, and takes from him the name of Castle-Magragh; and it was battered by the parliamentary army in the time of Cromwell. See TARNONMAGRATH. The remains of the original parish-church, or of a building which succeeded the original one, stand within the precincts of a burying-ground on the townland of Carne; and the position of the church in that townland seems to have originated the name of Templecarne. Several Danish forts occur; but none of unusual character. The road from Ballyshannon to Strabane passes through the interior of the parish. The Templecarne dispensary is within the Donegal Poor-law union; and in 1839-40, it expended £106 7s. 8d., and administered to 1,157 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £176 16s. 8d. Gross income, £476 16s. 8d.; nett, £389 6s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £60 4s. 7d. The church which was recently in use was built in 1749, at a cost or with means now unknown; and it had 300 sittings. The present church was recently erected by means of contributions of £1,525 4s. 2d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £534 7s. 10d. from other sources; and it has 1,000 sittings. Attendance at the previous church, in 1834, 290. A schoolhouse was also used as a parochial place of worship in 1834, and had an attendance of 40. The Roman Catholic chapels at Pettigoe and Lettercarne have an attendance of respectively 700 and 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are united to the chapel of Belleek. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,545 Churchmen, 141 Presbyterians, and 2,092 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools at Pettigoe, Grouse-lodge, Durnawick, Townavenny, and Boa Island were usually attended by about 202 scholars; the parochial daily school had on its books 52 boys and 10 girls; and 8 daily schools at Carden, Drumourgue, Tullylark, Mellalt, Townavenny, Crilleagh, Ballymaegorney, and Kishalinney, had on their books 418 boys and 235 girls. The parochial daily school was salaried with £4 a-year from the rector; the daily schools at Carden and Tullylark, with each £3 from subscription, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; that at Drumourgue, with £3 from subscription; and that at Townavenny, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society. In 1843, one National school at Boa Island had on its books 34 boys and 11 girls; and one at Townavenny had 53 boys and 52 girls.

TEMPLECORRAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Belfast, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the village of BALLYCARRY: which see. Length, south-south-eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,744 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,338; in 1841, 1,428. Houses 250. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,192. Houses 208. The surface is bounded wholly on the south by Belfast Lough, and partly on the east by Lough Larne; it consists of land which is very suitable for tillage, and is very productive in meadow and pasture; and it is traversed by the roads from Carrickfergus to Island Magee and Larne. White Head, which sometimes successfully vies with Black Head farther seaward, the nominal honour of marking the south side of the entrance of Belfast Lough, is on the south; Castle Chichester and Slaughter-bridge are on the east; Red-Hall, the seat of G. Kerr, Esq., commanding a noble sea-view, is in the north; and a curious subterranean stream makes its dive into the bowels of the earth a little beyond Red-Hall. "The ingress of this stream," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "takes place in a small circular pit, about 40 yards in diameter at the mouth, gradually diminishing in breadth as you descend, at the very lowest and central point of which the stream enters, and is seen no more: this very curious natural basin is called the 'Salt Hole.' It was here that Sir John Chichester the younger was slain, the 4th November, 1597; he was governor of Carrickfergus at this time, when James M'Sorley M'Donnell, (afterwards Earl of Antrim,) having corecled

a strong detachment of Highlanders in the Salt Hole, advanced with but a small body towards Carrickfergus, and, braving the garrison, Sir John was induced to sally out against him. M'Donnell pretended to fly in the greatest confusion, nor halted till he reached the place of ambuscade, when turning upon Sir John, who was now attacked by the Highlanders lying in ambush, he defeated his party, and took him prisoner shortly after: M'Sorley cut off Sir John's head upon a stone at the entrance of the Glynn. Here, also, in the same year, another engagement took place between the M'Quillans and M'Donnells, in which the ill-fated M'Quillans were defeated with great slaughter." The ancient church of Templecorran, now an unroofed ruin, and situated at the village of Ballycarry, is an interesting object. In the cemetery of the church is a tombstone to the memory of the Rev. Edward Bryce, who planted at Ballycarry in 1613 the first Presbyterian congregation in Ireland, and was minister of it till his death in 1636. The tombstone records that he had two sons, that one of these acquired a considerable property, and that the son of this one died member of parliament for Lisburn in 1697. A second tombstone summarily records the history of the Bryces, now called Bruces, down to the present century. A curious fact is, that the Rev. Edward Bryce's successors in the pastoral charge of the Presbyterian congregation at Ballycarry, from 1636 till after 1836, or upwards of two centuries, were only four in number, the average duration of the ministry of each being a little upwards of 50 years. The church of Templecorran is remarkable for having been the church of the first benefice to which Jonathan Swift, afterwards Dean Swift, was appointed,—the prebendal benefice of Kilroot. Swift was presented to this benefice by Lord Capel, the Lord-deputy of Ireland; but found the possession of it so incompatible with his tastes and indulgences, that he speedily resigned it in the behalf of a friend. "Swift's life at Kilroot, so different from that which he had led with Sir William Temple, where he shared the society of all that were ennobled either by genius or birth," says Sir Walter Scott, "soon became insipid. In the meanwhile, Temple, who had learned by the loss of Swift his real value, became solicitous that he should return to Moorpark. While Swift hesitated between relinquishing the mode of life which he had chosen, and returning to that which he had relinquished, his resolution appears to have been determined by a circumstance highly characteristic of his exalted benevolence. In an excursion from his habitation, he met a clergyman, with whom he formed an acquaintance, which proved him to be learned, modest, well-principled, the father of eight children, and a curate at the rate of £40 a-year. Without explaining his purpose, Swift borrowed this gentleman's black mare, having no horse of his own, rode to Dublin, resigned the prebendary of Kilroot, and obtained a grant of it for this new friend. When he gave the presentation to the poor clergyman, he kept his eye steadily fixed on the old man's face, which, at first, only expressed pleasure at finding himself preferred to a living; but when he found that it was that of his benefactor who had resigned in his favour, his joy assumed so touching an expression of surprise and gratitude, that Swift, himself deeply affected, declared he had never experienced so much pleasure as at that moment. The poor clergyman, at Swift's departure, pressed upon him the black mare, which he did not choose to hurt him by refusing; and thus mounted for the first time on a horse of his own, with fourscore pounds in his purse, Swift again embarked for England, and resumed his situation at Moorpark, as Sir William Temple's confidential secretary."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Kilroot or Ballinure [see BALLINURE], in the dio. of Connor. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £115 13s. 10d., and the rectorial for £231 7s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate in D. Kerr, Esq., the proprietor of the parish, and mixed up with the rent of his lands. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 240 to 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1 Churchman, 1,373 Presbyterians, 9 other Protestant dissenters, and 22 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—each of two of which was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and one of these two with £4 from the interest of a legacy—had on their books 74 boys and 55 girls.

TEMPLECRONE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Boyle, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the town of DUNGOLO: which see. Length, southward, 10½ miles; breadth, exclusive of islands, 8½; area, 52,921 acres,—of which 4,353 acres, 37 perches are in the island of Arran, and 989 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches are tideway of the river Guidore. Pop., in 1831, 8,198; in 1841, 9,842. Houses 1,718. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,393. Houses 1,640. The mainland district extends southward from Guidore bay to Traweragh bay, and is identical, over all the north and the centre, with the wild and unique tract of country called the ROSSIES: which see. The southern part of this district possesses, on the whole, both more amenities and more lofty uplands than the Rosses; and yet it exhibits a considerable resemblance to that tract, particularly in destitution of wood, in wildness of surface, in poverty of soil, in profusion of loughlets, and in intersection with bays of the sea and impervious pieces of land. The highest ground in the north. Anagarry hill, has an altitude above sea-level of 338 feet; and the highest in the south, Croochy mountain, has an altitude of 1,033 feet. The Guidore river flows along part of the western and the whole of the north-western boundary. The principal lakes are Loughs Fadda, Fad, Mullaghderg, Fern, Connell, Naglagagary, Trusk, Nafullanronny, Anura, Mumaddy, Waskel, Meenbannad, Dunglo, Meelagh, Lackmore, Crombane, Adreen, Croghy, Namuck, Meenleckualore, Nageenagh, Illan, Aleckmore, Salt, Aghnish, Maghera, Fuburry, Connyvegle, Anillanowenamarve, Nanurragh, Nanuaragh, Carnben, and Allar. The chief features of the coast are the bays of Innisfree and Maghera, the headland of Mullaghderg, the hamlet of Maghera, and the strand of Cruit. See MAGHERA, MULLAGHDERG, and INNISFREE. The principal islands belonging to the parish are ARRAN, RUTLAND, CRUIT, INNISFREE [which see], INNISKEERAGH, INNISHINY, OWEY, LACHAN, EIGHTER, ILLANCRONE, INNISCHEANE, and INNISHALL. Roads radiate from Dunglo toward respectively Stranorlar, Glenties, Maghera, Rutland, Mullaghderg, and Dunfalanagh; but only the first and the second are good. The Templecrone dispensary is within the Glenties Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 52,921 acres, with a pop. of 8,198; and, in 1839-40, it expended £154 5s. 2d., and administered to 1,736 patients.—Templecrone parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £235; glebe, £152 16s. 2d. Gross income, £387 16s. 3d.; nett, £348 4s. 3d. Patron, the Marquis of Conyngham. The incumbent holds also the benefice and prebend of Inver, in the dio. of Raphoe, and is non-resident in Templecrone. A curate is employed upon a salary of £90. The church is situated at Dunglo, and was built in 1700, by means of a gift of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 60. The Dunglo Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Letternacaward. The Bellerath and Arran Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,100 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 554, and the Roman Catholics to 8,137; and 10 daily schools at Dunglo, Carrenbuoy, Dunglo, Rutland, Ranafaret, Tubberakeen, Maghera, Cloghabillioo, Cruit, and Bellerath, had on their books 197 boys and 80 girls. One of the schools at Dunglo was salaried with £5 10s. 8d. a-year from Robinson's fund, and £1 10s. from the rector; the other at Dunglo, with £1 10s. from the rector; that at Carrenbuoy, with £5 10s. 9d. from Robinson's fund, and £2 from the rector; and that at Maghera, with £1 from the rector. In 1843, a National school at Dunglo had on its books 46 boys and 27 girls.

TEMPLEDERRY, a parish in the barony of Upper Ormond, 6½ miles south-east of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, north-east by eastward, 5½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2; area, 6,998 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,857; in 1841, 2,032. Houses 301. The southern and the central districts are part of the Keeper congeries of mountains, poor in soil, and of small value; and the northern district, comprising about one-third of the whole area, is good arable and pasture land, yet lies on a mean basis of upwards of 400 feet above sea-level. Much of the northern district is part of a rich valley, beautifully encrested with pleasant heights, and much embellished with the demesne of Castle-Otway, the romantic residence of the Hon. Robert Otway Cave. Knocknasragan mountain, in the south, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,296 feet; and a height on the boundary, nearly ½ mile north-east of Knocknasragan, has an altitude of 1,218 feet. A stream on the south-east boundary flows there from an elevation of 908 to one of 588 feet above sea-level; a stream on the south-west boundary flows there from an elevation of 958 feet; and the stream which flows along the valley in the north, has, about the middle of that valley, an elevation of 437 feet. The seats additional to Castle-Otway are Hud's-grove, Riverfield-house, and Outfield-house; and the other chief objects of interest are a police barrack, a fair green, and the site of Clongonnacastle. The Anglesey road passes across the southern extremity.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £157 9s. 3½d.; glebe, £50 6s. Gross income, £207 15s. 3½d.; nett, £160 5s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in the north, is of unknown date, and was repaired and enlarged in 1825, by means of a loan of £623 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, about 80. The Templederry and Careeny Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 850 and from 300 to 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Killaneaf. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 109 Churchmen, 9 Protestant dissenters, and 1,823 Roman Catholics; and 6 pay daily schools had on their books 189 boys and 129 girls.

TEMPLEDOWNEY, a parish in the vicinity of Toomavara, barony of Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It consists of two mutually detached districts, lying 5 furlongs asunder, the larger one north of Toomavara, and the smaller one south of that place. Length of the northern district, south-westward, ½ mile; breadth, from ½ to 1½. Length of the southern district, westward, 1 mile; extreme breadth, ½. Area of the whole, 1,850 acres, 4 perches; of the southern district, 922 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 475; in 1841, 552. Houses 97. Some of the land is good; but most of it is light. The northern district contains the seats of Pallas-house and Knockane-house, and the ruins of a castle; and the southern district contains the seat of Garra, and is traversed by the road from Toomavara to Silvermines. —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYMARRY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £83 1s. 6½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 464; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEMPLE-ERRY, or TEMPLEREE, a parish in the barony of Ikerrin, immediately east of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,241 acres, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,415; in 1841, 1,612. Houses 242. The northern and north-eastern districts are bog, and the other districts consist partly of bog, but chiefly of good land. A stream which flows on the eastern boundary has there an elevation of 386 feet above the level of the sea; and the river Suir traces the whole of the western boundary; and, about 1½ mile before coming into contact with it, has an elevation of 379 feet. The principal objects of any interest are the hamlet of Strogue, the seat of Castle-Eeny, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the ruins of two old castles. The roads from Templemore to respectively Templemoishy and Dublin pass through the interior. —This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £207 13s. 10½d.; nett, £156 1s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the chaplaincy of the military station of Templemore. Till 1835, the rectory of Temple-Ery formed part of the benefice of Templemore; and it has no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Loughmoel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,430; and a pay daily school had on its books 57 boys and 20 girls.

TEMPLE-ETNY. See TEMPLETHAY.

TEMPLE-EUNNA, a ruined old church, 3 miles east-south-east of Ballyeroy ferry, parish of Kilearnon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. Adjacent to it are Temple-Eunna burying-ground, and the well called Tobber-Eunna.

TEMPLEFINLAGAN. See TANLAGHTINLAGAN.

TEMPLEGAILE, TEMPLEVALLY, or TEACHSAXON, an old friary in the parish of Monivea, barony of Tyaquin, 3 miles north-north-east of Athenry, co. Galway, Connaught. "A friary of small extent," says Archdall, "was founded here in the time of King Henry VII. by one of the family of Burgh, for Franciscans of the Third Order; which friary and its appurtenances, together with the abbey of Mayo, were afterwards granted to the Burgesses and Commonalty of Athenry. Templemoyle, another friary, was erected here some time after the year 1441, for friars of the Third Order of St. Francis, which was granted to Edmund Barret." The ruins of Templemoyle stand about 5 furlongs south-east of those of Templegaile.

TEMPLEGALL. See WHITECHURCH.

TEMPLEGOWRAN, or TEMPLEGARIN, a quondam chapelry in the parish and lordship of Newry, 3 miles east of the town of Newry, co. Down, Ulster. The grave-yard still exists, adjacent to the road from Newry to Hilltown; and in its vicinity are a Roman Catholic chapel, Derrykeagh lake, and the seats of Bonagh-lodge and Templegowran-house.

TEMPLEHADIGAN. See TEMPLEDIGIN.

TEMPLEHARRY, a parish in the barony of Clonlisk, 2½ miles north-north-west of Moneygall, King's co., Leinster. Length, west-north-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 2; area, 4,589 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,156; in 1841, 1,137. Houses 185. The surface consists, in general, of good tillage land; and exhibits a large aggregate of artificial embellishment. A stream flows along part of the northern boundary, at an elevation of about 300 or 305 feet above the level of the sea. The road from Moneygall to Cloughjordan passes across the interior. The principal residences are Ballintemple-house, Foxborough-house, Cloonloughan-house, Park-house, and Castle-Emmel. —This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £141 14s. 9½d.; glebe, £18. The rectories of Templeharry and CULLENWAIN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Templeharry. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 2,809. Gross income, £387 4s. 7½d.; nett, £325 14s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1805, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and repaired in 1819, by means of a loan of £184 12s. 3½d. from that Board. Sittings 400; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Moneygall in Cullenwaine, and has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the parish of Dunkerrin. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 291, and the Roman Catholics to 896; the Protestants of the union to 523, and the Roman Catholics to 2,363; 4 daily schools in the parish had on their books 95 boys and 48 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had on their books 125 boys and 138 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £3 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £3 from the London Hibernian Society, £5 from subscription, and £3 from casual donations; and one, with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, £2 from the London Hibernian Society, and £3 from subscription.

TEMPLEHAY. See TEMPLETHAY.

TEMPLEHOUSE, a hamlet, a demesne, and a lake, in the county of Sligo, Connaught. The hamlet is in the parish of Kilvarnet, and barony of Leney; and stands on the road from Collooney to Tobbercarry, 3 miles south of Coolany, 3½ north-west of Ballymote, and 5 south-west of Collooney. It is the site of a school and a police barrack; and fairs are held at it on May 24, July 30, and Nov. 7. "Here," says Archdall, "we find Teach-Temple, or the House of the Temple, which was founded for Knights-Templars in the reign of King Henry III.; but, on the final overthrow of this order, it was given by King Edward II. to the Knights Hospitaliers." Extensive ruins of the military-monastic establishment still exist near the mansion of Templehouse, and impart a considerable interest to the locality. The demesne is situated immediately south of the hamlet, and principally, though not wholly, within the parish of Kilvarnet; and it is the beautiful, improved, and ornate residence of Alexander Percival, Esq. The lake extends along the south-south-east side of the demesne, and considerably farther to the south; it lies within the parishes of Kilvarnet and Achonry in the barony of Leney, and within those of Eirlaghfad and Cloonoghil in the barony of Corran; it is formed by a natural expansion or damming up of the waters of the Owenmore river; it has a surface-elevation of 186 feet above the level of the sea; and it measures 1½ mile in length north by eastward, and has an area of 103 acres, 13 perches within the parish of Kilvarnet, 35 acres, 27 perches within the parish of Kilhoury, 143 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches within the parish of Enlaghfad, and 108 acres, 1 rood within the parish of Cloonoghill. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

TEMPLEKELLY, TEMPLEACHALLY, TEMPLE-ICHALLA, or TEMPLEHALLY, a parish on the west border of the barony of Ownney and Arra, and of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It contains Ballina, or the eastern suburb of Killaloe. See BALLINA. Length, southward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 10,038 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches,—of which 1,009 acres, 13 perches are in Lough Derg, and 87 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 4,722; in 1841, 4,259. Houses 654. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,890; in 1841, 3,485. Houses 549. About one-half of the length extends along Lough Derg; and the remainder extends along the Shannon. The northern district is mountainous, and boldly overhangs Lough Derg, yet is separated from it by a band of rich woodland; and both it and the more lowland districts, of the centre and the south, make large contributions to the magnificence and the power of the highly picturesque environs of Killaloe. Two mountain summits on the northern border have altitudes of respectively 1,206 and 1,517 feet above the level of the sea. An indigenous stream descends from the northern district to the Shannon at a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Ballina, and has a total fall of upwards of 800 feet; and a stream which flows on the eastern boundary descends there from an elevation of 794 feet. The principal seats above Ballina are Derry-castle, Maryville, and the Cottage,—the first occupying a prominent and beautiful situation on the bold and sylvan banks of Lough Derg; and the principal below Ballina are Gortna-house, Boher-cottage, and Fort-Henry,—the last the residence of Mr. White. The roads from Killaloe to respectively Nenagh and the Slate quarries, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMASTULLA [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £406 3s. 1d.; glebe, £7. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmastulla. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 126, and the Roman Catholics to 4,846; a Sunday school, held in the Roman Catholic chapel, was usually attended by about 260 scholars; and 6 pay daily schools had on their books 323 boys and 218 girls. In 1843, a National School at Ballina was salaried with £8 from the Board, and had on its books 120 boys and 69 girls.

TEMPLEKIERAN, TEMPLEKERAN, or TEMPLEKERAN, a parish in the barony of Skreen, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,067 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches,—of which 162 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches lie detached about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile to the south. Pop., in 1831, 396; in 1841, 342. Houses 48. The surface consists of good land, and declines westward to within $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile of the river Boyne. The main body contains the hamlet of Corballis; and the detached district is traversed by the road from Navan to Dunshaughlin.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of SKREEN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, jointly with that of Lisnullen chapelry, £130. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 403; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school. Both the Commissioners of Public Instruction and those of Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage, indeed, return the church of the benefice of Skreen as in Templekieran; but the Ordnance Survey exhibits it as in Lisnullen, about 5 furlongs from the nearest part of Templekieran.

TEMPLEMACATEER, a quondam abbey in the parish of Ardnurcher, barony of Moycashel, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by west of Kilbeggan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Adjacent to its site is a small hamlet of the same name.

TEMPLEMALEY, a parish in the barony of Upper Bunnraty, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. Length, south by westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{3}{4}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,648 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches,—of which 237 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches are in lakes, and 7 acres, 5 perches are tideway of the river Fergus. Pop., in 1831, 1,554; in 1841, 1,634. Houses 251. The surface descends from the east end of Lough Dromore, to a point on the river Fergus opposite the middle of Ennis; and it possesses a considerable variety of character, but on the whole consists of good land. Lough Dromore lies on the northern boundary; Lough Ballyallia, on the south-western boundary; and Lough Cleggan, on the western boundary. The principal residences are Edenview, Newpark-house, Cappaghard-house, Brockville, Drumconora-house, Ballymaley-house, and Ballyallia-house,—the last the residence of Andrew Stackpole, Esq.; and the other principal objects of interest are Ennis race-course, the ruins of Templemaley church, the ruins of three castles, the site of O'Brien's castle, three forts, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The roads from Ennis to respectively Gort and Spancel-hill pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DRUMCLIFFE [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £55 7s. 8d.; glebe, £1. The rectory of Templemaley forms part of the sinecure benefice of OGASHIN; which see. Rectorial tithe composition, £49 10s. 11d. The Roman Catholic chapel stands at Barrfield, on the eastern verge of the parish; but is returned by the Commissioners of Public Instruction as within the adjoining parish of KILRAUGHTIS; which see. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 1,655; and a hedge-school had on its books 60 boys and 2 girls.

TEMPLEMARTIN, a parish in the barony of Kinnalmeaky, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,515 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,730; in 1841, 2,362. Houses 368. The surface is part of the north screens of the valley of the Bandon river, and is watered chiefly by a rivulet which falls into the Bandon a little above Innishannon; and though of hilly character, and on a comparatively high basis, it consists, in general, of arable land. Among the seats are Moss-grove and Mount-Pleasant. Fairs are held at Moss-grove on March 17, June 15, Sept. 21, and Dec. 8.—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Cork. The rectory is part of the benefice of TEMPLEBREADY; which see. Tithe composition, £500. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Tithe composition, £19; glebe, £12. Gross income, £61; nett, £58 17s. Patron, the dean of Cork. The church was built in 1797 by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 233 Churchmen, 7 Presbyterians, and 2,449 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 12 scholars; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £3 from the dean of Cork, £4 10s. from other parties, and some advantages from the Duke of Devonshire—had on their books 47 boys and 14 girls.

TEMPLEMARTIN, or ST. MARTIN, a parish on the western border of the barony of Gowran, 2½ miles east of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 782 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches,—of which 4 acres, 20 perches are in the river Nore. The Census of 1831 does not notice it; and the Commissioners of Public Instruction return its pop. of that year as 17, and exhibit them as all Roman Catholics. Pop., in 1841, 306. Houses 49. The river Nore traces the whole of the south-western boundary; and the mail-road from Kilkenny to Dublin passes through the interior. The most noticeable objects are the seat of Riverview-house, the ruins of St. Martin's church, the site of Rathennmore and Levistown castles, a grave-yard, St. Martin's well, and a constabulary barrack. A fair is held on Nov. 22.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Canice, in the dio. of Ossory. See KILKENNY (COUNTY OF THE CITY OF). There is neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, co. Cork. See MOURNE ABBEY.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, a parish in the baronies of Longford and Ardgagh, co. Longford, Leinster. It contains the whole of the town of Longford,—the chief part within its Ardgagh section, and the remainder within its barony of Longford section. See LONGFORD. Length, south-eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Ardgagh section, 5,445 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch; of the barony of Longford section, 3,669 acres, 28 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 8,323; in 1841, 8,484. Houses 1,292. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ardgagh section, in 1831, 2,098; in 1841, 1,907. Houses 329. Pop. of the rural districts of the barony of Longford section, in 1831, 1,709; in 1841, 1,521. Houses 262. The townland of Kiltreher, comprising 223 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches, is slightly detached from the west end of the main body, and extends westward to within 2 miles of the river Shannon at the mouth of the river Camlin. The general surface of the parish is low and flat, and constitutes part of an extensive plain of mixed bog, swamp, pasture lands, and good arable grounds; but though prevalently bleak and featureless, it possesses some decoration in the plantations of the glebe-house, Clonbally-house, and Carrickglass-house, and exhibits comparatively improved farming, comparatively good farm-houses, and a few small villas or respectable country residences. The river Camlin traces the mutual boundary of the two sections of the main body of the parish. The principal hamlets are Straid, New-Ross, Near-Clooncoose, Far-Clooncoose, and Derryharrow; and the principal villas are Clonbally-house and Carrickglass-house. The Longford branch of the Royal Canal facilitates communication with Dublin.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ardgagh. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 1d.; glebe, £307 16s. The rectories of Templemichael and BALLYMACORMACK, and the vicarage of KILLOE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Templemichael. Length and breadth, each upwards of 7 miles. Pop., in 1831, 13,975. Gross income, £1,174 15s. 3d.; nett, £1,005 3s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. Each of 4 curates receives a salary of £75. The church of Templemichael was built in 1812 by means of a loan of £3,221 10s. 10d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 700; attendance, from 125 to 450. There are churches also in Ballymacormack and Killoe. The Presbyterian meeting-house of Templemichael has an attendance of 80; and there is also a Presbyterian meeting-house in Killoe. Two Wesleyan Methodist meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 40 and 100. The Roman Catholic chapels of Templemichael and Ballymacormack have an attendance of respectively 900, and from 1,900 to 2,160; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Killoe. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 1,191 Churchmen, 109 Presbyterians, 12 other Protestant dissenters, and 6,677 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,782 Churchmen, 280 Presbyterians, 12 other Protestant dissenters, and 12,194 Roman Catholics; 10 daily schools in the parish had on their books 437 boys and 200 girls; and 28 daily schools in the union had on their books 981 boys and 552 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £15 a-year from the National Board, and £10 from the trustees of a fund left by the Rev. Mr. O'Beirne, a Roman Catholic clergyman; one, with £8 from the National Board; one, with £20 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; and £10 from the representatives of the late Essex Edgeworth; and one, with £10 from the London Hibernian Society.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, a parish at the south-eastern extremity of the barony of Slieveardagh, and on the eastern border of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of NIXEMILL, which see. Length, south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,869 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 796; in 1841, 1,027. Houses 146. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 867. Houses 120. The surface consists, in general, of good land. A stream which traces the southern boundary descends while there from an elevation of 435 to one of 257 feet above the level of the sea. The hamlets are Mangan and Currasilla; and the only other noticeable object is Castle-John, occupying a site of 440 feet of altitude above the level of the sea. The mail-road from Dublin to Cork by way of Clonmel passes across the north-west corner.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DYSENT [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £131 5s. 6d. In 1834, all the parishioners, with two exceptions, were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, a parish in the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. It lies on the right bank of the Blackwater, and at the south-western extremity of the county, 2½ miles north-north-west of Youghal. Length, south-south-eastward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½; area, 8,215 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,573; in 1841, 2,994. Houses 450. The Blackwater forms the lower part of the eastern boundary over a distance of about 2½ miles. The northern district is separated from the Blackwater by the intervention of the parish of Kilcockan, and is prevalently bleak, upland, pastoral, and half waste; but the southern district, though naturally rather poor in soil, is profuse in artificial embellishment, and partakes the beauty and gorgeousness which so extensively characterize the Blackwater's valley. A height on the north-western boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 672 feet; and one on the south-western boundary has an altitude of 457 feet. A stream which traces most of the upper part of the eastern boundary to the Blackwater, descends while there from an elevation of 231 feet; and one, the Glendine, which comes in near the middle of the northern boundary, and bisects the whole of the interior southward to the Blackwater, descends while within the parish from an elevation of 440 feet.

The vale of the Glendine is a beautiful, romantic, and thickly wooded little glen; and takes up a road from Youghal to Cappoquin and Lismore. The ruins of Rincere-castle crown an eminence overhanging the Blackwater, at the south-eastern extremity of the parish, and can be distinctly seen from Youghal. This castle is reputed to have belonged to the ecclesiastico-military association of Knights-Templars; and, having become a forfeit to the Crown, it was, with Ballinatra, Strancally, and other lands, granted, in 1586, to Sir Walter Raleigh,—and afterwards passed by purchase from him to the first Earl of Cork. The castle of Templemichael, at present a complete section of a heavy square tower, and also the mansion and the church of Templemichael, stand on the peninsula between the south side of the Glendine and the Blackwater. The ruins of Castle-Miles stand near the south-eastern border. The ruins of an old abbey stand on the Glendine rivulet, a little above Templemichael church. The principal seats are Cherrymount-house, Ballinatra-house, Templemichael-house, Ballydasoon-house, Springmount, Tourig-Hall, Newtown-house, Rincere-cottage, and Killea-house.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £220 4s. 10d.; and the rectorial for £440 9s. 8d.; and the latter are impropriate in Richard Smith, Esq., of Ballinatra. The vicarages of Templemichael and KILCOCKAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Templemichael. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 4,034. Gross income, £317 19s. 7½d.; nett, £263 19s. 7½d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The church was built in 1824, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60. attendance 90. The Templemichael and the Kilcockan Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kilwatermoy. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 178, and the Roman Catholics to 2,496; the Protestants of the union to 200, and the Roman Catholics to 3,991; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by from 20 to 25 scholars; and 2 daily schools in the parish—the one of which was in connection with the National Board, and the other supported with £25 a-year to the teacher and clothes for the children from Richard Smith, Esq., and the Hon. Mrs. Smith—had on their books 102 boys and 69 girls.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, a parish in the barony of Arklow, 2½ miles north of the town of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Area, 1,325 acres, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 360. It is regarded, quoad civilia, as part of the parish of Kilbride; and, in this point of view, is identical with the northern district of that parish. The ruins of the church still exist.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of KILBRIDE [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 200 at one service, and from 700 to 800 at another service; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castle-Macadam. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 167, and the Roman Catholics to 212.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, or TEMPLEMICHAEL-DE-DOUGH, a parish in the barony of Kinnalea, 2½ miles east by north of Innishannon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1½; area, 2,064 acres. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 437, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 764; in 1841, 711. Houses 125. Some parts of the surface are prime land; but other parts are bad. The drainage is southward, by the streamlet which falls into the head of Oyster Haven.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £230 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £8 15s. 1½d. Gross income, £239 10s. 6½d.; nett, £200 3s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £533 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 60. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 58, and the Roman Catholics to 809; and a daily school was partially supported by the rector, and had on its books 17 boys and 18 girls.

TEMPLEMOLOGGA, MOLOGGA, or NONANE, a parish in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, 3¼ miles north-west of Mitchellstown, and on the eastern verge of the county of Cork, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,306 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,876; in 1841, 1,951. Houses 300. The small parish of Abacross is merged in Templemologga, and included in the above statistics. Much of the parochial surface consists of Leadeary mountain and other lofty ground belonging to the Galtees; and the remainder is chiefly arable and pasture land. The declination is to the river Funcheon.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLEMORE [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £179 14s. 3d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 1,933; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEMPLEMORE, a parish, containing the chief part of the city of Londonderry, and identical with the North-west Liberties of the City of Londonderry, co. Londonderry, Ulster. See LONDONDERRY (City and Liberties of). Length, north-eastward, 8 miles; extreme breadth, nearly 3; area, 12,615 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches,—of which 3 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are water, and 1,062 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches are tideway in the river Foyle. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 19,620, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 18,972; in 1841, 20,379. Houses 3,017. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 9,490; in 1841, 5,849. Houses 1,012.* The ancient name of the parish was Derry, or Derry-Columbkil, and continued to be in use in ecclesiastical records till recent times; and its modern name of Templemore signifies the 'great church,' and originally designated the cathedral church of the city as distinguished from the smaller churches in its vicinity. The perpetual curacies of Muff, Burt, and Inch, in the barony of Inishowen and county of Donegal, formerly constituted part of the parish of Templemore, but are now almost always treated as constituting three separate and distinct parishes. The present parish of Templemore is bounded along the whole of the east by the river Foyle, on part of the north by Lough Foyle, and everywhere else by the county of Donegal. Its townlands lying upon the Foyle, named in an order from south to north, are Mullennan, Balloughry, Termonbacca, Ballymagowan, Edenballymore, Pennyburn, Ballinashalloo, Ballinaguard, and Culmore; and its landward townlands, or those in the central and western districts, named also in the order from south to north, and occasionally from east to west, are Lower Creevagh, Upper Creevagh, Killea, Springhill, Creggan, Sheriff's mountain, Whitehouse or Ballymagrorty, Cloughglass, Springtown, Ballymagrorty, Coshquin, Shantallow, Ballinagallagh, Elaghmore, and Bally-

* The Ordnance Memoir of the Parish of Templemore is a large and interesting volume, published in 1867; and was composed as a model of similar memoirs of all Ireland. But the plan was judged far too costly, and was parsimoniously abandoned. We have made large use of the volume in our General Introduction to the Gazetteer, and particularly in our article on the City of Londonderry; and we shall also use it as our principal authority in writing the present article.

arinet. The surface of the parish is undulated, and exhibits a series of swells, hills, and mimic mountains, most of which are cultivated or under pasture. The hills are separated into two groups or systems by a wide valley which extends north-westward from the Foyle at Pennyburn. The southern group is more prominent and lofty than the northern one; it rises, at the western extremity, into Holywell hill, the loftiest ground in the parish, and attaining an altitude of 800 feet above the level of the sea; it is subdivided into two portions, by the intersection of a remarkable valley, which appears to insulate the hill of Derry; and it is farther diversified and sliced down into redivisions by ravines, dells, or tiny glens, which, similarly to the valley just referred to, conform in direction to the valley of the Foyle. The northern hill group attains its highest point in the summit of Elaghmore, whose altitude above sea-level is only 354 feet; it is subdivided into low but distinct ridges by vales extending parallel to the valley of the Foyle; and one of these vales—that of Ballyarnet—assumes, in some positions, an importance little inferior to that of the valley of Pennyburn. This tract, as seen from the road to Culmore, combines the characters derived from moderate height and frequent subdivision, and appears a wide and undulated plain, bounded on the south by the hills of the southern divisions of the parish, and on the west and north-west by the hills of Inishowen. "The parish," says the Ordnance Memoir, "generally presents the appearance of a rich and cultivated country, eminently diversified in its picturesque features, and imposing from the grandeur of its undulating outlines. Its chief beauties are, however, connected with the broad and navigable Foyle, whose decorated shores present in succession the cheerful cottage and the wooded pleasure-ground, backed by the distant mountains of Inishowen and Benyevenagh, and whose sheltered waters are enlivened by the stately merchant vessel, and the element-conquering steamer—objects no less pleasing to the philanthropist than to the lover of the picturesque. Still, supereminent in every circumstance, the city itself is the great central object of attraction. Viewed from whatever side, its elevated and nearly insulated position,—its ranges of buildings, ascending above each other from the water's edge, and terminated by its lofty spire,—its time-worn battlements,—its long connecting line of bridge,—all combine in composing pictures at once novel and striking."

Ballyarnet Lake, comprising an area of 3 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches, and possessing a surface-elevation of about 100 feet above the level of the sea, lies in a shallow and bog-girt basin around the junction-point of the townlands of Ballyarnet, Ballinashallog, and Ballinagard. The Foyle, while in contact with the parish, flows in a deep and tranquil bed; and, except at Pennyburn, where it is met by a transverse valley, it luxuriates beneath bold banks and umbrageous woods, which in many places sweep down to the water's edge. Its greatest breadth, above the city, is nearly half-a-mile, and occurs opposite New-buildings in the parish of Clondermot; its greatest breadth below the city is $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and occurs in a sort of lacustrine expansion called Rosse's bay; and its least breadth is 1,068 feet, and occurs at the bridge which spans it at the city. Its depth at high water is 22 feet near the point of its entering the county, 24 feet opposite Preben, and 43 feet at the bridge of Derry. All the rivulets are small; and, excepting one which runs to Lough Swilly, they flow into either the river or the estuary of the Foyle. Springs are everywhere numerous, and not fewer than 8 occur within a tract of not more than 20 acres in Springhill and Creggan; but as they percolate through the detritus of rocks which abound in oxide of iron, they are frequently charged with ochreous particles, and sometimes become slightly chalybeate.—Bogs occur throughout the parish in isolated patches; and though only relics of a much more extensive tract, they continue to be of great local importance. In several townlands, they supply the inhabitants both with fuel and with an important ingredient in manurial composts; and in others, the surface of some portions is occasionally reclaimed for cultivation, and the subsoil of others which have been exterminated is readily subjected to tillage.—A small patch of wood, apparently natural, occurs in Ballinagallagh; and some more natural wood may probably have been preserved within the richly and beautifully planted demesnes upon the Foyle. The shore of the small portion of Lough Foyle which washes the parish is low and flat.—The geognosy of the parish is simple and without any exact boundary,—the rocks which constitute it extending both eastward across the Foyle, and westward into the county of Donegal. The principal rocks in situ are mica slate passing into gneiss, mica slate passing into clay slate, and mica slate passing into quartz slate. Quartz veins are common in the first or gneiss variety, rare in the second, and not very common in the third; and all are characterized, to a considerable extent, by the appearance of small specks of oxide of iron on the cross fracture. Beds of limestone and greenstone exist, but are much subordinate in prominence to the schistose rocks. The limestone appears only on the east of Mullenan, in a small excavation at the base of a limekiln; it is dark in colour, finely granular, and analogous in structure to the schists,—thin, white, crystalline stripes being visible on the cross fracture, though they are not sufficiently continuous to affect the cleavage. The greenstone is met with only at Conn's Hill quarry,—rather beyond the parochial boundary than within it; it is dense, close-grained, and homogeneous; and it is traversed by several grains of quartz which have the appearance of being metalliferous, yet do not exhibit any important metallic ore. A small pendicle of new red sandstone is seen on the streamlet which traces the northern boundary. Detritus of distinctive character forms a tiny flat district in the extreme north, and also several small patches of clay on the margin of the Foyle; and though, in other parts of the parish, it has not assumed the arrangement of a distinct formation, it claims attention as having an evident bearing on the general phenomena of the district. The detritus "may be noticed as gravel and sand, heaped on the sides of the principal valleys,—or as clay spread over the greater portion of the plains and hollows, which either were formerly or are now covered with bog. The union of these two forms of detritus impresses strongly on the present surface the character of ancient water-courses, either lakes or rivers. The detritus of gravel narrows and defines the boundaries, while the level clay base contributes to give the boggy covering that uniformity of surface which characterizes the tranquil waters of a lake. Along the valley, which now contains the bog of Shantalow, and the bog and lake of Ballyarnet, a chain of isolated sand-hills may be traced, appearing above the bog, while opposite to one of them a remarkable pinnacle of rock also rises above its surface, and another at no great distance is seen just level with it. Up the sides of these sand-hills the bog is seen to have crept, and as, within the memory of the existing generation, it has covered the summits of some of them, no doubt can exist that the sand-hills were prior in origin to the bog. In the still more marked depression, which, constituting the valley of Pennyburn, extends with little variation of level towards Lough Swilly, the appearances are equally illustrative; for, in advancing towards the west, the valley is narrowed between two beds, or islands of rocks, and exhibits a channel so natural and well defined that it is impossible to resist the feeling of being in a river, or strait—an effect which is greatly heightened by the level, smooth, and now grassy bog, which lines the bottom. The channel again swells into an open basin, and is again for a short distance contracted, as it winds round some projecting rocks, which, like those previously described, seem to attest by their isolated position, limited extent, and low level, that some powerful agent, such as water, had long exercised on them its abrading influence." The schistose rocks of the parish are extensively quarried for use, as building stones, but are not available as roofing slates; the limestone quarry has been abandoned, and limestone burnt at the kilns of the city is brought down the Foyle from beyond the parish; the greenstone is quarried for use in making and repairing roads; and the new red sandstone, though rather soft for the purpose, is occasionally used for grindstones. Brick-yards, which at one time existed on the Foyle, were abandoned about 37 years ago, in consequence of the growing scarcity of fuel. The soils of the parish have much uniformity of composition and appearance; yet those on the higher grounds are the most siliceous, and sometimes, though not often, stony, sandy, and meagre; those of by far the greater portion of the area are light and fertile clays or loams; and those of the very low grounds are the most argillaceous and retentive, yet are never, to an injurious degree, stiff or adhesive. The natural vegetation throughout the parish is various; yet, excepting some marine plants along the side of the Foyle, it presents no peculiarly marked features. The zoology of the district may have been interesting before the period of georgy; but it is now of altogether commonplace character.

The principal country residences are situated on the banks of the Foyle. The villa called the Farm is the first which occurs to the north of the city, and is the property and seat of Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart. Boom-Hall adjoins the Farm; has its name from the well-known boom which was here thrown across the river during the siege of Derry; and is the property of the Earl of Caledon, and the residence of the bishop of Derry and Raphoe. Brook Hall, adjacent to Boom-Hall, was formerly the seat of Sir George Fitzgerald Hill, Bart., and is now that of Henry Barre Beresford, Esq. Thornhill, next in topographical order, is the property of Capt. Hart, and the residence of W. Letham, Esq. Ballinagard, about 3½ miles from the city, and adjacent to the old fort of Culmore, is the property of Capt. Hart, and the residence of W. Campbell, Esq. Belmont, near the Farm, is the seat of James Beggs, Esq.; and the Cottage, near Belmont, is the seat of Charles O'Dogherty, Esq. Foyle Hill, nearly 1 mile south of the city, and 200 yards to the right of the Lifford road, is the residence of Mrs. Scott. Milltown-lodge, about a mile beyond Foyle Hill, and also near the road to Lifford, is the seat of Capt. Henry Lecky. Brandywell-cottage and the Grove, still farther south, are the seats of respectively Mrs. Watt and Patrick Gilmour, Esq. The Casino is situated nearly in the city, close to one of the Episcopal gardens; it stands on the slope of a hill, and commands a beautiful view of the river and the opposite bank; it is irregular in its architecture, yet presents a handsome front; and it was built by the Earl of Bristol when bishop of Derry, and in 1837 was the residence of

Ross T. Smyth, Esq. The bishop's demesne makes a prominent figure 1½ mile west of the city, but does not contain any residence. The seats additional to those noticed, together with their respective occupants in 1837, are Ballourgy, Capt. MacNeill; Greenhaw house, Wm. K. MacClintock, Esq.; Mullennan, William Moore, Esq.; Mullennan, Richard Harvey, Esq.; Creevagh, Anthony Babington, Esq.; Culmore-Point, Anderson MacAusland, Esq.; Belview, Hans Riddall, Esq.; Pennyburn, William D. Smith, Esq.; Pennyburn, Andrew Bond, Esq.; Troy-house, John Munn, Esq.; and Foyle-cottage, William Scott, Esq.—A very remarkable antiquity connected with Templemore, though not within the present parish, is that called the Grianan of Aileach: see AILEACH. St. Columb's stone, situated in Belmont garden, about a mile from the city, on the road to Green-castle, is marked on Neville's map of the siege of Derry, and is not improbably the stone which was used for the inauguration of the kings of Aileach, from a period prior to the introduction of Christianity; it has an irregular outline, approaching to be quadrangular, and measuring 7½ feet in diameter; it consists of gneiss; and it exhibits the sculptured impression of two feet, right and left, each 10 inches in length, but is otherwise unmarked by the chisel. The old church of Killea gives name to the townland on which it stands, was an oblong building of 60 feet by 30, and was formerly one of the five chapels-of-ease of the original parish of Templemore, but it has not been used as a place of worship since the Reformation, and is now reduced to its mere foundations. The grave-yard around it continues to be in use, and is enclosed with an excellent stone wall, 7 feet in height, which appears to be as ancient as the foundations of the church. The church of Culmore was built a little before the wars of the Revolution, for the use of the Protestant garrison of Culmore fort; it was used as an hospital by the Jacobite army, during the siege of Derry, and accommodated at one time 400 wounded persons; it was eventually destroyed by the Jacobite army, and has never since been repaired; but, excepting the west end, it continues entire in its walls, and proves itself to have been a structure of no mean character, consisting of a nave and transept in the form of a cross, with a square steeple at the west end. The castle of Aileach or Eagh—a totally different object from the Grianan of Aileach, though often confounded with it—is situated in Elaghmore, on the verge of the parish, about 2 miles from the Grianan of Aileach, and surmounts a gentle but commanding eminence, whose summit has an altitude of 248 feet above the level of the sea. This castle, and the neighbouring ones of Burt and Ineh, are traditionally asserted to have been built in the early part of the 15th century by Neactan O'Donnell, for his father-in-law O'Dogherty; and seem to have been obviously designed for the defence of the peninsula of Innishowen. Each of the castles appears to have consisted of a lofty square keep, with semicircular towers projecting from two of the angles, and strengthened by an outward ballium; but the greater part of that of Aileach has been used as building material in the adjacent village, and what remains is principally a portion of one of the semicircular towers. "It is certain that the peninsula of Innishowen was anciently the original territory of the Kinel-Owen; and that after the O'Neills, the chief family of this race, had forced their way by conquest into the more southern territory, called after them Tir Eoghain, or Tyrone, this original district formed a portion of the territory of the O'Gormlys, chief of the Kinel-Moen, a branch of the same stock. After the fall of the monarchy in the 12th century, however, the increasing power of the Kinel-Connel enabled them, after much contention, to add this district to their ancient possessions, and place the O'Doghertys, a distinguished family of that race, over it as tributary chiefs. And though there is no very exact account of the circumstances connected with its occupation by this family, the Irish annals afford such evidences as are sufficient to show that it must have been about the commencement of the 15th century; for it is at this period that they, for the first time, add the title of 'Lord of Innishowen' to that derived from their more ancient patrimony." The earliest notice in the annals of the Four Masters of an O'Dogherty as Lord of Innishowen, occurs under the year 1413; according also to the tradition of his descendants, Conor O'Dogherty, whom the annals then mention, was the first of his name who was lord of the peninsula, and henceforward the O'Doghertys appear to have held it as tributary lords, sometimes under the O'Neill, but usually under the O'Donnell, till it was confiscated in the 17th century. "It appears certain, therefore, that the castles of Elagh, Burt, and Inch, were not erected before the 15th century; nor is it likely that they were built at a more recent period, as such fortresses were then indispensably necessary to the security of the territory; the possession of which was contested fiercely and with great loss of life by the O'Neill and the O'Donnell, the rival chiefs of the great races of Kinel-Owen and Kinel-Connel, till the commencement of the following century, when the O'Neill was obliged to make a formal surrender of his right to it." The forts of Culmore and Dunalong were highly distinguished in the Irish history of the 17th century as 'fortresses of Lough Foyle'; but, in their existing state, they possess little interest except that of association with their former celebrity. That of Culmore is noticed under the word CULMORE [which see]; and that of Dunalong exhibits no distinctive feature worthy of being mentioned.

The agricultural condition of the parish possesses much interest from the relative importance of Templemore to the county of Londonderry, and of the county of Londonderry to Ireland; and it is somewhat fully exhibited in the following extracts:—"In farms, the small, as in most parts of Ireland, greatly preponderate over the large. Manures are readily attainable:—dung, either resulting from the home-keep of cattle, or bought in Derry; the spent wash from the distilleries, which is thus used as well as for feeding bogs; lime, burned in the city, the stone having been brought from beyond the limits of the parish; shells, procured at Shell Island in Lough Foyle; and occasionally kelp, purchased in Derry. With several of these, namely, dung, lime, and shells, bog earth is mixed, and forms a compost in general use. . . . The quantity of manure applied is considerable, though by the length of the rotation, and the frequent repetition of grain crops in the poorer parts of the parish, its good effects are not rendered permanent. Lime, from its comparatively small bulk, is less augmented in price by transport than other manures, and deserves, therefore, if fitted for the soil, a preference; in this parish it is chiefly used as an ingredient in composts. Shells, as a substitute for lime, have, from their small original cost, an advantage wherever they can be conveyed by water; but, on the contrary, in case of extensive land-carriage, the advantage is evidently in favour of lime. Composts are very general, bog being mixed in nearly equal proportions with dung, and also with lime and shells; these mixtures are indeed more common than the separate use of either. The rotations exhibit a great variety of combinations, partly due to the careless manner in which the poorer farmers regulate their field operations or take account of their results, and partly to the distrust which unfortunately still leads them to imagine that every inquiry is made with a view to the augmentation of their burthens. The same causes render it difficult to ascertain with precision the amount of crops; but, allowing for some uncertainty, improvement in farming may still be deduced. Wheat, for instance, which formerly was considered unsuited to the soil and climate—the one being considered too light, and the other too cold for its growth—has gained a footing in the parish, and is advancing in estimation, whilst green crops are also occasionally adopted. The improvement, however, of cottage husbandry is still a desideratum; and it would, perhaps, tend to promote it, were the agricultural societies to keep in view that the great majority of farms are small, and that premiums, to affect them, should be such as would apply to very small spaces. . . . The natural meadows are few. Pasture is limited. Forced or sown meadows are far from general; when intended to be cut the first year, they are sown with perennial rye-grass and red clover—1 bushel of grass seed and 12 lbs. of clover being generally sown on each Cunningham acre; when intended for grazing, white grass and white clover are sown—4 bushels of the white grass seeds and 6 lbs. of clover seed being allowed for each acre."

The manufactures of the city and suburbs of Londonderry, and of the townland of Edenballymore, are exhibited in the article LONDONDERRY (CITY OF). The appliances of manufacture, together with the estimated annual value of their produce, in the other townlands, are, in Ballongry, 53 tan-pits, £3,516,—12 linen looms, £549; in Ballyarnet, 3 linen looms, £168,—2 cotton looms, £146; in Ballymagowan, 3 linen looms, £78; in Ballymagorty, 2 cotton looms, £146; in Ballinagallagh, 3 linen looms, £168,—1 cotton loom, £73; in Ballinagard, 3 linen looms, £136; in Coshquin, 12 linen looms, £672,—3 cotton looms, £219; in Lower and Upper Creevagh, 1 wool-len loom, £25,—6 linen looms, £328; in Culmore, 3 cotton looms, £219; in Elaghmore, 7 linen looms, £391,—4 cotton looms, £292; in Mullennan, 12 linen looms, £354; in Shantallow, 4 linen looms, £200; in Sheriff's Mountain, 2 linen looms, £112; in Springtown, 2 linen looms, £110,—2 cotton looms, £146; in Termonbacca, 1 rope walk, £93,—3 cotton looms, £219; and in Whitehouse, 1 linen loom, £12. The quarries within the parish, together with the number of workmen employed in each, the total aggregate of working days, and the uses of the produce, are, in the city and suburbs, 2 quarries, 9 men, 513 days, for roads and ballast; in Ballongry, 1 quarry, 6 men, 100 days, for roads; in Ballyarnet, 1 quarry, not in use, for flags and building; in Ballymagowan, 1 quarry, not in use, for flags and building; in Ballymagorty, 1 quarry, seldom used, for building; in Ballinagallagh, 2 quarries, seldom used, for building; in Ballinagard, 5 quarries, not in use, for flags and building; in Cloughglass, 1 quarry, occasionally used, for building; in Coshquin, 1 quarry, seldom used, for building; in Lower and Upper Creevagh, 2 quarries, 4 men, 156 days, for building; in Creggan, 2 quarries, seldom used, for building; in Edenballymore, 1 quarry, not in use, for building; in Mullennan, 1 quarry limestone, not in use; in Shantallow, 1 quarry, 2 men, 156 days, for building; in Termonbacca, 4 quarries, not in use, for flags and building; and in Whitehouse, 1 quarry, occasionally used, for roads, &c. The mills in the parish, together with the amount of their produce, are, in the city and suburbs, 3 grain steam mills, 22,668,800 lbs. of oatmeal, and 15,142,400 lbs. of flour,—1 hacking machine, 14 cwt. raw quantity in 11 hours; in Ballymagrorty, 1 grain water mill, 107,520 lbs. of oatmeal; in Ballinagallagh, 1 flax water mill, 82,640 lbs. raw quantity, and 20,160 tow quantity; in Ballinagard, 1 flax water mill, 60,480 lbs. raw quantity, and 15,120 tow quantity; in Coshquin, 1 flax water mill, 99,840 lbs. raw quantity, and 24,960 tow quantity; in Edenballymore, 1 grain water mill, 822,560 lbs. of oatmeal; in Killea, 1 flax water mill, 69,120 lbs. of raw quantity, and 17,280 of tow quantity; in Mullennan, 1 flax water mill, 54,720 lbs. of raw quantity, and 13,680 of tow quantity; in Pennyburn, 1 wind mill,—1 grain water mill, 1,164,800 lbs. of oatmeal, and 1,513,200 lbs. of flour; in Termonbacca, 1 flax water mill, 25,272 lbs. of raw quantity, and 6,318 of tow quantity; and in Whitehouse, 1 grain water mill, 112,900 lbs. of oatmeal,—1 flax water mill, 84,480 lbs. of raw quantity, and 21,120 of tow quantity. The grand total of days of labour employed by all classes of persons in farming operations, are, in Ballougray, 35,667; in Ballyarnet, 13,948; in Ballymagowan, 16,773; in Ballymagrorty, 32,520; in Ballinagallagh, 21,734; in Ballinagard, 10,662; in Ballinashalloo, 21,542; in Cloughglass, 3,270; in Coshquin, 27,791; in Lower and Upper Creevagh, 25,256; in Creggan, 13,506; in Culmore, 41,828; in Edenballymore, 16,802; in Elaghnore, 13,912; in Killea, 8,341; in Mullennan, 33,717; in Pennyburn, 4,706; in Shantallow, 50,032; in Sheriff's Mountain, 23,075; in Springhill, 3,210; in Springtown, 5,680; in Termonbacca, 23,915; and in Whitehouse, 21,465. The road from Londonderry to Greencastle runs $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles within the parish; and that to Buncrana branches off this at Pennyburn-mill, and runs 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles within the parish. The road from Londonderry to Letterkenny runs about 3 miles within the parish, but is uneven and hilly; and that to Lifford branches off from this, and runs about 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles within the parish. In 1837, a new line of road to Letterkenny was projected, and a new road to Sligo, through St. Johnstown, was in contemplation.

Templemore parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £1,627 0s. 1d.; glebe, £9. The rectories of Templemore, GLENDERMOT, and FAUGHANYVALE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Templemore, and the corps of the deanery of Derry cathedral. Gross income, £3,224 7s. 11d.; nett, £2,445 8s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; but these two sums are exclusive of respectively £446 1s. 11d. and £402 15s. 11d. specially connected with the deanery. Patron, the Crown. The rectory of Templemore includes the perpetual curacies of BURT, INCH, and MURR, and the chapelry of LONDONDERRY; and the union of Templemore includes also the perpetual curacies of GLENDERMOT and FAUGHANYVALE: see all these articles. The following statistics refer only to the quoad civilia parish of Templemore, or to that described in the preceding parts of this article; and they, in consequence, exclude all the other districts and churches of the union, except those in the city of Londonderry and the townlands of Templemore-proper. Each of three curates receives a salary of £69 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The parochial church is the cathedral of the diocese. Sittings 1,000; attendance, from 300 to 800. The free church of Londonderry was built in 1830, at the cost of £613 12s. 4d., all defrayed by Bishop Knox; and enlarged in 1832, by the erection of a gallery, which, in addition to the vestry-room, cost £126 9s. 6d., provided by private subscription. Sittings 384; attendance, from 250 to 300. The chapel-of-ease in Londonderry was built at the private expense of Bishop Bernard, between 1747 and 1768. Sittings 240; attendance 200. See DERRY (CHAPELRY OF). The Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Synod of Ulster, is attended by from 900 to

1,000; the Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Secession Synod, by from 200 to 300; the Reformed Presbyterian meeting-house, by about 250; the Independent meeting-house, by from 150 to 200; the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by from 80 to 250; the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by from 200 to 250; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by from 1,600 to 4,000,—and the last is the cathedral chapel of the Roman Catholic dio. of Derry, and has 4 officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,314 Churchmen, 6,083 Presbyterians, 164 other Protestant dissenters, and 10,299 Roman Catholics; 9 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 1,053 scholars; and 30 daily schools had on their books 1,054 boys and 710 girls. Foyle College, one of the daily schools, had on its books 70 boys, admitted 20 scholars free, and was supported by between £400 and £500 a-year from the several London Companies, £100 from the Bishop of Derry, and fees of from £4 4s. to £7 7s. from each of the pupils not admitted free. Gwyn's school had on its books 81 boys, educates, boards, and clothes its scholars, and is supported by an annual income of about £1,882 from a bequest of £41,757 by Mr. John Gwyn. Erasmus Smith's male school had on its books 108 boys, admits 20 scholars free, and was salaried with £30 a year from Erasmus Smith's fund. Erasmus Smith's female school had on its books 97 girls, and was salaried with £15 from Erasmus Smith's fund, £40 Irish currency from the Irish Society, and £10 Irish from the Bishop of Derry. St. Columb's male and female school had on its books 143 boys and 166 girls, and was salaried with £30 from the National Board, £10 from the Irish Society, and generally £30 from collection in the Roman Catholic chapel. The Presbyterian male school had on its books 100 boys, and was salaried with £10 from the Presbyterian congregation, and £20 from the Irish Society. The Presbyterian female school had on its books 96 girls, and was salaried with its chief means of support from ladies' subscriptions, and £10 Irish from the Irish Society. The London Hibernian Society's school had on its books 85 girls, and was salaried with about £4 from ladies' subscriptions, £5 from the Irish Society, and about £9 from the London Hibernian Society. The Ballyoughry school had on its books 24 boys and 4 girls, and was aided with £20 of salary, £10 for stationary to the scholars, 6 acres of ground and a house from the Irish Society. All the other daily schools were supported wholly by fees. In 1843, the St. Columb's National male school was salaried with £15 a-year from the National Board, and had on its books 172 boys; the St. Columb's female school, with £15, and had 295 girls; the Shantallow male school, with £12, and had 80 boys; the Shantallow female school with £12, and had 70 girls; the Sheriff's Mountain male school, with £8, and had 55 boys; the Sheriff's Mountain female school, with £12, and had 73 girls; the Mullennan male school, with £8, and had 75 boys; the Mullennan female school, not salaried, and had 22 girls; the Raccourse school, with £15, and had 72 boys and 52 girls; the Derry male school, with £15, and had 156 boys; the Derry female school, with £10, and had 88 girls; the Great James' Street female school, with £12, and had 55 girls; the Groarty school, with £8, and had 43 boys and 18 girls; and the Ballyoughry school, with £8, and had 35 boys and 48 girls.

TEMPLEMORE, a parish, partly in the barony of Ikerrin, but chiefly in that of Eliogurty, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Eliogurty section contains the town of TEMPLEMORE: see next article. Length, south-south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Ikerrin section, 1,607 acres; of the Eliogurty section, 6,864 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches, —of which 16 acres, 16 perches are in Lough Templemore. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 4,583,* but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,218; in 1841, 5,966. Houses 825. Pop. of the Ikerrin section, in 1841, 743. Houses 118. Pop. of the rural districts of the Eliogurty section, in 1841, 1,538. Houses 228. The northern district is bleak and boggy; but the southern district is fertile, warm, orimate, and thickly sprinkled with villas. The river Suir describes the whole of the eastern boundary; and a small affluent of it flows on the southern boundary, and has there an elevation of 358 feet above the level of the sea. A height at the church, or west end of the town, has an altitude above sea-level of 402 feet. The principal country residences are Springmount-cottage, Woodville-house, Belwood-house, Eastwood-house, Manna-cottage, Belville-house, Butler's-lodge, Oldtown-house, Lloydsborough-house, and the Priory,—the last the handsome seat of Sir H. R. Carden, Bart., the proprietor of the town. "Connected with the Priory, is the old residence of this family. The old castle has been abandoned as a residence; but the well-wooded demesne lands have been attached to those of the Priory. One of the entrances to the old demesne is a picturesque remnant of the castle of the Knights Templars, from which the town takes its name. The grounds of the demesne are open to the public; and the neat manner in which the place is kept, and the hedge-rows around, give to that side of the town a very rural and pleasing appearance." The road from Roscrea to Cashel, and that from Tipperary to Dublin, intersect each other at the town.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Cashel. Vicarial tithe composition, £221; glebe, £60. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £420; and are inappropriate in John Lloyd, Esq. The vicarage of Templemore, and the rectories of KILLEA, and KILLAVENACH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Templemore. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 9,709. Gross income, £924 10s. 4½d; nett, £776 8s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church stands at the east end of the town, and was built in 1790, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1820, by means partly of an unreported amount of private subscription, and partly of a loan of £553 10s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 550; attendance, about 300. Two private houses in Killea are used as parochial places of worship. The Roman Catholic chapels of Templemore, Killea, and Killavenagh,—the first of which is situated at the town of Templemore—have an attendance of respectively about 3,000, about 800, and about 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 636, and the Roman Catholics to 4,590; the Protestants of the union to 711, and the Roman Catholics to 9,241; and 7 daily schools.—one of which was salaried with £40 a-year from the fund of Erasmus Smith, and one was a mathematical, one a classical school, and one a ladies' boarding school.—had on their books 184 boys and 112 girls; and 10 daily schools in the union had on their books 338 boys and 205 girls. In 1843, a male school at Templemore was salaried with £20 from the National Board, and had on its books 227 boys; a female school at Templemore, with £18, and had 222 girls; and a school at College Hill, with £12, and had 65 boys and 62 girls.

TEMPLEMORE, a post and market town, and a large military station, in the parish of Templemore, barony of Eliogurty, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the right bank of the river Suir, on the road from Roscrea to Cashel, on that from Rathdowney to Borrisleagh, and on that from Dublin to Tipperary, 2¼ miles west of the nearest point of the proposed railway from Dublin to Limerick and Cork, 3¼ west-north-west of Templemohy, 4¼ north-east by east of Borrisleagh, 9 north of Thurles, 9 south-west by west of Rathdowney, 11½ south by west of Roscrea, 16½ south-west of Mountrath, and 63¼ south-west by west of Dublin. The immediate environs are pleasant and ornate; and, though not possessing any very marked natural feature, they borrow character and considerable interest from the adjacency of the Devil's-Bit mountains. The town itself has an airy and comparatively clean and agreeable appearance; and consists principally of one long and spacious street extending along the conjoint line of highway. The church is a handsome edifice; the Roman Catholic chapel is a capacious structure; and the Methodist meeting-house is a neat building. The district bridewell in the town is in good condition; and, during 1843, it cost £20 for salary to the keeper, and £28 18s. 6d. for other expenses. The infantry barracks, situated in the south-western outskirts of the town, are a large, neat, and imposing series of buildings, capable of accommodating 1,500 men. The Templemore fever hospital is within the Thurles Poor-law union; it contains 14 beds, but is capable of containing 20; and, in 1839-40, it expended £246 13s. 6½d., and admitted 253 patients. The dispensary is also, of course, within the Thurles Poor-law union; it serves, jointly with the dispensary of Templemohy, for a district containing a pop. of 8,597; and, in 1839-40, it expended £50, and administered to 2,504 patients. In 1843, the Templemore loan fund possessed a capital of £56, circulated £260 in 245 loans, and had only one depositor or proprietor. Fairs are held on Jan. 30, March 30, May 17, June 28, July 31, Sept. 4, Oct. 21, and Dec. 7. A court of petty-sessions is held on every Wednesday. In 1838, the public conveyances were a car in transit between Roscrea and Thurles, a car between Roscrea and Clonmel, and a coach between Thurles and Dublin. Area of the town, 137 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,936; in 1841, 3,685. Houses 479. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 255; in manufactures and trade, 274; in other pursuits, 219. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 35; on the directing of labour, 282; on their own manual labour, 371; on means not specified, 60. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 594; who could read but not write, 213; who could neither read nor write, 704. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 385; who could read but not write, 328; who could neither read nor write, 984.

TEMPLEMORE, co. Mayo. See STRADE.

TEMPLEMOYLE, a hamlet, and a celebrated agricultural school, in the parish of Faughanvale, barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. The hamlet stands 1½ mile south-west by south of Muff, on the road thence to Strabane; and the agricultural school stands 7 furlongs south-south-west of Muff, and 5 miles east-north-east of Londonderry. The school stands upon a farm of 172 acres, closely adjoining Grocers' Hall, and rented from the Grocers' company. It was founded through the joint exertions of the country-gentlemen in the neighbourhood, different London companies, and a few distant subscribers. It was first connected with another school for the upper classes at Fallowlee, contiguous to Templemoyle, on the plan of the Fellenberg schools at Hofwyl; but whether the country was not yet ripe for such an experiment, or that some flaw existed in the constitution or management, the Fallowlee institute does not appear to have succeeded, —and was given up. The Templemoyle school—which was specifically the farmers' school—continues to flourish. The first outlay was considerable. The buildings cost £2,400; and are capable of accommodating not less than 70 boarders. These expenses were met by the contributions of 112 shareholders, and of a certain number of annual subscribers at 40s. a-year. The annual expense of board and instruction amounts to £10 a-year. Parents or landlords pay this for the largest proportion (the parents paying for about one-third), the Drapers' and Grocers' companies, the Irish society, and the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests for the remainder. The lowest age for admission is 14; it is better they should come at the age of 17. The school is open to all classes and persuasions, and is frequented from all parts of Ireland. The school is divided into two equal divisions; one remains in school, while the other is occupied abroad. The class in school pursue, under the head-master, reading English, English grammar, writing, arithmetic, geography, construction of maps, book-keeping in reference to their special occupations, farmers' accounts, &c. Euclid's Elements, trigonometry, in its application to heights and distances, land-surveying, together with the use of the water-level, theodolite, chain, &c. The other division works the farm and garden, under the head-farmer, divided into bands, each superintended by its respective monitor, who is responsible for the conduct of his band. The number of scholars in 1835 was 39. Of the students who had left previous to Sept. 1843, 93 had emigrated, 36 were employed as land-stewards, and the great majority were occupied in agriculture. The committee propose extending the accommodations.

TEMPLEMOYLE, co. Galway. See TEMPLEGAILE.

TEMPLEMURRIG, a parish in the barony of Tyrallow, 2½ miles north-north-west of Killalla, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, north-north-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,240 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches,—of which 5 acres, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,328, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,868; in 1841, 1,291. Houses 233. The Loonalaghan rivulet, on its way to Lackan bay, runs across a western wing of the parish; and Rathfran bay, an offshoot or creek of Killalla bay, forms most of the eastern boundary. See RATHFRAN. The surface is bleak, yet consists principally of arable land. The principal hamlets are Mullaghmacross, Stonybutler, Palmerstown, and Rathnasnanrath.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LACKAN [which see], in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial and rectorial tithes are each compounded for £54; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery and the precentorship of Killalla cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 1,963; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TEMPLENCARRIGA, or TEMPLENCARRIG, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 4½ miles north by west of Middleton, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of WALSHSTOWN; which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,208 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,602; in 1841, 1,574. Houses 248. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,322. Houses 205. The surface consists variously of arable, pastoral, and mountainous land, yet, in a general view, is tolerably productive; and it is watered southward by the head-streams of the Middleton river, and traversed by the road from Middleton to Rathcorrack.

—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the treasurership of Cloyne cathedral, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £498 8s. 8d.; glebe, £21. Gross income, £519 8s. 8d.; nett, £411 5s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. A school-house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 17. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 1,650; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 6 scholars; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 from subscription—had on their books 14 boys and 6 girls.

TEMPLENECRY. See TEMPLENEIRY.

TEMPLENEILAN, the former name of the parish of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught. See ROSCOMMON.

TEMPLENEIRY, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 3½ miles east-south-east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of BANSHA; which see. Length, south-south-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 12,840 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches,—of which 25 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches are in Lough Muskerry. Pop., in 1831, 2,961; in 1841, 3,700. Houses 537. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,680; in 1841, 3,322. Houses 473. The southern district consists of a portion of the north side of the Galtee mountains; the central district is a beautiful portion of the picturesque vale of Aherlow; and the northern district is a warm, fertile, and aggregately embellished tract round the village and mansion of Bansha. See GALTEE, AHERLOW, and BANSHA. Five summits on the southern boundary have altitudes—notice them in the order from east to west—of respectively 1,782, 1,553, 2,378, 2,636, and 2,568 feet of altitude above sea-level. Four indigenous rivulets, all northerly in course, and falling into the Aherlow, rise among the Galtees at elevations above sea-level, of respectively 806, 912, 1,224, and 1,765 feet. The Aherlow stream, while within the parish, flows in an eastward direction, and descends from an elevation of 198 to one of 177 feet. The lake Muskerry lies among the mountains in the south-western district. All the gentlemen's seats are situated north of the Aherlow, and are Castle-Mary, Ashgrove-house, Ballydavid-house, Lismaeue-house, and Bansha-castle,—the two last the beautiful and well-wooded residences of respectively William Baker, Esq., and E. O'Ryan Esq. The other chief objects of interest are a constabulary barrack, the site of St. Berrahert's church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and an old castle. The road from Tipperary to Cahir passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £230 15s.; glebe, £27. The rectories of Templeineiry and GRAYSTOWN, and the vicarage of DONOHILL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Templeineiry, and the corps of the precentorship of Cashel cathedral. The parishes are not mutually contiguous. Pop., in 1831, 9,473. Gross income, £702 7s. 4d.; nett, £606 11s. 2d.; but these sums are exclusive of respectively £21 10s., and £15 8s. 6d. specially belonging to the precentorship. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates are employed for the occasional duties of Donohill and Graystown on salaries of respectively £10 and £5. The church of Templeineiry is situated at Bansha, and was built at a date and cost now unknown, and was repaired, and received the accession of a steeple, in 1814, by means of a loan of £692 6s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 75; attendance, from 20 to 45. The Templeineiry Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Bansha, and has an attendance of from 1,400 to 1,500. There are two Roman Catholic chapels also at Donohill and Annacorthy, both in the parish of Donohill. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish of Templeenry amounted to 61, and the Roman Catholics to 3,068; the Protestants of the union to 126, and the Roman Catholics to 9,605; 4 daily schools in the parish were supported wholly by fees, and had on their books 95 boys and 101 girls; and 14 daily schools in the union had on their books 532 boys and 361 girls.

TEMPLENOE, a parish in the barony of Dunkerrin, 5½ miles south-west by west of Kenmare, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 32,426 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,882; in 1841, 4,189. Houses 711. The limits include the three small islands of Dunkerrin, Cappanacoss, and Grenane, near the head of the Kenmare estuary. The mainland is bounded, on the north-east, by the Finchy rivulet; on the south-east, by the Kenmare estuary; on the south-west, by the romantic river Blackwater; and on the north-west, by the alpine abutments of MacGillicuddy's Reeks. The surface is, for the most part, mountainous and comparatively barren; a considerable proportion of it is rocky, and a large proportion is boggy; and "the few spots of tillage and potatoe culture" which were to be seen when Dr. Smith wrote, "were scattered about here and there among the rocks, and were most miserably secured from the depredations of cattle, so that, for want of hedges and other fences, they were obliged to keep people in them, when the corn was near ripe, to drive them out." Limestone is found on the sea-board; and a tolerable kind of grey marble, a considerable quantity of which was at one time quarried and polished at the charge of Sir William Petty, occurs in the island of Cappanacoss. Dunkerrin-castle, situated on the shore 1½ mile west-south-west of Kenmare, gives name to the barony, and was formerly the chief residence of O'Sullivan-More. "According to Camden," says Dr. Smith, "this castle was anciently built by the Carews of England; but this seems to be a mistake, as is likewise his saying that it was possessed by Donald MacCarty-More, for it was always accounted the principal residence of the O'Sullivans, and probably erected by an ancestor of that house. This place, from its name and other circumstances, seems to be of great antiquity; for, in the ancient British language, Dun or Tun, as also in the Phœnician and Irish, signifies an hill. The Gauls, according to a learned antiquary, also called an hill by the same name. The word Korn or Kern, in the ancient British, signifies an horn; which etymologists derive from the Phœnician Cberen, signifying the same; and they named any corner or angle of land by that name, as Cyprus was Cerastis, and Cornwall in England, according to Camden, and several other places too tedious to mention. There are still to be seen between the remains of the castle and the sea, the foundation-walls of several old buildings, which, together with the antiquity of the name, and its being mentioned in some copies of Ptolemy's maps, besides the tradition of the country, all seem to point out its having been anciently a place of some note." The castle of Cappanacoss or Cappanacushy, situated in the south-western district of the parish, was the seat of a junior branch of the family of O'Sullivan-More, and is said to have been built by MacCrath, the brother of O'Sullivan-More; and from the O'Sullivans, both the MacCraths of this place, and the MacCrobans of Iveragh, had their name. The O'Sullivans are traditionally said to have come hither from Knockgraffon in the county of Tipperary; and they are said also to have built the old church of Templenoe, which very long ago became a ruin. The Templenoe dispensary is within the Kenmare Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,462; and, in 1839-40, it expended £79 11s., and administered to 1,321 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCROHANE [which see], in the dio. of Ardferit and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £122 6s. 1d.; glebe, £40. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilocrohan and Kenmare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 107, and the Roman Catholics to 4,037; and 3 daily schools—one of which was wholly supported by Mr. Longford, and one by the Rev. Denis Mahony—had on their books 66 boys and 35 girls.

TEMPLENOE, or LISNAVILLA, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 2½ miles north-east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 2; area, 2,720 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,156, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,089; in 1841, 1,154. Houses 149. The surface consists of prime land; and is traversed by the roads from Tipperary to respectively Cashel and Thurles. A stream which flows upon the south-west boundary has there an elevation of 282 feet above sea-level. The principal objects of any interest are Greenane-house and demesne, Newtown hamlet, a constabulary barrack, the glebe-house, and the site of a church.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TIPPERARY [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 3d.; glebe, £27. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 1,123; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 79 boys and 40 girls.

TEMPLEOGUE, a hamlet on the north-eastern verge of the parish of Tallaght and barony of Upper-cross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the river Dodder, and on the road from Dublin to Blessington, about 7 furlongs west-south-west of Rathfarnham, and 3 miles south-west of Dublin-castle. Adjoining it are Templeogue-bridge, and the ruins of Templeogue church,—the former across the Dodder; and in the south-western vicinity is Templeogue-house, formerly and for a long period a residence of the Domville family, but now the seat of Charles Lever, Esq.

TEMPLEOMALUS, a parish in the barony of Ihane and Barryroe, 2½ miles south-east by east of Clonakilty, co. Cork, Munster. It contains part of the village of ARUNDLMILLS: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,931 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,352; in 1841, 1,612. Houses 275. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,521. Houses 258. The surface lies on the east side of Clonakilty bay, and consists, in general, of good land.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £200 5s. 4d.; glebe, £8 0s. 4d. Gross income, £208 5s. 8d.; nett, £174 17s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. A licensed house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilgariff. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 1,354; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 a-year from the Roman Catholic clergyman—were usually attended by about 103 scholars.

TEMPLEORAN, or FORAN, a parish in the barony of Moygoish, 5½ miles north-west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,188 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 15 acres,

1 rood, 24 perches are in Lough Iron. Pop., in 1831, 1,298; in 1841, 1,395. Houses 234. The surface extends from a point $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Mullingar to the foot of Lough Iron; it contains some of the best land in the province, and is largely embellished by the well-wooded demesne of Sonna, the fine residence of M. H. Tuite, Esq.; and it is traversed by the Royal canal and the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo. The summit of Frewin-hill, on the eastern boundary, has an altitude above sea-level of 568 feet. The chief antiquities are Piercefield-castle, and the ruins of Templeoran church.—This parish is an impropriate rectory, and part of the perpetual curacy of LENEY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £137 3s., and belong to Sir John Bennet Piers, Bart. of Tristernagh-abbey. The Sonna Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbixy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 62, and the Roman Catholics to 1,200; and one pay daily school was usually attended by about 26 scholars.

TEMPLEORUM, a village in the parish of Fiddown, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Pilltown, on the road thence to Knocktopher. In the vicinity are Oldcourt-house, Tinnakelly-wood, and the ruins of Templeorum-castle. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ossory takes designation from the village, and has chapels here and at Pilltown and Owning.

TEMPLEOUGHTER, a parish in the barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is so interlaced and completely consolidated with the parish of Tirmacrevan, that its boundaries cannot be ascertained, and its separate statistics cannot be given. It therefore has only a nominal existence; and figures, in documents, as a rectory, and part of the benefice of Tirmacrevan, in the dio. of Connor. See TIRMACREVAN.

TEMPLEOUTRAGH, or UPPERCHURCH, a parish in the barony of Upper Kilnemanagh, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by west of Holycross, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, eastward, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from 1 to $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 12,902 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,635; in 1841, 3,147. Houses 447. The western district is part of the Bilboa mountains; and even the eastern district contains some rather lofty ground, and lies upon a comparatively high basis. The summit of Knocknascriggan, a few chains beyond the north-western boundary, has an altitude of 1,296 feet above sea-level; the summits of Foilnahan and Knockavillage, in the interior of the western district, have altitudes of respectively 1,205 and 1,216 feet. Moher-hill, adjoining the hamlet of Upperchurch, in the eastern district, has an altitude of 987 feet; two affluents of the Bilboa rivulet rise in the western district, at elevations of respectively 1,098 and 1,021 feet; a headstream of the Cloddiagh rivulet rises in the western district at an elevation of 968 feet; two affluents of the Cloddiagh rise in the central district at elevations of respectively 762 and 817 feet; one affluent of the Cloddiagh rises on the east side of Moher-hill at an elevation of 604 feet; and a headstream of the Owenbeg rivulet rises in the south-eastern district at an elevation of 678 feet. The Anglesey road passes across the western district; and the road from Holycross to Nenagh traverses the east and the centre. The principal hamlet is Upperchurch; the principal seats are Gortkelly-house and Mount-Prospect; the principal antiquities are four cromlechs, the site of Cashla-green-castle, and the ruins of another castle.—This parish is a wholly impropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Cashel. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at the hamlet of Upperchurch, and has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Moyalliffe. In 1834, the parishioners, with two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 202 boys and 106 girls.

TEMPLEPATRICK, a parish in the baronies of Lower Belfast and Upper Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. The Upper Belfast section contains the village of Templepatrick. Length, west-north-westward, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; but these measurements include the parish of Ballymartin, and the granges of Molusk, Ballyrobert, and Ungall, which are often regarded as portions of the parish of Templepatrick. Area of the Lower Belfast section, 5,220 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches,—of which 383 acres, 2 roods are in the parish of Ballymartin, 928 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches are in the grange of Molusk, and 883 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches are in the grange of Ballyrobert. Area of the Upper Belfast section, 8,969 acres, 3 roods, 0 perches,—of which 233 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches are in the grange of Ungall. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of the parish of Ballymartin and the grange of Molusk, 4,217. Pop., in 1841, exclusive of every thing not belonging to Templepatrick-proper, 3,559. Houses 583. Pop. of the Lower Belfast section, in 1841, 1,544. Houses 255. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Belfast section, in 1841, 1,821. Houses 291. The surface comprises much upland, and is very diversified in character. The land varies in annual value from 5s. to £3 per plantation acre, but averages about 25s. The road from Antrim to Belfast, and the mountain-road from Antrim to Carrickfergus, pass through the interior. Hyde-park demesne is in the grange of Molusk. Castle-Upton demesne, the residence of Lord Templetown, is in the north-west district of Templepatrick-proper, near the village of Templepatrick. The original and venerable mansion of Castle-Upton, built in the reign of Elizabeth by Sir Robert Norton, has been repaired; and the grounds and landed property around it have been much improved. See TEMPLETOWN. The village of Roughfort is in the Lower Belfast section, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 195. The village of Templepatrick stands 4 miles east-south-east of Antrim, on the road thence to Carrickfergus. Fairs are held on May 11, July 10, and Oct. 31. The Presbyterian congregation of Templepatrick was one of the earliest formed in Ireland; and Josias Welsh, a grandson of the Scottish reformer, John Knox, is said to have been its minister; though, according to Dr. Seaton Reid, he succeeded Robert Blair of Bangor at Oldstone. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland has its seat at the village, exercises inspection over eleven congregations, and meets on the first Tuesday of Feb., May, Aug., Sept., and Nov. The congregations under this presbytery are two at Randalls-town, two at Donegore, and seven at respectively Templepatrick, Killead, Lyle-hill, Crunlin, Antrim, Dunderod, and Muckamore. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 314; in 1841, 194. Houses 37.—Templepatrick parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial title composition and gross income, £295; nett, £264 12s. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Belfast, and is non-resident in Templepatrick. The rectorial tithes of 7 of the 13 townlands of which the parish consists, belong to the incumbent; the rectorial tithes of the remaining 6 townlands are inappropriate in the Marquis of Donegal; those of two of these 6 townlands are leased in perpetuity by Lord Templetown, and included in the rent; and those of the remaining 4 of these townlands, are compounded for £70, and held in lease by the incumbent. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, from 50 to 65. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, formerly belonging to the Synod of Ulster, have each an attendance of 200; and a Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Secession Synod, has an attendance of from 200 to 300. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 194 Churchmen, 4,025 Presbyterians, 63 other Protestant dissenters, and 147 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools had on their books 221 boys and 208 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board; one, with £8 from the National Board, £2 2s. from Mr. J. Templetown, and £1 from the vicar; one, with £20 from the fund of Erasmus Smith, besides £15 in gratuities from that fund; and one, with £22 from the fund of Erasmus Smith. In 1843, one National school at Lyle-hill was salaried with £15 from the Board, and had on its books 44 boys and 22 girls; one at Ballylough, with £12, and had 55 boys and 55 girls; one at Molusk, with £12 13s. 4d., and had 50 boys and 13 girls; one at Clackanduff, with £12, and had 41 boys and 24 girls; and one at Carnanee, with £12, and had 49 boys and 27 girls.

TEMPLEPATRICK, a quondam chapel in the parish of Donaghadee, ½ mile south-south-west of the town of Donaghadee, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. The grave-yard still exists; and beside it is a spring called St. Patrick's-Well, remarkable for the limpidness of its water, and for its ancient fame of imputed efficacy in relieving headache.

TEMPLEPATRICK, co. Westmeath. See MOYVORE.

TEMPLEPETER, a parish in the barony of Forth, 4½ miles south-west of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,045 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 349; in 1841, 317. Houses 50. The surface consists, in general, of prime land; and is traversed by the road from Tullow to Leighlin-bridge. The only noticeable objects are a grave-yard, the ruins of the church, the site of Ballymogue-castle, and the ruins of Graiguenaspiddoge.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £64 10s.; nett, £58 5s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefices of Augha and Dunleckny, in the dio. of Leighlin; and is non-resident in Templepeter. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 27 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 253 Roman Catholics; a hedge-school had on its book 36 boys and 41 girls; and there was neither church nor chapel.

TEMPLEPLACE, a village in the parish of Donaghumper, barony of South Salt, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the right bank of the river Liffey, and on the road from Celbridge to Oughterard, 5 furlongs south by west of Celbridge. It has a school. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 279. Houses 44.

TEMPLEPORT, a parish in the barony of Tullaghagh, 34 miles west-south-west of Ballyconnel, co. Cavan, Ulster. It contains the village of Bawnor; which see. Length, south-eastward, 14½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 5; area, 42,171 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches,—of which 1,532 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,758; in 1841, 12,100. Houses 1,908. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 12,004. Houses 1,980. The north-western and the central districts are mountainous, wild, and to a great extent waste; but the south-eastern district contains a large proportion of profitable land, and is beautified with several demesnes and extensive sheets of cultivation, and much diversified with lakes and other pleasant natural features. The summit of Slievenakilla, at the north-western extremity of the north-western district, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,793 feet; the summits of Moneensauran and Benbrack, on the south-western boundary, have an altitude of respectively 1,533 and 1,648 feet; the summit of Tiltinbane, on the north-eastern boundary, near the north-eastern extremity, has an altitude of 1,949 feet; the summit of Cuileagh, two or three chains beyond the north-eastern boundary of the north-western district, has an altitude of 2,188 feet; and the summit of Legavagra, a few chains beyond the northern boundary of the south-eastern district, has an altitude of 1,279 feet. Legmashinin, the magnificent source of the river Shannon, occurs near the northern extremity of the north-western district [see SHANNON]; the Owenmore rivulet waters the central portion of that district, to a confluence with the Shannon; and the Blackwater and other rivulets within the catchment basin of the Erne, water the central and the south-eastern districts. The principal lakes on the boundaries are Loughs Derrycasse, Ballymagouran, Glebe, Killyvan, and Muntereolus,—the first having a surface-elevation of 172 feet above sea-level; and the principal in the interior are Loughs Bowerky, Bellaboy, Brackley, and Templeport,—the first, the second, and the third having surface-elevations above sea-level of respectively 182, 179, and 197 feet. The principal hamlets are Ballymagouran and Kilsib; and these had, in 1831, a pop. of respectively 89 and 60. The principal country residences are Brackley-lodge, Springfield, Corville, Lissanover, Rosehall, Lakefield, the Cottage, Glengavlen, and Bawnboy-house,—the last the seat of Mr. Hassard. The roads from Swanlinbar to Killeshandra and Ballinamore, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £278; glebe, £388 9s. 9d. Gross income, £666 9s. 9d.; nett, £585 17s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. An order in Council of March 24, 1835, dissolved the union of the benefices of Drumreilly and Templeport as then existing, erected each into a separate benefice, and permanently transferred from Drumreilly to Templeport the glebe-lands of Tomlucky and Knox, the former comprising 101 acres, and the latter, 70 acres, 37 perches. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 130. The Trinity, Kilinevat, Ardera, and Templeport Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 900, 800, 800, and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, all, except the last, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,271 Churchmen, 2 Presbyterians, and 9,922 Roman Catholics; and 14 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and £4 from subscription, one with £3 3s. from subscription, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £10 from subscription—had on their books 517 boys and 365 girls. In 1843, one National school at Currin was aided with £21 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 62 boys and 57 girls; one at Bawnboy, with £12, and had 78 boys and 52 girls; one at Crea, with books only, and had 64 boys and 36 girls; one at Tullybrack, with £7 6s. 8d., and had 163 boys and 94 girls; one at Drimloher, with £4, and had 92 boys and 66 girls; and one at Garvolt, with £12, and had 70 boys and 23 girls.

TEMPLEQUINLAN, a parish, 2½ miles east-north-east of Clonakilty, and partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, partly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, from ¼ to 1. Area of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 1,346 acres; of the East Carbery section, 923. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,042; in 1841, 1,247. Houses 225. Pop. of the Ibane and Barryroe section, in 1831, 821; in 1841, 923. Houses 166. The surface is part of the south side of the basin of the Arrigadeen river. A portion of the land is good; and the remainder is of indifferent or only tolerable quality.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £115 0s. 10d.; nett, £109 5s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. But the benefice has been suspended under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act; and the incumbent of the adjoining benefice performs the occasional duties for a salary of £25. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £115 0s. 10d., and are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. A licensed room is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 3. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 1,156; and there was no school.

TEMPLEREE. See TEMPLEFRY.

TEMPLEROAN, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, 3 miles east of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of SHANBALLYMORE: which see. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,866 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,778; in 1841, 1,802. Houses 292. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,373; in 1841, 1,331. Houses 207. The surface consists of part of the beautiful and romantic valley of the AWEAG [which see]; and, excepting about 450 acres of mountain, it is everywhere arable. The road from Doneraile to Mitchellstown passes through the interior; and the route of the Dublin and Cork railway, as proposed by the Public Commissioners, approaches closely upon the south.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DONERAILE [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Doneraile. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 1,788; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 100 boys and 45 girls.

TEMPLEROBIN, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the greater part of the town of COVE [which see]; and it consists of the islands of SPIKE and HAWLBOWLINE, and the eastern division of GREAT ISLAND, all in the upper part of CORK HARBOUR: see these articles. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 3,594 acres. Pop., in 1831, 8,220; in 1841, 7,391. Houses 875. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,462. Houses 363. The surface is much diversified, and not a little beautiful; but has already been sufficiently noticed in the articles on Cove and the islands. The soil of the loftier grounds is in general poor; and that of the lower grounds is in general of medium quality.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLONMEL [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £323 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £11 5s. The church is situated in the town of Cove, and was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £223 1s. 6½d. raised by subscription. Sittings 750; attendance 700. The General hospital at Cove is attended by 6; the Military chapel at Spike Island, by 150; and the Hospital at Spike Island, by 25. The Methodist chapel has an attendance of 160. The Cove and the Ballymore Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 3,950 and 480; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,044, and the Roman Catholics to 6,960; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 130 scholars; and 15 daily schools had on their books 568 boys and 181 girls. Three of the schools were parochial for respectively males, females, and infants, and were salaried with respectively £60, £40, and £35, from annual subscriptions and a charity sermon; and another of the daily schools was salaried with £25 a-year from bequest by Mr. William Lynch, and £5 from collections at chapel. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Cove were salaried with respectively £25, and £15 6s. 8d., and had on their books 217 boys and 190 girls.

TEMPLESCOBBIN, or TEMPLESCOB, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Bantry, 1½ mile west-south-west of Emisecorby, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,707 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 405; in 1841, 495. Houses 78. The surface consists, in general, of arable land of a middle-rate quality; and is traversed by the road from Emisecorby to New Ross. The river Urrin traces the northern boundary. The seats are Dunsinane, Jamestown-cottage, Bloomfield, and Veronahouse.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £135. Gross income, £158 2s.; nett, £105 11s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 95; attendance 47. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 379; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 17 boys and 7 girls.

TEMPLESHAMBO, or TEMPLESHANBOUGH, a parish in the barony of Scarewalsh, 4½ miles south by west of Newtownbarry, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, eastward, 5½ miles; breadth, from 2 to 5½; area, 19,516 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,198; in 1841, 5,178. Houses 861. The western district is part of the western verge of the county, and consists wholly of a portion of the Mount Leinster and Blackstairs mountains, and the intervening wild and savage alpine defile called Scullog Gap; and even the eastern district, though prevalently champaign, arable, and tufted with wood, possesses some loftily hilly ground, and lies on a comparatively high base. The summit of Mount Leinster, at the north-western extremity of the parish, has an altitude above sea-level of 2,610 feet; the summit of Blackrock mountain, on the northern boundary, has an altitude of 1,971 feet; and a height on the eastern border, near the boundary, has an altitude of 723 feet. Two head-streams of the Urrin river rise in the western district at elevations of 800 and 839 feet above sea-level; and two head-streams of the Glasha rivulet rise in the central district at elevations of upwards of 319 and 384 feet. The principal hamlets are KILTIELY [which see], Ballindagran, and Curraghgraique; the principal seats are Coolycarney, Willmount-house, Duffry-hall, and Ballychristal,—the third in a state of ruin, and the fourth, the residence of Mr. James, romantically situated on the acclivity of Blackrock mountain; and the other principal objects of interest are a constabulary station, the site of an old church, and the roads from Newtownbarry to New Ross, and from Emisecorby to Goresbridge,—the latter up Scullog Gap.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the precentorship of Ferns cathedral, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £1,200; glebe, £78. Gross income, £1,278; nett, £1,070 6s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The civil parish of Templeshambo, or that from which the tithe composition is levied, includes also the perpetual curacy of MONART; which see. The church of Templeshambo was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £276 18s. 5½d. raised by parochial assessment; and enlarged in 1826, by means of a loan of £300 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 170. The Ballindagban and the Kiltelly Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 900 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Cairn and Newtownbarry. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 438, and the Roman Catholics to 4,059; and 10 daily schools were usually attended in summer by about 403 scholars. One of the schools was salaried with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the fund of Erasmus Smith, and some advantages from the rector; and one with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and payments, to an amount not recorded, from the Foundling Hospital for foundling children. In 1843, a National school at Kiltelly was salaried with £8 a-year, and had on its books 93 boys and 63 girls.

TEMPLESHANNON, a parish, partly in the barony of Scarawalsh, but chiefly in that of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. The Ballaghkeen section contains part of the town of ENNISCORTHY; which see. Length, south-south-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½. Area of the Scarawalsh section, 1,381 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches,—of which 1 acre, 3 roods, 20 perches are in the river Slaney. Area of the Ballaghkeen section, 3,601 acres, 36 perches,—of which 11 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches are in the Slaney. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,743; in 1841, 3,232. Houses 601. Pop. of the Scarawalsh section, in 1841, 181.* Houses 30. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ballaghkeen section, in 1841, 1,154. Houses 208. The surface extends along the left bank of the Slaney both above and below Enniscorthy; and is strictly identical with the eastern half of the environs of that town. Vinegar-hill—a height of 389 feet above sea-level, and closely adjoining the town—has a most lugubrious association with the rebellion of 1798, is the most conspicuous feature in a great extent of circumjacent country, and commands a brilliant panoramic view of the river and basin of the Slaney. See VINEGAR-HILL. The principal country residences are Yorkville, Greenmount-house, Ballinaharney-house, Clonhasten-house, Charleville-house, Belgrove-house, Aughnagally-house, Salville-house, and Rosgrove-house. The principal hamlets are Coilgarrow and Kilpierce, and are situated in the east. The east road from Enniscorthy to Wexford, the east road from Enniscorthy to Gorey, and the road from Enniscorthy to Oulart, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Mary's of Enniscorthy, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £470 2s. 3d.; glebe, £69. The Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of 30. The other places of worship attended by the parishioners are within the adjoining parish of St. Mary's. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 399 Churchmen, 26 Protestant dissenters, and 2,404 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £52 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and £20 from Lord Portsmouth—had on their books 87 boys and 44 girls.

TEMPLETENNY, a parish 3 miles west of

Clogheen, on the western verge of the barony of West Iffa and Offa, and at the south-western extremity of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of BALLYPOOREEN; which see. Length, in the direction of south by east, 9½ miles; breadth, from ¼ to 4½; area, 18,181 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 5,786, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,786; in 1841, 6,907. Houses 1,120. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,135. Houses 995. The surface extends southward from the summit-line of the Galtee mountains, across the valley of the Tar rivulet and the Mitchellstown Caves, up and over the Knockmeledown mountains to the bottom of the vale or to the stream of the Arraglin. See ARRAGLIN, MITCHELLSTOWN, and TAR. The central or valley district contains the greatest breadth of the parish, and consists in general of good land. The summit of Galteemore, ¾ of a mile west-south-west of the north-western extremity of the parish, has an altitude above sea-level of 3,015 feet; a summit of the Galtees in the interior of the northern district, has an altitude of 1,977 feet; and Carron-hill, a summit of the Knockmeledown mountains in the interior of the southern district, has an altitude of 1,189 feet. The Arraglin rivulet, at the middle of the line of its contact with the parish, has an elevation above sea-level of 320 feet; and a head-stream of the Tar rivulet rises on the western border of the central district at an elevation of 307 feet. The scenery of the parish, particularly among the gorges of the Galtees, is replete with power and character; and the Earl of Kingston's mountain-lodge is romantically nestled in one of its ravines. See GALTEE. The other seats are Dangan-house and Ballywilliam-house; the principal hamlets are Carrigavistal and Cooladerry,—the former of which had in 1831, a pop. of 58; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of two churches. Both the eastern and the western mail-roads from Cork to Dublin pass down the valley between the Galtees and Knockmeledown mountains.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of SHANRAHAN (which see), in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £184 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £6 17s. 6d. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Shanrahan, are compounded for £820, and are inappropriate in Viscount Lismore, and Caesar Sutton, Esq. The church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 50; attendance 11. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of about 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 3,969; and, notwithstanding the multitudinousness of the population, there was no school. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Templetenny were salaried with respectively £15 and £8 a-year from the National Board, and had on their books 71 boys and 57 girls.

TEMPLETHAY, TEMPLEHAY, or TEMPLE-ETNEY, a parish in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, 4 miles north-east by east of Clonmel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, eastward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 2 to 2½; area, 6,677 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,437; in 1841, 1,500. Houses 233. The northern district is boldly upland, and is wholly occupied with a portion of the Slievenaman group of mountains; and the southern district is champaign, and consists in general of good land. The summits of Slievenaman, Carrickabrock, and another height, all on the northern boundary, have altitudes of respectively 2,364, 1,859, and 1,589 feet above sea-level; and a height nearly in the centre of the parish has an altitude of 1,096 feet. The principal seats are Graigue-house and Ballyknockane-cottage; the principal hamlets are Killurney, Graigue, and Ballypatrick; and the other noticeable objects are the ruins of a church and a Roman Catholic chapel. The road from Fethard to Carrick-on-Suir passes through the interior; and the mail-road from Clonmel to Dublin approaches very close to the south-east corner.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCASH [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £92 10s. 9d., and the rectorial for £119 19s. 11d., and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Lismore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 1,501; and a daily school was salaried with £14 a-year from the National Board, and had on its books 105 boys and 47 girls.

TEMPLETOGHER, a parish $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of the village of Ballymoe, and on the northern border of the barony of Ballymoe, and of the county of Galway, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 13,705 acres, 3 roads, 18 perches,—of which 70 acres, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,881; in 1841, 4,976. Houses 937. The surface is pre-eminently low, flat, bleak, and without character; it consists partly of bog, and chiefly of poor land; and it is traversed by the road from Ballymoe to Dunmore. The principal residence is Springfield-house, and is situated on the eastern border. The hamlets are numerous and poor; two of the principal, Pulshasy and Ballygaruff, had, in 1831, a pop. of respectively 35 and 72; and the chief of the others are Briarford, Polymoon, West Island, East Island, Lettera, Forty Acres, Knockanarry, Moneenally, Gloryford, Derrywode, Williamstown, Monasterown, Lower Castletogher, Middle Castletogher, Upper Castletogher, Gaheen, Ballaghgar, Middle Cloonaghaura, Keelogue, West Curragh, Kildare, North Polleagh, Pollremon, Kilnalug, and Corralough.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILTULLACH [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £29 13s. 9d., and the rectorial for £37 13s. 10d.; and the latter are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Tuam. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 2,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Glenamadda, in the parish of Boyamagh. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 151 boys and 43 girls.

TEMPLETOHY, or TEMPLETOUHY. See TEMPLETOUHY.

TEMPLETOWN, a parish in the barony of Shelburne, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Fethard, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 34 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,156 acres, 3 roads, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,387; in 1841, 1,426. Houses 242. The surface extends southward along Waterford Harbour from Duncannon Strand, and includes also about 2 miles of the upper part of the east coast of Hook peninsula. About two-thirds of the land are good; and the other third is of indifferent quality. The highest ground, Brown Hill, is in the south, has an altitude of 214 feet above the level of the sea, and commands a good view of Waterford Harbour, Hook peninsula, Bannow bay, and the circumjacent country. The little bays or coves of Booley, Dollar, Broomhill, Stonewall, Templetown, Harrylock, and Oldtown, slightly indent or undulate the west coast; and those of Sandeel and Woarwoy occur in the east. The chief hamlets are Templetown, Harrylock, Little Graigue, and Large Graigue,—the first of which had, in 1831, a pop. of 50. The principal seats are Prior-hill and Graigue house; and the other chief objects of interest are the church, the Roman Catholic chapel, a coast-guard station, and the ruins of the Templars' church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and two castles. The Templars' church gives name to the parish, and belonged to a preceptory for Knights Templars, which was founded by O'More, and which, on the suppression of the order of Templars, passed to the Knights Hospitallars.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of Hook [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes are compounded for £123 17s. 1d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Ely. The church was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Poulfar chapel in the parish of Fethard, and Ramagrange and Duncannon chapels in the parish of St. James. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 1,290; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 17 scholars; and a pay daily school had on its books 69 boys and 34 girls.

TEMPLETOWN, a village in the parish of Carlingford, barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. It is situated near the extremity of Carlingford peninsula, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile north-west of Cooley Point, 2 miles south-west by west of Bellagun Point, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-east of the town of Carlingford. At the village is an old church; and within a mile are a coast-guard station, and the seats of Wilville, Ballug-house, Ballug-castle, and Mount-Dobbin. Pop. returned with the parish.

TEMPLETOWN, a locality in the county of Antrim, which gives the title of Baron and Viscount in the peerage of Ireland to the noble family of Upton. Henry Upton, Esq., the founder of this family, was a captain in the army of the Earl of Essex in 1598, and married a daughter of Sir John Clotworthy. In 1776, Clotworthy Upton, Esq., was created Baron Templetown; and in 1806, John Henry, the second baron, was advanced to the dignity of Viscount Templetown. The family-seat is Castle-Upton, in the parish of TEMPLEPATRICK: which see.

TEMPLETRINE, a parish 5 miles south-west of Kinsale, and partly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, partly in the barony of Courneys, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Carbery section, 2,328 acres; of the Courneys section, 2,456 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,020; in 1841, 2,149. Houses 348. Pop. of the Courneys section, in 1831, 1,310; in 1841, 1,128. Houses 189. The surface lies on Courtmacsherry bay, eastward from the vicinity of the isthmus of the peninsula of the Old Head of Kinsale. The land is very variable in quality; but most of it is good, and some is excellent. The principal features of both the coast and the interior belong to the demesne of GARRETSTOWN: which see.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £477; glebe, £26. Gross income, £503; nett, £422 1s. 11d. Patron, Thomas Cuthbert Kearney, Esq. of Garretstown. The church was built in 1821, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 2,049; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £16 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 326 boys and 145 girls.

TEMPLETUOHY, or BALLINSIN, a parish, partly in the barony of Eliogurty, but chiefly in that of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Ikerrin sec.

tion contains the village of Templetoohy. Length of the whole, south by westward, 44 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Eliogruy section, 1,226 acres, 2 roads, 5 perches; of the Ikerrin section, 7,234 acres, 1 road, 24 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,633; in 1841, 3,194. Houses 516. Pop., in 1841, of the Eliogruy section, 39; of the rural districts of the Ikerrin section, 2,762. Houses in these respectively 7 and 437. The surface lies along the eastern verge of the county and province; and about one-half of its area, comprising all the east, the extreme north, and the extreme south, is bog. Carrick Hill, on the southern boundary, has an altitude of 452 feet above sea-level. The principal residences are Cranagh-house, Crawford-lodge, Long-Orchard-house, and Lissanure-house; the chief antiquities are the ruins of Tullow-castle, of Lisdallen-castle, of another castle, and of a church. The road from Thurles to Borris-in-Ossory, and that from Templemore to Castle-Durrow, intersect each other in the interior. The village of Templetoohy stands at the intersection of these roads, and nearly in the centre of the parish, about 4 miles east of Templemore. It is the site of the parochial church, the Roman Catholic chapel, a National school, two grave-yards, a dispensary, and the ruins of Lisdallen-castle. A height at the village has an altitude above sea-level of 455 feet. The dispensary is within the Thurles Poor-law union, and, jointly with the dispensary of Templemore, serves for a district containing a pop. of 18,597; and, in 1839-40, it expended £106 17s. 10d., and made 3,542 dispensations of medicine. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 602; in 1841, 393. Houses 72.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £510 10s. 13d.; glebe, £13 15s. The rectories of Templetoohy and CALLABEGS [see that article], constitute the benefice of Templetoohy. Length, south-westward, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 4,253. Gross income, £764 9s. 9d.; nett, £671 15s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Kilbragh, in the cathedral of Cashel. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 200; attendance, about 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Moyne. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 2,718; the Protestants of the union to 86, and the Roman Catholics to 4,388; and 5 daily schools in the union—4 of which were in the parish—had on their books 243 boys and 133 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £15 a-year from subscription; and the other three, with respectively £5, £9, and £10 from the National Board.

TEMPLEUDIGAN, or ST. PETER'S, a parish in the barony of Bantry, 5 miles north-north-east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,177 acres, 1 road, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,434; in 1841, 2,151. Houses 358. The north-western district is part of the lofty upland range of the Blackstairs mountains; but the other districts are champaign, and consist, in general, of good tillage land. White mountain, and two other summits on the western boundary—the former on the boundary with the parish of St. Mullins, and the latter two on the boundary with the county of Carlow—have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,259, 1,679, and 1,627 feet. The rivulet Boro flows along most of the northern and the whole of the north-eastern boundary. Coolbawn, the fine seat of Francis Bruen, Esq., is situated on this stream, and in the north-eastern corner of the parish; the mansion is a handsome edifice, in the enriched Tudor style of architecture; and the surrounding grounds are extensively and tastefully planted. "Coolbawn," remarks Mr. Fraser, "is seen in its best point of view from the high grounds adjacent to the road leading from Tomanino to Meara's-bridge, and which road also connects Castleboro with Coolbawn; and those who are interested in park scenery will not regret this slight detour," from the Dublin and New Ross road by way of Newtownbarry, "to command the beauties of this interesting place." The prevailing scenery of the parish, particularly among the declivities and skirts of the Blackstairs mountains, and along the vale of the Boro, possesses a large aggregate of beauty and power. The village of Ballywilliam, situated near the southern boundary, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile south-south-west of the church, is the site of a constabulary barrack, and the vestiges of Warrett's castle; and about $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile south-east of it are the parochial school and Templeudigan dispensary. The only other objects which challenge special notice are Ballybawn-house, Aughteigemoor hamlet, and the site of two churches. The road from Newtownbarry to New Ross passes through the interior. The Templeudigan dispensary is within the New Ross Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it received £63 1s. 9d., and expended £78 11s. 5d. In 1843, the Templeudigan loan fund had a capital of £1,083, circulated £4,194 in 913 loans, realized a nett profit of £33 9s. 6d., expended for charitable purposes £10, and had 19 depositors or proprietors of its capital.—This parish is a vicarage, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarage is part of the benefice of St. Mary's of New Ross. See ROSS. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £204 4s. 5d., and have been transferred to the uses of the perpetual curacy; and the rectorial tithes are compounded for £188 12s. 8d., and are impropriate in the Frizzel family. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice endowed with the vicarial tithes. Gross income, £204 4s. 5d.; nett, £191 16s. 2½d. Patron, the incumbent of New Ross. The incumbent is non-resident; and a stipendiary curate receives a salary of £75, and an allowance of £25 for lodging-money. The church was built in 1808, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 30 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonleigh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 90 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 1,732 Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school had on its books 15 boys and 15 girls.

TEMPLEUSQUE, TEMPLEISKY, or TEMPLE-ASQUE, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 5 miles north-east of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of RIVERSTOWN; which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,603 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,289; in 1841, 1,429. Houses 209. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,048; in 1841, 1,295. Houses 186. The surface is part of the east side of the catchment basin of the Glannire rivulet, is watered westward by two small affluents of that rivulet, possesses great variety and much aggregate beauty of feature, and is traversed by the mail-road from Cork to Dublin.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLASPGUEMULLANE [which see], in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £316. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 1,263; and a daily school was salaried with £25 a-year from subscription, and had on its books 2 boys and 48 girls.

TEMPLEVALEY. See TEMPLEGAILE.

TEMPO (THE), a rivulet of the eastern division of the county of Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises among the mountains, on the mutual boundary of the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh, and runs about 10 miles within the latter county, past the village of Tempo, and through the parishes of Enniskillen, Agbavea, and Agbalarcher, south-south-westward and southward, to a confluence with the Colebrook river, at a point 14 mile south of Maguire's-bridge.

TEMPO, a village in the parish of Enniskillen, barony of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the Tempo rivulet, and at the intersection of the road from Lisbellaw to Fintona, with that from Enniskillen to Clogher, 4½ miles north-east by north of Lisbellaw, 4½ north-north-west of Brookborough, 3½ west by south of Fivemiletown, 6½ east-north-east of Enniskillen, 8½ south-west by south of Fintona, and 8½ north-west by north of Dublin. Adjacent to it is Tempo-house, the seat of Emerson Tennent, Esq. The immediately circumjacent country is tumulated, hilly, partially mountainous, everywhere much diversified, and prevailing of agreeable appearance. The village itself is a clean and comparatively comfortable place; and it contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, a loan fund, a post-office, and a small inn. The church is a chapel-of-ease to the parochial church of Enniskillen, and was built, not very many years ago, at the expense of the parish. It contains 500 sittings, is served by a perpetual curate, who has a salary of £75, and has an attendance of about 450. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800, is served by two officiates, and is the only chapel of the Roman Catholic parish of Tempo, in the dio. of Clogher. The ruins of the old parish-church of Enniskillen are situated a little west of the village. The Tempo dispensary is within the Enniskillen Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £106 17s. 1d., and made 2,000 dispensations of medicine. In 1843, the Tempo loan fund had a capital of £723, circulated £2,940 in 1,218 loans, realized £24 4s. 11d. of nett profit, expended £5 4s. 8d. for charitable purposes, and had 14 depositors or proprietors of its capital. A fair is held at Tempo on the 28th of every month. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 422. Houses 78. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufactures and trade, 65; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 58; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 4.

TERELLA. See TYRELLA.

TERMON. See TARMON.

TERMONAMUNGAN, a parish in the barony of Omagh, 3½ miles south-west of Castle-Derg, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, east-south-eastward, 10 miles; extreme breadth, 7½; area, 45,399 acres, 13 perches,—of which 288 acres, 34 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,253; in 1841, 7,561. Houses 1,310. The parish forms the extremity of the western wing of the county, is bounded on all sides except the east by the county of Donegal, and approaches on the south-west to within 3 furlongs of Lough Derg. The whole of the surface is part of the central portion of the vast congeries of mountains which spreads through the greater part of the county of Donegal, and large parts of the counties of Londonderry, Tyrone, and Fermanagh; it is prevalently wild, rocky, heathy, sterile, and repulsive; it is diversified principally by the glen of the river Derg, cleaving it from end to end nearly along the centre; and it thus consists mainly of the mountain-vale and spreading bill-screens of the Derg, yet contains various subordinate glens and defiles, both parallel and lateral. Brandy-hill, one of the most conspicuous summits, is situated on the western border, and has an altitude of 1,024 feet above the level of the sea. The rivulet Mournebeg flows partly along the northern boundary, and partly through the north-eastern interior. The principal of numerous loughlets and ponds, locally dignified with the name of lakes, are Loughs Tusker, Bradon, Ahull, Doo, Sallagh, Nakiroey, Apoldoo, Chill, Avelvin, Mullin, Any, and Lack. The hamlet of Killeter is situated in Glenderg, and on the road from Castle-Derg to Pettigo, 3½ miles south-west of Castle-Derg; and is the site of a school and of the parish-church. The chief of the other hamlets are Breenletter, Lenamore, Tullyred, Ballymaskeag, Ballyvetra, Ballyclaber, Loughbary, Seskinawaddy, Meenanoran, and Croagh. The principal antiquities are a standing-stone and a Druidical altar. The roads from Pettigo and Donegal to Strabane pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £438 9s. 3d.; glebe, £10. Gross income, £448 9s. 3d.; nett, £368 18s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance, from 100 to 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 100 to 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 1,000; and a Roman Catholic place of meeting in the open air has an attendance of from 500 to 600. In 1834 the parishioners consisted of 1,695 Churchmen, 768 Presbyterians, and 5,148 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 114 scholars; and 9 daily schools at Altamullen, Magherakill, Killeter, Aghnahoo, Lisnacloon, Carrickoghan, Altgoland, Laught, and another locality, had on their books 369 boys and 162 girls. The daily school at Altamullen was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and £2 from Sir Robert Ferguson; that at Magherakill, with £8 from the National Board, and £1 1s. from Mr. Smith; and that at Killeter, with £8 from the National Board, £2 2s. from the rector, £2 from Sir Robert Ferguson, and £1 1s. from Mr. Smith; that at Aghnahoo, with £8 from the National Board, and £3 3s. from Sir J. Stronge; and that at Lisnacloon, with £8 from the National Board, and £2 from Sir R. Ferguson. In 1843, there were National schools at Altamullen, Magherakill, Lisnacloon, Aghnahoo, Carrickoghan, Laught, and Maghernageeragh.

TERMONBARRY. See TARMONBARRY.

TERMONCARRA, a village in the parish of Kilmore-Erri, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands about half-a-mile east of the coast of the Atlantic, 5 furlongs north of the marine inlet of Portnafranka, and nearly 4 miles north-west by west of Belmullet. In its vicinity are the ruins of a church and Burke's castle. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 192. Houses 37.

TERMONEENY, a parish in the barony of Loughsholin, 2 miles south-east of Maghera, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, south-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,773 acres, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,551; in 1841, 2,539. Houses 438. The whole of the surface, with the exception of a small portion, consists of very fine land. The principal residence is Clover-hill. The road from Magherafelt to Coleraine, and that from Belfast to Londonderry by way of Toome-bridge, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £220; glebe, £158. Gross income, £378; nett, £343 4s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1801, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 230; attendance 40.

A Presbyterian meeting-house was, in 1834, occupied on alternate Sabbaths by Seceders and Covenanters, and had an attendance of 60 Seceders and 90 Covenanters. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 473 Churchmen, 1,284 Presbyterians, 125 other Protestant dissenters, and 771 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £12 from that Society and £2 2s. from the rector—had on their books 165 boys and 109 girls. In 1843, one National school at Derganagh was salaried with £8 from the Board, and had on its books 67 boys and 50 girls; a male school at Lemmaroy, with £11, and had 70 boys; and a female school at Lemmaroy, with £10 10s., and had 66 girls.

TERMONFECKAN, or TORFECKAN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ferrard, and of the county of Louth, Leinster. It contains the villages of TERMONFECKAN and BALTRAY: which see. Length, eastward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, from 1 to $2\frac{3}{4}$; area, 6,382 acres, 4 perches,—of which 77 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are tideway of the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,784,* but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,393; in 1841, 3,344. Houses 614. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,509. Houses 440. The coast is the broadest district, and extends from the mouth of the Boyne to within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of Clogher Head; but the southern district is bounded only over half-a-mile by the Boyne. An extensive rabbit-warren stretches along part of the coast. The prevailing surface of the parish is low, and consists of excellent land. The Termonfeckan rivulet, a stream of about 5 miles in length of run, flows through nearly the middle of the parish and past the village of Termonfeckan. The principal residences are Black-hall, Barn-hill, Carstown-house, Belview, Rath-house, and Newtown-house,—the two last the seats of respectively W. Brabazon, Esq., and J. MacClintock, Esq. Other interesting objects will be noticed in connection with the village.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £432; glebe, £46. The rectories of Termonfeckan, CLOGHER, and MAINE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Termonfeckan. Length and breadth, each 4½ miles. Pop., in 1831, 5,145. Gross income, £675 16s. 10d.; nett, £497 18s. 9½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was partly rebuilt in 1792 at the expense of the parish of Termonfeckan, but at what expense is not known. Sittings 200; attendance 89. The Termonfeckan and Sandpit Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 900 and about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapel of Hacketscross has an attendance of about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Walshestown in the benefice of Rathdrummin. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish—inclusive of 4 Protestant dissenters—amounted to 141, and the Roman Catholics to 3,229; the Protestants of the union to 169, and the Roman Catholics to 4,809; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £12 a-year from the National Board, and one with £10 from the rector—had on their books 150 boys and 63 girls; and 8 daily schools in the union had on their books 288 boys and 98 girls.

TERMONFECKAN, or TORFECKAN, a village in the parish of Termonfeckan, barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. It stands on the Termonfeckan rivulet, and on the road from Drogheda to Clogher, 4 of a mile west of the shore of the Irish sea, 1½ north of Baltray, 2 south-south-west of Clogher, and 4 north-east of Drogheda. The Termonfeckan rivulet is here crossed by a handsome two-arched bridge of cut stone; and the village itself is a neat and pleasant seat of population, frequented in summer as a sea-bathing resort, formerly celebrated as the site of ancient ecclesiastical buildings and one of the residences of the archbishops of Armagh, and boasting a creditable parochial church and the picturesque remains of an ancient castle. "The name Termonfeckan," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "signifies the Sanctuary of St. Fechan, who was abbot of Fowre, in the county of Westmeath; of whom Colgan says that he founded the noble monastery of Edara, which the lord of the territory of Leney endowed with great possessions, and with the tract of land extending from the river, which leaves the monastery, to the sea; and we learn from Ware that there was here an abbey of regular canons, the possessions of which were confirmed by Pope Celestine the Third, A. D. 1195. In former times the founder of a church was obliged, prior to its consecration by the bishop, to endow it with certain properties for the maintenance of the clergy connected with the Establishment. To these lands, which were denominated Erenach or Termon lands, various privileges were annexed; they were exempt from all lay charges, and became sanctuaries, and strictly 'territorium Ecclesiasticum,' and were in some respects equivalent to our glebe lands, and hence the name Termonfeckan. The parish-church of St. Fechan is handsomely situated on a rising ground over the river, and is a neat commodious structure, having a good steeple and spire, but cannot boast of much antiquity. In the chancel some of the archbishops are interred. In the churchyard is an antique stone cross, about six feet high, with bas-reliefs of the usual description, but much defaced; the church also contains some handsome mural monuments. A short distance from the church, and commanding the road to the sea-shore, is a lofty, square, embattled tower, apparently of the reign of Henry the Eighth, in very good preservation. It consists of three stories, having a parapet at the top, with a look-out tower, and a platform on the side next the coast. From its situation and appearance it has evidently been intended as a defence, and even yet might be used as such to advantage, being very strong, and commanding the country all round. It is now inhabited by mendicants, and is called the curate's house; for what reason I could never learn. Termonfeckan has been the residence of two remarkable characters,—Doctor James Usher, and Doctor Oliver Plunkett,—the one celebrated for his learning, the other for his misfortunes. Of the latter it may suffice to say, that he was characterized by Bishop Burnet as a wise and sober man, who was for living quietly, and in due submission to the government. He was convicted of an impossible crime, and sentenced to an ignominious death. He was dragged on a sledge to Tyburn, and executed on the 1st of July, 1681, in the presence of an immense number of spectators. After his execution his head was severed from his body, which was divided into quarters, and buried in St. Giles' churchyard in the fields. At the end of two years it was raised and conveyed to a monastery of English Benedictines at Lambpring, in the Duke of Brunswick's territories in Germany, and reburied there with much pomp. The head, however, even yet adorned with silvery hair, is preserved in a monastery of Dominican nuns at Drogheda, in an ebony casket, in very good preservation; and even yet retains in its features the benign and peaceable character of the archbishop's countenance." The dispensary of Termonfeckan is within the Poor-law union of Drogheda, and serves for a district of 14,526 acres, with a pop. of 6,672; and, in 1839-40, it received £57 6s., and expended £60 1s. Area of the village, 50 acres. Pop., in 1831, 470; in 1841, 412. Houses 86. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 37; in manufactures and trade, 34; in other pursuits, 18. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 36; on their own manual labour, 45; on means not specified, 4.

TERMONMAGRATH, an old fortalice in the parish of Templecorne, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands in the vicinity of Pettigo, and commands an extensive and beautiful view of Lough Erne. See TEMPLECORNE. "The foundation of this castle, according to popular tradition," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is ascribed to the celebrated Malmurphy, or, as he was usually called, Myler Magrath, the first Protestant bishop of Clogher; and there is every reason to believe this tradition correct. The lands on which the castle is situated, anciently constituted the Termon of St. Daveog of Lough Derg, of which the Magraths were hereditarily the termoners or church-wardens; and of this family Myler Magrath was the head; so that these lands properly belonged to him anteriorly to any grant of them derived through his bishopric. He was originally a Franciscan friar, and being a man of distinguished abilities, was advanced by Pope Pius V. to the see of Down; but having afterwards embraced Protestantism, he was placed in the see of Clogher by letter of Queen Elizabeth, dated 18th May, 1570, and by grant dated the 18th September, in the same year."

TERMONMAGUIRK, a parish $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Pomeroy, and partly in the barony of Strabane, but chiefly in that of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. The Omagh section contains the villages of SIXMILECROSS and TERMONROCK; which see. Length of the whole, southward, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 8; but these measurements include a detached district of Clogherney, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles by $1\frac{1}{2}$, which lies isolated a little west of the centre of Termonmaguirk. Area of the Strabane section, 1,352 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches,—of which 3 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are water. Area of the Omagh section, 39,725 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches,—of which 271 acres, 58 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,307; in 1841, 12,098. Houses 2,143. Pop. of the Strabane section, in 1831, 569; in 1841, 541. Houses 90. Pop. of the rural districts of the Omagh section, in 1841, 11,089. Houses 1,961. Nearly the whole of the surface lies among the central moorlands of the county; and, but for its being intersected by some pleasant vales, would everywhere present a bleak, wild, and sterile aspect. About one-third of the entire area is arable land; about 2,000 acres are reclaimable upland; and all the remainder is either deep bog or sheer mountain, partly pastoral but chiefly waste. The rivulet Cloghfin runs across the western district. The lakes Fingreen, Macrovy, Carn, and Meenadoocy, lie in the north-west; and the loughlets Lily, Black, and White, lie on the eastern border. The principal residences are Ninemilehouse, and Hazel-hill,—the latter amidst wooded and ornate grounds, nearly in the centre of the parish. The roads from Omagh to Moneymore and Dungannon pass through the interior. The chief hamlet is Athenry; and a principal antiquity is the ruin of the old parish-church. The Termonmaguirk dispensary is within the Omagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district strictly identical with the parish; and, in 1839, it expended £100, and administered to 1,792 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £803 1s. 7½d.; glebe, £680 13s. 4d. Gross income, £1,483 14s.

11½d.; nett, £1,267 6s. 10½d. Patron, the Marquis of Waterford. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killasher, in the dio. of Kilmore, but is resident in Termonmaguirk. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The church is situated at Termonrock, and was built in 1787 by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 128. A chapel-of-ease was built about 10 years ago at Sixmilecross; and while it was in the course of erection, the Presbyterian meeting-house was used in the early part of every Sabbath as a chapel-of-ease, and had an attendance of 158. This Presbyterian meeting-house belonged to the Secession Synod, and had a Presbyterian attendance of from 200 to 280. A Wesleyan Methodist place of meeting has an attendance of about 80. The Carrickmore, Loughmacrory, and Creggan Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 604 to 880, 560, and 263; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. An out-of-door place of meeting was also used in 1834 for Roman Catholics; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, was conjoined to a similar place in the parish of Clogharney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,722 Churchmen, 941 Presbyterians, and 8,249 Roman Catholics; 2 Roman Catholic Sunday schools, held in the Roman Catholic chapels, were usually attended by about 136 scholars; 11 other Sunday schools at Termonrock, Benchran, Loughmacrory, Brackey, Ballintrane, Cloghfin, Sixmilecross, Inishatrive, Tonagun, Trimogue, and another locality, were usually attended by about 533 scholars; 2 parochial daily schools, the one for boys and the other for girls, had on their books 65 boys and 44 girls; and 2 daily schools at Sixmilecross, and 11 daily schools at Benchran, Loughmacrory, Trimogue, Brackey, Ballintrane, Cloghfin, Creggan, Agheogun, Inishatrive, Latin, and Remakin, had on their books 734 boys and 343 girls. The parochial male school was supported principally by the rector; the parochial female school was salaried with £6 a-year from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and £2 from the London Hibernian Society; the daily school at Benchran, with £6 from the London Hibernian Society; that at Loughmacrory, with £7 10s. from the London Hibernian Society, and £1 1s. from Sir Hugh Stewart; that at Trimogue was in connection with the National Board; that at Brackey was aided with gratuities from the London Hibernian Society; that at Ballintrane was salaried with from £7 to £7 10s. from the London Hibernian Society; that at Cloghfin, with £7 and other advantages from Col. Verner; that at Creggan, with £8 from the National Board; that at Agheogun, with £10 from the National Board; and one of those at Sixmilecross, with about £3 from the London Hibernian Society, and £9 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society. In 1843, one National school at Agheogun was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 78 boys and 42 girls; one at Creggan, with £10 8s. 4d., and had 79 boys and 30 girls; one at Tandergree, with £15 18s. 4d., and had 74 boys and 33 girls; one at Trimogue, with £15, and had 71 boys and 35 girls; and one at Remakin, with £8, and had 57 boys and 49 girls.

TERMONROCK, a village in the parish of Termonmaguirk, barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the north road from Pomeroy to Omagh, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Six-mile-cross, $4\frac{1}{2}$ west of Pomeroy, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ east of Omagh. In the south-eastern vicinity is the demesne of Hazel-hill; and at the village are the present parish-church, and the ruins of the former one. A fair is held on the last Friday of every month. In 1843, the Termon union loan fund had a capital of £1,445, circulated £7,254 in 1,915 loans, realized a nett profit of £49 15s. 2d., expended for charitable purposes £49 15s. 2d., and had 14 proprietors of its capital. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 113. Houses 24.

TERRIL'S-PASS. See TYRRELL'S-PASS.

TERROIG, or ATERICK, a lake on the mutual border of the county of Galway, Connaught, and of the county of Clare, Munster. It lies among the Slieve-Baughta mountains, 6 miles north of Scariff, has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 450 feet, measures about 1½ mile in length, and sends off its superfluous waters in a head-stream of the Scariff river.

TERRYGLASS, a parish in the barony of Lower Ormond, 4½ miles north-west of Borris-o'-kane, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 9,761 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches,—of which 1,989 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches are in Lough Derg. Pop., in 1831, 2,573; in 1841, 2,953. Houses 452. The surface derives much scenic power and beauty from the intricate shore-line of Lough Derg; and it possesses a considerable amount of interior pleasantness and decoration; yet it consists, for the most part, of light and indifferent land. The principal seats are Drominalodge, Dromina-house, Asbgrove, Shannon-view, Firmount-house, and Slievair-house. The principal hamlets are Terryglass and Ballinderry; the former is situated near Lough Derg, is the site of the church and the Roman Catholic chapel, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 48; and the latter is situated on the south-eastern verge of the parish, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 54. A Culdean establishment seems to have been early founded at Terryglass; and a fountain in the vicinity of the hamlet is still called St. Columb's Well.—This parish is a rectory, a vicarage, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is a sinecure benefice, held now or recently by the incumbent of Aboghilly, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition and gross income, £208 12s. 3½d.; nett, £186 12s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The vicarage is part of the benefice of BALLINACLOUGH: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £100; glebe, £18 15s. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Glebe, £22 10s. Gross income, £114 17s.; nett, £85 19s. 2d. Patron, the dean of Killaloe. The church was built in 1809, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Finoe and Kilbarron. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 171, and the Roman Catholics to 2,536; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 50 boys and 32 girls.

TESSARAGH, TISSARA, or TAUGHSHARA, a parish on the western border of the barony of Athlone, 2 miles south-south-west of Athleague, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, north-westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½; area, 8,482 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 135 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,492; in 1841, 3,356. Houses 602. The surface is low, and consists for the most part of light land. The river Suck traces the western boundary, and divides the parish from co. Galway; and the loughlets Aneally and Lushmaha lie in the interior. The small post-village and the pleasant demesne of MOUNT-TALBOT [which see], are situated upon the Suck. The chief residences, additional to Mount-Talbot, are Bushypark, Bellgrove-house, and Woodbine-cottage; and the other principal objects of interest are Clounah-Wood and a constabulary barrack.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £61 16s. 11d., and the rectorial for £41 4s. 7½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. The vicarages of TESSARAGH, DESERT, and TAGHNOY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tassaragh. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 8,459. Gross income, £138 9s. 2d.; nett, £100 2s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated a little north of Mount-Talbot, on the road to Athleague, and was built in 1766, by means partly of a gift of £415 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and partly of an unreported sum obtained by private subscription. Sittings 200; attendance 55. Two Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice have each an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 52, and the Roman Catholics to 3,607; the Protestants of the union to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 8,911; 6 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £5 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, about £3 from a charity sermon, and about £4 from the London Hibernian and the Irish Societies, and one with £4 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, and £7 10s. from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society—had on their books 250 boys and 85 girls; and 10 daily schools in the union, had on their books 357 boys and 124 girls.

TESSAURAN, TISERAN, or KILGALLY, a parish in the barony of Garrycastle, 2½ miles north-west by west of Cloghan, King's co., Leinster. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 7,316 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches,—of which 106 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 2,032; in 1841, 2,029. Houses 346. The north-western boundary is traced by the Blackwater; the south-western boundary, by the Shannon; and the south-eastern boundary, by the Brosna. All the northern district, part of the eastern, and most of that along the Blackwater, are bog; much of that along the Shannon is lowland meadow; and most of the remainder is dry limestone land, pleasant in appearance, and possessing a considerable aggregate of embellishment. The principal artificial features are the mutually adjacent demesnes of Moystown and Hunstanton, the residences of the Messrs. L'Estrange, situated on the Brosna. "Though Moystown," remarks Mr. Fraser, "has not extensively diversified park scenery to boast of, and is environed by deep brown bog, there is, in the style of the house, in the arrangement of the plantations, and in the beautiful evergreen oaks and other ornamental trees which adorn the lawn, a character which carries us back to the gentlemen's seats of the olden times. This demesne is watered by the Brosna, which pays its ample tribute to the Shannon at the termination of the grounds, and where also the Grand Canal crosses the river in its progress to Ballinasloe." The other principal residences are Woodbine-house, Bellmount-house, Kilcummin-house, and Bleach-hill. The chief hamlets are High-street, Bellmount, Lisdaly, and Newtown. The other chief objects of interest are a constabulary barrack; the church, the Roman Catholic chapel, the ruins of Lislooney-castle, the ruins of a church, and the sites of Bellmount and Faddanmore castles. The road from Cloghan to Shannon-bridge passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £256 10s. The rectory of Tessaurean and the vicarage of FERNANE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Tessaurean. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 7. Gross income, £876 19s. 2½d.; nett, £656 11s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilnagareagh, in the dio. of Meath; but is resident in Tessaaran. A curate receives a salary of £89 4s. 7½d. The parish of Ferbane is also a perpetual curacy; and the following statistics refer wholly to the parish of Tessaaran. The church was built in 1805, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1831, by means of private subscription, and a loan of £300 from the late Board. Sittings 200; attendance, from 140 to 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ferbane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 343, and the Roman Catholics to 1,607; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board, and £6 from a local fund, one with £4 12s. 3d. and other advantages from the rector, and one with some advantages from Mrs. L'Estrange—had on their books 151 boys and 110 girls.

THE ROWER. See ROWER (THE).

THOMAS-STREET, a village in the parish of Taghboy, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands at the intersection of the road from Athleague to Ballinasloe, with the direct road from Athlone to Westport, 6½ miles south of Athleague, and 10 west-north-west of Athlone. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel; and in its vicinity are the hamlet of Commons, and the small demesnes of Cloonagh and Ballina. Pop. returned with the parish.

THOMASTOWN, a parish in the barony of East Ophaly, 2 miles south-east of Rathangan, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 853½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 139; in 1841, 119. Houses 17. The land is good. The highest ground is at the church, and has an altitude of 310 feet above the level of the sea. The road from Rathangan to Kildare passes along a considerable portion of the eastern boundary.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £58 1s. The rectories of Thomastown, POLLARDSTOWN, and DENMURRY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Thomastown. The parishes are not mutually adjacent. Pop., in 1831, 572. Gross income, £219 16s. 7d.; nett, £201 2s. 7d. Patron, the Duke of Leinster. A curate receives a salary of £50. The church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £1,122 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 50. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 120; the Protestants of the union to 33, and the Roman Catholics to 550; a daily school in the parish was wholly supported by the rector, and had on its books 10 boys and 10 girls; and there was also a daily school in Pollardstown.

THOMASTOWN, a hamlet and a demesne in the parish of Relickmurry and Athassel, barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. The hamlet stands 2 miles west by south of Golden-Bridge, on the road thence to Tipperary. It has a National school; but, though formerly a pleasant place, it now wears a dilapidated aspect. A dispensary here is within the Tipperary Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 18,282; and, in 1839-40, it expended £175 12s. 5d., and made 4,728 dispensations of medicine to 2,730 patients. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 155; in 1841, 139. Houses 22. The demesne is in the southern vicinity of the village; and formerly was the residence of the late Earl of Llandaff, but now of Viscount Chabot. The mansion is a superb edifice, in the pointed and castellated style of domestic architecture; the close-views luxuriate among the rich woods of the demesne itself, and the opulent grounds of the Golden Vale, and the valley of the Suir; and the perspectives are identified with the curvatures, the tints, and the magnificence of the Bilboa mountains in the north, and especially the Galtee mountains in the south. "The fine castellated mansion, the extent of grounds, surrounding scenery, and richness of the soil, the age and quantity of timber," remarks Mr. Fraser, "entitle this demesne to rank with the first in the kingdom."

THOMASTOWN, a parish in the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains very nearly the whole of the town of THOMASTOWN; see next article. Length, southward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,041 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 28 acres, 8 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 3,182, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,054; in 1841, 2,744. Houses 499. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 311; in 1841, 409. Houses 74. The larger district lies on the left bank of the Nore, and the smaller district on the right bank; and the latter formerly constituted the parish of Greenan. The land is generally of a light yet good quality. The principal rural residences are Abbeyview, Greenan-lodge, and Greenan-house; and the other chief objects of interest not in the town are the ruins of a castle and of Templeingham. The road from Dublin to Waterford, by way of Gowran, passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £248; glebe, £17 10s. The rectories of Thomastown and COLUMBKILL, and the impropriate curacy of FANAGH-CHURCH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Thomastown. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 3,959. Gross income, £548 10s.; nett, £488 6s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £80. The church was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £1,168 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, from 75 to 80. The Roman Catholic chapels of Thomastown and Mung have an attendance of respectively about 4,000 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Kilfane and Kilmanogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 145, and the Roman Catholics to 2,909; the Protestants of the union to 153, and the Roman Catholics to 3,806; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 20 scholars; a Roman Catholic Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 300 scholars in winter and 1,000 in summer; 5 daily schools in the parish—one of which was supported chiefly by the rector and Lord Carrick, and one was aided with subscriptions from the parochial Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 184 boys and 118 girls; and there were a Roman Catholic Sunday school and two daily schools in Columbkil. In 1843, one National school in Thomastown had on its books 356 boys; another at Thomastown had 246 girls; and one at Mullinakil had 107 boys and 78 girls.

THOMASTOWN, a market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parish of Columbkil, but chiefly in that of Thomastown, barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the river Nore, at the intersection of the road from Kilkenny to New Ross with the road from Dublin to Waterford by way of Gowran, 3½ miles north-west of Innistigue, 3½ north-east of Knocktopher, 6½ south-south-west of Gowran, 8½ south-south-east of Kilkenny, 12 north-west by north of New Ross, 17 north of Waterford, 19½ south-south-west of Carlow, and 60 south-west by south of Dublin. The immediate environs are rich and beautiful; they comprise some of the finest reaches of the river Nore, and some of the most sumptuous portions of its banks and its valley; and they contain, amidst a profusion of interesting objects, the exquisite ruins of ABBEY-JERPOINT, and the handsome or brilliant demesnes of MOUNT-JULIET, the Court, Coolmore-house, Bonnybrook, Brown's-Barn-house, Ballyduff-house, Kilfane-house, Kilmurry-house, Jerpoint-Church-house, Annamult-house, and John's-Well-house. See ABBEY-JERPOINT and MOUNT-JULIET. Greenan-castle, adjacent to the southern outskirts of the town, was formerly the residence of the Anglo-Norman family of Denne or De Den.—The town itself, though very favourably situated as to once scenery, cleanliness, the various appliances of comfort, and the best facilities for trade, has a comparatively poor appearance, and challenges attention more by its memorials of quondam importance than by its indications of present prosperity or taste. The river Nore divides it into two sections, placing the larger section on the left bank, and the smaller section on the right. The streets, in a general view, are very irregularly aligned; and render the town incompact and comparatively straggling. The total length of the streets on the left bank of the river is about 1½ statute mile; and the total length of those on the right bank is about 800 yards. A light and handsome stone bridge of 5 arches connects the two sections of the town, and was built in 1792, by means of a county subscription, and after a design by Mr. B. Brophy. At each end of the bridge stands an ancient square tower, which was formerly connected with the fortifications of the town; in various places are vestiges of the walls by which the town was surrounded; and in the interior are several private houses of antique character, yet of not very considerable age. "It is evident," says Mr. Brewer, "that the principal houses, in past times, partook of the castellated character, even down to ages not far distant. The most ancient domestic building, in fair preservation, has door and window cases of stone, square and canopied. Over the door is inscribed 'Owen Fennell and Ellen Tobin, a. d. 1646.'"—

The town was founded by Thomas Fitz-Anthony Walsh, an Anglo-Norman, and seneschal of Leinster; and it received from him both its Saxon name of Thomastown, and its Irish name of Ballymacandon,—the latter meaning the town of Anthony. "We are informed by Mr. Archdall," says Mr. Brewer, "that, according to tradition, there was a Dominican convent at this place, concerning which foundation the reverend author of the Monasticon could not find any authentic account. This page of the Monasticon, as is observed in the manuscripts of the Chevalier De Montmorency, is of a very surprising character, since Mr. Archdall must have had before him the authority of Dr. Burke, bishop of Ossory (Hiber. Dominicana, p. 337), exhibiting the fact of such an institution at Thomastown. But, if lettered information were not sufficient, a visit to the place in question could not have failed to remove the scepticism of this author. The ruins of the abbey comprise five beautiful pointed arches, forming one side-aisle, together with several windows. The chancel constitutes the present church, and is far from being an inelegant specimen of the pointed style of design. The pillars are quadruple, each capital varying from the other in its ornamental particulars. The door is of a correspondent likeness with the arches, and more than usually lofty. The west window is of the narrow style that prevailed in the time of Henry III. Beneath the building is a crypt or subterranean chapel. There are many sepulchral monuments among the remains of the abbey, including the part now used as a parochial church. Several of these are of the 16th and 17th centuries; but such as bear any pretensions to antiquity are so shamefully mutilated that they could not be described without great difficulty and labour. The most curious monumental relic consists of the figure of a man, represented in gigantic proportions. This figure was dug from the ruins of the abbey church, and is believed to have formed part of an ancient tomb belonging to the family of Denne of Grenane, in the vicinity of Thomastown. Several of the monumental stones appear to have commemorated priors or superiors of the convent.—Here is a handsome Roman Catholic chapel, built about 15 years since; and the examiner will find, with considerable interest, that the great marble altar in this chapel was removed to its present situation from the fine and venerable ruins of Jerpoint abbey. George Berkeley, D.D., the learned and very eminent bishop of Cloyne, was the son of William Berkeley of Thomastown. This celebrated prelate was born on the 12th of March, 1684, at Kilcerin, say his biographers, but we believe at Kilkerril near the native town of his father."

Though situated in the midst of a rich country, at the meeting of the roads from Waterford, Kilkenny, New Ross, and Dublin, on one of the finest rivers in Ireland, and within 5 miles of the point to which that river is navigable by vessels of considerable burden, Thomastown enjoys comparatively little trade, and is a place of much poverty. Even the retail shops are of nearly the meanest description; and two large flour-mills constitute almost the whole appliances of manufacture. Trilly's inn, though a small establishment, furnishes post-horses and carriages. Cullen's inn is also a small establishment. The town has a branch-office of the Tipperary Joint-stock Bank. In 1843, the Thomastown loan fund, No. 1, had a capital of £795, circulated £4,042 in 921 loans, realized a nett profit of £13 15s. 2d., expended for charitable purposes £13, and had 23 proprietors; and the loan fund, No. 2, had a capital of £878, circulated £3,406 in 970 loans, realized a nett profit of £83 8s. 11d., expended for charitable purposes £42 14s. 7d., and had 13 proprietors. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, March 17, April 30, May 25, June 29, Aug. 19, Sept. 15, and Dec. 16. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a mail-car to New Ross, and a coach and a mail-coach in transit between Waterford and Dublin. A picture of the poverty of Thomastown, in contrast to the wealth of its environs, is drawn by Mr. Inglis with such intrinsic truth and power, and with such relative design to represent the general poverty of Ireland, that we should be guilty of great dereliction of duty did we not present it to our readers:—"There is a great deal to be seen in the neighbourhood of Thomastown. The country is extremely pretty; there are a number of fine and extensive domains at no great distance; and several ruins are scattered here and there, the most interesting of which is at Jerpoint, about a mile from the town. Lord Carrick has a pretty park in the neighbourhood; and with Kilfane, the seat of Mr. Power, I was particularly pleased. At Kilfane I saw some excellent pictures; and amongst them the celebrated portrait of Napoleon by Gerrard. There must, I think, be a drawback on the enjoyment of the finest domain in Ireland. All that the heart can desire may be concentrated within its walls; nay, even the subject village may own the fostering protection of a kind-hearted resident landlord. But beyond all this disappears: private wealth and humanity can extend their influence only to a limited distance; and beyond the circle of that influence, rags and beggary are found. I am led to make this observation here, because there are several resident landlords about Thomastown; and because there is but one opinion round the country, as to the worth of Mr. Power, as a resident landlord; and yet I found the condition of the people, generally, to be wretched. I met in my walks, wives and mothers begging about the country; carrying their sacks home with a few potatoes, and under their arms a little bundle of sticks,—the only firewood they could afford,—picked up by the roadside. These were not common mendicants; but as I personally ascertained, were the wives and daughters of labourers who could find no employment: many had not even the means of obtaining seed to put into their little patches of potato-ground. The cabins I found wretched in the extreme;—many without even a pig in them. This, I put in italics; for a new light had now begun to dawn upon me. I used to be shocked at seeing a pig's snout at a cabin door, and looked upon such a spectacle as a proof of wretchedness; but I now began to bless the sight, and to pity more the poor wretches who possessed no pig. It is true, indeed, that things were still better when a pig's sty was visible; for that gave evidence both of the existence of the pig, and of the superior comfort of its owner; but still it was always to me a pleasant sight where, if no pig sty was visible, I saw him that pays the 'rint' walk leisurely in and out of the cabin door, or heard his comfortable grunt within. The greatest example of individual prosperity I observed among the poor in the neighbourhood of Thomastown, was finding three pigs resident in one cabin. It must be recollected that at the time when these observations were made, labour ought to have been particularly in demand, for it was just the season for potato planting. I remained longer in Thomastown than the importance of the place itself demanded; but being a central point in Kilkenny, and having introductions in the neighbourhood, I availed myself of my position, to add to my own personal observations, the results of others' experience. I particularly inquired, of persons of all conditions and opinions, as to whether any improvement was discernible in the condition of the people within the last twelve or fifteen years; and I regret to say, that I heard but one opinion,—that a visible deterioration had taken place in the condition of the labouring classes and of the smaller farmers. How often do we hear the question mooted, Is Ireland an improving country? The reply ought to depend altogether on the meaning we affix to the word improvement. If by improvement be meant more extended tillage, and improved modes of husbandry,—more commercial importance, evinced in large exports,—better roads,—better modes of communication,—increase of buildings,—then Ireland is a highly improving country; but, up to the point at which I have arrived, I have found nothing to warrant the belief, that any improvement has taken place in the condition of the people. I passed a Sunday in Thomastown; and had of course an opportunity of seeing the population of a Kilkenny country parish, thronging to the Catholic chapel. Every woman wears a cloak, and the hood of every cloak is thrown over the head, unless the cap underneath be an extremely smart one; in which case, the hood is allowed to fall a little back; or if the cap be a none-such, it is altogether exposed. The habit of covering the head appears to be universal. If a girl is not possessed of a cloak, she will borrow the shelter of an apron, or even of a petticoat,—like the woman of La Mancha; and in the dress of the men, I remarked also a resemblance to Spanish costume; notwithstanding that the weather was dry and mild, almost every man wore a great coat. The shops were crowded after mass.

All the country people who had money flocked into the 'stores' to buy some little thing,—the village dealers, to supply their retail trade,—and others, to buy a little tea, sugar, or any thing else that domestic use required."

The town of Thomastown, originally Greenan, was incorporated by charter of its founder, Thomas Fitz-Anthony; and it had also charters or kindred documents of 20 Edward III., 49 Edward III., 28 Henry VI., 1 Mary, 13 James I., and 5 James II. The borough limits are now imperfectly understood: the charter of James I. ordained, "that the towns or townlands of Brownesharne and Ffios MacCody, and the other towns and hamlets, parcel of the rectory of Thomastown and Columbkille, be reputed to be within the bounds, metes, and franchises of Thomastown;" and about 200 acres of land around the town, besides about 10 acres within the walls, are called "corporation lands;" yet they do not seem to have ever belonged to the corporation, but appear to have acquired their designation from their constituting the precincts, or part of the precincts, of the corporate jurisdiction. The corporation was styled, "The Sovereign, Provost, and Burgesses of the Town of Thomastown;" and consisted of a sovereign and burgesses,—the latter unlimited by charter, but limited to 12 by practice. The corporation was still in existence at the date of the public inquiry into the condition of the municipal corporations of Ireland, and then consisted of a provost and 9 burgesses; but it was so nearly nominal that even the provost had little acquaintance with its affairs. A local court, with jurisdiction to the amount of 40s. Irish, was formerly held by the provost, but fell into disuse about the year 1831. The town is a seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter on the second Tuesday of every month; it possesses a district bridewell; and it is the headquarters of one of the 8 constabulary districts of the county. The streets are kept in repair by county presentment. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament; and the sum of £15,000, voted as compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union, was wholly awarded to Viscount Clifden. A dispensary in the town is within the Kilkenny Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,917; and, in 1839, it received £128 4s., and expended £130 10s.—Area of the parish of Thomastown section of the town, 115 acres; of the Columbkille section, 12 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,871; in 1841, 2,348. Houses 429. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 166; in manufactures and trade, 249; in other pursuits, 92. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 259; on their own manual labour, 213; on means not specified, 18. Pop., in 1841, of the parish of Thomastown section, 2,335; of the Columbkille section, 13. Houses in these respectively, 425 and 4.

THOMOND—originally TEADH-MUIN, or NORTH MUNSTER—an ancient district of fluctuating extent and changeable political character, identical, in a general view, with the present north-west of the province of Munster. Both its extent and its character at various periods, are noticed in the historical section of our article on the county of CLARE: which see. Thomond gives the title of Marquis in the peerage of Ireland to the lineal representatives of the ancient, illustrious, and regal family of O'Brien. "The O'Briens," says Mr. T. Crofton Croker, "are one of the few original Irish families, that a series of revolutions have not entirely deprived of possessions in their native country. Until the reign of Henry VIII., they were distinguished as kings of Thomond, when the hereditary heir to the title, being a child, was dispossessed by his uncle Murrough, according to an ancient and barbarous Irish custom named Tannistry, a species of popular election of leaders or chiefs, that gave the right of possession to the strongest; as a living poet has happily defined it:

----- 'the simple plan,
That they should take, who had the power,
And they should keep who can'— a custom finally abolished by James I., in 1605. From this event perhaps the present Irish motto of the O'Briens originates, literally in English, 'The strong hand uppermost;' which has been absurdly enough rendered 'Vigueur du dessus.' King Murrough, feeling the insecurity of the title he had usurped, when his nephew Donough arrived at years of maturity, determined on surrendering it to the king of England, and of securing a lesser dignity, in which he was encouraged by the English governor of Ireland, who was anxious to destroy the feeling of monarchical independence. Murrough accordingly sailed for England, where he arrived on the 3d June, 1543, and waited upon Henry VIII. at his palace at Greenwich, to whom he formally resigned his pretensions to royalty, and received in lieu the title of Earl of Thomond for his own life, and Baron of Inchiquin for his descendants, by letters-patent dated the 1st July following, at the same time covenanting to assimilate to English manners, to obey the English laws, and to cause his children to be instructed in the English language. Donough, the nephew of Murrough, was also created by Henry, to prevent any future disputes, Baron of Ibrackan for himself and male issue, and Earl of Thomond for life on the decease of his uncle. After some severe family feuds, which were suppressed by the interference of Lord Sussex, Donough, Baron of Ibrackan, succeeded his uncle as Earl of Thomond, and received a new patent of nobility from Edward VI., continuing the title of Thomond to his heirs, whilst that of Inchiquin remained to the descendants of his uncle. The illustrious actions and descent of the O'Briens have been a favourite theme with the bards of Ireland. At the commencement of the seventeenth century, most of the senachies in the kingdom were engaged in a poetical controversy respecting the claims to superiority between the great northern family of O'Neal and the great southern one of the O'Brien, a subject on which several thousand verses were employed. These have been collected, and are termed by Irish scholars, 'The Contention of the Bards;' the contest arose out of a composition of Tieghe MacDaire's, who was retained as poet by Donagh O'Brien, the fourth Earl of Thomond, and was answered by Louis O'Clery, poet to O'Neal. Rejoinder and reply almost innumerable ensued; and the majority of the bards of that period became involved in the dispute. The most prominent member of the O'Brien family in Irish history since the conquest by England, was Murrough, the sixth baron of Inchiquin; but he appears to have been so ambitious, selfish, and time-serving a character, that it is impossible either to admire him, or become interested in his fortunes. Lord Inchiquin married a daughter of Sir William St. Leger, the president of Munster, whose attachment to the unfortunate Charles I., and stability of principle, is a noble contrast to the veering conduct of Lord Inchiquin. On the death of his father-in-law, Lord Inchiquin, being disappointed in his expectations of succeeding to the presidency, declared for the parliamentary party, and accepted an important command under them, meanly endeavouring to conceal his mortification, and account for the change of his political creed, by a variety of insignificant excuses.

From what can be collected, Lord Inchiquin's career during the civil war was intemperate in the highest degree,—'Not sparing his own kindred,' says Ludlow, 'but if he found them faulty,' (that is, in arms for the cause he had abandoned,) 'hanging them up without distinction.' His 'memorable service' at Cashel partakes of the same spirit, where, regarding neither sex nor age, 3,000 were put to the sword by his orders; and the priests, literally torn from the altars of God, were butchered before them in the cathedral. Hail Lord Inchiquin acted from the enthusiastic feeling of the times, his character would have retrieved itself on the page of history, for he was personally brave and frequently victorious; but he seems to have studiously corrupted the well-inclined, and endeavoured to elevate himself by undermining the nobleness of others. The parliament of England, feeling that no dependence could be placed on such a man, voted him a traitor on the 14th April, 1649; and Charles II., with a view of creating a revolution in his favour, immediately by letters from the Hague appointed him President of Munster; but the soldiers under his command, disgusted by the inconsistency of his conduct, revolted. Lord Inchiquin, for safety, fled to France, and was soon after raised by Charles to the dignity of an earl; on whose restoration, when the claims of unbroken allegiance were unrewarded, the sum of £8,000 was bestowed on Lord Inchiquin—'as a mark of his majesty's favourable and gracious consideration of his losses and sufferings.' In 1800, Murrough, fifth Earl of Inchiquin, was created Marquis of Thomond, in the peerage of Ireland; in 1801, he was made Baron Thomond of Taplow, in the peerage of the United Kingdom; in 1808, he was killed by a fall from his horse, and was succeeded in his Irish honours by his nephew; and, in 1826, the latter, the second Marquis of Thomond, was created Baron Talcaster in the peerage of Great Britain.

THIONLAGEE, or TONLAGEE, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Boystown and Derrylosory, and of the baronies of Lower Talbotstown and North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Its summit is situated 2½ miles north of Wicklow Gap, and has an altitude above sea-level of 2,307 feet. An official report on the mountain bogs of Wicklow and Dublin, treats Thonlagée as only the central summit of a group of mountains, and says, "This group is bounded on the north by the vale of the river Liffey, and the vale of Lough Tay; on the south, by the broad valley of the King's river, and Glenanasane; and on the west and east, by an inhabited and cultivated country. If we except very small and detached patches of arable land in Glenmacanass and the valley of the King's river, the surface of the whole country, within the above boundaries, is composed either of shallow bog or of a moory soil. In this latter case it is covered by heath, with coarse grass growing amongst it; like the mountains contained in the groups already described, nearly the whole surface is capable of improvement; and many parts, particularly the valleys, may be rendered highly productive. The valley of the King's river is on an average about 2 miles wide and 8 miles long, and may fairly be estimated to contain 10,000 Irish or 16,247 English acres; in several parts of this fine valley, cottages are scattered, each possessing a small field in tillage, and the scanty stock of cattle belonging to its poor inhabitants are suffered to range almost wild about the neighbouring mountains; but no vigorous attempts towards reclamation have yet been made, which is the more to be lamented, as this valley offers even greater facilities to improvements than that of the river

Liffey. But the idea of draining either the side of a mountain, or the flat land contained in the valley, does not appear to have entered into the contemplation of any of the mountain farmers. About one-third part of the valley of the King's river is covered with shallow bog; the remainder, excepting the small portion that has been cultivated, is moory, and the surface covered by a coarse sedgy grass, intermixed with heath: this part is highly improvable."

THREE-ROCK MOUNTAIN, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Kilgobbin and Taney, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Its summit is situated 5 furlongs north-north-east of the summit of Two-Rock mountain, and 2½ miles south of the village of Rathdrum; and it has an altitude of 1,479 feet above the level of the sea, and commands a brilliant view of the country around the city and the bay of Dublin.

THREE-TROUTS' STREAM (THE), the rivulet which traverses the glen of the Downs, co. Wicklow, Leinster. See Downs (GLEN OF THE). "The brook which rises in the upper part of the glen, where it separates the Downs mountain from the Sugarloaf, and brawls over its rocky bed, in continuation, steals softly under the shrubs, which adorn the dark narrow glade; and onwards gladdens the 'gay sunny valley,' which spreads near to the beautiful village of Delgany; where, under the name of the Three-trouts' stream, it pays its tiny tribute to the main." [Fraser.]

THURLES, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Eliogurty, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, west-north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 8,268 acres, 3 roads, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 10,450; but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 10,031; in 1841, 10,284. Houses 1,667. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,375; in 1841, 2,761. Houses 445. The surface is watered southward through the centre by the river Suir, and consists wholly of a section of the rich and beautiful valley of that river. The land, in a general view, is excellent, and lets at high rents. The roads from Tipperary to Dublin, from Clonmel to Roscrea, and from Thurles to Two-Mile-Borris, traverse the interior. The demesne of Brittas-castle, the residence of Mr. Langley, is situated nearly 2 miles north of the town, and contains the foundations of an extensive mansion which was commenced several years ago. The other chief country residences are Liscahill-lodge, Kilrush-house, Liscahill-house, and Ballycarrane-house. The other principal objects of interest in the rural districts are the hamlet of Sheskin, and the ruins of a church and Killinane-castle.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £800; glebe, £160. The rectory of Thurles, and the vicarages of RAHELT, SHYANE, and ADNITH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Thurles. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, nearly 4. Pop., in 1831, 11,771. Gross income, £1,206 11s. 2d.; nett, £995 11s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. A portion of the tithes of Thurles parish, compounded for £135, is inappropriate in the representatives of Nathaniel Taylor, Esq. of Noon. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Crohane, Lismullin, Modeshill, and Mowney, forming the corps of the archdeaconry of Cashel; and likewise the sinecure treasurership of Christ-church, Dublin. A curate receives a salary of £90. The church is situated at Thurles, and was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £1,846 0s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 120. The Baptist meeting-house has an attendance of from 25 to 30. The Thurles Roman Catholic chapel has 4 officiates, and an attendance of 11,000.* The chapels of the Ursuline convent and the Presentation convent, are jointly under the care of one officiate, and have an attendance of respectively from 80 to 90 and 30. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, inclusive of 19 dissenters, amounted to 289, and the Roman Catholics to 10,349; the Protestants of the union to 313, and the Roman Catholics to 12,155; and 20 daily schools in the union—17 of which were in the parish—had on their books 704 boys and 773 girls. One of the schools in the parish was an endowed school, salaried with £53 11s. 9d. a-year from the late Dr. Bray; one was a school conducted by the Presentation nuns, and attended by 300 girls; one was a boarding school, conducted by the Ursuline nuns; two were classical boarding and daily schools, conducted by private enterprise; and all the rest were common pay daily schools.

THURLES, a post and market town in the parish of Thurles, barony of Eliogurty, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the river Suir, and at the intersection of the road from Clonmel to Roscrea, with that from Tipperary to Dublin, 3 miles north-east by north of Holyroos, 3¼ north-west of Littleton, 4½ west of Two-Mile-Borris, 8 south-west by west of Johnstown, 9 south of Templemore, 10 north-north-east of Cashel, 17 north-east of Tipperary, 18½ south of Roscrea, and 70 south-west of Dublin. The Suir is here a small and sluggish stream; and the surrounding country is flat and fertile. The town is in a prosperous condition; and has, of late years, greatly increased in both trade and extent. The ruins of several ecclesiastical and castellated buildings are both objects of interest in themselves, and monuments of the town's antiquity and comparatively early importance, particularly the remains of a Carmelite monastery, founded in 1300, by the family of Butler, and now consisting of a tower and part of the cross-aisle of the church; the ruins of a castle, founded also by the family of Butler; and the remains of a smaller building, called the Knights Templars' castle. Among the modern public edifices are a neat church, an infantry barrack, a bridge, a bridewell, a court-house, a market-house, a fever-hospital, and a poor-law union workhouse. But Thurles derives its distinguishing character, both architectural and social, from its being the seat of the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Cashel, and, with the exception of Galway, the most decidedly Roman Catholic town in Ireland. "The eye," observes the Catholic Directory for 1838, "is struck with the number as well as the beauty of the edifices sacred to religion and to education. One cannot help wondering how so many houses, upon such a scale, would have arisen from means so scanty, and in times so little auspicious to the growth of Catholicity. In the midst of a large group of buildings stands the archbishop's residence, which, without being a costly, is yet a beautiful and commodious dwelling. It was built by Dr. James Butler, and considerably enlarged by the late Most Rev. Dr. Laffan, at his private expense. The cathedral is a simple structure, yet noble in its simplicity, large enough to accommodate from 7,000 to 8,000 persons, with a magnificent altar, and an organ second to none in the kingdom. At either side of the cathedral stands a convent, one of Ursuline, and the other of Presentation nuns, both very prosperous establishments. The Ursuline convent was founded by the Most Rev. Dr. Bray in the year 1787. Where there was at first but a thatched cottage, you may now see more than one range of large, well built houses, with gardens tastefully laid out, stretching along the banks of the river Suir. * * The Presentation convent is a very fine house. You do not know which to admire most, its commanding exterior, or the simple elegance of its well-arranged interior. It is, indeed, a specimen of the purest taste, blended with the unostentatious simplicity of religion. The convent chapel is Gothic, and very beautiful." Connected with the convents are the schools noticed in our article on the parish; a large and commodious schoolhouse was also erected in 1815, by the "Religious Brothers of the Christian Schools;" and there is now, in addition, a large Roman Catholic college.

Thurles is the market for the sale of the agricultural produce of an extensive circumjacent district of country; and the depot for the supply of that district with all the innumerable goods of a general retail trade. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, Sept. 21, Dec. 21, and the first Tuesday of every month. The town is the head-quarters of one of the six districts of the constabulary of the north riding of Tipperary; it is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter held on every Saturday,—and it has two loan funds, a savings' bank, and branch-offices of the National Bank of Ireland, and the Tipperary Joint-Stock Bank. In 1843, the Thurles loan fund, No. 1, had a capital of £783, circulated £5,374 in 2,434 loans, realized a nett profit of £8 7s. 5d., and had 6 proprietors of its capital; and the Thurles agricultural loan fund had a capital of £1,292, circulated £5,727 in 2,223 loans, realized a nett profit of £23 13s. 6d., and had 27 proprietors of its capital. The public conveyances in 1838 were a coach to Dublin, a mail-car to Kille-naule, a mail-car to Kilkenny, a mail-car to Roscrea, a car to Clonmel, and a car in transit between Clonmel and Roscrea. The main trunk of the Cork and Limerick Railway from Dublin, as projected by the Public Commissioners, passes within 1 statute mile of Thurles. Area of the town, 321 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,084; in 1841, 7,523. Houses 1,222. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 527; in manufactures and trade, 601; in other pursuits, 427. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 65; on the directing of labour, 702; on their own manual labour, 748; on means not specified, 40. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,415; who could read but not write, 424; who could neither read nor write, 1,192. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 832; who could read but not write, 760; who could neither read nor write, 2,014.

The Thurles Poor-law union ranks as the 23d; and was declared on March 28, 1839. It lies wholly within the county of Tipperary, and comprehends an area of 125,139 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 64,237. The number of its ex-officio and its elected guardians is respectively 10 and 31. Its electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, is, in the barony of Kilmennagh, Moyliffe, 446,—Templebeg, 400,—and Borrisoleagh, 1,109; in the barony of Ikerrin, Templetoohy, 437,—and Templeree, 251; in the barony of Slieveadagh, Buolick, 193,—Kilcooley, 486,—and Fennor, 230; and in the barony of Eliogurty, Thurles, 2,238,—Holycross, 300,—Moycarky, 354,—Ballymoreen, 143,—Borris, 442,—Moyné, 534,—Rahealty, 534,—Templemore, 1,013,—East Loughmore, 269,—West Loughmore, 377,—Drom, 437,—Inch, 212,—and Ballycahill, 193. The number of valued tenements within the Kilmennagh districts is 2,015,—within the Ikerrin districts, 668,—within the Slieveadagh districts, 938,—within the Eliogurty districts, 6,730,—within the entire union, 10,371; and of these, 5,670 were valued under £5,—1,873, under £10,—932, under £15,—603, under £20,—336, under £25,—219, under £30,—241, under £35,—137, under £50,—and 340, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £110,473 6s.; the total number of persons rated is 10,895; and of these, 1,716 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,632, not exceeding £2,—1,135 not exceeding £3,—770, not exceeding £4,—and 594, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on July 6, 1840,—to be completed in June, 1841,—to cost £5,840 for building and completion, and £1,260 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6½ acres, purchased for £1,000,—and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Nov. 7, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £228 16s. 7½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,030 10s. 1d. During the half year ending on Sept. 29, 1843, the amount of poor-rate collected was £278 11s., the other receipts were £1 1s. 8d., the balance in favour of the union at the commencement of the half year was £348 6s. 2½d., the balance against the union at the close of the half year was £94 3s. 3½d., the amount of expenses on account of electoral division paupers was £476 17s. 8d., the amount of expenses on account of union paupers was £2 12s. 10d., and the proportion of establishment charges was £242 11s. 8d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 217. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at Thurles and Templemore, and dispensaries at Thurles, Borrisoleagh, Littleton, Templemore, Templetoohy, and Ballinonny and Kilcooley; and, in 1839-40, they received £526 7s. 11d. from subscription, £715 17s. 8d. from public grants, and £14 3s. 9½d. from other sources, and expended £594 19s. 11½d. in salaries to medical officers, £203 9s. 9½d. for medicines, and £508 18s. 5½d. for contingencies. The Thurles fever hospital contains 52 beds, but could accommodate from 70 to 80 patients; it is attended by 4 physicians, each of whom receives a salary of £17 10s.; and, in 1839-40, it expended £360 10s. 5d., and admitted 504 patients. The Thurles dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 15,658; and, in 1839-40, it expended £162 9s. 1½d., and made 13,140 dispensations of medicine to 2,133 patients.

TIBOHINE, or TAUGHBOYNE, a parish in the barony of Frenchpark, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the town of FRENCHPARK and the village of LOUGHGLYNN: see these articles. Length, east-north-eastward, 12½ miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 44,092 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches,—of which 867 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 16,460; in 1841, 17,804. Houses 3,214. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 15,759; in 1841, 16,987. Houses 3,071. One half or upwards of the whole surface is bog; most of the remainder consists of inferior land, and has a bleak and haggard appearance; and almost the only spots of pleasant character are the immediate shores of the lake of Loughglynn, and especially the demesne and immediate environs of Frenchpark. The highest ground, Buckhill, is near the centre of the parish, and has an altitude above sea-level of 416 feet. The lake of Loughglynn is the largest sheet of water, and has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 284 feet; and the other lakes are Loughs Cloonagh, Errit, and Cloonacally,—the last of which has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 270 feet. The river Breegeog flows along part of the eastern boundary, and receives from the interior the rivulets of Curricnabrabher and Amugeeragh. Loughglynn communicates both with the rivulets of Francis and Cloonard, and with the river Lung; and the last of these streams waters most of the western district, and receives the tribute of the Annaderryboy. The principal residences, additional to Frenchpark-house, are Sheepwalk-house, French's-lodge, Ratra, Mullen, Cloonshanville-cottage, Loughglynn-house, Rook-Island, Kiltymaine, Silverfeld, Cabir, Derry-lodge, and Errit-lodge. The road from Boyle to Tuam, and that from Roscommon to Swineford, intersect each other in the interior. In 1843, the Tibohine Loan Fund had a capital of £616, circulated £3,193 in 1,168 loans, realized a nett profit of £42 7s. 7d., expended for charitable purposes £40 16s. 10d., and belonged wholly to one proprietor.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £347 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £29 15s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectory of Tibohine constitutes the corps of the prebend of Artaugh; and the incumbent holds also the benefice of Lisonagh, in the dio. of Lismore, but is resident in Tibohine. The perpetual curacy of Loughglynn is within the parish and benefice of Tibohine; and the following statistics are all exclusive of the district assigned to that curacy. Pop., in 1831, 6,336. The church is situated about 2 miles west-north-west of Frenchpark, and was built about a century ago, at a cost now unknown. Sittings 150; attendance 40. Three Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 900, 700, and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 167, and the Roman Catholics to 6,552; and 14 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and advantages worth about £10 from Mr. French, and two with respectively £8 and £20 from Lord Dillon—had on their books 719 boys and 401 girls.

TICKILLEN, a parish in the barony of East Shelmallee, 3½ miles north-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,866 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches,—of which 799 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches form a detached district of 1½ mile by 4, situated 2½ miles to the east. The detached district contains part of the village of CASTLE-BRIDGE: which see. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,185; in 1841, 1,260. Houses 198. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,015; in 1841, 1,112. Houses 172. The main body extends along the left bank of the river Slaney, down to a perch or two below Ferry-Carrig; and the detached district extends along the left bank of the Sow, down to the vicinity of its embouchure, and of the village of Castle-Bridge. The banks of the Slaney within the main body are powerfully picturesque; and the whole parochial surface, with the exception of some sandy and unprofitable ground, consists of good land, and possesses a large aggregate of artificial decoration. "There are few views more striking than that which is obtained from the bridge of Ferry-Carrig, nor do we remember to have seen anywhere a more striking combination of objects. Above the bridge, the windings of the broad tidal river, with its high and partially wooded banks; below, the expanded estuary, with its cultivated slopes; on either side of the river, the roads which have been cut out of the solid rock, exhibiting the manifold contortions and disruptions of the schistose strata; the long and simple timber bridge, crossing the mouth of the river, and connecting the above roads; the grey and time-honoured walls of the rastle of Ferry-Carrig, which crowns the steep, and presides over the romantic scene—all combine to arrest the attention of even the most casual observer." The principal residences within the main body of the parish are Killowen-house, Newtown-house, Moat-park, and Perry-lodge,—the last the seat of Mr. Trake; and the principal within the detached district are Seaview, Edenvale-house, and Ballybeggan-house. The ruins of two churches stand in respectively the main body and the detached district.—This parish is a vicarage of two parts, or rather a double vicarage, in the dio. of Ferns. The larger vicarial section is part of the benefice of KILPATRICK: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £00; glebe, £9. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £63 7s. 9d.; and are inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 71 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 860 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school. The smaller vicarage section is part of the benefice of ARDOLME: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £29 19s. 4d., and the rectorial for £28 13s. 6d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Portsmouth. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Castle-Bridge, but not within the Tickillen part of that village. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 32 Churchmen, 12 Protestant dissenters, and 455 Roman Catholics.

TICKMACREVAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the town of GLENARM, and part of the village of CARNLOUGH: see these articles. Length, southward, 8 miles; breadth, from 1¼ to 4½; area, 20,506 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,859; in 1841, 4,443. Houses 720. But these measurements and statistics include also the parish of TEMPLEUGHTER: which see. The surface extends southward from the village of CARNLOUGH, yet is bounded, over scarcely 4 miles, by the north channel; and it consists principally of a section of the mountains, escarpments, and glens, upon the abrupt eastern face of the great tabular trap district of Antrim, and of the portion of superb sea-coast which lies round the head of Glenarm bay, and is adorned with the woods and other embellishments of the demesne of Glenarm castle. The summit of Collin-Top, a little beyond the north-western extremity of the parish, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,419 feet. The hamlet of Straidkelly, on the coast between Glenarm and Carnlough, had, in 1831, a pop. of 172. The fine new coast road, from Larne to Cushendall and Ballycastle, passes along the sea-board.—This parish is a rectory, and, together with the included rectory of Templeoughter, a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £240; glebe, £46 7s. 6d. Gross income, £286 7s. 6d.; nett, £267 12s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at Glenarm, and was built about 62 years ago, at the private expense of the Antrim family, and enlarged in 1822, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance, from 100 to 150. The two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 150 and 90. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 30. The two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 250 and 335; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 490 Churchmen, 1,622 Presbyterians, and 1,930 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 172 scholars; and 7 daily schools—one of which at Glenarm was salaried with £10 a-year from a legacy, one with £8 from the National Board, and one with £1 from the rector—had on their books 200 boys and 114 girls. In 1843, one National school at Faystown was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and had on its books 34 boys and 26 girls; one at Harp hall, with £8 13s. 4d., and had 60 boys and 37 girls; one at Knockstaken, with £8 6s. 8d., and had 22 boys and 15 girls; one at Cornalbana, with £7 6s. 8d. and had 29 boys and 17 girls; and one at Aughagash, with £12, and had 42 boys and 42 girls.

TIERKELLY, a chalybeate well in the parish of Drumballyrouney, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated near Drumballyrouney church, and near the road from Rathfriland to Ballinabinch, 2 miles north-north-east of Rathfriland. "Tierkelly water," says Mr. Atkinson, "is a very strong chalybeate, as appears from its thick blue scum, from its striking a claret colour with galls, and a durable blue from log-wood. Whilst it appears by these trials to be well saturated with iron, it is otherwise exceedingly light, and free from any considerable mixture of heterogeneous matter. This water does not appear to have been much used; but from several casual trials, has been effectual for the scurvy, both internally and externally used."

TIERSHANAGHAN, a village in the parish of Ballyheigue, barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 19 acres. Pop., in 1841, 222. Houses 34. It is a very poor place, containing not one tolerably good house, and only three houses above the class of the most miserable cabins.

TIMAHOE, a parish in the barony of Clane, 3½ miles north by west of Robertstown, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 9,896 acres, 39 perches,—of which 10 acres, 30 perches are reservoir for the supply of the Grand Canal. Pop., in 1831, 1,527; in 1841, 1,680. Houses 276. A large proportion of the surface, comprising very nearly all the western and the northern districts, is part of the bog of TIMAHOE [see next article]; but the remainder consists, in general, of good land. The highest ground, Drumachon, situated in the north-west, and surrounded with bog, has an altitude above sea-level of 311 feet. The Grand Canal draws supply from the interior, and passes, on its summit-level, very near the southern boundary, yet does not come within the parochial limits. Timahoe hamlet and Timahoe-house are situated nearly in the centre. The other chief hamlets are Skeaghard and Cappagh; the other chief residences are Corduff-house, Hodgestown-house, and Coolcarigan-house; and the principal antiquity is the ruin of Blackwood-castle. The road from Robertstown to Enfield passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £238; glebe, £10. Gross income, £248; nett, £231 17s. 6d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also two chaplaincies in the city of Dublin, and the perpetual curacy of Grangegorm in the dio. of Dublin, and is non-resident in Timahoe. A curate receives a salary of £75. There is no church; and the Protestants attend the church of Ballinacagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 1,541; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 44 boys and 22 girls.

TIMAHOE, a bog in the parishes of Timahoe and Ballinacagh, barony of Clane, in the parish of Scullagestown, barony of Ikenethy and Oughteran, in the parish of Killeenague, barony of Connell, and in the parishes of Kilpatrick, Ardkill, Mylarstown, and Duffierth, barony of Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Its length, southward, is 5½ miles; its greatest breadth is 4½; and its area is 12,878 acres.

It is bounded, on the north, by an abrupt range of gravel hills, which separates it from the Blackwater, and which extends from Muckland-hill by Dunfort to Kilmurry; on the east, by the high ridge which extends from Graigue by Timahoe and Staplestown to Doneda; on the south, by the island of Allen; and on the south-west, and west, by a gravel ridge, which separates it from the large bog of Lulliamore. Its highest point has an elevation of 25 feet above the summit-level of the Grand Canal, and 289 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay, and its lowest point is an elevation of 32 feet below the summit-level of the Grand Canal, and 232 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay. Its average depth is about 25 feet; and almost everywhere below it is a bed of tenacious blue clay, varying from 1 foot to 3 feet in thickness, and superincumbent on a mass of mixed clay and limestone gravel of unknown depth. Its surface is, in general, excessively wet; and in some places, quagmires, occasioned by springs, extend a mile in length. The estimated expense of reclaiming the bog is £21,470 2s.

TIMAHOE, a village in the parish of Fossy or Timahoe, barony of Cullenagh, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Maryborough to Leighlin-bridge, with that from Stradbally to Ballinakilly and Abbeyleix, 4 miles south-south-west of Stradbally, 5½ south-south-east of Maryborough, 6½ north-north-east of Ballinakilly, and 6½ north-east of Abbeyleix. Its uncorrupted or original name was Teach-Mochoe, 'the house of Mochoe'; and arose from the foundation of a monastic establishment, which monkish annalists date so high as the latter part of the 5th century, and ascribe to a St. Mochoe. The actual monastery, however, seems to have been founded by O'More of Leix, probably in the 10th century, and merely dedicated to the saint whose name it bears. The pile is said to have been burned in 1142; its property was granted, in the reign of Elizabeth, to the family of Loftus; and some unimportant remains of the structure still exist. In the vicinity of the ruins are a pillar-tower, and the picturesque remains of a castle built by the family of Loftus; and at the distance of about a mile is an ancient rath or fort. In 1642, the Irish under General Preston were defeated near Timahoe by General Monk. Fairs are held at the village on April 3, July 3, and Oct. 18. Pop., in 1831, 96. Houses 9.

TIMOGUE, a parish in the barony of Stradbally, 2 miles south-south-west of the town of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, northward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,490 acres, 3 roads, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 300; in 1841, 367. Houses 56. The land is, in general, very good. The summit of a hill on the east has an altitude above sea-level of 783 feet. The Straid rivulet runs along the west, and has there an elevation above sea-level of 321 feet. The road from Stradbally to Timahoe passes along the western border. The only other noticeable objects are Timogue-house, the parish church, and the site of a castle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £158 19s. 9d.; nett, £115 3s. 10d. Patron, the Marquis of Lansdowne. The church is an old building, of unknown date and cost. Sittings 100; attendance 50. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39, and the Roman Catholics to 280; and a pay daily school was salaried with £6 a-year from subscription, and had on its books 18 boys and 18 girls.

TIMOLEAGUE, a parish, partly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. The Ibane and Barryroe section contains the small town of TIMOLEAGUE: see next article. Length and breadth of the parish, each 2 miles. Area of the Carbery section, 708 acres; of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 2,165 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,824; in 1841, 1,683. Houses 304. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 286; in 1841, 292. Houses 44. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ibane and Barryroe section, in 1831, 818; in 1841, 759. Houses 133. Part of the land is of indifferent quality; and the remainder is excellent. The stream and the little estuary of the Arigadeen, "the little silver river," wash all the north and the east; and a tiny affluent of the estuary waters the interior. Over a mile before reaching the town, the Arigadeen flows in a serpentine course, at the foot of a hill; at its reaching the town, it washes the walls of an ancient castle, flows past the verge of the churchyard, and glides beneath the walls of an ancient abbey; and it then expands into increased width on its way to Courtmacsherry bay, and woos the eye down to a prospect of its agreeable sea-banks. Among the seats are Umera-house, Timoleague-house, and Barry's-Hall,—the second the residence of Colonel Travers, and the third the residence of Mr. Lucas, noticed as follows by Dr. Smith: "To the south-west of the town, on a rising ground, is Barry's-Hall, built by the Hon. Capt. Barry, on the estate of the late Lord Barrymore; it has a prospect of part of the arm of the sea, which comes up to the foot of the hill on which it stands, forming an handsome basin, interspersed with small islands."—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £413 8s. 8½d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £428 8s. 8½d.; nett, £367 7s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 110; attendance 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmaloda. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 161, and the Roman Catholics to 1,545; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 9 boys and 31 girls; and 5 daily schools—one of which was about to become connected with the National Board, one was salaried with £8 a-year from the London Ladies' Liberman Society, and £7 from subscription, and another with £6 from subscription—were usually attended by about 239 scholars.

TIMOLEAGUE, an ancient and once important, but now decayed and small market town, in the parish of Timoleague, barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the right bank of the Arigadeen estuary, 3 miles above its expansion into Courtmacsherry bay, 4 miles east-north-east of Clonakilty, 5 south-west by west of Kilbrittain, 7 south-west-west of Bandon, 2½ south-west by south of Cork, and 148½ south-west of Dublin. "The former eminence of this place chiefly proceeded from a religious foundation, whose ruins still exist, and are worthy of the traveller's attention. The abbey of Timoleague has been attributed to various founders, but may be confidently ascribed, on the authority of a manuscript formerly reposed in its archives, to William Barry, lord of Ibane, who died on the 17th of December, 1373. The establishment was one of the noblest in the county, to which its buildings lent an ornament, and was founded for friars of the order of St. Francis. Provincial chapters of the order were held within its walls in 1536 and 1563, and several persons of distinction were here interred. It shared the common fate at the date of the suppression in the reign of Henry VIII.; but was repaired in the year 1604, and restored, for a short time, to purposes of secluded piety, by some fervid adherents of the old religion. These remains occupy a low, but lovely and peaceful station, on the banks of the Silver stream, whose tide laves the ancient but still firm walls. The buildings have been long since deprived of their roofing, but in other respects present a curious specimen of the arrangements that prevailed in a monastic structure. They comprise the principal walls of the abbey-church, with an attached cloister, and several apartments, including the refectory. In the choir of the church are the fragments of monuments erected to members of several ancient families, among which have been noticed those of MacCarty Reagh (placed near the centre of the choir), the O'Cuillanes, and the Lords Courcey. It appears from the obituary book of this convent, as cited by Sir James Ware, that the steeple, dormitory, infirmary, and library were rebuilt, about the year 1500, by Edmond Courcey, bishop of Clogher, who had been a friar of this house, and was buried here in 1518. The choir is of an earlier date, and is in a respectable, but not elaborate or costly style of pointed architecture. The arches of the doors and windows are of brown freestone; and it has been observed that the place at which this stone was procured is probably far distant, it not being known that any similar stone exists in the neighbourhood. It appears to be likely that the prosperity of this place was chiefly dependent on the fortunes of its abbey; but that it was once a town of considerable notoriety is unquestionable. At the end of the village opposite to that enriched by the ruins of the monastery, are the vestiges of a castle, said to have been built by the sept of O'Shaughnessy. It is recorded by Smith that Timoleague was formerly much frequented by Spaniards, who here found a ready market for large quantities of wine. He adds that there were, in those busy days, no less than fourteen taverns in this town, at which sack was sold. What fertile materials are afforded, by these details, for the retrospective fancy of a writer prone to people a ruined town and deserted strand, with the tenants of a past day! What mingled scenes of ecclesiastical pomp and laical merriment! A stately abbey, with friars of the grey order, clothed in their gowns and cowls; a shore crowded with Spaniards, bearing the produce of a favourite vintage; and fourteen houses for the sale of sack!—[Brewer's Ireland.] The modern parish-church is a neat and commodious edifice. Sloops can sail up the estuary of the Arigadeen to the town, and lighters can sail past it. Yet the town, though advantageously situated for trade, and fitted to command a considerable extent of circumjacent country, is swamped by the two more eminent towns of Clonakilty and Bandon, and has utterly ceased to be a place of any importance. Fairs are held on March 26, July 5, Aug. 21, and Dec. 6. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. A dispensary in the town is within the Bandon Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119 10s. 8d., and administered to 3,018 patients. Area of the town, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 720; in 1841, 635. Houses 127. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 50; in manufactures and trade, 59; in other pursuits, 25. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 55; on their own manual labour, 70; on means not specified, 3.

TIMOLIN, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of East Narragh and Rheban, and of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It contains the villages of BALLYTORE and TIMOLIN: which see. Length, eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,289 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 2,941, and according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,139; but both the latter of these authorities certainly, and the former probably, include the parishes of MOONE and BELAN: which see. Pop., in 1841, 1,611. Houses 238. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 998. Houses 159. The land of the parochial union to which the parish of Timolin belongs varies from very good to very bad; but, in a general view, is of a light arable quality, and averages in annual value about 26s. per plantation acre. The rivulet Griese flows along the western boundary. A cavern occurs in the north-eastern district. The road from Castle-Dermot to Leighlin-bridge passes through the interior. The principal residences are Ballytore-hill, Griesemount, Griese-park, Retreat-house, the Cottage, and Ballytore-house.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £63 15s., and the rectorial for £127 10s.; and the latter are inappropriate in the vicars choral and chairman of Christ-church. The vicarages of Timolin, MOONE, RATHTOOLE, and KILLELAN, and the rectory of BELAN [see these authorities], constitute the benefice of Timolin. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 4,426. Gross income, £458 15s.; nett, £401 17s. 14d. Patron of Killelan, Sir Richard Steele, Bart.; of the other parishes, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of St. Nicholas in the city and dio. of Dublin, and the sinecure and unendowed prebend of Timothan in the cathedral of St. Patrick's; but he is resident in Timolin. The church is of unknown date and cost of erection; and was repaired and new-roofed in 1816, at the cost of £349 3s. 42d., raised by parochial assessment; and enlarged in 1823, by means of a loan of £415 7s. 84d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 110. The Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of from 50 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castle-Dermot. In 1831, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 311 Churchmen, 47 Protestant dissenters, and 2,781 Roman Catholics; and those of the union consisted of 360 Churchmen, 47 Protestant dissenters, and 4,019 Roman Catholics. In 1834, one daily school in the parish made no return of its attendance; and 4 other daily schools in the parish had on their books 213 boys and 204 girls. The school which made no report was a Quakers' school, chiefly for boarders; one of the other schools was parochial, and aided by the vicar and by the Association for Discourtenancing Vice; and another was partially supported by subscription.

TIMOLIN, a village in the parish of Timolin, barony of East Narragh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the road from Castle-Dermot to Leighlin-bridge, 1½ mile south of Ballytore, and 4½ miles north by east of Castle-Dermot. Its original or uncorrupted name is Teach-Moling; and arose from a monastic establishment which is alleged, though on no very clear or credible authority, to have been founded here, in the seventh century, by a St. Moling of Ferris. The alleged monastery does not pretend to be known to record subsequent to the year 927; yet the monkish chronicler, Friar Clynne, narrates,—according to the Montmorency MSS. quoted by Mr. Brewer,—“that, during the Easter holidays, anno 1323, Philip O'Callan, to whom Timolin then belonged, his son, and many persons of his sept, were slain by Edmond le Botiller, rector of Tullow, and the cantons; who afterwards set fire to O'Callan's church of Thamolyn, which they burned to ashes, with the men, women, and children therein, not sparing the relics of St. Moling.” In the reign of John, a nunnery was founded at Timolin, by Robert Fitz-Richard, lord of Narragh. About the same period, and by the same person, a castle was erected at the village; it was a military post of some consequence in the period immediately succeeding that of its erection, and continued to be so down to modern times; and, in the 17th century, it was taken by the Marquis of Ormonde, and in spite of Commissioners, named by the contending parties, being actually engaged in adjusting terms of peace—its garrison were, by order of the Lords-justices Parsons and Borlace, put to the sword. In 1843, the Timolin loan fund had a capital of £287, circ. £2,129 in 967 loans, and belonged to 30 proprietors. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, and June 28. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 228; in 1841, 172. Houses 26.

TINEHELY, a small market and post town in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of South Ballinacore, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the rivulet Derry, and on the road from Shillelagh to Wicklow, which is that also from Carnew to Rathdrum, 54 miles north by east of Carnew, 6½ south-west of Aughrim, 14½ south-west of Rathdrum, and 44½ south-south-west of Dublin. It occupies a romantic site among the broken grounds skirting the base of the mountains, which extend from Glen-Aughrim to the vicinity of Newtownbarry; and it is overhung, on the west, by a summit which has an altitude of 1,312 feet above the level of the sea. Both this summit and others nearly as high in the vicinity, command extensive views of the valley toward Aughrim, the mountain ranges which flank it, various adjacent heights, and the comparatively low tract of country which extends to the west. The town was entirely destroyed during the rebellion of 1798, but was soon after rebuilt in an improved manner under the encouragement and partly at the expense of Earl Fitzwilliam, the lord of the manor; and it now presents a neat and agreeable appearance, and has a rather handsome market-house and sessions-house, a dispensary, a soap manufactory, a tan-yard, a few retail shops, an extensive flour-mill, and a comfortable little inn and small posting establishment. The dispensary is within the Shillelagh Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £111 2s. 4d., and administered to 1,409 patients. Fairs are held on the first Wednesday of Jan., Feb. 7, the third Wednesday of March, the second Wednesday of April, May 8, June 4, the Wednesday after June 24, the third Wednesday of July, Aug. 7, the first Wednesday of Sept. and Oct., Nov. 7, and the second Wednesday of Dec. The town is a constabulary station, and the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter on the second Wednesday of every month. The Earl of Strafford, usually designated “the unfortunate,” was proprietor of the manor of Tinehely, in common with a vast extent of adjacent estate; and he commenced at Coolrus, about 4 of a mile from the town, the erection of a splendid mansion closely similar to that of Jegginstown Palace, also begun by him, in the vicinity of Naas. Some ruins of the mansion still exist and bear popularly the name of Black Tom's Buildings; and the portions of the ruins which have disappeared supplied stones and bricks for the construction of many of the town's private houses. Closely adjoining the town is the villa of Townview, the residence of Lieut. Moreton; and about 3½ miles distant is Coolattin-Park, the interesting and only Irish seat of Earl Fitzwilliam. Area of the town, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 575; in 1841, 640. Houses 99. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 44; in manufactures and trade, 61; in other pursuits, 16. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 64; on their own manual labour, 50.

TINNEHINCH, or TINNAHINCH, a barony in the extreme north-west of Queen's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the west, the north, and the north-east, by King's county; on the south-east, by the barony of Portnebhinch; and on the south, by the baronies of West Maryborough and Upperwoods. Its length, eastward, is 11½ miles; its greatest breadth is 7; and its area is 54,187 acres, 15 perches,—of which 108 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches are water. The south-west district is occupied by a portion of the Slievebloom mountains; a large proportion of the other districts is unprofitable bog; and the remainder, though generally arable and tolerably fertile, is too minutely subdivided into small farms, and does not produce a sufficiency of food for the local use of the population. The water-shed of the Slievebloom mountains, called the Cones, forms the western part of the southern boundary; and the water-shed, called the Ridge of Cappard, ranges within the interior. Baunreaghcony, the highest summit of the Cones, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,676 feet; the Antonian, the loftiest summit of the Ridge of Cappard, has an altitude of 1,114 feet; and three summits in the interior of the south-western district, and situated to the west of the Ridge of Cappard, have altitudes of respectively 1,054, 1,261, and 1,359 feet. Lough Annaghmore lies on the north-western boundary; and the rivulets Clodiagh, Gorragh, Glenlahan, Glenbarrow, Murglash, and Owenass—all, except the first and the second, affluents or rather head-streams of the Barrow, effect the drainage of most of the barony,—while the Barrow itself, after being formed by two of the streams, flows eastward through the interior.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Castlebrack, Kilmanman, Rearymore, and Rosenallis. The only town is part of Mountmellick; and the principal villages are Clonaslee and Rosenallis. Pop., in 1831, 17,113; in 1841, 17,910. Houses 3,011. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,126; in manufactures and trade, 880; in other pursuits, 332. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 83; on the directing of labour, 1,247; on their own manual labour, 1,887; on means not specified, 121. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,545; who could read but not write, 1,701; who could neither read nor write, 2,640. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,067; who could read but not write, 2,826; who could neither read nor write, 3,051.—Tinnehinch barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Mountmellick. The total number of tenements valued is 3,749; and of these, 2,749 were valued under £5,—503, under £10,—181, under £15,—109, under £20,—65, under £25,—31, under £30,—35, under £40,—26, under £50,—and 50, at and above £50.

TINNEHINCH, a hamlet in the parish of Rearymore, barony of Tinnehinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the rivulet Barrow or Glenbarrow, and on the road from Mountmellick to Frankford, 2 miles east by south of Clonaslee. The Barrow at the point of passing below Tinnehinch Bridge, has an elevation above sea-level of 352 feet. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

TINNEHINCH, a village in the parish of St. Mullins, barony of Lower St. Mullins, co. Carlow, Leinster. It stands on the western verge of the county, and on the left bank of the river Barrow, directly opposite to Graigueanamaugh, so as to form a suburb of that town, 5 miles south by west of Borris. The ruined castle of Timnebhinch, once a seat of the Butlers, is picturesquely situated on the river's banks adjacent to the village; and the ruins of St. Michael's church, St. Michael's burying-ground, and St. Michael's Well, are in the near vicinity. A fair is held on Sept. 29. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 221. Houses 40.

TINNEHINCH, the secluded but beautiful seat of James Grattan, Esq., on the eastern verge of the parish of Powerscourt, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated on the river Bray, adjacent to the glen of the Dargle and to the demesne of Powerscourt, ¾ of a mile south-west of Enniskerry. See DARGLE and POWERS-COURT. It possesses surpassing interest as the place where the celebrated orator Grattan composed, and often recited, the speeches which have immortalized his name in literature. "The house is of moderate dimensions, and is placed at the foot of a lofty hill, richly wooded through its whole ascent. A lawn extends to the silver bosom of the river, and the grounds attached to the residence were ornamentally planted under the directions of Mr. Grattan. But the chief beauties of the demesne are borrowed from the splendid improvements of Powerscourt, the whole charms of which territory conduce towards its decoration. At this place—on a spot thus deeply retired, amidst some of the most captivating scenery of a country he truly loved—the late admired orator, and venerated friend of mankind, passed the evening of a life devoted to the service of the public. It would be superfluous to expatiate on the interest which Tinnebhinch must retain with a very distant posterity in its connection with a man so illustrious. The refinements of mental pleasure blend with each inanimate object; and when the feelings of party shall have subsided in utter coldness, and his name be no longer hailed with popular acclamation, this spot must remain consecrated to genius and patriotic benevolence." [Brewer's Ireland.]

TINTERN, or KINNEAGH, a parish in the barony of Shelburne, 3 miles north of Fethard, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the village of SALT-MILLS: which see. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 6,863 acres, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,602; in 1841, 2,680. Houses 421. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,509. Houses 394. The surface slowly declines to the north-west side of Bannow bay; and is not diversified with either mountain or remarkable hill. The rivulets Tintern and Blackwater effect the drainage southward to Bannow bay. About one-half of the land is arable; and the remainder is chiefly meadow and pasture. The number of townlands is 32. Turbaries are abundant. The climate—in consequence, probably, of the general dryness of the soil—is healthy. A few quarries of building stone are worked. Sea-sand, of a kind suited to manorial purposes, is abundant. The bay of Bannow produces plenty of shell and other fish; and is remarkable, in particular, for large cockles and oysters. A weekly market is held at Tintern; and fairs are held on May 12, and Sept. 21. The principal hamlets are Ballycullane, Taylorstown, Burkestown, and Poundtown; and the principal residences are Tintern-abbey, St. Kieran's-house, St. Martin's Villa, Tamlaght-house, and Ballinraun-house. Ruins of a church or a castle exist on almost every townland; and Danish raths or forts are numerous. The supereminently interesting objects, however, are the abbey, the mansion, the demesne, and the church of Tintern; which, in combination with Bannow bay and the immediately adjacent coast, constitute one of the most fascinating scenes in the county of Wexford. "Tintern-abbey, a monastic ruin of considerable interest, was founded by William, Earl Marshal of England, and Earl of Pembroke, who wedded the lady Elizabeth de Clare, daughter of Earl Strongbow by his second wife, the Princess Eva Macmurchugh, in whose right he claimed the lordship of Leinster. The Earl of Pembroke, when in great danger at sea, made a vow that, in case he escaped, he would found an abbey on the spot where he landed in safety. His bark found shelter in Bannow Bay, and he religiously performed his vow by founding this abbey, which he dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and filled with Cistercian monks, whom he brought from Tintern in Monmouthshire, a monastery that owed its foundation to the house of de Clare. The new abbey of Tintern was richly endowed by the founder, but experienced some vicissitudes of fortune; and it is stated by Archdall that, in the year 1447, 'the lands belonging to it being very much wasted, and the abbot having rebuilt the house at his own particular cost and charge, it was enacted by parliament that the abbot of Tintern should not in future be compelled to attend parliaments, or other great councils.' After the dissolution of religious houses, the buildings and appurtenances of this monastery were granted by Queen Elizabeth to Anthony Colclough (afterwards Sir Anthony Colclough, knight), to hold in capite, at the annual rent of 26s. 4d. Irish money. By the Colclough family a part of the structure was converted into a mansion, still their residence; and many of the dependant chapels and outer buildings were removed at different times, the stone being used in erecting the parish-church, and a neat bridge thrown over the meandering river that waters the demesne. The abbey, which still constitutes a commanding and picturesque object, stands on a plain at the foot of a lofty hill, near the stream above noticed, which falls into the bay of Bannow. The abbey church was a handsome building, in the pointed style, designed after the plan and elevation of Dunbrody Abbey, but not so extensive a scale. The walls are still entire, with a square tower rising from the centre; but scarcely any traces of architectural ornament are now to be discovered. The present mansion is chiefly formed from the chancel of the ancient church, and is not well adapted to the purpose of a liberal domestic establishment. Considerable improvements were projected, and many were commenced, by the late Mr. John Colclough, who, amongst other alterations, intended to restore the roof of the venerable abbey. The gardens are extensive and are entirely enclosed with long ranges of substantial wall." [Brewer's Ireland.] Several monuments to members of the Colclough family occur in the parish-church; and the chief of them is a large table monument of black marble, to the memory of Sir Anthony Colclough. The farm-houses in the parish usually present a neat appearance, being white-washed, covered with slate, and shaded with trees.—This parish is an inappropriate rectory, and part of the perpetual curacy of OWENDUFF [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes are compounded for £300, and belong to Caesar Colclough, Esq. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £369 4s. 7½d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 150; attendance 180. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Owenduff and Clongeen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 244, and the Roman Catholics to 2,396; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 25 boys and 15 girls; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 a-year from Mr. Colclough—were usually attended by about 198 scholars.

TIPPER, a parish in the barony of North Naas, 1½ mile east by south of the town of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 3,288 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 821; in 1841, 661. Houses 114. The surface is low; consists, for the most part, of land below medium quality; and is traversed by the road from Kill to Bailymore-Eustace. The seats are Craddockstown-house, Tipper-house, and Newtown-house. The principal hamlet is Beggar's-End.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition and gross income, £152; nett, £136 13s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Naas, in the dio. of Kildare, and is resident in that benefice. 'There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 808; and 3 daily schools—one of which was supported by the Rev. Richard Wolf and Miss Wolf—were usually attended by about 105 children.

TIPPERAGHNEY, TIBBERAGHNEY, TIBBRACH, or TYBEROUGHNEY, a parish in the barony of Iverk, 1½ mile south-west of Piltown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,147 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 283; in 1841, 278. Houses 33. The parish lies on the margin of the county, at the confluence of the Lingay and the Suir, and is bounded by the former of these streams on the west, and by the latter on the south-west and the south. The surface consists of very good land, and is traversed by the road from Waterford and Piltown to Clonmel. "Tybroughny or Tipperaghney church," says the Rev. Mr. Sandys, "seems to be a ruin of great antiquity, from Tiobar, 'a well,' and Eochba, a name formerly very common among the Irish, both forming now the modern name of Tybroughny. Here also stands a stately castle, supposed by some to have been built by King John, while living at Waterford. Another account is that it was built, or at least inhabited, by some of the Walshes of the mountains, who were once the proprietors of this entire parish; and this latter tradition derives the name of Tybroughny from the words Tih-Branagh, literally meaning in the Irish language Walsh's House." A town of some importance is traditionally said to have stood at Tipperaghney, about the period of the Anglo-Norman invasion. The hamlet of Knockvoe now stands on the northern boundary.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Fiddown [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £00. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TIPPERARY,

An inland county of the province of Munster. It constitutes all the north-eastern and the middle-eastern portion of that province, and ranks with Cork and Galway as one of the three greatest counties of Ireland. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the county of Galway; on the north, by King's county; on the east, by Queen's county and the county of Kilkenny; on the south, by the county of Waterford; on the south-west, by the county of Cork; and on the west, by the counties of Limerick and Clare. All its boundary with Galway and Clare is formed by the river Shannon and Lough Derg; 9 miles of its boundary with King's county, by the Little Brosna; respectively 4½, 7, and 5 miles of its boundary with Kilkenny, by a head-stream of the Suir, by the Munster river, and by the Lingay rivulet; about 18 miles of its boundary with Waterford, by the river Suir; most of the remainder of its boundary with Waterford, by the Knockmeleadow mountains; probably 8 or 10 miles of its boundary with Limerick, at fitful intervals, by several streamlets, particularly the Bilboa; and all the remainder of its boundaries, or rather the lines of interval between these natural limitations, by the mere artificial boundaries of estates or farms. Its outline is an irregular oblong, extending from north to south, slowly and gradually expanding in its progress southward, and suffering an indentation on the eastern part of the north from King's county, and another on the middle of the west from the county of Limerick. Measured along a series of straight lines, or exclusive of all minor sinuosities, it has a contact of 17½ miles with Galway; of 14½ miles with King's county, across the indentation of that county, or 34 miles round the outline of that indentation; of 11½ miles with Queen's county; of 23½ miles with Kilkenney; of 29½ miles with Waterford; of 5½ miles with Cork; of 28 miles with Limerick, across the indentation of that county, or of 42 miles round the outline of that indentation; and of 9½ miles with Clare. Its greatest length, southward from the mouth of the Little Brosna to the Knockmeleadow mountains at the junction point with the counties of Waterford and Cork, is 50 miles; its greatest breadth, westward in a line about 2 miles north of Fethard, is 29½ miles; but its breadth, over 10 miles at the northern extremity, nowhere exceeds 9½ miles; in a line eastward from the end of the Limerick indentation, is 16½ miles,—and, in a line eastward, falling upon the end of the King's county indentation, is 21½ miles. Its area comprises 843,887 acres of arable land, 178,183 of uncultivated land, 23,779 of continuous plantations, 2,359 of towns, and 13,523 of water,—in all, 1,061,731 acres. In proportion to its extent, this county contains less unimproved land than any other in the south of Ireland. The uncultivated land is situated partly on the tops and declivities of mountains, particularly on the range of the Devil's Bit and Keeper mountains, and partly as bogs, in low valleys near the margins of rivers and streams. Mr. Griffiths reports that about 30,000 acres might be reclaimed for cultivation, and 60,000 drained for pastures.

Surface.—The south-eastern termination of the Slievebloom mountains slightly touches the extremity of the wing or horn of the county situated on the east side of the King's county indentation; and all the adjoining part of that great range of uplands contributes its scenery to the landscape around Roscrea. The Devil's Bit mountains, rising speedily up from the dingle or defile of Roscrea which separates them from the Slievebloom mountains, extend 15 miles south-westward to the vicinity of Borrisleagh; and they form a continuous ridge of considerable variety of outline, force of character, and extensiveness of view; but they partially belong, over 8 miles of their extent, to the indenting district of King's county,—they have nowhere a basis breadth of more than 4 miles,—and they send up their principal summits, Borrisnoe, Devil's Bit, Kilduff, Knockanarra, and Latteragh, to the altitudes of respectively 1,471, 1,462, 1,583, 1,429, and 1,257 feet above the level of the sea. A bisecting clogher of mountains is intimately connected with the south-west end of the Devil's Bit range; sends one mass southward, with a length of 9½ miles and a breadth of 7½, under the name of the Bilboa mountains, and another mass westward, with a length of 9½ miles and a breadth of 7½, under the name of the Keeper mountains; stands immediately connected, at the west side of the former mass and the south side of the latter one, with the Slieve-Phelim mountains of Limerick; and constitutes, jointly with these mountains, a region of thickly-packed, many-summited, variously-outlined, metalliferous, and magnificent uplands, interspersed with beautiful and romantic glens, and powerfully characterized with escarpments, abrasures, and grassy acclivities. The principal summits of the clogheries within Tipperary, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, but named without reference to a minute distinction between its two sections, are Foilnaman, 1,205 feet; Knockavillage, 1,216; Moher-Hill, 987; Knockbane, 1,188; a height 3 miles north-west of Knockbane, 1,501; a height 3 miles north-west by west of Knockbane, 1,295; Knocknascreggan, 1,296; Knockteigue, 1,312; a height 2½ miles north of Knocknascreggan, 1,543 feet; a height 1½ mile north-east of Knocknascreggan, 1,218; Keeper mountain, 2,268; a height of 1½ mile north-west of Keeper mountain, 1,607; Moher-Slieve, 1,783; and a height 4 miles east of Newport-Tip, 1,204. A narrow but beautiful ridge, called the Slievenamuck mountains or the Tipperary hills, extends in the direction of east by north from within ¼ of a mile of the boundary with Limerick, past the southern vicinity of the town of Tipperary, and along the north side of the picturesque glen of Aberlow; and it has a mean basis-breadth of less than a mile, exhibits in its declivities a profusion of wood and cultivation, and sends aloft, as its principal summits, Moanour mountain, Slievenamuck, and a height 2½ miles east by north of Slievenamuck, to the altitude of respectively 1,103, 1,215, and 1,000 feet above the level of the sea. The magnificently grand mountain-range of the Galtees come in from the south-western extremity of the county of Limerick, and extend, within Tipperary, 9 miles eastward to the valley of the Suir, at a point about 2 miles west-north-west of Cahir; they have their culminating-point in Galteemore, 3,015 feet of altitude above sea-level, on the boundary with Limerick; they possess, within Tipperary, an extreme basis-breadth of 5½ miles, and everywhere a basis-breadth of considerable expansion; they rise steeply and in some places inaccessiblely up, in their northern acclivities, but descend more shelvingly and slopingly on the south; they constitute both a museum of brilliant highland landscapes, and a mighty and most beautiful perspective to far-away scenes, particularly athwart 'the Golden Vale,' and down the windings of the Suir; and they send aloft, as their principal summits, along their watershed, 7 heights of respectively 2,588, 2,636, 2,378, 1,969, 1,577, 1,437, and 1,476 feet of altitude above sea-level,—on the north side of their watershed, two heights, of respectively 2,166 and 2,109 feet of altitude,—and on the south side of their watershed, three heights of respectively 1,977, 1,591, and 856 feet of altitude. The Knockmeleadow mountains extend strictly parallel with the Galtees, and belong rather more to Waterford than to Tipperary, and partially also, under the name of the Kilworth mountains, to Cork. See KNOCKMELEADOW. The portion or rather side of these mountains within Tipperary has a basis-breadth of from 1½ mile to 3½ miles; it is cloven along the western part of the boundary with Waterford, to the extent of 3½ miles by the mountain vale of Arraglin; it possesses on the eastern part of the boundary with Waterford, the summits of Sugarloaf-hill, Knockmeleadow-proper, and two other heights to the east of the latter, with altitudes above sea-level of respectively 2,144, 2,609, 2,101, and 1,846 feet; and it lifts up, wholly within Tipperary, the summits of Cornan-hill, Knockanard, Farbreaga, Knockshanahallian, and West Croghan, with altitudes of respectively 1,180, 1,337, 1,703, 2,150, and 1,718 feet.

A small but acclivitous and lofty group, that of Slievenaman, soars up from the plain in the south-east corner of the county; and its principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Slievenaman, 2,364,—Carrickabrock, 1,859,—Knockanaua, 1,654,—a height nearly $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Knockanaua, 1,088,—a height $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile west of Nine-mile-house, 852,—and a height nearly 1 mile south-west of Carrickabrock, 1,589. Another small but picturesque group, occupying an area of 34 miles by 23, overhangs the lower part of Lough Derg, contributing some features to the scenery of that lake, and blending from many points of view with the great congeries of the Keeper mountains, from which it is separated only by the valley or dingle which takes along the mail-road from Limerick to Nenagh; and its four principal summits have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,083, 1,127, 1,206, and 1,517 feet. These various groups, and ridges, and congeries of mountains, impart strength and brilliance to the landscapes of all parts of the county, and afford noble perspectives to even the most distant portions of its plains; and other heights, though rarely acquiring the loftiness of hills, and generally consisting of mere swells and undulations, serve to relieve the interior of the champaign grounds from monotony, and, in some instances, to lift the eye round panoramic scenes of great extent and uncommon beauty. The broad, spreading, fertile, and luscious valley of the Suir flanks all the east side of the Devil's Bit and the Bilboa mountains; the broad, beautiful, and most fructiferous dingle, called the Golden Vale, extends from the valley of the Suir eastward to the Slievenaman mountains, and westward between the Bilboa and the Slievenamuck mountains, away into the county of Limerick; the picturesque and lovely vale of Aherlow extends westward from the valley of the Suir, between the Slievenamuck and the Galtees mountains; the limestone valley of the Tar extends westward from the valley of the Suir, between the Galtees and the Knockmeledown mountains; part of the northern half of the surpassingly rich valley of the Suir, after the river assumes an easterly course, forms all the eastern part of the southern border of the county; and the opulent, lovely, and luxuriant plain of Ormond constitutes all the narrow district lying north of the Keeper and the Arra or Lough Derg mountains. The low grounds of the county are thus a gorgeous assemblage of wealth, brilliance, and beauty. Yet the district which constitutes the north-eastern and the eastern borders, from the vicinity of Roscrea all the way south to the vicinity of the Slievenaman mountains, are first a sheet of sheer bog about $23\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and next an expanse of low, spreading, moorish hills, whose loftiest summits acquire an altitude of from 300 to 600 feet above the level of the adjacent plain.

Waters.—All the lakes of the county of Tipperary, excepting its portion of Lough Derg, are small and unimportant. The principal, together with their respective area, are Loughs Curra, Dheen, and Boheen, 21 acres, 35 perches, in the parish of Clonbeg, and barony of Clanwilliam; Muskerry, 25 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches in the parish of Templemore, and barony of Clanwilliam; Carrownreddy, 14 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches, in the parish of Tipperary, and barony of Clanwilliam; Rockwell, 20 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches in the parish of Knockgraffon, and barony of Middlethird; Nabinch, 22 acres, 38 perches in the parish of Ballingarry, and barony of Lower Ormond; Ourna, 31 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches, and Claree, 19 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches in the parish of Cloghprior, and barony of Lower Ormond; Avon, 15 acres, 19 perches in the parish of Finwoe, and barony of Lower Ormond; Ballinagrass and other loughlets, 38 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches in the parish of Kilbarran, and barony of Lower Ormond; Paulawee, Clareen, and Black, 54 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches in the parish of Killodiernan, and barony of Lower Ormond; Ourna, 37 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches in the parish of Knight, and barony of Lower Ormond; Friar's, 10 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches in the parish of Lorrha, and barony of Lower Ormond; Templemore, 16 acres, 16 perches in the parish of Templemore, and barony of Eliogurty; and several loughlets, 60 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches in the parish of Corbally, and barony of Ikerrin. Excepting these lakes, and a few acres of water in the parishes of Innislonnaght and Kilcooley, all the 13,600 acres of water exhibited in the Ordnance Survey as belonging to Tipperary, are in Lough Derg, and the rivers Suir and Shannon. All the district west of the summit-line of the Devil's Bit and the Bilboa mountains, and also a small portion of the Golden Vale around the episcopal village of Emly, belong to the basin of the Shannon, and are drained to that monarch river, or to its great expansion of Lough Derg, by a number of inconsiderable rivulets, the chief of which are the Brosna, the Nenagh, the Kilmastulla, and the Mulkern. A tiny district at the south-western extremity of the county belongs to the basin of the great Blackwater, and is drained by the Arraglin rivulet, and one or two rilly headstreams of the Funcheon. Another tiny district, in the vicinity of Roscrea, constituting the north end of the county's region of bog, gives birth to the Nore, and is drained for a brief distance by its nascent stream. A third inconsiderable district, though larger than the two preceding, and not very far from being identical with the hilly and moorish little region on the eastern border of the county, is drained by the King's river and the Munster river, confluent tributaries eastward to the central Nore. All the vast remainder of the county belongs to the basin of the SUIR: which see. The only navigations of the county are that of the Shannon along all the boundary with Clare and Galway, and that of the Suir up the southern boundary to Clonmel.

Minerals.—A formation of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate, constitutes the greater portion of the Keeper mountains, the Bilboa mountains, and the Lough Derg mountains, a small part of the Knockmeledown mountains, and a considerable part of the Galtees mountains, the Devil's Bit mountains, and the Slievenamuck mountains. A formation of old conglomerate, with red, purple, and grey clay slate, constitutes most of the Knockmeledown mountains, rather more than one-half of the Galtees, and a considerable portion of the Slievenamuck group. A formation of yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitutes the northern part of the Devil's Bit range, a broad belt round the Keeper and Bilboa congeries, and narrow belts round the Lough Derg mountains, the Galtees, the Knockmeledown mountains, and the Slievenamuck mountains. A formation of old red sandstone and sandstone conglomerate, constitutes a portion of the centre of the Keeper mountains, the western declivities of these mountains, the district around Newport-Tip, and thence to the Shannon, a narrow belt between the clay slate and the yellow sandstone of the Lough-Derg mountains, and the central and eastern portions of the Slievenamuck range. A coal formation, partially containing workable seams of coal, constitutes the district of moorish hill on the eastern border of the county, the district westward thence till within a few miles of Cashel, a tiny district closely adjacent to Cashel, and another tiny district a little north-north-west of Clonmel. Wings and ramifications of the great central foetz limestone plain of Ireland constitute very nearly all the vast remainder of the county.—“The position of the sandstone on the flanks of the Knockmeleadow mountains, is generally conformed to the inclination presented by the surface of the subjacent clay slate, but the masses on the higher grounds approach more and more to a horizontal arrangement.” “The strata of the sandstone in the upper region of the Galtees, are almost horizontal, yet gently curved, following the form of the summit, and precipitously broken off on the sides, where they frequently crop out. On the flanks where they are not abruptly broken off, they become more inclined, and appear to be conformed to the surface of the clay slate on which they rest. The sandstone varies much in character; but in general it is a fine-grained rock, composed of grains of quartz closely aggregated. The sandstone of Slievenamuck yields excellent flags.” “The direction of the strata of the clay slate of the Keeper and Bilboa mountains varies. The sandstone in one part near Newport on the west side of the range is a coarse red conglomerate, and rests unconformably on the clay slate. Copper was formerly dug in these mountains, at Lackamore, 5 miles east of Newport. There are three veins, one of them thicker than the rest, and bearing rich copper ore in bunches. The workings in this vein extended above 700 feet in length, and 150 feet in depth. An attempt was made early in the present century to renew the works, but the machinery was insufficient to keep the mine free from water. Considerable quantities of lead mixed with silver were obtained last century in an opening at the junction of the clay slate with the floetz limestone, near the village of Silvermines. This opening had been filled with clay, sandy clay, sand, decomposed slate, and scattered blocks of limestone, Lydian stone, and sandstone, the whole mass being penetrated or cemented by metallic depositions of various kinds; and in this ‘softness,’ as the miners termed it, the operations were conducted.” “The floetz limestone of the county presents, in its connection with other rocks, and in its organic remains, several features similar to those of the mountain limestone of Derbyshire and the north of England, but differs in this, that the tract occupied by it forms an extensive plain, marked only by slight undulations.” “The coal-field forms a low range of hills, placed upon the floetz limestone, and elevated above it. It varies in its elevation, being highest and most abrupt on the north-western side, where the hills rise from 300 to 600 feet above the limestone plain. On this side the dip both of the limestone and superincumbent coal strata is greater than on the other side. Towards the south-east the surface declines gradually, and the streams which water the tract mostly flow in that direction. The strata are more gently inclined here. The aspect of the hills varies, but they are commonly rounded with intervening hollows. The junction of the limestone with the coal formation is generally at the foot of the hills, but sometimes half way up their side. Immediately above the limestone, shale and grit stone alternate, there being two beds of each: the upper gritstone, when not covered by the superior beds, constitutes the main body of the elevated part of the coal hills: it is marked by repeated undulations, forming unequal ridges, with intervening hollows or troughs, having their greatest extension or length generally from north-east to south-west. In these troughs, the coal beds are found resting upon fire-clay, which intervenes between them and the grit stone, and forms the floor of the coal, and covered by shale, grit, and then shale again. Sometimes this series is repeated so as to give two seams of coal. The troughs are generally from 50 to 70 yards deep from the surface to the coal, near the centre of the trough, and from 500 to 700 yards wide at the surface.”

Agriculture.—The barony of Middlethird was selected by the Irish Poor Commissioners as the field of inquiry into the agricultural and economical condition of Tipperary; and it may probably be regarded as a fair average specimen of the county. Bog is scarce in the barony; and the paucity of fuel is severely felt in its southern districts. Commonage is unknown; and woodlands occur only within gentlemen’s demesnes. About one-third or one-fourth of the barony is pasture; and most of the remainder is tillage,—principally with a rich deep loam, on a substratum of limestone. The proportion of grazing land increased during the five years preceding the Commissioners’ inquiry; but previous to these years it had decreased. Grazing farms, in a general view, are few, and large, and held by gentlemen. Fences separating farms usually consist of double ditches, and those separating fields usually consist of single ditches; and both classes are, for the most part, in such good condition that only very trivial loss is sustained from the trespassing of cattle. Rents were supposed to have fallen from 20 to 30 per cent. during the 12 years preceding the inquiry of the Commissioners. Leases are much less in use now than at a recent period; and such as still exist are usually for 31 years or three lives in the case of farms, and for 21 years in the case of cottage and glebe lands. The system of sub-letting is falling into desuetude; yet at the period of the Commissioners’ inquiry about one-fourth of the barony continued to be held by middlemen. Attempts to consolidate small farms have frequently been made by landlords, but have usually been resisted or violently resented by the ejected tenants and the general body of the peasantry. Competition for small holdings is so great that, on occasion of almost every vacancy, persons offer more than the land is worth, and enter on its possession on terms quite incompatible with their obtaining more from it than the most miserable subsistence. This competition has been a prolific source of crime; and it usually incapacitates the small tenant from paying his rent in any way but by labour to his landlord. “The course of cropping is uniformly very severe. Potatoes, wheat, and oats, form the series, and it is repeated if the land will bear it. The potatoes are manured, or perhaps limed; they are still generally cultivated by the spade, and set in beds called larry-beds, having the earth out of the trenches thrown over the manure, which is spread on the ground, and the seed is then planted. This system requires more manure than setting potatoes in drills with a plough, which is every year becoming more common, and its advantages in saving labour and manure, and its superior facilities of killing the weeds among the crops when growing, are becoming more known.” Stall-feeding as ancillary to manuring is unknown; town manure is in smart request at from 2s. to 2s. 6d. per 15 cwt.; furze, bog-earth, and weeds are sedulously stored up in the dung-yard; and other practices prevail which indicate scarcity and dearth of manure. The common white potatoes are preferred as crops to all the better varieties, by both the cottiers and the farmers, on account of their making a remunerating return on more exhausted land, and yielding a more abundant return on good land. Wheat is grown more commonly after potatoes than after fallow; the seed is steeped in brine as a preventive of smut; the growing crop is usually rolled, and twice weeded; none of the produce is of prime quality; and much of the portions raised by the small farmers is thrashed immediately after harvest in order to pay debts or rent. The potato is in general use for the feeding of cattle; clover, rye-grass, and vetches, have of late been increasingly cultivated; but turnips and mangel-wurzel are not in use. "After the common rotation of crops has been taken once or twice, or on some of the best lands three or four times, the ground is left to grass for 6 or 8 years. Grass or clover seeds are usually sown with the oats, the last crop of the tillage course; and for the two following years, the produce is mown and then grazed, until the land is again broken up by the plough. Small farmers frequently do not sow any grass seeds, nor mow the crop; they also break up the ground after a shorter interval. Owing to the warmth and moisture of the climate, and from the late period (the month of August) at which they are cut, the crops of hay are heavier than would be produced by land of equal goodness in Great Britain; but it is probable that from its more succulent nature, the hay will not support or fatten cattle better than a smaller quantity of English hay." The old-fashioned plough has been generally superseded by an iron plough of similar construction to the Scotch one. The harrows in use, though not of the best description, do effective execution upon the friable soil of the country. Rollers are rapidly increasing in request. The carts are drawn each by one horse, and have narrow wheels and low rail-formed sides; and they carry but a small load. When straw is wanted for thatching, the corn is often knocked out against a board by the hand; but when the straw is wanted for other purposes, the corn is usually thrashed with the flail. The con-acre system is prevalent; and the quantity of land usually taken by a family is from a rood to an acre. Very little cheese is made; and even butter is not produced in large quantity, but is generally of good quality.—In 1841, there were, within the civic districts of the county, 230 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 110 of from 5 to 15 acres, 22 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 21 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the rural districts, 13,032 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 12,787 of from 5 to 15 acres, 4,938 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 2,900 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year, there were, within the entire county, 25,630 male farmers of upwards of 15 years of age, 122 male farmers of less than 15 years of age, 1,585 female farmers of upwards of 15 years of age, 7 female farmers of less than 15 years of age, 64,370 male servants and labourers of upwards of 15 years of age, 3,647 male servants and labourers of less than 15 years of age, 9,963 female servants and labourers of upwards of 15 years of age, 1,135 female servants and labourers of less than 15 years of age, 467 ploughmen, 398 gardeners, 18 graziers, 1,216 male herds, 11 female herds, 150 care-takers, 5 land-agents, 408 land-stewards, 24 gamekeepers, and 300 dairy keepers.

Social Condition.—The article 'Tipperary,' in the Penny Cyclopædia, contains the following instructive digest of the information relative to the condition of the people elicited by the Poor Inquiry Commissioners:—"The demand for labour at the time of the inquiry was considered to have decreased, while the population had increased. Wages, which had in the course of 10 years undergone a diminution of about 2d. per day, were usually for men 6d. a-day, with food, and in harvest 1s. a-day with food, or when hired for a whole year 7½d. a-day in summer, and 6d. a-day in winter without food. Boys under sixteen received 8d. a-day in harvest time, or if hired by the year 15s. per quarter, or in some baronies, 20s. per quarter. If a labourer worked 250 days in the year, at 8d. a-day, he received £8 6s. 8d., which may be considered as the full average of the yearly earnings of the class. In the seasons when work is slack, mid-winter, and a month before harvest, many of them resort to begging. To this the labourer may add a little by eggs, and about £3 by his pigs. When food is dear, the labourer has to work sometimes for six weeks in July and August, merely for his food, consisting generally of potatoes and milk. When a farmer feeds his labourer, he gives him commonly better food than he would have at home. If a labourer has a cottage, potato garden, and milk from his employer, as is usual, these are considered equivalent to a third or a half of his wages. The labourers in the richest grazing districts are the worst off. The labourers, when they obtain permanent employment at fixed wages, exhibit generally increased cleanliness and decency of appearance, and their cabins are better furnished. There is no employment for women, except in some of the baronies in harvest time, and perhaps in the potato planting and digging seasons, when they earn about 6d. a-day. Formerly they spun wool for their own clothes, but this practice has ceased for several years, probably because the manufactured article can now be purchased cheaper. The rearing of fowls is the source of some profit; and a couple of pigs will bring in about £3, which is depended upon to pay the rent of the potato garden. There is no work for children under 14 years of age; they are not employed in hoeing or weeding corn or other crops. The cottier tenants, occupiers of less than 10 acres of land, are enabled to feed and clothe their families better than a labourer, but are themselves worse fed than the labourers who are dieted by the farmers. Cottiers seldom keep a cow; they hold their land from year to year, and are generally in arrear for rent, which is always (if a man holds 5 acres or more) expected to be paid in money. The potatoes which the labourer or small cottier grows constitute the food of his family; he himself is frequently fed by his employer. Milk is not used in more than one-half of the families. The greatest expenditure on tobacco is 6d. a-week. Candles for 6 months amount to 3d. per week; and other necessities, under the general designation of 'kitchen,' cost from £1 10s. to £2 10s. for the year. The labourers do not consume any description of groceries. The fees to the Roman Catholic clergy form an important item in a labourer's outlay. The fee for marriage is 25s., for churching a woman 2s. 6d., and for blessing the clay and saying mass at a funeral 5s.; at confession at Easter and Christmas, 1s. is expected; but these fees are often remitted. The dwellings of the labourers are of the most wretched description; nor has any perceptible improvement taken place of late years. During the alarm of cholera, they were whitewashed, but that is now neglected. They are generally 20 feet long by 12 broad, with walls from 7 to 8 feet high, divided into 2 or perhaps 3 very small apartments, and never having a second story; covered only with a thatch of straw, and having nothing but the bare ground for the floor, and that often full of holes, which in wet weather become little pools of water. A hole in the roof allows the escape of the smoke; and their windows, 15 inches square, are more commonly without glass than with it, and almost universally destitute of shutters; they have rarely any out-house except a pig-stye, and in many cases where they have not even that, the pig sleeps in the house. These wretched hovels usually cost in erection about £10, and the tenant pays from 20s. to 30s. a-year as rent, with a rood of land; the rent is near £2 10s. The cabins are always kept in repair by the tenant; they are usually built separate, not grouped in villages or hamlets, and for convenience near the road-side. It rarely happens that there is more than one bed for the whole family; a bedstead, a dresser, two chairs, a large iron pot, and some crockery, all of the worst description, usually complete the catalogue. In some wretched cabins even these are not found, and the family lie on the floor. The chief article of food is the potato; the peasantry grow this in preference to corn, because it yields a more abundant supply with less care and less manure. A labourer, when employed, gets three meals of potatoes a-day,—his wife and children only two. In July and August, when the old potatoes have become unfit for food, and the new crop is not ready, cholera or other bowel complaints are produced by the unwholesomeness of the diet; and the failure of the potato crop is always productive of great distress; the labourer is then obliged to procure provision upon credit, which he obtains with great difficulty and by paying double the market price. In respect of clothing, considerable improvement has taken place, though the peasantry are still very indifferently clad. No material for clothing is of home manufacture, but the women generally make up their own dresses; sometimes, however, they are unable to do this, and have to pay for getting them made. The use of shoes and stockings is increasing. Old clothes, brought from London and Liverpool, are much worn; the yearly expenditure of a labourer's family on clothes is seldom less than £1. The ordinary fuel is turf; near the bogs this is cheap, but to one living at a distance of 8 or 10 miles from a turbarry the cost is doubled. When fuel is scarce, pilfering and the destruction of woods and fences are common. Straw and dried cow dung are used as a substitute for turf. The county has always been one of the most disturbed in Ireland; 'although there is an ebb and flow of crime in other counties, Tipperary has always kept up steadily to high-water mark,'—this was the statement of the resident police magistrate of Cashel."

Live Stock.—Stock of all kinds are good. The Limerick or common Irish breed of black cattle are the most common, in consequence of being thought the most hardy. The Durham and Hereford breeds are in considerable request; and the long-horned Leicester breed was long ago introduced, but has never acquired much favour. The Kerry and Ayrshire cows are little in request except on the farms of gentlemen. Fewer cattle are now fattened for exportation than at a former period; yet some are still sent to Waterford for exportation to Liverpool. Young bullocks for grazing are bought at Ballinasloe or nearer markets; and many of a year old are sold to purchasers from the counties of Galway and Roscommon. Most of the sheep within the county are a cross of the Leicester breed, and are large and well-shaped. Two or three sheep are kept on many a small farm for the sake of the wool; some sheep are mixed with black cattle on the pastures of many dairy farms; but no sheep are kept in folds, or fed in large flocks. Most of the horses are of a light boned and active description, well adapted to the varied labours of the farm. The pigs are of an improved breed, and are continuing to improve.—In 1841, there were, within the civic districts of the county, on holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 1,637 horses and mules, 324 asses, 600 cattle, 203 sheep, 5,660 pigs, and 7,346 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 181 horses and mules, 18 asses, 158 cattle, 46 sheep, 297 pigs, and 817 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 177 horses and mules, 12 asses, 273 cattle, 107 sheep, 203 pigs, and 734 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 111 horses and mules, 5 asses, 80 cattle, 85 sheep, 40 pigs, and 127 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 73 horses and mules, 1 ass, 413 cattle, 894 sheep, 127 pigs, and 390 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with the estimated value of each, were 2,199 horses and mules, £17,592; 360 asses, £300; 1,585 cattle, £10,303; 1,335 sheep, £1,409; 6,327 pigs, £7,909; and 9,414 poultry, £235. Total estimated value of live stock in the civic districts of the county, £37,898. In the same year there were, within the rural districts, on holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 2,959 horses and mules, 2,540 asses, 3,134 cattle, 3,571 sheep, 19,892 pigs, and 118,197 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 3,350 horses and mules, 1,941 asses, 5,763 cattle, 7,601 sheep, 14,523 pigs, and 103,706 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 10,514 horses and mules, 757 asses, 17,856 cattle, 19,586 sheep, 27,676 pigs, and 177,444 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 7,320 horses and mules, 892 asses, 19,984 cattle, 20,209 sheep, 22,293 pigs, and 106,151 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 9,072 horses and mules, 946 asses, 40,425 cattle, 78,881 sheep, 20,949 pigs, and 81,285 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with the estimated value of each, are 33,215 horses and mules, £265,720; 7,076 asses, £7,076; 87,162 cattle, £556,553; 129,848 sheep, £142,833; 105,333 pigs, £131,666; and 586,783 poultry, £14,669. Total estimated value of the live stock in the rural districts of the county, £1,128,517.

Woods.—The continuous plantations within the county of Tipperary, in 1841, consisted of 1,520 acres of oak, 353 of ash, 74 of elm, 949 of beech, 3,879 of fir, 14,811 of mixed trees, and 2,193 of orchards,—in all, 23,779 acres; and detached plantations consisted of 45,833 trees of oak, 219,304 of ash, 87,131 of elm, 86,749 of beech, 121,838 of fir, 357,043 of mixed trees, and 13,149 of orchards,—in all, 931,647 trees, equivalent to 5,823 acres;—so that the total of plantations was 29,602 acres. Of the continuous plantations, there were planted, previous to 1791, 1,147 acres of oak, 114 of ash, 25 of elm, 59 of beech, 153 of fir, 3,012 of mixed trees, and 904 of orchards; from 1791 to 1800, 84 acres of oak, 121 of ash, 6 of elm, 29 of beech, 96 of fir, 1,047 of mixed trees, and 225 of orchards; from 1801 to 1810, 15 acres of oak, 29 of ash, 9 of elm, 24 of beech, 689 of fir, 2,027 of mixed trees, and 257 of orchards; from 1811 to 1820, 21 acres of oak, 18 of ash, 14 of elm, 30 of beech, 652 of fir, 2,396 of mixed trees, and 284 of orchards; from 1821 to 1830, 169 acres of oak, 11 of ash, 9 of elm, 523 of beech, 1,167 of fir, 3,649 of mixed trees, and 342 of orchards; and from 1831 to 1840, 86 acres of oak, 60 of ash, 11 of elm, 284 of beech, 1,120 of fir, 2,680 of mixed trees, and 181 of orchards.

Trade.—A digest of the statistics of personal industry, or of occupations, as furnished by the Census of 1841, appears to us the best means of affording both a minute and a comprehensive view of the classes and comparative amounts of trades and manufactures.—Millers, 208; maltsters, 4; brewers, 22; distillers, 11; barn-maker, 1; bakers, 402; confectioners, 62; saltsters, 12; salt-manufacturer, 1; tobacco-twisters, 32; fishmongers, 5; egg-dealers, 2; fruiterers, 7; cattle-dealers, 40; horse-dealers, 6; pig-jobbers, 147; corn-dealers, 53; seeds-men, 10; butter-merchants, 5; huxters and provision-dealers, 147; butchers, 174; poulterers, 2; victuallers, 338; grocers, 39; tea-dealers, 2; tobaccoconists, 16; wine-merchants, 4; flax-dressers, 47; carders, 94; spinners of flax, 924; spinners of wool, 2,676; spinners of unspecified classes, 4,286; factory-workers, 35; winders and warpers, 14; wool-dressers, 42; weavers of cotton, 39; weavers of linen, 169; weavers of woollen, 107; weavers of unspecified classes, 871; manufacturers of lace, 5; manufacturers of thread, 2; dyers, 38; clothiers, 17; cloth-finishers, 6; skinners, 15; curriers, 38; tanners, 20; brogue-makers, 739; boot and shoe makers, 2,371; tailors, 2,125; sempstresses, 1,022; dress-makers, 1,943;

Communications.—The Public Commissioners' proposed line of railway from Dublin to Limerick and Cork comes in from Queen's county, in the vicinity of Templetoohy, passes south-westward in the vicinity of Thurles and Holycross, and forks into the two lines toward respectively Limerick and Cork, in the southern vicinity of Holycross; the Limerick line curves slowly round from a south-westerly, to a westerly direction, and leaves the county of Tipperary in the southern vicinity of Cappagh; and the Cork line proceeds southward, past Cashel, to the north-western vicinity of Cahir, and then deflects to the west-south-west, and ascends the limestone valley between the Galtees and the Knockmeledown mountains. The Commissioners' proposed line from Limerick to Waterford branches off from the Dublin and Limerick line in the vicinity of Cappagh, proceeds south-eastward past Golden-bridge to a point 2 or 3 miles above Clonmel, and then passes eastward down the valley of the Suir, and in the northern vicinity of Clonmel and Carrick-on-Suir. A proposed railway from Dublin to Limerick, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, follows very nearly the course of the present mail-road, passes across the north-east wing of Tipperary in the vicinity of Roscrea, traverses the indentation upon Tipperary by King's county, and proceeds south-westward past Nenagh to the Shannon at a point nearly midway between Killaloe and Limerick.—The principal roads which traverse the county are the Dublin and Limerick mail-road, by Roscrea and Nenagh; the Dublin and Cork west mail-road by Littleton, Cashel, and Cahir; the Dublin and Cork east mail-road by Clonmel and Clogheen; the Limerick and Waterford mail-road, by Tipperary, Cahir, Clonmel, and Carrick-on-Suir; the Clonmel and Ballinasloe mail-road, by Fethard, Cashel, Thurles, Templemore, and Roscrea; and the Birr and Limerick post-road, by Borris-o'-kane and Nenagh. The road-surveyor of the north riding was appointed in May 1839; he constructed, between that date and the close of 1841, 9 miles of new road; and, at the latter date, he had under his charge 927 miles of road, and had made a survey for a new line of road. The surveyor of the south riding was appointed in 1834; he constructed, between that date and the close of 1841, 18 miles of new road; and, at the latter date, he had under his charge 2,089 miles of road.

Divisions and Towns.—The county was recently divided into two ridings, north and south; and is now, in assize affairs and other departments of county business, practically treated as if it were two counties. Its baronies are Lower Ormond, in the northern part upon the Shannon; Upper Ormond, in the central part upon the Shannon; Ownay and Arra, in the southern part upon the Shannon; Ikerrin, in the north-east; Eliogurty, in the northern part of the central east; Slieveardagh, in the southern part of the central east; East Iffa and Offa, in the south-east; West Iffa and Offa, in the south-west; Clanwilliam, in the southern part of the central west; Lower Kilnemanagh, in the northern part of the central west; Upper Kilnemanagh, in the north-west centre, between Lower Kilnemanagh and Upper Ormond; and Middlethird, in the south-east centre, between Slieveardagh and Clanwilliam. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of Kilsheanane and Pubbehill, in the parish of Oughterleague, and the townland of Clonbunane, in the parish of Clonoulty, unitedly containing a pop. of 484, from the barony of Lower Kilnemanagh to that of Clanwilliam. Lower Ormond contains 15 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; Upper Ormond contains 12 whole parishes, and part of two other parishes; Ownay and Arra contains 9 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; Ikerrin contains 7 whole parishes, and part of 6 other parishes; Eliogurty contains 16 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; Slieveardagh contains 13 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; East Iffa and Offa contains 10 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes; West Iffa and Offa contains 14 whole parishes, and part of 1 other parish; Clanwilliam contains 23 whole parishes, and part of 7 other parishes; Lower Kilnemanagh contains 6 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; Upper Kilnemanagh contains 4 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; and Middlethird contains 30 whole parishes, and part of 7 other parishes. The towns and chief villages are Borris-o'-kane, Goatstown, Puskawn, Lorrha, Ballyloughane, CloghJordan, and part of Nenagh, in Lower Ormond; Toomavarra, Silvermines, and part of Nenagh, in Upper Ormond; Portroe, Newport, and Ballina, in Ownay and Arra; Roscrea and Templetuohy, in Ikerrin; Thurles, Moyné, Loughmoe, Templemore, Littleton, and Two-mile-Borris, in Eliogurty; Mullinahone, Killenale, Ballingarry, New Birmingham, Nine-mile-house, and Maradyke, in Slieveardagh; Carrick-on-Suir, Abbey, Ballyclarahan, Kilcash, Tobberabeena, Kilsheelan, and the chief part of Clonmel, in East Iffa and Offa; Cahir, Clogheen, Ardinnan, Ballyporeen, Newcastle, and Barncourt, in West Iffa and Offa; Tipperary,

First-class inhabited houses, 1,722; second-class, 13,653; third-class, 28,190; fourth-class, 22,819. Families residing in first-class houses, 21,123; in second-class houses, 16,699; in third-class houses, 30,869; in fourth-class houses, 24,879. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 52,805; in manufactures and trade, 13,512; in other pursuits, 8,253. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1,607; on the directing of labour, 25,978; on their own manual labour, 45,034; on means not specified, 1,951. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 94,360; to clothing, 6,569; to lodging, 8,939; to health, 181; to charity, 5; to justice, 1,062; to education, 666; to religion, 280; unclassified, 8,030; without any specified occupations, 12,349. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 12,181; to clothing, 11,850; to lodging, 68; to health, 209; to charity, 4; to justice, 5; to education, 235; to religion, 50; unclassified, 18,401; without any specified occupations, 95,572. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 75,383; who could read but not write, 31,052; who could neither read nor write, 81,800. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 30,258; who could read but not write, 43,640; who could neither read nor write, 112,140. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 16,253; attending superior schools, 825. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 11,105; attending superior schools, 372. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 48; married, 48; widowed, 4. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 40; married, 47; widowed, 13.—Physicians, 37; surgeons, 52; dentist, 1; apothecaries, 63; druggist, 1; midwives, 58; nurse-tenders, 158; judges, 2; coroners, 2; barristers, 9; proctor, 1; attorneys, 59; excise-officers, 51; bailiffs, 109; gaol-keepers, 26; city constables, 19; law-clerks, 5; inspector of weights and measures, 1; school-teachers, 423 males and 116 females; ushers and tutors, 232 males and 40 females; governesses, 79; teachers of music, 4; dancing-masters, 7. Clergymen of the Establishment, 64; Methodist ministers, 5; Presbyterian ministers, 3; Roman Catholic clergymen, 137; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 36; monks, 2; nuns, 40; sextons, 15 males and 10 females; Scripture-readers, 2; and parish clerks, 16. The newspapers published within the county in 1843, were the Nenagh Guardian on Wednesdays and Saturdays, the Tipperary Free Press on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and the Tipperary Constitution on Tuesdays and Fridays,—the first at Nenagh, and the other two at Clonmel.

Antiquities.—Among the most interesting of the extant antiquities of the county, are the various buildings on the Rock of Cashel, the church of St. Mary's, and the remains of the fortifications of Clonmel, the walls and gates of Fethard, the castle of Cahir, the bridge and round tower of Golden, the moat of Knockgraffen, the priory of Athassel, the abbey of Holycross, the pillar-tower of Roscrea, the castle of Nenagh, and the monastic ruins of Monaincha; and all these will be found noticed in the articles on the localities to which they belong. By far the richest natural curiosity in the county—one of the richest, in fact, in Europe—is the caves of MITCHELLSTOWNS: see see. The ancient monastic institutions, known or asserted to have stood within the county, including those which are completely extinct, and of which no certain record exists, as well as those which survive in ample ruin and make a prominent figure in history, are an abbey of regular canons of the order of St. Augustine, at Athassel, granted, at the dissolution of monasteries, to Thomas, Earl of Ormond; a second abbey of this order at Cahir-Dunesh, granted to Sir George Sherlock; a third abbey of this order at Carrick-on-Suir, subjected to the Hospital of St. Thomas of Acon in London; a fourth abbey of this order at Inchinemo; a fifth abbey of this order at Lorrha, granted to Sir Richard Nugent, Baron of Delvin; a fifth abbey of this order at Oliver-Grace; a sixth abbey of this order at Tirdaglass; a seventh abbey of this order at Thome, secularized by Henry VIII., and afterwards dissolved by Queen Elizabeth; an eighth but merely supposed abbey of this order at Emly, alleged to have afterwards become the cathedral of the diocese of Emly; a ninth abbey of this order at Ardinnan; a tenth abbey of this order at Roscrea; an eleventh abbey of this order at Clusin-Combruin; a twelfth abbey of this order at Enachmidbrenin; a thirteenth abbey of this order at Innislonaught, a parish now frequently called Abbey; a convent of canonesses of the order of St. Augustine, at Moylagh, granted at the dissolution to Sir H. Radcliffe; an establishment of Knights Hospitallers, under the rule of St. Augustine, and enjoying the lands previously belonging to the Knights Templars, at Clonanal, granted at the dissolution to Richard Harding; an abbey of the Benedictine order at Kilcummin; an abbey of the Cistercian or Bernardine order, at Hoare-Abbey, in the immediate vicinity of Cashel; a second abbey of this order at Holycross, granted at the dissolution to Thomas Earl of Ormond; a third abbey of this order at Innislonaught or Abbey, granted to Sir Cormac MacTeigh MacCarthy; a fourth abbey of this order at Kilcoole, granted to Thomas, Earl of Ormond; a friary of the Dominican order at Cashel, granted to Walter Fleming; a second friary of this order at Lorrha; a third friary of this order at Clonmel; a friary of the Franciscan order, at Cashel, founded in the 13th century by Sir William Hackett, reformed to the Observantine rule in 1538, and granted at the dissolution to Edmund Butler, archbishop of Cashel; a second friary of this order at Ardinnan; a third friary of this order at Clonmel, founded in 1269, reformed to the Observantine rule in 1536, and granted at the dissolution partly to James Butler, Earl of Ormond, and partly to the townsmen of Clonmel; a fourth friary of this order at Galbally, granted to John Desmond; a fifth friary of this order at Killinallagh, granted to Dermot Ryan; a sixth friary of this order at Nenagh, founded in the 13th century, and granted at the dissolution to Sir Henry Wallop; a seventh friary of this order at Roscrea, founded in 1490, by Bibiana O'Dempsey, and granted at the dissolution to the Earl of Ormond; a friary of eremites of the Augustinian order at Fethard, founded in 1306, by Walter Mulcot, and granted at the dissolution to Edmund Butler, Lord Dunboyne; a second friary of this order at Tipperary, founded in the 13th century, and granted at the dissolution to Dermot Ryan; and a friary of the Carmelite order, founded in the 13th century by the Butlers.

History.—The Coriondi and the Udiar or Uodiar of Ptolemy are supposed by Sir James Ware to have occupied the country which now constitutes the county of Tipperary, and the counties adjoining it in the west and south-west. Sir James thinks also that the ancient territory of Aradh-Cliach corresponded to the Arra or western portion of the present barony of Ownay and Arra; that the ancient territory of Corca-Eathrach comprehended the portions of the Golden Vale which lie around Cashel; that the ancient territory of Eoganacht was a district occupied by a sept of its own name around Thurles; that the ancient territory of Hy-Fogarty was a district occupied by the sept of O'Fogarty in the vicinity of Thurles; that the ancient territory of Hy-Kerin, the country of the sept of O'Miagher, was quite or nearly identical with the present barony of Ikerrin, which retains the ancient name with only an alteration in its spelling; and that the ancient territory of Muscraige-Thire or Muscraige-Thire, the country of the sept of Kennedy, was nearly identical with the present baronies of Lower Ormond and Upper Ormond. These territories seem to have been divided, during the early periods of Irish history, between the princes of the Dalcaissian race who governed Thomond or North Munster, and the princes of the Eoganacht or Eugénian sept who governed Desmond or South Munster. These two sets of princes alternately possessed the paramount sovereignty of all Munster; and soon after the landing of the Danes or Ostmen, Feidlim MacCrimtham, prince of Desmond, was king of all Munster, and held his court at Cashel. This prince was at once a tyrant, a warrior, and a conqueror; and, in the course of his wars, he subjugated the princes of Connaught and the king of Meath, who then wielded the paramount sovereignty of all Ireland. At the commencement and in the early part of the 10th century, Cormac MacCullinan, of the Eoganacht race, was both king of Munster and bishop of Cashel; in 907, he fought and defeated, on a battle-field in King's county, Fiann-Siona, king of Meath and monarch of Ireland; at some period during his episcopate, he built at Cashel a chapel which still bears his name, and is alleged to have written the history which is usually called the Psalter of Cashel; and in 908, in consequence of his having attempted the forcible exaction of tribute from Leinster, he was assailed, defeated, and slain by an army of the men of that country, supported by the princes of Ulster and the king of Meath. Near the middle of the 10th century, Callachan, king of Cashel, desolated the country and exacerbated the people by unprincipled and scourging wars; and his own subjects rose against him, defeated him, captured him, and gave him up as a prisoner to Murkertach, the heir-apparent to the monarchy of Ireland. In the latter part of the 10th century, Brian Boromh, prince of the Dalcaisian family, king of Thomond, and afterwards monarch of Ireland, held the sovereignty of all Munster. In 1101, Murkertach, king of Munster, consigned the city of Cashel to the church, or rather to the bishops of Cashel, who are usually alleged to have at this period obtained the rank of archbishops. In 1172, a celebrated assembly of Irish princes and prelates was held at Cashel, under summons of Henry II., the Anglo-Norman conqueror of Ireland; and this assembly recognised the sovereignty of the English king over Ireland, and made various laws for assimilating the Irish to the English church, and increasing the power of the Irish clergy. In the settlement which followed the Anglo-Norman conquest, a principal part of the territory which now constitutes the county of Tipperary seems to have continued as a tributary toparchy, in the possession of Donald O'Brien, the native prince of Thomond and Ormond. In 1174, an Anglo-Norman force, under Earl Strongbow and Hervey of Mount-Norris, advanced to Cashel with the view of attacking Donald O'Brien, and expected to be there joined by a detachment of Ostmen from the garrison of Dublin; but learning that this detachment were intercepted by Donald near Thurles, and driven back with the slaughter of about 400 of their number, they turned suddenly round, and made a precipitate retreat to Waterford, there to learn that the Irish chieftains, including the hitherto sycophantish Donald Kavanagh, were rushing to arms against the Anglo-Norman authority. In 1175, an army under Raymond le Gros, marched across Tipperary to the city of Limerick, which also belonged at that time to Donald O'Brien; and, with mingled stratagem and bravery, they speedily entered the city in triumph. In 1176, Limerick was besieged by O'Brien of Thomond, who, on the march of Raymond for its relief, took post with his army to intercept him in a defile near Cashel. With a force of 80 knights, 200 inferior cavalry, and 300 archers, Raymond forced the intrenchments of the foe, while his Irish confederates of Kinsella and Ossory stood spectators of the combat, ready to rush with slaughter on whichever should prove the defeated party. When the victorious leader had received hostages from O'Brien who submitted, and from O'Connor who had promised such pledges to Henry, he led his forces into Desmond at the invitation of MacArthy, who had been thrown into prison by his own son, the usurper of his principality. Raymond, who received a tract of land in Kerry for the service performed on this occasion, restored the injured prince to his dominion, who requited his son's unnatural conduct with imprisonment and death. The English commander had scarcely accomplished this laudable achievement, when he received a letter from his wife Basilia, informing him that 'her great tooth which had been so long aching, was at last fallen from the socket.' Understanding the death of Strongbow to be thus mysteriously expressed, to prevent the bad consequences which would arise from the news of the event in case of the letter's interception, he hastened to Dublin, committing the custody of Limerick to O'Brien, since he was unable to afford any English troops for its garrison. The Irish chieftain, having taken a solemn oath to guard the city for the English monarch, and to restore it at the royal pleasure, set fire to it in four quarters, as soon as he perceived the departure of Raymond's army, declaring that this town should no longer continue to be the nest of strangers." Thomond, inclusive probably of the greater part of what now constitutes the county of Tipperary, was granted in 1177 to Philip De Braosa; but, in consequence of the inability or disinclination of that person to take possession, it still continued under the power of Donald O'Brien. In 1185, during the Irish administration of John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King John, castles were erected at Ardfinnan and Tipperary for the maintenance and defence of the Anglo-Norman power; but in 1190, Donald O'Brien captured the castle of Ardfinnan, and defeated near Thurles an Anglo-Norman army, under William, Earl-marshal, the son-in-law and successor of Earl Strongbow. In 1194, Donald O'Brien, who had figured so conspicuously in resisting the Anglo-Norman power, and who is usually said to have built the oldest existing portion of the cathedral of Cashel, died. In 1210, Tipperary was erected into a county by King John, during his expedition to Ireland at the head of a considerable army; and previous to that year, therefore, it probably was entirely subjugated to the Anglo-Norman authority. In 1274-1277, the northern district of the county was probably part of the seat of war between the Anglo-Norman family of De Clare and the descendants of the O'Briens of Thomond, who still retained possession of a portion of their ancient principality. In 1317, some portion of the county was probably traversed and scourged by the invading army of Edward Bruce of Scotland, in their desolating progress from Kilkenny to Limerick. In 1328, the royal privileges in the county were granted to James Butler, Earl of Carrick and Ormond; and during a very long subsequent period, they continued to be possessed by the Earls of Ormond. In 1330, Brian O'Brien, prince of Thomond, ravaged the county of Tipperary, burned the towns of Tipperary and Athassel to the ground, and conducted a troublesome and disastrous though petty war against the English authority. "This war," says Gordon, "ended with some dishonour to the English government, and might have been attended with still worse consequences, if the cruelty of the insurgents had not excited a desperate spirit of defence. About 60 persons of English ancestry, surprised in a church at the time of Divine service, in utter despair of mercy to themselves, attempted only to supplicate for the priest's life, who in vain presented the consecrated wafer. The host was furiously snatched from his hand, himself transpierced with weapons, and the miserable congregation consumed in the church, which was set on fire over them. The enemy received many severe checks, defeated by the citizens of Wexford, harassed by the exertions of James Butler, lately created Earl of Ormond, and attacked by the irregular troops of Maurice, the chieftain of Desmond. But the forces of Maurice, with whom Darcy, the chief governor, treated as an independent prince, were more burthful to the English by their maintenance, on free quarter, than serviceable in the field: and as the foe continued still formidable, and appeared on certain information to be privately abetted by some lords of English race, a new chief governor, Sir Anthony Lucy, took measures the most vigorous, the execution of which was facilitated by the expectation of a visit of the king in person with an army. Issuing summonses for a parliament to be held at Dublin, and afterwards at Kilkenny, without being obeyed in the attendance of the lords, he seized the persons of Maurice, who had been created Earl of Desmond, Mandeville, Walter De Burgo, and his brother, and William and Walter Bermingham. William Bermingham, found guilty, was executed, and Desmond long imprisoned: but as the declaration of an intended visit to Ireland by the king, whose warlike preparations were intended really against Scotland, was only a feint, the war with the Irish clans was no otherwise terminated than by precarious treaties with their chiefs, for the negotiation of which the prior of Kilmainham was charged with a commission." Almost at the first blush of the great rebellion of 1642, Cashel, Clonmel, Fethard, Carrick-on-Suir, and all the other towns of Tipperary, were seized by the insurgents. Some murders were perpetrated at Cashel by the relatives of persons whom Sir W. St. Leger, president of Munster, had put to death; and various murders were committed at Fethard, Silvermines, and other places, by other parties. In 1647, the Earl of Inchiquin, who acted as parliamentary commander in Munster, overran the county of Tipperary, took Cahir by capitulation, took Cashel by storm, slaughtered in the latter place 20 priests and a multitude of the people who had taken shelter in the cathedral as an asylum, levied contributions throughout all the circumjacent country, and was prevented from capturing Clonmel only by the failure of provisions for his army. In 1649, after Lord Inchiquin, in horror at the execution of Charles I., had made common cause with the Earl of Ormond, and when Cromwell invaded Ireland, and found himself opposed by both royalists and confederates, a detachment of his army captured Carrick-on-Suir, and he himself crossed the Suir at that place to lay siege to Waterford. In the month of October, Lord Inchiquin and Taaffe, at the head of a royalist force, marched to attempt the recapture of Carrick-on-Suir: "and Ormond, confident of the success of the expedition, was preparing to march thither after having accomplished the reinforcement of Waterford, when he received intelligence that the attempt had miscarried, and that the discomfited troops had retired to Clonmel. Thither also retired the marquess with his few remaining forces in a circuitous and harassing march, through a country which had exhibited a gloomy scene of terror, where persons of all descriptions were collecting their miserable effects and flying in confusion different ways to escape the English army." The Earl of Ormond, with the main body of his army, remained at Clonmel and its vicinity watching Cromwell, till sickness and the approach of winter drove the siege of Waterford to an abortive termination; and then, after having posted a large body of Ulster men at Clonmel, he withdrew to Kilkenny. About the end of next February, Cromwell opened the campaign of 1650, by taking Cashel, Fethard, Cahir, Clogheen, and other places in the vicinity; and in the course of April, he commenced the troublesome and disastrous siege of Clonmel. "At Clonmel, his next object of attack," says Gordon, "garrisoned by 1,200 northerners under Hugh O'Neal, Cromwell met so obstinate a resistance, that he lost 2,000 men in the first assault, and found the expediency of depending chiefly on a blockade. Lord Roche, with a body of troops hastening to relieve the garrison, was totally defeated by Lord Broghill, who advanced to assist the besiegers. The Romish bishop of Ross, a most active partisan, was taken in this battle, and offered his life on condition of his prevailing on the garrison of a neighbouring fortress to surrender: but the heroic prisoner, when conducted within hearing of the garrison, exhorted them to maintain courageously their post against the enemies of their country and religion, and with undaunted spirit resigned himself to death. O'Neal, after a siege of two months, despairing of relief, when his ammunition and provisions were exhausted, contrived, by a masterly piece of conduct, to withdraw his garrison secretly from Clonmel, and to lead them safely to Waterford, leaving the citizens of the former to treat with the English general, who granted them an honourable capitulation, as his presence was importunately demanded elsewhere." In 1651, Ireton, who succeeded Cromwell as generalissimo of the parliamentary army in Ireland, concentrated his forces at Cashel, preparatory to his marching to the west and forcing a passage across the Shannon at Killaloe. At the period of the Restoration, Clonmel was one of the towns in possession of the royalists. In the war of the Revolution, and after the battle of the Boyne, Clonmel was abandoned by the Jacobites on the advance of William; and it formed the retreat and asylum of the latter's army, on occasion of his relinquishing the siege of Limerick, and embarking at Duncannon for England. The county of Tipperary was not involved in the rebellion of 1798; and though it has figured with painful and ignominious prominence in many an agrarian disturbance, it has not been the theatre of any modern insurrection or other movement of sufficient magnitude to be a proper topic for history.

TIPPERARY, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains part of the town of TIPPERARY: see next article. Length, north-eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,362 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches,—of which 14 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are in Lough Carrownreddy. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 7,996, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 7,959; in 1841, 7,311. Houses 1,040. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,936; in 1841, 1,668. Houses 241. The surface is part of the district or strath called the Golden Vale, and consists of prime land. The rivulet Arra, an affluent of the Suir, runs eastward along the southern border; and descends there from an elevation of 334 feet above sea-level at the point of entering the parish, to an elevation of 301 feet at a point about 4 a mile above the town of Tipperary. The principal country residences are Pegsborough-house, the seat of Mr. Bradshaw; Sadleir's Wells, the seat of William Sadleir, Esq.; Roesborough-house, the seat of Mr. Roe; Ballinillard-cottage; Rosanna-house; and Springvale-cottage. The principal antiquities in the rural districts are the site of a castle and the site of a church. The roads from Tipperary to Limerick and Nenagh traverse the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 5d.; glebe, £20. The rectories of Tipperary, TEMPLENOG, KILFEACLE, and CLOMBULOGUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tipperary. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 12,538. Gross income, £1,052 7s. 8d.; nett, £903 8s. Patron, the diocesan. One curate receives a salary of £100; and another receives a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house and 9 acres of land. The church is situated in the town, and was built in 1830, by means of a loan of £2,584 12s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £300 raised by subscription. Sittings 600; attendance, from 300 to 500. The Roman Catholic chapel of Tipperary has 4 officiates, and an attendance of about 7,000. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Killeale. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 590, and the Roman Catholics to 7,583; the Protestants of the union to 630, and the Roman Catholics to 12,361; 19 daily schools in the parish had on their books 581 boys and 364 girls; and 6 daily schools in the other parts of the union had on their books 217 boys and 113 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £92 3s. 6d. a-year and other advantages from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with from £32 to £64 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; and two, with sums not reported from the National Board, and respectively £20 and £25 from subscription.

TIPPERARY.

A post and market town in the parishes of Tipperary, Cordangan, and Corroge, barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the rivulet Arra, and on the mail-road from Limerick to Waterford, 6½ miles west-south-west of Golden, 7½ south of Cappaghwhite, 7½ east by north of Emly, 8 south-east by east of Pallasgreen, 10 west by south of Cashel, 13½ north-west of Cahir, 14 south-west of Holycross, 17 south-west of Thurles, and 87 south-west of Dublin.

Encirons.—The town is situated nearly in the centre of the great eastward and westward strath called the Golden Vale,—probably the most fertile and luxuriant tract of country under the dominion of the British crown. This gorgeous dale of almost perpetual soil is everywhere rich, everywhere beautiful, everywhere picturesque and exultant; yet it is specially sparkling and magnificent immediately around Tipperary,—powdered with pleasant villas, gemmed with garden, orchard, and mimic grove, and, above all, powerfully and most picturesquely foiled, first by the verdant slopes and gentle sky-line of the Slievenamuck hills, and next by the sublime escarpments and the cloud-cleaving summits of the Galtee mountains. The luscious sweetness, the brilliant beauty, and the thrilling power of the scenery of the environs, have occasioned the town to become the chosen home of several families of annuitants. The exquisite vale of Aherlow, between the Slievenamuck mountains and the Galtees, though not entering into the composition of the landscapes seen from the town, belongs strictly to the environs, and is sufficiently near to be within the scope of easy drives or stont perambulations. Even in a social and economical point of view, the district immediately around the town, though closely associated in name with the very quintessence of predial disturbance, and very near in position to the scenes of some of the most barbarous deeds of recent riot and insubordination, is far from being as unpleasant as many districts of better name and more peaceful neighbourhood. "The con-acre system," says Mr. Inglis, "is very general in the neighbourhood of Tipperary, and very popular. They looked upon it as the only refuge which many a man had against starvation. The rents paid were at the rate of from £10 to £12 an acre, and a guinea per quarter was generally paid in advance. Here, therefore, the system is on a more unfavourable footing for the renter of the con-acre; for before he can avail himself of it, he must be possessed of a little capital; and the farmer has security against his tenant relinquishing his possession. The number of resident gentry about Tipperary is considerable; though some of the largest proprietors are absent,—I will not say absentees,—for that, I think, is not the term to apply to those who have their chief possessions in England. All that can be expected from such individuals is to have proper resident agents, and occasionally to visit their properties. Many absentee properties are quite as well managed as if the proprietors were resident; and, as one example of this, I may name the large estates of Lord Stanley, in this neighbourhood. I found only one opinion as to the excellent managements of these estates; rents are moderate, and the tenantry well treated; and from my own observation, I can speak to the generally comfortable condition of things upon this property. A reading society, of which, I believe, the agent upon the property is librarian, has been instituted for the benefit of Lord Stanley's tenantry; and the project I understood to be perfectly successful. I found everything perfectly quiet and orderly in the neighbourhood of Tipperary. The very name forces to our recollection images of shillelaghs, and broken heads, and turbulence of every kind; and I found it readily admitted that the fighting propensities of the Tipperary boys are somewhat remarkable."

The Town.—"'Tipperary," remark Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is said to be a corruption of the Irish Tobar-a-neidh, which signifies 'the well of the plains,' from its situation at the base of the Slievenamuck hills. Other etymologists derive it from Teobred-aruin, that is, 'the fountain of Ara,'—an ancient chief whose name, in conjunction with that of another chief, Owney, is now given to one of the baronial divisions of the county." A castle was built at Tipperary, soon after the Anglo-Norman conquest, for the purpose of aiding to maintain and defend the Anglo-Norman power; but it was very speedily captured by the prince of Thomond, the descendant of the ancient toarchs of the county. A monastery for hermits following the rule of St. Augustine, was founded at the town, in the reign of Henry III. The modern public buildings are a large and handsome church, a very capacious Roman Catholic chapel, a small Methodist meeting-house, a large endowed school, a bridewell, a sessions-house, a poor-law union workhouse, a fever hospital, and two inns and posting establishments. Though the suburbs and outskirts contain some very miserable abodes, the general appearance of the town,—especially if the remoteness of its situation be taken into account—is comparatively clean and agreeable.

Trade.—"'Tipperary, though inconsiderable in size to bear the name of the county," observes Mr. Inglis, "is rather a flourishing town; and is what a mercantile traveller would call 'a good little town.' There is no town westward nearer than Limerick; and there is consequently a busy retail trade, the result of country wants. There is also a good weekly market, which makes Tipperary the depot of agricultural produce for a range of 12 or 15 miles round. Owing to the low price of agricultural produce, the retail trade was somewhat dull when I visited Tipperary, but it was supposed it would revive the ensuing winter. Notwithstanding the better circumstances of the tradesmen, the condition of the labouring classes I found little better than elsewhere. Not so large a proportion of the people were out of employment here as in some other places, but wages were only 8d. a-day, without diet; and I ascertained that there is no constant employment for all, or anything approaching to all, the population. I certainly observed fewer ragged people, and fewer beggars in Tipperary than in Cashel and many other towns; but in searching the suburbs, I found many cabins wretched enough, and enormous rents paid for them. Some paid £4, none less than £2 10s., and the average rent might be £3." Fairs are held on April 5, June 24, Oct. 10, and Dec. 10. The town has branch-offices of the National Bank of Ireland and the Tipperary Joint-stock Bank; it is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter held every Thursday; it is the residence of a stipendiary magistrate, and the head-quarters of a district of the constabulary of the South Riding of the county; and it possesses a loan fund and a savings' bank. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £1,088, circulated £3,101 in 2,563 loans, realized a nett profit of £109 10s. 6d., and belonged to 11 proprietors. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Cashel, a coach to Cork, two cars to Limerick, a mail-car in transit between Limerick and Cloumel, and a car and mail-coach in transit between Limerick and Waterford. The Dublin and Limerick line of railway, as proposed by the Public Commissioners, passes within 5 statute miles of the town, at a point in the vicinity of Donoghill.

Statistics.—Pop. of the town, in 1831, 6,972; in 1841, 7,370. Houses 1,097. Area of the parish of Tipperary section, 127 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,000; in 1841, 5,643. Houses 799. Poor-law Union.—The Poor-law union of Tipperary ranks as the 10th, and was declared on Jan. 30, 1839. It lies partly in co. Limerick, but chiefly in co. Tipperary; and comprehends an area of 185,561 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 70,853. The number of elected guardians is 32, and of ex-officio guardians 10. The electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are, in co. Limerick, Doon, 665,—Green, 621,—Ulla, 403,—and Killeely, 215; and in co. Tipperary, Tipperary, 1,079,—Clonbeg, 572,—Emly, 476,—Lattin, 89,—Cullen, 233,—Shronehill, 117,—Bruis, 315,—Sollaghed, 537,—Rathliney, 326,—Cordangan, 329,—Kilfracle, 270,—Golden, 850,—Killaldriff, 507,—Banshaw, 392,—Donoghill, 445,—and Toem, 556. The co. Limerick divisions lie within the barony of Coonagh; the division of Toem lies within the barony of Kilmemanagh; the division of Donoghill lies partly within the barony of Kilmemanagh and partly within that of Clanwilliam; and all the other divisions lie within the barony of Clanwilliam. The number of valued tenements in the Coonagh districts is 1,904,—in the Kilmemanagh districts, 801,—in the Clanwilliam districts, 6,294; in the entire union, 8,999; and of this total, 4,434 are valued under £5,—1,262, under £10,—724, under £15,—603, under £20,—409, under £25,—291, under £30,—437, under £40,—259, under £50,—and 580 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £148,297 1s. 7½d.; the total number of persons rated is 10,042; and of these, 1,978 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,205, not exceeding £2,—734, not exceeding £3,—482, not exceeding £4,—and 419, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Aug. 12, 1839,—to be completed in Sept. 1840,—to cost £6,240 for building and completion, and £1,110 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, procured for £150 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £25 4s.,—and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was July 3, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £5,848 9s. 5d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,647 0s. 2d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 409. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital at Tipperary, and dispensaries at Tipperary, Pallasgreen, and Thomastown; and, in 1839-40, they received £367 5s. 7d. from subscription, and £501 18s. 7d. from public grants, and expended £100 in salaries to medical officers, £172 18s. 3d. for medicines, and £311 2s. 11d. for contingencies. The fever hospital is a commodious and recently-erected building, capable of containing 40 beds; and, in 1839-40, it expended £385 14s., and admitted 530 patients. The Tipperary dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 21,992; and, in 1839-40, it expended £173 12s. 5d., and made 4,728 dispensations of medicine to 2,730 patients.

TIPPERKEVIN, a parish 2 miles north by west of Ballymore-Eustace, and formerly in the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, but now in that of South Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, in the direction of north-west by west, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,751 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 791; in 1841, 744. Houses 111. A considerable portion of the surface, particularly in the east, is mountainous; a small portion is waste; and the remainder consists, in general, of light gravelly land. A height in the north-western district has an altitude above sea-level of 358 feet; Donode Moat, on the south-western boundary, has an altitude of 570 feet; Bishop's Hill, on the south-eastern boundary, has an altitude of 835 feet; and Slieveroe, on the north-eastern border, has an altitude of 1,094 feet. The chief objects of artificial interest are the church, a grave-yard, and the ruins of Eustace-house. The road from Ballymore-Eustace to Rathcoole and Leixlip passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £117 16s. 8d.; glebe, £80. Gross income, £197 16s. 8d.; nett, £172 7s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent usually resides in Dublin. A curate receives a salary of £98 18s. 10d. The church was built in 1830, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 24. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 43, and the Roman Catholics to 723; and there was no school.

TIRAGHRILL, a barony in the south-east of the county of Sligo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Carbery; on the east, by the county of Leitrim; on the south, by the county of Roscommon; and on the west, by the baronies of Corran and Leney. Its length, north-north-westward, is 14 miles; its breadth is from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 9; and its area is 79,596 acres, 9 perches,—of which 4,397 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are water. The south-eastern district contains the greater portion of the Brablieve mountains, is a portion of the great mineral-field of Arigna or Connaught, and sends up a summit to the altitude of 1,346 feet above sea-level; the extreme south-west contains the larger portion of the Curlew mountains, and sends up a summit to the altitude of 1,062 feet; and part of the northern district contains a portion of the south hills-screens of Lough Gill, and sends up, on the boundary with Carbery, the summit of Slieve-Daene to the altitude of 900 feet. The larger portion of Lough Arrow lies in the south; a portion of Lough Gill lies in the north; Lough Skeen lies on the southern boundary; and Longhs Tobberscanavan, Ballylawley, Bo, and Nascool, lie in the interior. The beautiful valley of the Arrow or Uncion river forms a principal portion of the western district, and contains some land of prime quality.—This barony contains part of the parish of Ballysadere, and the whole of the parishes of Aghanagh, Ballinakill, Ballysummaghan, Drumcollumb, Killadono, Killery, Kilmacallane, Kilmastraney, Kilross, Shancough, and Tawnagh. The towns and principal villages are Ballinacree, Collooney, Tobberscanavan, Ballintogher, Riverstown, and part of Ballysadere. Pop., in 1831, 28,736; in 1841, 31,739. Houses 5,470. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,583; in manufactures and trade, 736; in other pursuits, 384. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 109; on the directing of labour, 1,394; on their own manual labour, 4,050; on means not specified, 150. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,959; who could read but not write, 2,163; who could neither read nor write, 7,535. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,580; who could read but not write, 2,290; who could neither read nor write, 9,892.—Tiraghrill lies partly within the Poor-law union of Sligo, and partly within that of Boyle. The total number of tenelements valued is 4,621; and of these, 2,378 are valued under £5,—1,398, under £10,—403, under £15,—160, under £20,—79, under £25,—52, under £30,—49, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 78, at and above £50.

TIRAGHT, a remarkable rock in the barony of Corkaguiny, co. Kerry, Munster. It is one of the most westerly islets of the Blasquet group; and lies off the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-east of the Foze Rock, $1\frac{1}{2}$ west of Innisabro, $2\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of the seaward end of the Great Blasquet, $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of Dunmore Head, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by south of Cape Sybil. It enjoys the popular but erroneous reputation of being the most western land in Europe. It is a soaring, acclivitous, and sublime mass of naked rock, ascending steeply up from the ocean in a series of most imposing cliffs, and very nearly rivaling the Great Skellig in wild and savage magnificence. TOBBER, a parish $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Dunlavin, and formerly in the barony of Upperross, co. Dublin, but now in the baronies of Lower Talbotstown and Upper Talbotstown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Its outline is almost exactly that of an equilateral triangle of nearly 2 miles each side. Area of the Lower Talbotstown section, 1,029 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches; of the Upper Talbotstown section, 393 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 104, and according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 110; in 1841, 576. Houses 91.* Pop. of the Lower Talbotstown section, in 1841, 479. Houses 77. The general quality of the land is good. A height on the north-east boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 842 feet. The roads from Dunlavin to Hollywood and Ballymore-Eustace pass through the interior. The only other objects of any interest are Tobber-house, a police station, Tobber Cross-roads, and the ruins of the church.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNLAVIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £88 12s. 8d. In 1831, the parishioners consisted of 19 Protestants, and 91 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TOBBER, a hamlet in the parish of Kilmanaghan, barony of Kilkoursey, King's co., Leinster. It stands 3 miles north-west by north of Clara, on the road thence to Moate. It is the site of a Roman Catholic chapel, and a constabulary barrack; and within a mile of it are Tobber-house, Ballinaminton-house, Tully-house, Primrose-lodge, Moyally-house, Holly-wood, Clover-park, Greenville-house, Kilfoylan-house, a woollen factory, and the ruins of a church, Gorteen-castle, Moyally-castle, Eabearan-castle, and the former mansion of Tully. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath takes name from the hamlet, and has chapels here and at Bellagh.

TOBBER, a village in the parish of Kileroran, barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands adjacent to the road from Ballymoe to Ballinasloe, 1 mile west of the river Suck, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ south of Ballymoe. In its vicinity are Turlough-house, and the ruins of a church. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 149. Houses 30. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday and Oct. 26.

TOBBERAHEENA, a village in the parish of Abbey, barony of East Ifa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands near the river Suir, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Clonmel. Area, 32 acres. Pop., in 1841, 453. Houses 75. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 62; in manufactures and trade, 23; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 26; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 4. A fair is held on Oct. 2.

TOBBERBRACHEN. See TOBBER, co. Galway.

TOBBERCLARE, a hamlet in the parish of Ballymore, 2 miles from the village of Ballymore, barony of Rathconrath, co. Westmeath, Leinster. A Dominican friary was founded here in 1438.

TOBERCERRY, a small market and post town in the parish of Achonry, barony of Leney, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Boyle to Ballina, 3 miles east-north-east of Banada, 8 west-

* Only the Upper Talbotstown section appears to have been regarded as constituting the parish by both the Census enumerators of 1831, and the ecclesiastical enumerators of 1834; and even a portion of this, containing, in 1831, a pop. of 13, was viewed doubtfully by them as probably either extra-parochial or belonging to some other parish of the benefice of Dunlavin.

south-west of Ballymote, 16 east by south of Ballina, 16 west-north-west of Boyle, and 100 west-north-west of Dublin. The surrounding country is bleak, and contains a large proportion of rocky and waste ground. The town, though small, is improving; and it possesses a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a market-house, a sessions-house, a constabulary barrack, a small inn and posting establishment, a loan fund, and a dispensary. The church is a chapel-of-ease to Achoury; and was built in 1830, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. The chaplain is appointed by the incumbent of Achoury, and receives a salary of £75. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £2,396, circulated £10,313 in 3,266 loans, realized a nett profit of £145 5s. 9d., expended for charitable purposes £45, and belonged to 24 proprietors. The dispensary is within the Sligo Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 99,033 acres, with a pop. of 24,259; and, in 1839-40, it expended £134 3s. 1d., and administered to 1,527 patients. Fairs are held on Feb. 8, March 25, May 24, June 28, July 27, Aug. 16, Sept. 15, Oct. 4, and Nov. 29. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. Tobbercurry is the head-quarters of one of the five districts of the county constabulary of Sligo. Two old castles are in the vicinity. Area of the town, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 210; in 1841, 788. Houses 135. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 46; in manufactures and trade, 66; in other pursuits, 33. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 64; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 14.

TOBERDONY, or TOBERRENDONEY, a village in the parish of Beagh, barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the southern verge of the province, and on the road from Galway to Ennis, 4½ miles south-south-west of Gort. It has a fair green and a constabulary barrack. Fairs are held on July 12 and Sept. 20. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 167. Houses 32.

TOBERFUDDER, a hamlet in the parish of Isertkelly, barony of Loughrea, 6 miles north-north-east of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught.

TOBERGRIEVE, or TOBERQUAN, an ancient and picturesque well, in the parish of Mothell, barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. It is situated on the eastern verge of Mothell, near the noble demesne of Curraghmore, 2½ miles south of Carrick-on-Suir, and is in high repute among the peasantry as 'a holy well.' Adjacent to it are some Druidical remains and the ruins of a church.

TOBERMORE, a small post town in the parish of Kileronaghan, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Coleraine, 2½ miles south-south-west of Maghera, 3 north-north-east of Desertmartin, 5 north-west of Magherafelt, 7 north by west of Moneymore, 19 south of Coleraine, 76 west-north-west of Belfast, and 98 north by west of Dublin. It contains a Presbyterian meeting-house, and an anti-pædobaptist Independent meeting-house,—the latter officiated in till his death by the recently deceased and well-known Dr. Carson, the author of numerous controversial writings on theology. Fairs are held on the second Monday of every month. Area of the town, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 672; in 1841, 525. Houses 110. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 79; in other pursuits, 15. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 55; on their own manual labour, 54; on means not specified, 2.

TOBERQUAN. See TOBERGRIEVE.

TOBERSCANAVAN, a village in the parish of Ballysodere, barony of Tiraghtrill, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the mail-road from Sligo to Dublin, 1½ mile south-south-east of Collonee, and 3 south-south-east of Ballysodere. Tobberscanavan lake lies in the southern vicinity of the village, and is about half-a-mile in length. A spacious castellated gateway, in the vicinity, forms the entrance to Mr. Cooper's extensive and beautiful demesne of Markree. Fairs are held in the village on May 17, June 30, Sept. 18, and Oct. 31. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 250. Houses 51.

TODD'S-LEAP. See ERRIGAL-KEROGUE.

TOE-HEAD, a cape in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It projects southward from the west side of the entrance of Castlehaven, toward the rocks called the Stags of Castlehaven; and is situated 1½ miles north-east of Cape Clear, and 12 south-west by west of Gully Head. It forms a lofty promontory, and is subtended toward Castlehaven by a bold and lofty coast. In its vicinity are the islets of Black-Rock and Horse-Island, and the coves of Ardeghan and Torbay.

TOEM. See TOOM.

TOGHER, co. Wicklow. See ROUNDWOOD.

TOGHER, a village in the parish of Clonmore, barony of Ferrara, co. Louth, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Dunleer to Dunany with that from Termanoffeek to Anagassan, 3 miles south-south-east of Anagassan, 4½ east by north of Dunleer, 4½ north-west by north of Clogher, and 7½ north by east of Drogheda. It contains the parish-church of Clonmore; and in its vicinity are a Roman Catholic chapel, Sally-cottage, Seafield, and Weaver's-hall. Pop. not specially returned.

TOGHER, a bog in the parish of Clonagh and Clonagheen, and partly in the barony of East Maryborough, partly in that of West Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. It measures 2½ miles in length; and extends to within 1½ mile of the south-west side of the town of Maryborough. Its area is 2,129 acres. It lies high; and forms one of the principal summits of the champaign districts of the county. "The several streams which issue from it on the north and east," reports Mr. Aber, "are ultimately conveyed into the river Barrow, and those on the south and west into the Nore. It is bounded on the north and south by rising grounds having low passes, through which the water is discharged; but on the east and west, the adjoining lands are generally lower than the surface of the bog. It has two summits, one at the north-east and the other at the eastern edge of the bog; several streams proceed from the springs at these summits; the opening and deepening of which would materially contribute towards draining the bog. * * This bog is extremely wet, notwithstanding its elevation above the adjoining country; its summits consist of quagmire, and are almost impassable in dry weather; the remaining part of the bog is wet fibrous peat, except towards the border, where it is compact and used as turbary. A considerable part of the surface of this bog is covered with grass, but not sufficiently firm to bear the weight of cattle, even in the driest seasons, except on the sloping banks formed by the streams which have the effect of consolidating a small portion of it. Several acres at the edge of this bog have been cut away for fuel, leaving a new surface with a few feet of peat in depth under it in a good state of cultivation; yet very little has been done to reap any profit from the advantages it offers, except in a few detached places where good crops of potatoes, oats, rape, and turnips, have been produced. The highest part of this bog is 400 feet above high water mark

In Dublin bay, and the lowest part of its base or bottom is 352 feet; its greatest depth is 24 feet, and its average depth is 17 feet." The estimated cost of reclaiming the bog is £2,285 16s. 4½d.

TOGHERTY, a hamlet in the parish of Killerran, barony of Clare, south-east of Tuam, co. Galway, Connought.

TOLKA (THE), a rivulet of the county of Dublin, Leinster. We have already noticed it under its alias name of BALLYBOUGH: which see.

TOLKA, a village in the parish of Finglass, barony of Castleknock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the Tolka rivulet, ¾ of a mile south-south-east of the village of Finglass, and 2 miles north-north-west of Dublin. In its vicinity are a lunatic asylum, Farnham-house, Belville, Clonmel-cottage, Johnstown-house, the institution for the deaf and dumb, Claremont-house, Westpark-house, Rivermount-house, the botanic garden, Glasnevin-house, Tolka-park, Violet-Hill-house, and Tolka-lodge. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 275. Houses 52.

TOLLYMORE-PARK, or TULLAMORE-PARK, the superb demesne of the Earl of Roden, in the parish of Kilcoo, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the rivulet Shimna, at the north-west base of Slieve-Donard, adjacent to the south side of the village of Briansford, 2½ miles south by east of Castlewellan, and 2½ north-west by west of Newcastle. See SHIMNA, SLIEVE-DONARD, BRIANSFORD, CASTLEWELLAN, NEWCASTLE, KILCOO, MOURNE, and SLIEVE-SNAVAN. The mansion is a plain though commodious building; yet the demesne, in consequence partly of its artificial decorations, but chiefly of its natural character, is one of the most magnificently picturesque within the British dominions. Its woods extend about 2 miles along the base of Slieve-Donard, and contain some of the finest larch in the kingdom. "Tullamore-Park," observe Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is a place which nature had prepared to receive the improvements of art. It is situated in the midst of most sublime scenery, with the wide expanse of ocean open before it; yet nowhere do the trees grow with greater luxuriance. Through this delicious spot rush the assembled mountain rivulets, creating in their passage cascades of every variety of force and form. It is scarcely possible to imagine a scene where natural beauties and advantages have been turned to more valuable account by judgment, skill, and taste, than this, which lies at the foot of Slieve-Donard, and almost on the brink of the ocean." "Entering the grand gate," says Mr. Atkinson, "we proceeded by a row of excellent offices, with a tower, clock, and spire, to inspect the demesne. The lofty mountains of Mourne, with Sliebgh-Donard in the rear of this grand group, and an extensive green mountain, richly planted, that skirts the lawn, bear full upon your view as you enter the grand gate. In your descent from this gate to the lawn, you not only pass by the spire and offices attached to the house, but also a small pleasure garden; and after moving 20 or 30 paces towards the lawn, a landscape inconceivably grand presents itself. In your approach through the gate, you are entertained with a grand mountain-view through a defile; but here, to the majesty of the Mourne mountains, which overhang the landscape in front, and the planted mountain of more modest altitude that bounds the lawn, with a most interesting cottage on its declivity, are added the variegated beauties of an open country, and the entire rich and picturesque group of features that characterize the home-view. Among the former may be included, as of prime importance to the general scene, the Irish channel on the left hand, with Felix Magennis's famous castle on the sea-shore. Among the latter, the woody hills and glens of the demesne, extending to the right in front of the lawn; the interesting cottage on the declivity of the planted mountain; and on the lawn itself, a beautiful monument erected to the memory of the Hon. James Jocelyn, R.N., second son of the late Earl of Roden. * * * Tullamore-Park is reputed to contain 1,200 Irish acres; and we may truly say, that such a combination of wood with water, of lofty mountains with lowly valleys, and of all which is necessary to fill the vastness of the imagination with an impression of the grandeur and beauty of a perfect scene, we have seldom witnessed in our travels through this country."

TOMACORK, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ferns, and on the mutual confines of the counties of Wicklow and Wexford, Leinster. Its post-town is Carnew; and its chapels are situated at Tomacork and Coolafanya.

TOMACURRY. See MOCURRY.

TOMB, TOOMB, or TOOME, a parish, 5½ miles south-west of Gorey, and partly in the barony of Gorey, partly in that of Sarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. The Sarewalsh section contains the village of CAMOLIN: which see. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Gorey section, 3,500 acres, 1 road, 34 perches; of the Sarewalsh section, 3,479 acres, 28 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,905; in 1841, 2,067. Houses 340. Pop. of the Gorey section, in 1831, 891; in 1841, 1,064. Houses 172. Pop. of the rural districts of the Sarewalsh section, in 1831, 375; in 1841, 462. Houses 75. Some of the surface is pastoral; but most is good arable land. The river Bann runs south-south-westward through the interior; and descends, while there, from an elevation above sea-level of 152 feet to one of 96 feet. The principal seats are Newbridge-lodge, Ballinclare-house, Norrismount, and Medop-hall; the principal hamlet is Ballyoughter, situated in the extreme east; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of two churches,—one of them that of the old church of Tomb, situated in the extreme north-east. The road from Gorey to Ferns passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £276; glebe, £30. The rectories of Tomb, KILCOMB, and ROSMINGUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tomb. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 4,263. Gross income, £686 13s. 1d.; nett, £639 19s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kiltannel, in the dio. of Ferns, and is non-resident in Tomb. A curate receives a salary of £100. The church is situated at Camolin, and was built in 1772, by means of an unknown sum of money, partly raised by subscription and partly gifted by the late Board of First Fruits; and was enlarged in 1820, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 280; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapels of Camolin and Ballyoughter have an attendance of respectively 1,300 and 1,700; the Rosmingue Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these chapels are united to that of Kilnehue. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilcomb. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 500, and the Roman Catholics to 1,440; the Protestants of the union to 808, and the Roman Catholics to 3,569; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish had on its books 85 boys and 80 girls; 5 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £7 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and £5 from subscription, and one with £5 from subscription—were usually attended in summer by about 35 scholars; and there were 4 daily schools in the other parts of the union.

TOMBEOLA, an extinct village, and a quondam monastery, at the head of Roundstone bay, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaght. "A monastery for Dominican friars," says Archdall, "was founded here about 1427, by the O'Flahertys, dynasts of Eir Connaght, in which elevated station they continued till the arrival of Oliver Cromwell. In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, this building was wholly demolished, and even the stones, those of the church-walls not excepted, were made use of to build a castle in the neighbourhood. The few ruins remains are scarcely visible, and very imperfectly mark the traces of this ancient village."

TOMDEELY. See DRONDEELY.

TOMEENS (THE), a small head-stream or affluent of the river Rine, in the south-western district of the barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It passes about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of the village of Tulla, and has a singular subterranean course.

TOMFINLOUGH, a parish in the barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of NEWMARKET-ON-FERGUS, and the village of BOHKKERROAN; see these articles. Length, south-south-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,736 acres, 2 perches,—of which 613 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,053; in 1841, 4,401. Houses 694. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,630. Houses 410. The surface, in a general view, is low, and consists of poor land. The highest ground is on the southern boundary, and has an altitude of 159 feet above the level of the sea. Lough Rosree lies on the eastern boundary; and Loughs Fin, Ballycar, Cahirkine, and Teregheen, lie in the interior. Within the parish is a silver mine. The principal seats are Rathlaheen-cottage, Rathlaheen-house, Craglough-house, and Ballycar-house,—the last the residence of Mr. Colpoys. The chief antiquities are the ruins of Moghan-castle and of five other castles. The road from Ennis to Limerick passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFINAGHTY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £30 18s. 6½d.; glebe, £51. Part of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £61 16s. ½d., is inappropriate in the Earl of Egremont; and part, compounded for £50, is appropriated to the see of Killaloe. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Bunratty and Kileoury. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 138, and the Roman Catholics to 4,214; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £14 a-year from the Baptist Society, and one with an unreported sum from Mrs. Stuard—had on their books 248 boys and 176 girls.

TOMGRANEY, or TOMGRENT, a parish in the barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of Scariff and Tomgrane. See SCARIFF. Length, in the direction of south by east, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 14,181 acres, 12 perches,—of which 22 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches are in Lough Derg, and 238 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 5,568; in 1841, 6,113. Houses 1,022. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,407; in 1841, 5,086. Houses 861. The surface extends from a point within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the northern boundary of the county, at the sources of the Scariff river, to a point within $\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the city of Killaloe; and its most easterly district includes a small portion of the head of Scariff bay. A considerable aggregate of the area is mountainous and pastoral; and the remainder consists, for the most part, of tolerably good arable land. One summit on the southern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,019 feet; one on the north-eastern boundary has an altitude of 1,126 feet; and one in the interior of the northern district has an altitude of 944 feet. The head-streams of the Scariff river drain the northern and the central districts; and the accumulated volume of that river runs eastward from Lough O'Grady to Scariff bay. The greater part of Lough O'Grady lies within the parish; and the surface-elevation of this lake has a height of 122 feet above the level of the sea. Loughs Keel and Fir lie in the interior. The principal hamlets are Derrywalter, Ballymore, Derrymore, and Knockatagh. The principal rural residences are, Ballyvanon-house, Cullahy-house, Drewsborough-house, and Raben-house,—the third the seat of Mr. Drew, and the fourth the seat of the Rev. B. Brady. The patent by which the lands of Raben are held of the Crown, requires that a certain number of deer be kept on the estate: The other chief objects of interest in the rural districts, are three grave-yards, O'Connor's Rock, and the ruins of a castle. The village of Tomgrane stands on the road from Scariff to Killaloe, 1 mile south-south-west of Scariff, $1\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of the head of Scariff bay, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Killaloe. It contains the parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, the glebe-house, a grave-yard, and the ruins of a castle; and in its immediate vicinity are O'Connor's Rock and Scariff Poor-law union workhouse. An abbey is alleged to have been founded at the village at an early period. Fairs are held on Jan. 5, Feb. 1 and 27, March 4 and 17, April 3, May 1, June 3 and 17, July 5, Aug. 3, 14, and 27, Sept. 6, Oct. 4 and 10, Nov. 4, and Dec. 9. Area of the village, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 400; in 1841, 371. Houses 62.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £415 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £30. Gross income, £445 7s. 8½d.; nett, £369 19s. 8½d. Patron, the Rev. T. B. Brady. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 120; attendance 30. The Scariff, Tomgrane, and Clonskie Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000, 450, and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kilroe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 87, and the Roman Catholics to 5,893; a classical daily school had on its books 25 boys; and a hedge-school had on its books 60 boys and 20 girls. In 1843, a National school in Scariff workhouse had on its books 17 boys and 14 girls.

TOMHAGGARD, a parish at the south-eastern extremity of the barony of Bargie, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,180 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 723; in 1841, 774. Houses 126. The southern boundary is the ocean, and the south-western boundary is the lagoon of TACUMSHANE: which see. A small district on the coast is sterile sand; but all the other districts consist of good land, very fertile, and in a state of thorough cultivation. The seats are Mount-Acton and Jenstown-house; the principal antiquities are Bargie castle and the ruins of a church; and the principal hamlet is Tomhaggard, the site of the ruined church and the Roman Catholic chapel.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £203 2s. 6d.; glebe, £5 9s. 7d. The rectory of Tomhaggard, and the vicarages of KILMORE and KILTURK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tomhaggard. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 3,336. Gross income, £448 2s.; nett, £420 9s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Mulrarkin, in the dio. of Ferns. A curate for Tomhaggard receives a salary of £83 1s. 6½d.

The church is in Kilturk. The Tombaggard and Kilmore Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 700 and 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Mulrankin. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 756; the Protestants of the union to 130, and the Roman Catholics to 3,252; a parochial daily school, and two National schools in the parish, had on their books 101 boys and 71 girls; and there was also a daily school in Kilturk. One of the National schools was salaried with £8 from the Board, and £12 from subscription; and the other, with £8 from the Board, and £10 from subscription.

TOMIES. See TOOMIES.

TOMREGAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Knockninny, co. Fermanagh, but chiefly in the baronies of Tullaghagh and Lower Loughtee, co. Cavan, Ulster. The Tullaghagh section contains the small town of BALLYCONNEL: which see. Length of the Fermanagh section, eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2. Length of the Cavan sections, south-eastward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Fermanagh section, 3,200 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches,—of which 23 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches are water. Area of the Tullaghagh section, 5,221 acres, 12 perches,—of which 89 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches are water. Area of the Lower Loughtee section, 2,256 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 161 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,118; in 1841, 4,212. Houses 735. Pop. of the Fermanagh section, in 1831, 1,062; in 1841, 1,224. Houses 216. Pop. of the Lower Loughtee section, in 1831, 668; in 1841, 638. Houses 106. Pop. of the rural districts of the Tullaghagh section, in 1831, 1,935; in 1841, 1,963. Houses 350. A considerable proportion of the surface is either pastoral or waste; and the remainder consists in general of gravelly land, only second-rate in quality. The summit of Legavagra, immediately beyond the northern boundary of the Tullaghagh section, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,279 feet. A ridge of sandstone hills which acuminate in Legavagra, occupies most of the northern district of the parish, sends down its skirts to the romantic site of Ballyconnel, and constitutes a remarkable feature in the midst of a comparatively great expanse of country. The small lakes Cloncoboy and Drumderg lie on the eastern boundary of the Fermanagh section; the Woodford river runs along the southern boundary; and the other chief objects in that section are the grove, the school, and the village of Oakwood. The considerable lakes Annagh and Kilwilly lie on the eastern boundary of the Cavan section; Lough Togher lies on the southern boundary; and two or three small lakes lie in the interior. The principal residences are Cranaghan-house, Berrymount, Sandywood-house, and Ballyconnel-castle,—the last the seat of Mr. Enery, amidst a wooded and rather large demesne.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £129 14s. 4d.; glebe, £381 13s. 3d. Gross income, £511 7s. 7d.; nett, £422 0s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated at Ballyconnel; it was built about 88 years ago, at the private cost of the late Col. Montgomery; and it was enlarged in 1820, by means of a gift of £461 10s., and a loan of £461 10s. 9½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450; attendance 340. The Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kildallen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,075 Churchmen, 11 Presbyterians, and 2,675 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools at Ballyconnel, and 8 at Doon, Carramore, Kilwilly, Tomregan, Gortneddin, Mullanagorman, Cranaghan, and another locality, had on their books 371 boys and 279 girls. The two schools at Ballyconnel, and the four at Kilwilly, Gortneddin, Mullanagorman, and Cranaghan were in connection with the Kildare Place Society, and were salaried with respectively £15, £7, £5 5s., £14, £7, and £3 from subscription; the school at Carramore was connected with the London Hibernian Society, and salaried with £2 from subscription; and the school at Tomregan was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £2 from subscription. In 1843, two National schools at Ballyconnel had on their books 90 boys and 104 girls.

TONAGHTY. See TOWAGHTY.

TONDUFF, a bog in the western district of the barony of Cullinagh, 1 mile east of the river Nore, and 1½ north of Abbeyleix, Queen's co., Leinster. Area, 400 acres. "This bog," reported Mr. Aber in 1814, "is bounded by rising grounds, divided by valleys, which admit of a free passage for the discharge of its waters into the Nore with a considerable fall. Its summit, which is central, has a fall of surface in a south-west direction to the stream of 42 feet; and a fall of 7 feet for its base or bottom. The distance being 4 furlongs, 20 perches; and a fall from the surface of said summit, in a northerly direction, to the Corbally stream, of 22 feet, the distance being 3 furlongs, 20 perches. The interior of this bog consists of fibrous peat, in which rise several springs; but the edges being of compact firm peat, have been long used as a turbary, in consequence of which much has been cut away, but no attempts have been made towards its cultivation, except at the south-west verge, where some fir trees have been lately planted, which are thriving extremely well. The highest part of the surface of this bog is 332 feet above the sea at high-water mark, and the lowest part of its surface is 292 feet; the greatest depth of the bog is 35 feet, and its average depth is 22 feet." Estimated cost of reclamation, £542 1s. 3d.

TONELAGEE. See THONELAGEE.

TONEROE, a hamlet in the parish of Ballinacourty, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the road from Galway to Gort, 1 mile north-north-west of Clareen-Bridge, and 2½ south-east of Oranmore.

TONLAGHNEIVE. See SAINTFIELD.

TOOM, TOEM, or TOEMVERIG, a parish 6 miles north by west of Tipperary, and partly in the barony of Clanwilliam, but chiefly in that of Upper Kilnemanagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Kilnemanagh section contains the village of CAPPAGHWHITE: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 8½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 2½. Area of the Clanwilliam section, 610 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches; of the Kilnemanagh section, 11,666 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,596; in 1841, 4,277. Houses 629. Pop., in 1841, of the Clanwilliam section, 352; of the rural districts of the Kilnemanagh section, 2,879. Houses in these, respectively 54 and 409. The northern and the central districts entirely consist of a portion of the Bilboa mountains, lofty, wild, and waste, but very improvable; and the southern district, or that around Cappaghwhite, is a portion of the northern border of the Golden Vale, fertile, ornate, and beautiful, borrowing great picturesqueness from the overhanging mountains, and forming part of the frontier of Tipperary toward the county of Limerick. The whole of the mountain districts has a very considerable altitude; a summit on the north-western boundary has a height above sea-level of 1,501 feet; and the source of a rivulet on the western boundary has an elevation of 1,446 feet. The streams of the southern or champaign district flow at elevations above sea-level of from 208 to about 300 feet. Copper mines exist on the eastern margin of the central district. The Anglesey road impinges on the northern district. The seats, and other chief objects of interest in the southern district, are High-park, Cappagh-house, Cahirmahilla-lodge, a church, the site of a castle, and the accompaniments of Cappaghwhite. "Here," at Toom, says Archdall, "was a priory of regular canons, dedicated to St. Donan, although others give it to the Virgin Mary. St. Donan was formerly honoured here, as patron of the place, and was probably the founder. This monastery was a cell to Inchmoneo."—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £215 8s. 4jd. The tithes were formerly appropriated to the see of Cashel; but about the year 1833, they were disappropriated thence, and attached to what had previously been the perpetual curacy of Toom; and that perpetual curacy included, not only the parish of Toom, but also the parishes of CASTLETOWN and AUGHACREW: which see. Pop., in 1831, 5,011. Gross income, £92 6s. 1jd.; nett, £62 6s. 1jd. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £46 3s. 1d. The church is one of the oldest edifices of its class in use in Ireland, and was repaired about 38 years ago by means of private subscriptions and parochial assessments, but was in a dilapidated condition in 1832. Sittings 130; attendance 70. The Cappaghwhite Roman Catholic chapel has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of about 1,500. The Cuanaveeraba Roman Catholic chapel is situated among the mountains, and has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Templebeg. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 3,661; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 21 boys and 24 girls; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided with £8 from the National Board, and some advantages from subscription, one with some advantages from Lord Lismore, and one with £20 from the incumbent—were usually attended by about 202 scholars.

TOOM, co. Cork. See TOOMBS.

TOOMAVARRA, a village in the parish of Aghnameadle, barony of Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the road from Roscrea to Silvermines, and on the direct road from Nenagh to Maryborough, 3½ miles south-west of Moneygall, 6 east of Nenagh, and 8 north-east by east of Silvermines. It is the site of a church, a glebe-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, a grave-yard, a schoolhouse, a dispensary, and the ruins of a preceptory of Knights-Templars; and within a mile of it are Pallas-house, Knockane-house, Blane-house, Garron-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the ruins of Blane and Knockane-castles. The dispensary is within the Nenagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,633; and, in 1839-40, it received £95 18s., and expended £96 18s. Fairs are held on June 5, July 23, Sept. 29, and Nov. 4. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 790; in 1841, 885. Houses 156. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 81; in manufactures and trade, 75; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 82; on their own manual labour, 86; on means not specified, 8.

TOOMB-BRIDGE, a long communication across a swampy portion of the course of the river Lee, a brief distance above the influx of the river Sullane, barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. "Not far distant from Drumcaragh castle," says Mr. Croker, "is Toomb-Bridge, a long and narrow pass over an extensive and swampy flat, through which the Lee meanders, embracing numerous little islands covered with the bog myrtle and stunted timber. Rising above Toomb-Bridge is a steep and considerable hill, on the top of which stands Dundarerk-castle, built by the MacCarthys, and forfeited by Dermot MacCarthy in 1641. It commands a view of an immense tract of country, in which the appearance of cultivation is scattered and unequal.

TOOME (LOWER), a barony on the western border of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by Kilonway; on the east and south-east, by Lower Antrim; on the south, by Upper Toome; and on the west, by the county of Londonderry. Its length, west-south-westward, is 8½ miles; its extreme breadth is 6½; and its area is 36,259 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches,—of which 129 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are in the river Bann. The eastern district consists of part of the western abutments, vale-cleft declivities, and slowly descending slopes of the great tabular region of trap; the western district is part of the eastern side of the low and spreading valley of the Lower Bann; and the central district consists of a portion of the valley of the river Maine, and a picturesque part of the vale of the rivulet Braid. The whole of the western boundary is traced by the Bann. Among the most pleasing features of the interior are the beautiful environs of Ballymena, the Moravian settlement of Gracehill, and the Earl of Mountcashel's demesne of Galgorm-castle.—This barony contains part of the parish of Ahoghill, and the whole of the parish of Kirkinriola. Its towns and chief villages are Ahoghill, Cullybackey, Galgorm, Gracehill, part of Ballymena, and part of Portlengone. Pop., in 1831, 26,254; in 1841, 29,056. Houses 4,973. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,058; in manufactures and trade, 2,851; in other pursuits, 362. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 131; on the directing of labour, 2,895; on their own manual labour, 2,193; on means not specified, 52. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,629; who could read but not write, 4,153; who could neither read nor write, 2,533. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,719; who could read but not write, 7,078; who could neither read nor write, 3,138.—Lower Toome lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Ballymena. The total number of tenements valued is 3,617; and of these, 1,918 are valued under £5,—907, under £10,—372, under £15,—189, under £20,—83, under £25,—47, under £30,—60, under £40,—16, under £50,—and 25, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £1,982 17s. 9d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £1,982 17s. 9d. and £1,967 7s. 5d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,071 0s. 4d. and £1,649 11s. 10d.

TOOME (UPPER), a barony on the western border of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Lower Toome; on the north-east, by the barony of Lower Antrim; on the east, by the baronies of Lower Antrim and Upper Antrim; on the south, by Lough Neagh; and on the west, by the Lower Bann and Lough Beg, which separates it from the county of Londonderry. Its length, west-north-westward, is 10 miles; its breadth, exclusive of Lough Neagh, and measured in the direction of south by west, is 8½ miles; its breadth, if measured inclusively of the barony's portion of Lough Neagh, becomes the length, and is 10½ miles; and its area is 64,953 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches,—of which 18,204 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches are water in Loughs Neagh and Beg, and the rivers Bann and Maine. The surface is nearly all low; and consists of the lower portion of the valley of the Maine, all the north shore of Lough Neagh, all the east side of the valley of the Lower Bann down to the foot of Lough Beg, and a portion of the pleasant district near the confluence of the Braid rivulet and the Maine. Its district upon Lough Neagh extend eastward to the immediate vicinity of the town of Antrim, and boasts the Earl O'Neill's extensive and superb demesne of Shanecastle; its portion of the valley of the Maine exhibits a series of close scenes of considerable beauty; and its central and north-eastern districts form a conspicuous part of "a bleak, and in the arable parts, thickly inhabited tract of country, which is greatly cut up into small farms, diversified with low hills and isolated patches of marsh and bog. This undulating plain is bounded on the east by the chain of low mountains which stretch along the coast from Carrickfergus to Ballycastle, and on the west by the hills which form one of the boundaries of the valley of the Bann; and bleak and dreary though many parts of this district be, it everywhere, as regards civilization and all the blessings which follow in its train, exhibits a pleasing contrast to some similar divisions in the more southerly parts of the kingdom." [Fraser.]—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ahoghill, Antrim, and Ballyscullion, the whole of the granges of Ballyscullion and Shilvodan, and the whole of the parishes of Craufield, Drummaul, and Duneane. The only town is Randalstown, and the principal village is Toome. Pop., in 1831, 23,912; in 1841, 24,246. Houses 4,175. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,525; in manufactures and trade, 1,596; in other pursuits, 187. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 58; on the directing of labour, 1,799; on their own manual labour, 2,418; on means not specified, 33. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,190; who could read but not write, 3,109; who could neither read nor write, 3,147. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,894; who could read but not write, 4,065; who could neither read nor write, 4,324.—Upper Toome lies partly within the Poor-law union of Antrim, and partly within that of Ballymena. The total number of tenements valued is 4,028; and of these, 2,135 are valued under £5,—£74, under £10,—439, under £15,—232, under £20,—114, under £25,—79, under £30,—81, under £40,—31, under £50,—and 45, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £26,027 17s. 2d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £2,040 15s. 3d. and £2,125 2s. 8d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,105 8s. and £2,064 12s. 4d.

TOOME, or TOOME-BRIDGE, a village in the parish of Duneane, barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the western verge of the county on the right bank of the river Bann, on the isthmus between Loughs Neagh and Beg, and on the direct road from Belfast to Londonderry, 3½ miles east-south-east of Castle Dawson, 4 south-south-east of Bellaghy, 5 west by north of Randalstown, 5 east of Magherafelt, 8 south of Portlengone, and 22 west-north-west of Belfast. In consequence of its position at the north end of Lough Neagh and above Lough Beg, it is a very great thoroughfare between the counties of Antrim and Londonderry; yet, contrary to what might have been anticipated, it has a very trivial amount of population, and is not a place of any trade. A noble bridge of 9 arches, built at the expense of Earl O'Neill, takes the thoroughfare across the Bann, and gives the village its name of Toome-Bridge. Previous to the erection of this structure, the communication across the river was maintained by a ferry. A large inn was, a considerable period ago, built at the village. A castle, to defend the pass of the river, formerly stood in the vicinity of the village, but on the Londonderry side of the river, and within the parish of Artree; and, in consequence of its situation between the two lakes, it must have been a military station of considerable importance. In 1650, this castle was taken by the Roman Catholic bishop of Clogher, and retaken by Col. Venables. In the vicinity of the village, on the Antrim side, are St. Helena and Drumraymond, the former the residence of Mr. Reford, and the latter a cottage of Earl O'Neill. Fairs are held at Toome on April 20, and Dec. 4. The Toome-Bridge dispensary is within the Ballymena Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £78, and administered to 288 patients. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 122; in 1841, 95. Houses 17.

TOOMIES, or TOMIES, a mountain in the north-east corner of the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It forms the northern part of the western screen of the Lower Lake of Killarney,—the central and southern parts of that screen being formed by the Glens and the Purple mountains; it spreads from the edge of the lake westward to the Gap of Dunloe, so as to form part also of the eastern screen of that savagely and sombrelly picturesque defile; and it topographically, though not nominally, includes Glens mountain,—the separation between the two consisting of only a ravine or gorge far up the acclivities, and tumultuously washed by a cascade. This mountain rises precipitously up from the edge of the lake, is clothed over the base and the lower declivities with noble masses of wood, presents an imposing intricacy and magnificence of outline, shakes down from one of its sides the superb waterfall called O'SULLIVAN'S CASCADE [which see], and forms a prominent and powerful portion of the backgrounds of almost all the good groupings of the Lower Lake's scenery. "Leaving Ross bay," says the author of the Guide to Killarney, "the Lower Lake expands itself in glorious majesty; the promontories of Ross-castle to the left of the foreground, O'Donoghoe's Prison and Innisfallen to the right; and immediately opposite, but at a distance of about two miles, Tomies and Glens mountains rise, in the most abrupt, bold, precipitous manner, from the surface of the waters, having their bases thickly wooded with oaks and hollies." "Leaving the island of Innisfallen, and sailing out into the broad expanse of waters, a grand mountain-view presents itself; Tomies and Glens directly opposite, the group of hills closing up the entrance to the Upper Lake adjacent to them, and Turk and Mangerton to the south. * * * Steering towards Tomies mountain, which is about 1½ mile from Innisfallen, the eye is delighted by the never-ending variety and change of scenery, momentarily occurring; at first, Tomies and Glens appear rising abruptly from the water, half-clothed with hanging woods, and rearing their naked summits to the skies; upon a nearer approach, they hide their rugged heads, and present a range of forest nearly 6 miles in length, and apparently occupying the entire face of the mountains."

TOORIG (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It rises 4 or 5 miles north of the parish of Ardagh, runs in a southerly direction through the centre of that parish, and thence flows in an eastward direction through Two-Mile-Bridge to the Blackwater, at a point about a mile above Youghal. The stream is very much subject to high and sweeping freshets from the mountains. Mason's statist notices as follows a rude wooden bridge, which spanned it at Inchinrinka, and formed the only practicable communication between the western and the eastern districts of the parish of Ardagh in wet weather. "It is formed of two planks, supported by wooden legs, with an abutment on each side of the river for the ends of the planks to rest on; the two planks are formed of a tree of about 40 or 50 feet long, sawed through the centre; of course it is very strong, and has an iron balustrade on one side for the hand."

TOPPIT MOUNTAIN, a mountain in the parish of Enniskillen, barony of Tyrkenney, 5 miles east by north of the town of Enniskillen, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Its summit has an altitude of 909 feet above the level of the sea, soars conspicuously above the summits of the surrounding hills, and commands a fine view of the greater portion of the counties of Fermanagh and Tyrone. The mountain is easy of ascent.

TORALAYDAN, an inlet in the parish of Glencolumbkille, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies within $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile of the nearest part of the mainland, 3 miles north-east of the entrance of Glen bay, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of the headland between Loughrusmore and Loughrusbeg. It is a mere rock, but gigantic in dimensions, and both conspicuous and very curious in appearance. Its summit has an altitude of 350 feet above sea-level; and all its sides fall down in sheer cliffs to the ocean.

TOR-HEAD, a headland in the parish of Culfeightrin, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It screens the south side of Murlough bay, is situated 5 miles north of Cushendun, and is the point of the Irish mainland nearest to Scotland, being directly opposite the Mull of Kintyre. It consists of mica slate, with subordinate beds of limestone, sienite, and felspar porphyry; but in the bay to the north of it are most interesting columnar formations of trap, and on the loftier portions of the hills behind it are beds of sandstone and chalk, capped in some instances with basalt. It may be regarded as a mere projection of the cliffs of Cushleak; and it is immediately overhung by the hill of Carnlea, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 1,250 feet. The scenery of the headland itself and of the bay which it screens, is singularly grand, yet very little known. "Soon after we turned from the main road towards the coast," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "we entered a wild district, walked along a barren heath, looked upon Tor-Point, stood above the several headlands, grazed, until we became giddy, upon giant rocks, from the summits of terrific cliffs, and commenced a descent into the bay of Murlough. There are spots—small unrecorded places—nooks hid beneath cliff or mountain, mere corners of the island, that altogether escape the tourist who bows along the splendid roads which render the great leading features of the scenery of the county of Antrim so easy of examination. Let the visitor on no account omit to inspect this bay,—a scene of unspeakable grandeur and beauty." Tor-Head is a coastguard station; and the fisheries within its district were worked by 73 men, with one open sail-boat and 17 row-boats.

TORMORE, an island in the parish of Glencolumbkille, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated within 3 furlongs of the nearest part of the mainland, 1 mile north-east of Toralaydan, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of the peninsula between Loughrusmore and Loughrusbeg. It strictly resembles TORALAYDAN [which see] in both character and appearance, and, like it, dings down its whole periphery in sheer cliffs to the sea; but it is loftier, more gigantic, and more imposing, and lifts its summit to the altitude above sea-level of about 500 feet.

TORY, TORRY, or TROREE, an island in the parish of Tullaghobegley, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated 4 miles north by west of Innisboffin, 6 north by east of Bloody-Foreland, and 7 west-north-west of Horn Head. It extends $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-westward, with a maximum breadth of $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile, and comprises an area of 785 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Its south-east end is called Port-Doon; its north-west end is surmounted by a lighthouse; a tiny peninsula projecting northward from Port-Doon is called Tormore; and two hamlets in the interior are called East Town and West Town. Its surface consists principally of mountain and rock; and, as seen from lofty ground on the mainland, is described by the late Rev. Cæsar Otway as "rising out of the deep like a castellated and fortified city,—lofty towers, church-spires, battlements, bastions, batteries, presenting themselves,—so strangely varied and so fantastically deceptive are its cliffs." The north-eastern coast presents to the ocean a range of cliffs, of from 100 to 300 feet in height; the south-western coast is low and flat; and the intermediate surface, in a general view, slopes from the former coast to the latter. The inhabitants are a semi-barbarous race, about 500 or 700 in number; and they support themselves by husbandry and by fishing. The lighthouse on the island was erected in 1832; its lantern has an altitude of 122 feet above high-water sea-level; and the cost of maintaining it during 1840 was £852 17s. 6d.,—and during 1843, £813 1s. 5d. On the north-east side of the island, within about 3 furlongs from the shore, vessels have shelter in 18 fathoms of water; but a pier is greatly needed for the accommodation of fishing-boats. Ruins exist upon the island of a round tower,—of some crosses,—of several ecclesiastical buildings, which are fondly alleged to have been seven churches,—and of an old military structure, which the inhabitants call Ball's castle. "Off this island," says the late Rev. Cæsar Otway, in his interesting Sketches in Ireland, "Sir John B. Warren, in 1798, encountered a French fleet, with troops and rebel chieftains on board, and capturing them all, he crushed the hopes of the French army that landed at Killalla, and broke the spirits and the cause of the rebels who had joined them. I was sorry that it was out of my power to visit Tory Island. It is about 12 miles from shore; and I am informed that it is an interesting spot. Here are the ruins of a fortress, erected by Erick of the red army, one of the Norwegian sea kings, whose roving rule extended around these isles and coasts. The name of the island is of Runick etymology, and Thor-Eye," now corrupted into Torry, denotes that it was consecrated to Thor, the Scandinavian deity, that presided over stormy and desolate places. Here also is a tower and church, built by St. Columbkille,

• The singularly lofty and tower-like rocks of this island might have conferred on it the appellation of Tarris Island.

and a portion of the churchyard is dedicated to some ancient saints, his followers, who are there interred; wherein if any one presumed now to bury a corpse, the following night he would be cast with violence out of the ground. * A foreigner, who is not more remarkable for his attainments in mineralogy and natural history than he is for his agreeable and amiable manners, went lately to this island; I am not informed whether his explorings were attended with satisfactory results; but as bodies do not rest in their graves, no more could the carcase of this philosopher rest in his bed; yet it was not owing to the intervention of angry saints, but to the assaults of hungry vermin. We are informed that this learned zoologist, on his return to the continent of Ireland; was so anxious to divest himself of the sundry genera and species that attached themselves to him as by a kind of elective attraction, that, divesting himself of his integuments, he was seen through a telescope wading into the sea, armed with scrubbing-brushes, resolutely intent on expelling, destroying, drowning all the specimens of entomology that were inclined to attend on the professor, even as far as the museum of the Dublin Society. The people of Tory Island seldom come to the mainland. A fishing-boat, containing seven or eight men, was lately driven by stress of weather into Ards bay, and the wind for some days continued so directly contrary that they could not venture to return to their island. Mr. Stewart of Ards gave these poor people shelter in a large barn, and supplied them with plenty of food and fresh straw to lie on;—not one of these people were ever in Ireland before; the trees of Ards actually astonished them,—they were seen putting leaves and small branches in their pockets to show on their return. Mr. Stewart had the good nature to procure a piper for their amusement; and all the time the wind was contrary these harmless people continued dancing, singing, eating, sleeping,—a picture of savage life in every age and clime. There are about 500 inhabitants on the island, and these poor creatures have been in the course of the present summer (1827) visited by a great calamity. In the month of August last, a strange and unforeseen storm set in from the north-west, which drove the sea in immense waves over the whole flat part of the island; the waves even beat over the highest cliffs,—all their corn was destroyed, their potatoes washed out of the ground, and all their springs of fresh-water filled up; nothing can be imagined more deplorable than this. The island is part of the estate of the see of Raphoe. On this occasion Dr. Bisset, the excellent bishop, did much to alleviate the wants of this wretched people."

TORY-HILL, a high conical hill in the parish of Rossinan, north-western verge of the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is situated $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of the village of Mullinavat, and 5 north by west of the City of Waterford. Its name in ancient times was the Hill of the Sun, and this is its name still in the Irish language; and tradition asserts that, during the remote ages in which the people of the town of Waterford were worshippers of the Sun, they marched in procession, on solemn days, to this hill, and offered sacrifice on its summit to their god.

TOUGH, TCOON, or TCOORAH, a parish in the barony of Ownybeg, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north by east of Pallasgreen, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the village of CAPPANORE; which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,519 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,534; in 1841, 3,753. Houses 599. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,823; in 1841, 3,202. Houses 498. About 161 acres are mountain, 486 acres are red bog, and the remainder consists, for the most part, of good arable land. The northern district comprises a small portion of the skirts of the Slieve-Phelim mountains; and the southern district spreads away into the Golden Vale. The Bilboa or Little Mulhern rivulet effects the drainage westward; and the route of the Limerick railways to Dublin and Waterford, as proposed by the Public Commissioners, passes near the southern boundary. The principal seat is Tower-hill, the residence of Mr. Lloyd, situated about a mile from Cappamore. The demesne which surrounds this seat is elevated in site, has extensive plantations, and is a conspicuous feature in a great expanse of country.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ANINGTON [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £250. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of about 1,800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 3,636; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 125 boys and 53 girls. In 1843, a National school at Tower Hill was salaried with £18 from the Board, and had on its books 194 boys and 120 girls.

TOUGHCLUGGIN, or CLUGGIN, a parish in the barony of Coonagh, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Pallasgreen, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,094 acres. Pop., in 1831, 217; in 1841, 822. Houses 107. The land is of good quality, forms part of the Golden Vale, lies on the eastern verge of co. Limerick, and is drained by one of the head-streams of the Little Mulhern. The road from Limerick to Tipperary passes through the interior; and the route of the railway from Limerick to Dublin and Waterford, as proposed by the Public Commissioners, passes near the northern boundary.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CULLEN [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithe composition, £40; glebe, £13 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £40 ls. 6d.; and are inappropriate in Mr. Wilson. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 226; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TOURIN, the delightfully situated demesne of Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart., in the parish of Lismore and Maccollop, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. It occurs on the right bank of the Blackwater, 2 miles south of Cappoquin, nearly opposite Dromana, the seat of Lord Stewart De Decies, and in the vicinity of Drumroe, the seat of Sir William Jackson Homan, Bart. On this demesne may be observed the junction of the limestone and the schistose formations of the western district of the county; and the summit of an ancient castle within the park, commands a view of the mineralogical divisions, as well as of the picturesque beauties of the surrounding country.

TOURO (THE), a rivulet. See TOORIG.

TOWAGHTY, or TONAGHTY, a parish in the barony of Carra, 6 miles north-north-west of Hollymount, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, southward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,067 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches,—of which 109 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,258; in 1841, 1,297. Houses 230. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is traversed by the road from Balla to Ballinrobe, and by the mail-road from Westport to Dublin. Carcownaron lake extends along the western boundary, and contains the greater part of the water area; Ballyglass lake lies on the eastern boundary; and two or three loughlets lie in the interior. The hamlet of Ballyglass stands on the Westport and Dublin mail-road, and contains a post-office and a constabulary barrack. The seats are Mount-pleasant and Tower-hill,—the latter the residence of Valentine Blake, Esq.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory, and vicarage, in the dio. of Tuam. The tithes belong to the vicars choral of Dublin. The clerical duties of the parish are performed, without emolument, by the vicar of DRUMMONAGHAN: which see. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 1,336; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TOWMORE, TOOMORE, or TUOMORE, a parish in the barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the town of FOXFORD: which see. Length, southward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 6,787 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches,—of which 102 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,576; in 1841, 3,744. Houses 673. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,508; in 1841, 3,064. Houses 534. The river Moy, here a stream of very considerable volume, touches the south-western boundary, makes a detour at no great distance to the south, touches the south-western boundary, makes a second detour at no great distance to the west, and after receiving the influx of the superfluous waters of Loughs Conn and Cullen, returns to trace northward the greater part of the western boundary. A height in the interior of the southern district has an altitude of 642 feet above the level of the sea. The western abutments of the Lurgan Hills or Slieve-Gamph mountains, form a natural strength and a very prominent feature along a great part of the eastern border. The southern district of the parish is hilly, picturesque, and romantic; the western district is principally a morassy, or at least wet, flat, and tame plain; and the eastern district is a tame slope from the skirts of the Lurgan Hills. The village of Church is situated in the north-east. The principal country residences are Moorbrook-house, near that village, and Dove-hall, close to the town of Foxford.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of STRAIT [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £104 7s. 10d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Sir William Henry Palmer. A curate for Towmore receives a salary of £100. The church is situated in Foxford, and was built in 1801, by means of a loan of £300 from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £400 raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 200; attendance 90. There is also a Roman Catholic chapel in Foxford; but the attendance on it is not sufficiently distinguished in the report from that on the other Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 158, and the Roman Catholics to 3,680; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £10 from the National Board—had on their books 203 boys and 126 girls.

TOWNEY, a cove or small fishing harbour in the parish of Kilcar, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated at the east side of the entrance of Teelin bay, 2 miles east of Carrigan Head. It has a depth of only 6 feet at high water; and its small pier is in bad repair.

TOWNLEY-HALL, a demesne in the parish of Tullyallen, barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. It is situated on the left bank of the river Boyne, 3 miles west by north of Drogheda; and is the residence of B. T. Balfour, Esq. It possesses a comparatively large area, pleasant natural features, a profusion of sylvan embellishment, a full participation in the beauties of the lower valley of the Boyne, and intimate historical association with the memorable battle which broke the power of Jacobitism in Ireland. See BOYNE. Its lands formerly bore the name of Beltumber, and were part of the scene of action of the battle of the Boyne. On these lands there was found, some years ago, a very curious wooden ball or bullet, of oval outline, and hirsute with lead spikes. A flattened space at its broader end "had an iron staple driven into it, and the whole surface was unevenly studded over with clumsy blunt spikes of lead, which projected from the surface of the ball about $\frac{1}{4}$ inch; the greatest diameter of the ball was about 7 inches. It was, perhaps, the ball of the antique and well-known weapon called the 'morning star.' Whether this weapon was ever used at the battle of the Boyne or not may be a question which the mere finding it on the field of the battle will not answer. It is probable that the portion of King James's army which were but indifferently armed may have boasted of some man who adopted this antique weapon."

TRABOLGAN, a demesne in the parish of Corkbeg, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated at the extremity of the peninsula, on the east side of the entrance of Cork Harbour, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles south-west of Cloyne. It is an old seat of the ancient family of Roche,—who gave name to the headland of Roche Point, at the east side of the entrance of Cork Harbour; and it is at present the residence of Edward Roche, Esq., M. P. North-north-east of it, toward the village of Aghada, is Rochemount, the seat of J. W. Roche, Esq.; and a little north-west of it is Carlisle Fort,—one of the two military strengths for the defence of the entrance of Cork Harbour. The natural scenery around the demesne is superb.

TRACTON, a parish in the barony of Kinnalea, 3 miles south of Carrigaline, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of Minane and Tracton. See MINANE. Length, southward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,862 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,838; in 1841, 2,959. Houses 474. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,627. Houses 413. Area of the village of Tracton, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 115. Houses 25. A stream runs through the parishes of Tracton and Clontard, and falls into a navigable estuary at Minane-Bridge, 3 miles from the south of Ringabella bay. The interior of Tracton contains neither lake nor mountain. The surface, in a general view, is considerably diversified, consists of tolerably good arable land, and possesses only such high grounds as are broad-based, tabular, and cultivated to the summit. The number of townlands or ploughlands is eleven,—ten of which belong to the Earl of Shannon, and one to Mr. Hodder. A few native oaks and hazels in the demesne of Gurlygrennan are the principal apology for woods. A vein of galena intermixed with quartz and pyrites was at one time worked in the east, but, in consequence of the smallness of the quantity of ore obtained, was speedily abandoned. The remarkable mineral substance called wavelite or hydrargillite, which had previously been discovered only in one of the southern counties of England, was found, about 30 years ago or upwards, in the vicinity of Minane-Bridge. It occurs in a bill of flinty slate, both adhering to that rock and in detached nodules,—the latter spherical or hemispherical, and composed of acicular four-sided prisms, diverging from a common centre, and in general adhering laterally to one another. The nodules vary in size from the diameter of a pea to a diameter of nearly two inches. The lustre is splendid; the colour is bluish green, passing into yellow,—also white, black, and greyish black; and the specific gravity is 2.7. A fine series of specimens of both the wavelite of Minane-Bridge and that of Devonshire is preserved in the museum of the Cork Institution. Calcareous sand from Ringabella—or fine sea-sand, containing a large intermixture of comminuted shells—is a principal and very fertilizing manure.

The only seats are those of Mr. Hodder and Mr. Daunt. The principal antiquity is the once celebrated abbey of Tracton; but the only existing vestiges of this are a few fragments of pillars, some blocks rudely carved to represent human faces, and scattered quoin stones, partly athwart the churchyard and partly in the walls of the church. "St. Mary's Abbey of Tracton was founded by the MacCarty's in the year 1224, A. D., and supplied with Cistercians from the monastery of Alba Landa, at Maridun in Wales; the possessions were confirmed by Edward III. The Abbey of Tracton, which derived its name from the 'Alba Tractus' or fair tract of country surrounding it, stood two miles south of Carrigaline; and the abbots formerly sat in parliament. The monks pretended to have a piece of the cross, which they said 'Barry Oge' had purchased for them at a great price. This was so firmly believed that, on every Holy Thursday, vast multitudes resorted thither to pay their devotions to the supposed relic. This Abbey was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Henry Guilford and Sir James Craig (March 20, A. D. 1568), upon their paying beforehand the sum of £7 15s. Sir James Craig assigned it to the Earl of Cork, who passed a patent to the Abbey (March 23d, 7th of James I.), and transferred it to his son Francis, Lord Shannon. The Abbey is now (A. D. 1749) demolished."—This parish is an inappropriate rectory, and vicarage, in the dio. of Cork. The tithes are compounded for £463 15s., and belong to the Earl of Shannon. The inappropriate parishes of Tracton, KILPATRICK, KILMONT, BALLYFOYLE, KINKURE, and CLONTREAD [see these articles], constitute the perpetual curacy and the benefice of Tracton. The parishes are not quite contiguous. Length of the union, 11 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 8,419. Gross income, £71 3s. 1d.; nett, £69 19s. 1d. Patron, the Earl of Shannon. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 45. The Tracton Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Nohoval. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilmomy and Clontead. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 52, and the Roman Catholics to 2,899; the Protestants of the union to 270, and the Roman Catholics to 8,421; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish had on its books 5 boys and 6 girls; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the Diocesan Society—were usually attended by about 128 scholars; and there were 7 daily schools in the other parts of the union. In 1843, a male National school and a female National school at Knocknamanna, were salaried with respectively £12 and £8 a-year from the Board, and had on their books 244 boys and 154 girls.

TRADDERY, a sinecure benefice in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the southern part of the county of Clare, Munster. It comprises the rectories of KILNASOOLAGH, KILMALEERY, BUNRATY, FINOGH, CLOUGHAN, KILCONRY, TOMPINLOUGH, and DROMLINE: see these articles. Gross income, £678 14s. 6½d.; nett, £641 8s. 8½d. Patron, the Earl of Egremont. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Clare-Abbey, in the dio. of Killaloe.

TRAKEL, LACKEN, or WHITE STRAND, a small bay, at the north-eastern extremity of the barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It washes the parish of Lacken at its head and the two divisions of the parish of Kilcummin at its sides; and has already been partially noticed under the word LACKEN: which see. Mr. Nimmo, in the official report of his Coast Survey, says, "Rounding Kilcummin Head, we find the sand has blown to a great extent over the western slope, and forms a line of downs, and a broad strand across the inlet between it and Rathlacken Point; behind the sands is an extensive but shallow lagoon, dry at low water. The channel being in the middle of the strand, is too precarious to be of much use in navigation, or to admit of improvement, although the grounds in the neighbourhood are fertile. This bay is called Trabel or the White Strand, and affords good supplies of flat fish. Several yawls are kept on the western shore below Castle Lacken, but they must be hawled up a steep cliff into a paddock near Mr. Burke's house; nor does there seem any method of forming a harbour at any reasonable expense. We are now in a district of limestone, alternating with sandstone, of considerable fertility and great population. The roads terminate at Castle Lacken, which is also the last post-office on this side, and from hence round to Dunfinny bay, the coast is a precipitous cliff of horizontal beds of limestone, black slate, and sandstone."

TRALEE, a parish in the barony of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the chief part of the town of TRALEE: see next article. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,605 acres. Pop., in 1831, 11,021; in 1841, 12,534. Houses 1,619. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,453; in 1841, 1,944. Houses 295. The parish comprises a small part of the Stacks mountains, and a prominent part of the strath or valley of the little river LEE [which see]; and it has its name from the latter of these districts, the word Tralee originally meaning the strath or strand of the Lee,—or as it was anciently written, the Leigh. The scenery of the parish itself is charming; and that of the parish in grouping with the circumjacent country, and the mountain and marine perspectives, is singularly brilliant and full of character and power. A large proportion of the land consists of a dark limestone soil, suitable alike for tillage and for pasture, and has long been reputed the richest in the county. Some good quarries exist of a dark-coloured marble, somewhat similar to that of Kilkenny, but more indurated, and less profuse in fossil shells, and capable of being raised in blocks of any reasonable size. The principal villas and mansions in the vicinity of the town are Belmont, Ballard, Spring-Lodge, Magh, Lower Cannon, Chute-hall, Springhill, Arabella, Plover-hill, Frogmore-lodge, Oakfield, and Bally-seedy,—the two last the residences of respectively Mr. Bateman and Arthur Blennerhassett, Esq. A vantage-ground above Ballyseedy-house, upwards of 2 miles south-east of the town, commands a delightful prospect of a number of the country residences, and a large and beautiful portion of the strath and screens of the Lee.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £408 7s. 7½d.; glebe, £46. Gross income, £454 7s. 7½d.; nett, £377 16s. Patron, Sir Edward Denny, Bart. A curate receives a salary of £75 as curate of the parish, and a salary of £50 as chaplain to the military of the town. The church was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £2,261 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 700. The Independent meeting-house has an attendance of 45. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rataas and Annagh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,055 Churchmen, 22 Protestant dissenters, and 10,590 Roman Catholics, two free daily schools under the superintendence of the rector, were supported with jointly £60 from the Board of Erasmus Smith and from clergymen of the Established Church, and had on their books 47 boys and 28 girls; two free schools, under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, were salaried with each £25 a-year, and had on their books 320 boys and 250 girls; and 5 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 175 scholars. In 1843, a male National school and a female National school in the town were salaried with respectively £16 and £20 from the Board, and had on their books 300 boys and 437 girls.

TRALEE.

A post and market town, a sea-port, a parliamentary borough, and the assize town and capital of the county of Kerry, in the barony of Trughenackny, and partly in the parish of Ratass, but chiefly in that of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the rivulet Lee, and at the intersection of the road from Ardfert to Milltown with that from Dingle to Limerick, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of the head of Tralee Harbour, $\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Blennerville, $\frac{2}{3}$ east by south of Spa, 4 south-east of Ardfert, 6 north of Milltown, 7 east-north-east of Kilgobbin, 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Castle-Island, 10 south of Abbey-Odorney, 16 north-east by east of Annascull, 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by north of Killarney, 18 south-south-west of Listowel, 20 $\frac{1}{2}$ east-north-east of Dingle, 24 $\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Ballylongford, 26 south-south-west of Tarbert, 55 south-west by west of Limerick, and 143 $\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of Dublin.

Enviroms.—The site and the immediate environs of the town are low, flat, and subject to inundations from freshets of the Lee; but the middle grounds and the backgrounds of the scenery around it are so composed as to form a complete panorama, at once brilliant, beautiful, and comparatively unique. "There is," says Mr. Fraser, "something very striking in the scenery around Tralee, and, at the same time, very different from what is generally met with around this part of the coast. In front of the town, the vast expanse of waters and accompanying range of mountains which rise boldly from the shores of the bay, and run westward to Brandon, where they dip into the ocean; and on the other side, the broad fertile valley stretching eastward to Castle-Island, which is bounded on the north by the Stack hills, and on the south by the higher range of Slieve-Mish; the latter range is not more than 14 miles in extent; it springs from the valley of Castle-Island, and is terminated by the valley along which the road from Tralee to Dingle by Annascull is carried. Batregraun, the highest point of the range, attains an elevation of 2,796 feet above the level of the sea; and from it or from any other summit of Slieve-Mish which are nearer Tralee, good views are obtained of the vast assemblage of mountains lying to the south and west of Dingle bay, of the town, and generally of the country lying around."

Interior of the Town.—Several of the streets are spacious, well-built, regularly laid out, and agreeably neat or even handsome; the southern outskirts embrace a large expanse of demesne-grounds, belonging to Tralee-castle, but now disposed in public promenades, or at least made fully accessible to the townspeople; and the general appearance of both interior and outskirts, as to at once architecture, cleanliness, order, and indications of prosperity, is in keeping with the delightful character of the environs, and exceedingly superior to what any reasonable stranger would anticipate in so remote a situation. The rivulet Lee runs through the middle of the town; and is spanned in its progress by several small bridges. A sort of square—scarcely large enough, however, to bear that designation in an urban sense, and decidedly too small to harmonize with the spaciousness of the principal streets—marks the centre of the town, and was formerly the focus of both public architecture and public business. One spacious street, 380 yards in length, extends eastward from the square; sends off rectangularly from its south side to the Castle-Green another spacious street of about 180 yards in length; and forks at its termination into two cabin-edified streets, the one extending in the direction of east by north along the road to Killarney, and the other in the direction of south-east toward the gaol and the barrack, situated at the distance of 1,000 yards from the centre of the town. One brief but spacious street goes northward from the square, and another brief but less spacious one goes westward; the latter to send off a ramification north-westward; and both the former street and this ramification lead to a large suburb of cabins, consisting of several streets, and constituting all the north-west wing of the town. A street altogether one-sided in its good edifices, but partly built on the other side with cabins, extends 300 yards southward from the square, and leads out to the west side of the castle grounds. Another, a longer, a more spacious, and a somewhat fully edified street, yet far from being uniform in either width or character, extends parallel to the preceding at the distance of 50 or 60 yards to the west, and eventually becomes a terrace overlooking the canal; and a rather spacious, and nearly straight street, goes off from the west side of this, extends about 380 yards west-south-westward, and is both prolonged at its termination and winged along its south side by lines and streets of cabins. The town, in a general view, is thus a comparatively compact main body of good and spacious streets, with cabins fringing it slightly on the south, and forming three large suburbs on respectively the east, the north-west, and the south-west. Yet, in spite of the somewhat large aggregate of inferior houses, the town as a whole, and as compared to most towns of its size in all parts of Ireland except the north, possesses a decidedly respectable character. "I have no hesitation," says Mr. Inglis, "in pronouncing Tralee, the county town of Kerry, to be altogether the most thriving town I have seen since leaving Clonmel, and in some respects it leaves Clonmel behind it. Tralee has streets that would not disgrace the best quarters of any city; and these not streets of business—which it also has—but streets containing gentlemen's houses, or, at all events, houses which no gentleman might be ashamed to live in."

The indications of prosperity visible in the outward appearance of Tralee, I found, upon inquiry, to be just indications. Twenty years ago, Tralee was little else than a congregation of cabins; and within a far shorter period it has received—as a merchant of the town expressed it—its new face.

House rent in Tralee is high,—higher than in any English county town; but a little way out of Tralee it is moderate enough. A gentleman, whom I visited, had an excellent house, somewhat more than two miles from Tralee, beautifully situated on the bay, with spacious out-houses, and with 10 English acres of good land, for which he paid £45. Estimating the land at £2 10s. per acre, (for land around Tralee lies high,) he paid £20 for his house and its accommodations. The town of Tralee is the property of Sir Edward Denny; he grants leases on lives, renewable for ever; but it is not in his power to let ground at a lower rate than £10 an acre. He is also the chief proprietor of the surrounding county; but the occupying tenants chiefly hold under middlemen, who extract the utmost rent that competition can produce."

Public Buildings.—A Dominican friary was founded at Tralee, either in 1243 or 1260, by John, son of Thomas Fitzgerald, who, with his son Maurice, was slain at Callan by MacCarty-More. The edifice had a good steeple, and was the burial-place of several of the Earls of Desmond, and persons of other distinguished families; but it was long ago destroyed. In 1627, Sir Edward Denny, on condition of his having the appointment and the profits of the town-clerk, granted to the provost and burgesses of Tralee the circuit and liberty of the abbey, and all other privileged places in the borough.—Four castles formerly stood in the town; but, previous to the middle of last century, three of them were completely destroyed. The fourth castle, or that which was permitted to remain, was originally the chief seat of the Earls of Desmond; and, along with a large estate, which formed part of the enormous forfeited patrimony of the Desmonds, it was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Edward Denny, the ancestor of the present proprietor and recent improver of the town. In this castle was perpetrated in 1579 the horrible assassination of Sir Henry Danvers, the Justices Meade and Charters, and all their servants, while asleep in their beds, by Sir John de Desmond, the brother of the Earl,—an event which was provoked merely by Sir Henry Danvers having held session of gaol delivery within Desmond's palatinate, and which paved the way for the speedy destruction of all the power, honours, and opulence of the Desmond family.—The present parish-church is a handsome modern edifice. The two Roman Catholic chapels are spacious. The Independent, the Presbyterian, and the Methodist meeting-houses are small and unimposing. The infantry barrack stands within a large area, and contains accommodation for 600 men. The county court-house is a chaste, classical edifice, erected after designs by Morrison. The county gaol adjoins the court-house, and is remarkable for cleanliness and good order, but does not contain a sufficiency of cells and work-rooms to permit the adoption of modern improvements in prison discipline. The total number of cells is 79; and there are no other rooms containing beds for the use of prisoners. In 1843, the average number of prisoners was 107½; the maximum number was 159; the total number, inclusive of debtors, was 839; the number of recommitments was 77; and the total expenditure during the year was £2,008 4s. 10½d. The old gaol and court-house stood in the square, at the centre of the town. Other existing public buildings than those we have noticed are a nunnery, a market-house, an infirmary, a fever hospital, and a work-house,—the last three of which will be noticed in next section.

Poor-law Union.]—The Tralee Poor-law union ranks as the 102d, and was declared on March 30, 1840. It lies wholly within co. Kerry, and comprehends an area of 350,722 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 84,374. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Tralee, 19,772; Castle-Island, 7,592; Brosna, 2,168; Ballincushane, 4,701; Ballymacelligot, 5,235; Castlemaine, 2,795; Kilgarrylander, 2,808; Kilgobbin, 3,960; Ballinvoher, 2,624; Ballinacourty, 2,184; Minard, 2,735; Castle-Gregory, 4,597; Ballyduff, 2,610; Dingle, 11,617; Kilquane, 1,982; Ventry, 2,596; Dunorlin, 2,975; and Dunquinel, 1,363. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 11 and 34; and 8 of the latter are elected by the division of Tralee, 5 by the division of Dingle, 3 by the division of Castle-Island, 2 by each of the divisions of Ballincushane, Ballymacelligot, and Castle-Gregory, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The division of Tralee lies partly within the barony of Trughenackmy, and partly within that of Clanmaurice; the divisions of Castle-Island, Brosna, Ballincushane, Ballymacelligot, Castlemaine, and Kilgarrylander, lie within the barony of Trughenackmy; and all the other divisions lie within the barony of Corkaguiny. The number of valued tenements within the Clanmaurice district, exclusive of the portion within the borough of Tralee, is 47,—within the Trughenackmy districts, exclusive of the portion within the borough of Tralee, is 6,263,—within the Corkaguiny districts, is 6,227,—within the borough of Tralee, is 1,592,—within the entire union, is 14,129; and of this total, 8,655 are valued under £5,—2,288, under £10,—1,040, under £15,—624, under £20,—411, under £25,—268, under £30,—363, under £40,—163, under £50,—and 317, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £113,588 0s. 8d.; the total number of persons rated is 14,611; and of these, 3,857 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—2,117, not exceeding £2,—1,202, not exceeding £3,—670, not exceeding £4,—and 618, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on July 30, 1840,—to be completed in January 1842,—to cost £8,557 for building and completion, and £1,643 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 10 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £62,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 paupers. The workhouse was not opened for the admission of paupers at the commencement of 1844; and the total expenditure of the union till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,445 3s. 2d. The medical charities within the union are an infirmary and a fever hospital at Tralee, and dispensaries at Annasaul, Castle-Gregory, Castle-Island, and Dingle; and, in 1839-40, they received £418 19s. 7d. from subscription, £1,802 4s. 5d. from public grants, and £18 17s. 7d. from other sources,—in all, £2,240 1s. 7d.,—and admitted 1,034 intern patients, and made 23,630 dispensations of medicine to extern patients. The infirmary at Tralee is a county institution; it contains 36 beds, but is capable of containing 40; it is well managed, but has not sufficient capacity; and, in 1839-40, it received £863 1s. 10d. from public grants, and £9 4s. 7d. from other sources,—expended £184 1s. 10d. in salaries to medical officers, £50 7s. 4½d. for medicines, and £653 0s. 7½d. for contingencies,—and admitted 306 intern patients, and made 2,675 dispensations of medicine to extern patients. The fever hospital at Tralee is also a county institution; it contains 61 beds, and is capable of accommodating 66 patients; and, in 1839-40, it received £550 from public grants, expended in all £491 7s. 1½d., and admitted 728 patients.

Trade.]—Tralee is one of the most thriving towns in the south of Ireland; and has, for a number of years past, experienced great increase of trade, both as a market-town and as a sea-port. "From September 1833, till May 1834," says Mr. Inglis, "4,000 tons of wheat were exported from Tralee, 3,000 tons of oats, and 400 tons of barley. Besides this very considerable quantity, there was bought in the market for home consumption, 1,000 tons of wheat, 70 tons of oats, and 4,000 tons of barley. Since the year 1825, the corn export trade of Tralee has increased about one-third, and the home trade about one-fifth. The hutter export trade of Tralee used to be considerable, but it is greatly on the decline,—scarcely one-twentieth part of the quantity being now exported, comparatively with the year 1825. The retail trade of Tralee is an extensive and improving one; and many of the dealers are wealthy. As good shops are to be found in Tralee as in Cork; and the stock in many of them is very extensive. A ship canal is now constructing from the bay to the town; but its probable utility is doubted by many. It is thought that the strong westerly gales which blow into the bay will accumulate sand in the canal, and obstruct navigation. I was at Tralee on market-day, and I never recollect to have seen a busier place. Independently of an extensive supply of country produce, there was a very abundant exhibition of all kinds of manufactured goods and apparel; and every shop in the town was crowded to the door. The following are the prices of some articles of provision in Tralee. Beef averages 3d. per lb.; mutton, 3½d.; pork, 2d.; a fine turkey in the season, costs 1s. 9d.; a fine goose, 10d.; and fine fowls, 8d. a couple; a good cod-fish can be bought for about 8d.; and oysters are 3d. a-dozen; potatoes, when I was at Tralee in the scarce season, were 3d. per stone." The exports of 1835 amounted in estimated value to £42,315, and consisted of 4 tons of kelp, 8,246½ of corn, 14 of bacon hams and butter, and 19½ of spirits; and the imports of the same year amounted in estimated value to £27,270, and consisted of 1,675 tons of coals, culm, and cinders, 121 of unwrought iron, 52 of cast-iron, 5 of unwrought lead, 78 of corn, 3½ of potatoes, 137½ of herrings and other fish, 507 of salt, 7 of wrought-iron and hardware, and 25½ of glass and earthenware. Previous to the opening of the canal, Blennerville was practically the port of Tralee; and even yet it is the port for some of the larger vessels; while the Samphire-Islands, 5 miles to the west of the town, are the port for vessels of the largest class. The canal does not bring up to the town any vessel of greater burden than 300 tons. Tralee as a port, however, is a dependency of Limerick, so that there are no separate statistics of its customs and shipping. The custom-house of Tralee is at Blennerville. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town consists of 8,000 tons of agricultural produce for exportation, 7,950 of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 600 of agricultural produce for the local use of breweries and distilleries, 600 of excisable articles not received by direct importation, and 37,950 of stones, lime, turf, and other heavy and bulky commodities; and the estimated amount of inland carriage from the town consists of 500 tons of imported goods, 400 of the produce of breweries and distilleries, and 2,200 of coals, manure, and other heavy and bulky articles. Markets are held on every Tuesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on May 3, Aug. 4, Oct. 9, Nov. 7, and Dec. 13. The town has branch-offices of the Bank of Ireland, the National Bank of Ireland, and the Provincial Bank of Ireland. In 1842, the savings' bank of Tralee had 640 depositors. The principal inns are the Hibernian and the Blennerhasset Arms, both in Upper Castle-street. The public conveyances in 1838 were a mail-car to Ballyheigue, a mail-car to Cahirciveen, a mail-coach to Cork, a car to Cork, a mail-car to Dingle, a coach to Killarney, a car to Killarney, a mail-coach to Limerick, and a car to Limerick. The newspapers published in the town at the commencement of 1844, were the Kerry Evening Post, on Wednesday and Saturday; the Kerry Examiner, on Tuesday and Friday; and the Tralee Chronicle, on Saturday.

Municipal Affairs.—A charter of 10 James I. erected Tralee into a borough, is the only one which was ever granted to the place, and purports to have been made at the petition of the inhabitants of the village of Tralee. "The points of the boundary on the west are Ballyville, the Black Rock, and the centre of the village of Blennerville, from whence the boundary on the south proceeds along the river to the bounds of Ballynullen, and from thence on the east by Ratass Garden along by the gual to Clogherishough Rock, and thence on the north by Clonalough, Oakpark, and Balloughna, to Ballyville. These limits have not been adopted by the Boundary bill; those specified in that act do not reach to Blennerville, but in other points are somewhat more extended than the former boundary. The parts newly included are in the parish of Ratass. The entire of the town and suburbs of Tralee are contained in the new boundary." The corporation, according to charter, is styled "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Tralee;" and consists of a provost, 12 free burgesses, and a commonalty. The officers named in the charter are the provost, the burgesses, and 2 sergeants-at-mace; and the other officers are a town-clerk, a marshal-keeper, and a weighmaster. There have been very few freemen; in 1823, four were chosen and sworn; and, in 1831, two were chosen, but not subsequently sworn. The free burgesses hold office for life, or till resignation or removal; and they are directed to be chosen from among "the better and more honest inhabitants of the borough;" yet the qualification of residence has not been regarded in practice. The free burgesses in 1833 were Maurice O'Connor, provost, Rev. Barry Denny, Rev. Robert Day Denny, Rev. Arthur B. Rowan, Pierce Chute, Esq., Caleb Chute, Esq., Rev. Henry Denny, J. J. Hickson, Esq., William Denny, Esq., John Bateman, Esq., John Hurly, Esq., and Arthur Blennerhasset, Esq.; two of these were entirely non-resident, and six others, though resident within 7 miles of the town, were not within the old limits of the borough; all were mutually related, or, at least, connected by family ties; and 3 were registered voters for the borough simply as free burgesses, while 4 were registered as £10 householders. The corporation have not any exclusive or criminal jurisdiction. The provost's court, created by charter, and held every Thursday, is a court of record for all personal actions of debt, covenants, offences, detinues, contracts, and demands whatsoever, not exceeding the sum of 5 marks, happening or arising within the borough or liberties. The Municipal Corporation Commissioners reported, in 1833, that this court was liable to much abuse, and created evils and oppressions as surely as it attempted to remove them, and that the institution of a court of summary jurisdiction in the nature of a court of conscience for demands under 40s., was recommended on a consideration of the average amount of the sums proceeded for before the provost. No minor court is held within the borough. The assizes for the county of Kerry are held at Tralee twice a-year; courts of quarter-sessions, four times a-year; and courts of petty-sessions, twice a-week. In 1833, eight magistrates were resident in the town and its vicinity. The town is the residence of a stipendiary magistrate, and of a constabulary county inspector; and the head-quarters both of the whole constabulary force of the county, and of one of the districts of that force, comprising the 7 stations of Tralee, Abbey-o'-Dorney, Kilgobbin, Ballyheigue, Ardref, Castle-Island, and Blennerville. Excepting a small amount of market dues, the corporation does not possess any property; and probably they never did possess any. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament; and it continues to send one to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 258; of whom 246 were householders, and 12 were burgesses. Constituency, in 1844, 290.

Statistics.—Pop. of the town and borough, in 1831, 9,568; in 1841, 11,363. Houses 1,422.—Area of the parish of Tralee section, 392 acres. Pop., in 1841, 10,500.* Houses 1,324. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 564; in manufactures and

History.—Tralee probably owed its origin as a town to the founding of its Dominican friary. During the palatinate of the Earls of Desmond, it was the seat of their authority, and the chief place of their residence; and ever since their attainder, it has been the county town of Kerry. At the breaking out of the rebellion in 1641, Sir Edward Denny put the town into the best posture of defence which circumstances would admit, enrolling and drilling his tenantry, procuring gunpowder and muskets from Cork, and so far provisioning and garrisoning his castles as to prepare them for a siege; and when called away from Tralee by the president, he constituted Sir Thomas Harris and the provost, joint-governors of the castles, and the town. Only two of the original four castles of the town were then in a serviceable condition; the larger one, which had been the residence of the Earls of Desmond, belonged strictly to Sir Edward Denny; and the smaller one, called the Short-castle, belonged to a Roman Catholic of the name of Rice, and was taken from him by the English population for the military protection of the town, and its inhabitants. A manuscript narrative written at the period, and quoted in Dr. Smith's work on Kerry, explains that a fresh water rivulet ran 20 or 30 paces to the south; that, midway between the great castle and this brook was a wall of stone, which enclosed a court-yard before the castle, not more than 4 feet high; that towards the east end were a large stable and brew-house not above half covered; and that 20 feet farther to the east was a stone-house built during the preceding year. In the greater castle were 170 men, women, and children, in the short-castle were 105, and in both were sufficient provisions for the support of the whole during two years; but, so numerous were families from the vicinity driven headlong to the castles as asylums from pillage and barbarity, that both accommodations and provisions were on far too meagre a scale for resisting a prolonged siege. On Jan. 23, predatory parties of Irish commenced a long course of rapine in the town's outskirts and environs, defying the castles, and occasionally coming within range of their shot; on Feb. 14, a strong and embodied force marched into the town, kept possession during the night, and forced open the gaol and 5 or 6 merchants' houses; immediately afterwards, robbery and threatened assassination drove about 400 of Sir

Edward Denny's country tenants naked and helpless for refuge to the castles; and during about 6 months, the circumjacent country was subjected to a series of scourging indictments from the Irish, and the castles sustained a regular and most obstinate siege, and, after becoming exhausted of both ammunitions and provisions, were obliged to surrender upon quarter, and a suit of clothes to each person, with the delivering up of all their arms. The severities perpetrated by the Irish are somewhat minutely noted in a narrative of the siege on pp. 301—12 of Dr. Smith's Kerry; and the sufferings which they drew upon themselves in return may be inferred from the following incident toward the conclusion of the siege:—"The Irish had made a breach in a brew-house wall that joined the west end of the short-castle, which house the besieged set on fire to prevent a lodgement being made therein; however, by this means, the Irish placed their sow against the walls, and began to work with crows and pick-axes under a constant fire, and had got half-way through. This attempt put the besieged into a great panic, their men being quite tired in attempting to beat them off; for so they signified in a letter to the great castle, conveyed by a line from the top of one to the other. In this distress one Peter Cambridge, a cooper, said, that he would have one bout more with them, and, starting up, he took an iron crow, and began to work on an entire pinnacle of the castle, which he soon loosened and tumbled on the sow, and crushed it, with the assailants therein, to pieces; and immediately throwing over some faggots of dry laths dipt in pitch, the whole was consumed to ashes; the men in the other engine which attacked the great castle, quitted it, but on getting out most of them were shot, and soon after the garrison burnt it likewise. The Irish had about 20 men killed and burnt in these engines. The garrison observed one man half-burnt lying under the rubbish, on whom a cat had fed every day for some time, whose corpse the Irish desired leave to bury; but the same liberty being refused to the besieged, they would not admit the body to be carried off." All Kerry was now in possession of the insurgent Irish, with the exception of Ballybeggan-castle, in the vicinity of Tralee [see BALLYBEGGAN]; and, in May 1643, an English force, consisting of 1,200 foot and 200 horse, was sent by Lord Inchiquin, under Lieut.-Col. Story and Captain Bridges, to overrun Kerry and distress the enemy; but, after a painful and hazardous march, they found Tralee in ashes, and the surrounding country in desolation, and were unable to effect any greater achievement than to make some prisoners, take a large prey of cattle, and offer a safe escort out of Kerry to the English who had continued shut up in Ballybeggan-castle. In 1691, the Jacobites held possession of all Kerry; and on the approach of Brigadier Levison, at the head of 700 cavalry from the north, they rose in a mass to oppose him, and wantonly set fire to Tralee.

TRALEE BAY, a bay in the baronies of Trughenackmy and Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It consists of an outer portion, called par excellence Tralee bay, and an inner portion, usually called Tralee Harbour. The bay, or outer portion, is almost quite identical over its commencing portion with the bay of BALLYHEIGUE: which see. It is screened on the west by the low and flat peninsula which runs northward as a partition between it and Brandon bay [see BRANDON]; on the south, by part of the coast of CORKAGUINEY [which also see]; and, on the west, partly by the low ground near Ardfer, which forms the southern portion of the east shore of Ballyheigue bay, partly by the island of Fenit, and partly by a low and small peninsula which projects southward from the mainland in the vicinity of

Fenit. See FENIT; and see also BARA and HOGS. Its entrance, measured eastward from the head of the Brandon peninsula, or across the south end of the bay of Ballyheigue, has a width of 6 miles; its interior contracts at Fenit Island to a width of 4½ miles; but suddenly expands, south of that island, and sends off eastward the interior bay of Tralee, or Tralee Harbour; and the extent to which it penetrates the land, southward from its entrance to the coast of Corkaguiney, is 4½ miles. Tralee Harbour, or the inner bay, opens at the Samphire Islands with a width of rather more than 1½ mile, contracts to a width of ¾ of a mile, re-expands to a width of 1½ mile, thence gradually contracts to the embouchure of the river Lee, and altogether penetrates the land eastward to the extent of 4½ miles. "By giving the Hog Islands a birth, and sailing east by north," says Dr. Smith, "you come into Tralee bay, little frequented by ships, being dry at low water; however small vessels lie safe aground in it. The channel is towards the middle of the bay, the entrance is between two small islands, called the Samphire Isles to the north, and the mainland to the south. All the maps of Ireland and sea-charts place Fenit Island, which they call Fenor, in the middle of this bay; whereas it lies close to the shore on the north side, between which and the main there is a small creek for ships, which must be entered from the north, but the passage is so narrow and foul, that it cannot be entered without a good pilot."

TRALEE-SPA, a village, and a celebrated medicinal well, in the barony of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. The village is situated on the north shore of Tralee Harbour, 2½ miles south of Ardfer, and 2½ west by north of Tralee; but it has already been noticed under the word SPA: which see. The well is situated in the vicinity of the village, and of a series of villas and lodging-houses, which its celebrity as a resort of invalids occasioned to be erected. The shore adjacent to it is a delightful strand, very commodious for air and exercise; and the appliances for the accommodation of visitors are to the full as good and ample as could fairly be anticipated in so remote a situation. "The soil about it," said Dr. Smith in 1756, "is gravelly, and somewhat inclining to turf on the east side. The well is near a foot deep, and about 3 feet in diameter, flowing out of a small bank of yellow clay mixed with gravel; it has been known above 50 years, and hath been of late years, and continues to be at present, in high repute, by reason of several notable cures effected by it. This water on the spot struck a fine claret colour with galls, which it did also some days after in the town of Tralee. Silver immersed 24 hours in it, both at the well and in Tralee, suffered no alteration in its colour. There is a large quantity of ochry matter round the well, part of which, being dried and calcined, was attracted by the loadstone. A gallon of this water evaporated in an earthen pan over a slow fire, near Tralee, afforded 36 grains of an ochry sediment. In the months of April and June, 1751, this water at the spring was rather cold than sensibly warm; and, by the hydrometer, equal in weight to rain-water. Its taste is rather pleasant than otherwise, and sits well on the stomachs of the drinkers, many of whom take to the number of a dozen half-pint glasses, and yet, except where the stomach and prime viæ were evidently foul, it hath scarce ever been known to vomit. . . . From various experiments, it is evident that this is a light chalybeate water, comparatively pure, containing a latent sulphur, extricated by putrefaction, as appears by the phenomena exhibited, common to most sulphureous waters. The greater quantity of sulphur in this than in most other plain chalybeates, gives it a preference in most cases. It is far less volatile than the sulphur in the German Geronstere waters. Its salt is marine, but hardly considerable enough in quantity to deduce any notable effect from, except, perhaps, that it may give it an attenuating quality, and by this means render it more effectual in removing viscidities. The sensible virtues and effects of this water, according to accounts transmitted to Dublin to Dr. Rutty, by the late Dr. William Collis, who long resided in its neighbourhood, and from other later observations, are as follow:—An earth-worm put into this water soon dies. When it is drunk from 3 pints to 2 quarts it is diuretic, and an enlargement of the dose makes it greatly purgative, and when further increased it also vomits; but its chief operation is by urine. . . . It raises the spirits to a great degree, and gives a voracious appetite and good digestion. It began to be much used about the year 1746, which was owing to a cure it effected on a gentleman of fortune in this county, who the preceding spring had lost his appetite, was restless, and much disordered. The gentleman was advised to drink this water; and after a little preparation and regular drinking, he soon recovered his appetite and rest, and became much healthier than for many years before. This roused the indolent inhabitants of Tralee, and induced several persons long afflicted with hysteric colics, rheumatisms, the scurvy, and several other chronic diseases, to use the water, and most of them received singular benefit thereby."

TRAMEEN. See CASTLETOWN, co. Sligo.

TRAMORE, an open, dangerous, and lugubriously celebrated bay, in the baronies of Middlebird and Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. It has the parish of Drumcamon on the west and the north, and the parishes of Kilmacleigue, Corbally, and Rathmoyle, on the east. It opens between Great Newtown Head on the west, and Brownstown Head on the east,—the latter situated 6 miles west of Hook Head, or the east side of the entrance of Waterford. The summits of Great Newtown Head and Brownstown Head have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 147 and 102 feet; the west and the east shores of the open portion of the bay are bluff, and of similar character to the headlands; and the north shore of the open part of the bay, as well as the whole shore of a lagoon, called the Back Strand, is either flat and beachy, or a series of low accumulations of sheer sand. The open part of the bay has an almost uniform width of nearly 2½ miles, penetrates the land to the extent of 1½ mile, and looks staringly out to the ocean; so that with its bluff headlands and its low interior shore, it is peculiarly liable to be mistaken for the entrance of Waterford Harbour. The lagoon or closed part of the bay called the Back Strand, communicates with the open part only by a very narrow channel in the extreme east, is separated from all the remainder of the head of the open bay by a narrow and prolonged spit of sandhills, alternately receives and empties through the connecting channel all the waters which occupy its area at full tide, and expands with a length of about 2 miles from east to west, and a varying breadth of from 6 furlongs to 1½ mile. The spit of sandhill between the open bay and the Back Strand is about 2 miles in length, is low, hard, and covered with bent, was formed by the tremendous action of the surf in storms from the south, and now serves to prevent any further encroachment of the sea. The Back Strand comprises about 1,000 Irish acres of improvable land; and offers an inviting spoil to those who would arrest it from the dominion of the sea. Some great tumulations of sand at one extremity of the beach compose what is called the Rabbit-burrow, and command a full view of the open bay, now smooth and glassy as a lake under the smiles of summer, and now exhibiting the frightful magnificence of convulsion and thunder under the lash of storms. To enable mariners to distinguish Tramore bay from the entrance of Waterford Harbour, and to avoid the appalling dangers which the former yawns to inflict, two beacons have been erected on Brownstown Head and three on Great Newtown Head; and very considerable aid is afforded also by the light-ship situated to the south of the Saltees Islands. "In the month of January, 1816, the Sea-Horse transport, having on board the second battalion of the 59th foot, was driven by a raging tempest into the inhospitable bay of Tramore. It occurred in the day-time; the shore was crowded with people, who were aware of the inevitable fate of the crew, and had no possible means of relieving them. As the vessel neared the shore, those on board were distinctly seen, awaiting in agony the dreadful catastrophe. Husbands and wives, parents and children, (there were many women and infants in the ship,) were plainly observed in some few instances encouraging each other, but for the most part clinging to the timbers, or folding their arms round those they loved, that they might die together. Their anticipations were but too well founded; the vessel struck and went to pieces, when 292 men and 71 women and children perished in sight of the assembled thousands. All that courage and the most devoted gallantry could do, was attempted to save them; and there are some splendid instances of successful exertion, in which the preservers nearly shared the fate from which they had rescued others. The calamity was almost general; only 30 men were preserved. A few days after the shipwreck, nearly 60 corpses, some of them the remains of women and children, were carried on the country cars from the coast to the burying-ground, at two miles' distance. The wretched survivors accompanied the melancholy processions, and witnessed their companions and relatives deposited in one vast grave." A monument, recording the melancholy catastrophe, was erected in Tramore churchyard by the officers of the regiment.—A tiny but useful harbour occurs at the north-east extremity of the open bay, and is a coast-guard station. See RHINESHARK.

TRAMORE, a small town, and a sea-bathing resort, in the parish of Drummannon, barony of Middlethird, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands at the north-west extremity of the open bay of Tramore, 6 miles south by west of Waterford, $\frac{7}{8}$ west of Dunmore, and 83 south-south-west of Dublin. It is protected from the prevailing winds, commands a magnificent view of the sea, enjoys the advantages of a great extent of hard and level strand, and possesses all the other appliances which can recommend it as a sea-bathing resort. It has good markets, and commodious lodging-houses. Its hotel is a spacious building, elevated considerably above the town, and well adapted for enjoying the invigorating breezes from the sea. Its communications with Waterford are short, frequent, and facile. Its strand is about 3 statute miles in length, and everywhere quite consolidated and smooth. It possesses a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, several schools, a dispensary, and a loan fund. The dispensary is within the Waterford Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 14,034; and, in 1839-40, it expended £130, and administered to 2,044 patients. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £1,446, circulated £6,097 in 1,542 loans, realized a nett profit of £5 10s. 3d., and belonged to 13 proprietors. Regular races are run in summer, and are encouraged by private subscriptions and by the proprietors of the town. The town, as to its alignment, is inconspicuous and straggling; but, on that very account, possesses superior adaptation to its uses as a sea-bathing resort; and it has long been the favourite retreat of the citizens of Waterford and the inhabitants of the circumjacent country. Within a mile of it are Crowbally-cottage, Seaview, Rosemount, Tramondville, Beachmount, Seaville, Rockview, Newtown-hill cottage, Rock-lodge, Newtown-lodge, and Newtown-house,—the last the seat of Edward O'Neill Power, Esq.; and in the vicinity are also Tramore-lodge and Summerville, the residences of respectively William Christmas, Esq. and Earl Fortescue. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Waterford and Lismore takes name from Tramore, and has chapels here and at Corbally. Area of the town, 82 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,224; in 1841, 1,120. Houses 182. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 61; in manufactures and trade, 97; in other pursuits, 77. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 107; on their own manual labour, 88; on means not specified, 30.

TRAWBREAGA. See STRADBREAQA.

TRAWREENAGH, or TRYENACH, a bay or lagoon in the parishes of Templecrone and Lettermacward, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It opens off the north-east corner of Guibarra bay, penetrates the land 3 miles eastward, has an entrance-width of only 3 furlongs, and expands in the interior to a width of $\frac{1}{4}$ mile. Its waters are shallow, and its shores are dreary. A rivulet which flows into it and shares its name, abounds with salmon, and offers its finny treasures to the neighbouring inhabitants; but the latter are so poor that they can neither purchase nets nor construct weirs to take the fish.

TREADINGSTOWN, a parish 4 miles south-south-east of Kilkenny, and partly in the barony of Shillelogher, but chiefly in that of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The Gowran section contains part of the village of BENNET'S BRIDGE: which see. Length, southward, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$. Area of the Shillelogher section, 18 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches,—of which 1 rood, 37 perches are in the river Nore. Area of the Gowran section, 692 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches,—of which 7 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches lie detached a little to the north-east, and 11 acres, 35 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 423; of the Shillelogher section, 19; of the rural districts of the Gowran section, 229. Houses in the whole, 80; in the Shillelogher section, 2; in the rural districts of the Gowran section, 43. The parish lies along the left bank of the river Nore; and contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a National school, and two graveyards.—Treadingstown is a wholly appropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory; and its tithes belong to the economy estate of the cathedral of St. Canice. Tithe composition, jointly with that of Killarney, £100.

TREDAGH. See DROGHEDA.

TRENCH'S MONUMENT, a monumental erection marking out the burial-place of the noble family of Trench, in the parish and barony of Kilconnel, 24 miles north-west by west of the village of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. It crowns the summit of a hill 403 feet above sea-level; and is a conspicuous feature within a considerable periphery of comparatively champion country. In its southern vicinity is Woodlawn, the well-wooded seat of Lord Ashtown; and about 2 miles to the north, spreads the improving estate of the Earl of Clan-carty, around the village of Ballinacward, and distinguished—like the more conspicuous estate of Garbally adjoining Ballinasloe—by the comfortable character of the habitations of the tenantry.

TRESPAN-ROCK, a curious trappean rock in the southern vicinity of Wexford, barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. "On the road leading to the barony of Forth from Wexford," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "there lies a range of rocks, forming in themselves a very picturesque object, extending about a mile in length, and half-a-mile in breadth; that part nearest the town is called Trespan-Rock, a subject worthy the study of the geologist. The formation is the kind of rock commonly called trapstone; the rock is upwards of sixty feet in height from the field in which it stands, and near the centre there is a chasm, or cut, about fifteen feet wide, dividing the rock from the summit to the base, and so perfect is the fracture, that wherever there is a projection on the one side, on the reverse is the cavity corresponding thereto; what is singular, the smaller part or half of the rock has actually sunk upwards of ten feet from the natural level. Besides the singularity in the formation of the rock, it is allied to one of the most memorable periods of Irish history, when this town sustained a siege, and was gallantly defended by Colonel David Symot, against the Parliamentary army, under the command of Oliver Cromwell, in the month of October 1648. Cromwell formed his camp on the rocks alluded to, part of which still retains his name. There is a tradition here, that when Captain Stafford, the governor, treacherously surrendered the castle to him, he marched his troops through the fissure in the rock; but whether that be the fact or not, so late as the summer of 1829, there could be traced the breast-work of a battery for four guns erected by him on the top of Trespan-Rock; this has been effaced by the working of a quarry, from whence most of the stone now used in Wexford is drawn."

TRISTY, a mountain in the parish of Kileummin, between Lough Carrowmore and the head of Tulloghan bay, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught.

TRILLICK, a village in the parish of Kilskeery, barony of Onagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the south-west border of the county, and on the road from Onagh to Enniskillen, 4 miles south of Dro-more, 5 east by south of Lowtherstown, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Fintona. It contains two Methodist meeting-houses; and within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of it are Kilskeery church, a Roman Catholic chapel, five schools, Trillick-cottage, the ruins of Trillick-castle, the lake of Maghera, and the demesne of Relagh. Fairs are held on the 14th of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. A dispensary in the village is within the Lowtherstown Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £150, and made 3,469 dispensations of medicine. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 434. Houses 82. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 16; in manufactures and trade, 50; in other pursuits, 19. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 48; on their own manual labour, 29; on means not specified, 3.

TRIM, a parish in the baronies of Lower Moyfenragh and Upper Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains, on the mutual border of its two sections, the town of TRIM: see next article. Length, north-north-eastward, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Lower Moyfenragh section, 9,391 acres, 23 perches,—of which 109 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches are in the river Boyne. Area of the Upper Navan section, 4,034 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches,—of which 29 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are in the river Boyne, and 28 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches lie detached a little to the east. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 5,926, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,894; in 1841, 6,314. Houses 1,056. Pop. of the rural districts of the Lower Moyfenragh section, in 1831, 2,124; in 1841, 2,933. Houses 506. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Navan section, in 1831, 402; in 1841, 1,112. Houses 197. The river Boyne first flows northward and eastward along a large portion of the western boundary of the Moyfenragh section; next eastward and northward through the interior of that section; and next east-north-eastward and eastward along nearly all the boundary between the two sections, and through the interior of the town. A considerable portion of the surface, particularly in the southern district of the Moyfenragh section, is bog; but the remainder consists, for the most part, of good arable land. The principal county residences are Newhaggard-house, Waterloo-lodge, Boyneview, Lodgepark, Boyne-lodge, Batterstown, Ballyconnell, Foxbrook, Clonea-house, Boyne-park, Roristown, Wellington, and Tullyard. The interior is traversed by the road from Longwood to Navan, and by that from Athboy to Dublin.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £185; glebe, £296 16s. 1d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £430, and are appropriated to the see of Meath, and leased to William Allan, Esq. The rectories of Trim, NEWTOWN-CLOSBUN, and TRUBLY, and the curacies of KILCOOLEY, TULLAGHNOGUE, and SCURLOGSTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Trim. Length, 7 miles breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 6,995. Gross income, £647 19s. 2d.; nett, £593 15s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £89 4s. 7d. The church was built in 1803, at the cost of about £738 9s. 2d.,—of which £181 9s. 2d. was a donation from the then diocesan, £184 12s. 3d. was a loan from the Trustees of Braddock's charity, and the remainder was raised by parochial assessment; and a gallery was added in 1827, by means of a loan of £350 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance, from 200 to 500. The Roman Catholic chapels at Trim and Boardmills have an attendance of respectively about 3,000 and about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 730, and the Roman Catholics to 5,471; the Protestants of the union to 766, and the Roman Catholics to 6,569; and 9 daily schools in the union—8 of which were in the parish—had on their books 380 boys and 239 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £10 a-year from the vicar, and £6 and other advantages from the Incorporated Society; and one with £30 from the Committee of the Roman Catholic chapel. In 1843, a male National school and a female National school in Trim were salaried with respectively £18 and £9 10s. from the Board, and had on their books 191 boys and 189 girls; and there was also a National school in Trim workhouse.

TRIM,

A post and market town, the county town of Meath, formerly a parliamentary borough, and anciently the seat of a bishopric, in the parish of Trim, baronies of Lower Moyfenragh and Upper Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands upon the river Boyne, and on the road from Dublin to Enniskillen by way of Athboy, 5 miles north-north-west of Summerhill, 6 south-east by east of Athboy, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Navan, 9 west-north-west of Dnnshughlin, $10\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Killoec, 19 south-east by east of Oldcastle, $2\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by west of Dublin, and $60\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Enniskillen.

General description.—The river Boyne, while passing through the town, pursues an east-south-easterly direction; but, in the immediate vicinity both above and below the town, it describes noble curvatures, makes majestic sweeps, and contributes a series of prominent and beautiful features to the landscape. The environs of the town, though consisting of a flat country, and destitute of any striking natural features, exhibit such fertility of soil, such goodness of culture, such abundance of embellishment, and such comparative profusion of villas and mansions, as to be generally pleasing, and, in some places, softly picturesque. The exterior of the town, as seen from various vantage-grounds in the vicinity, presents an arresting appearance, and exhibits indications of antiquity, great quondam importance, and much existing architectural character. The interior is very irregular, both in the alignment of its streets and the plan of its buildings; yet it contains many good houses, and makes a decidedly favourable impression. The principal streets in the southern section of the town, are a street 240 yards in length, extending southward from the bridge to the southern vicinity of the castle, but edified only on the west side over the southern half of its extent; a somewhat spacious and nearly straight, yet not uniform street, 450 yards in length, parallel to the former at the distance of about 150 yards to the west, and extending southward from the Boyne at the Watergate to the vicinity of the Wellington pillar; and a spacious and quite straight street, 180 yards in length, branching off from the first at a point about 60 yards from the bridge, and extending south-westward to the second. The principal streets in the northern section of the town are a street of 270 yards in length, extending from the bridge toward the eastern environs, and describing nearly a demisemicircle in its alignment; a very partially edified street of 300 yards in length, extending eastward from the termination of the former; a partially edified, very irregular, and aggregately narrow street, of 360 yards in length, extending north-westward from the termination of the first; and a very narrow, very sinuous, and very diversified street, 550 yards in length, branching off westward from near the commencement of the first, yet maintaining a prevalent direction to the north, and winged with a suburb of lanes upon the Boyne. Very considerable remains exist of fortifications which formerly surrounded the town; and these, though excluding some suburbs, constitute, in a great measure, the town's existing boundaries.

The Castle.—Trim-castle, though partially dilapidated and destroyed, is still very extensive; and in consequence of the elevation of its site, and the grandeur of its outline, it forms a very imposing object. Sir R. C. Hoare declares it to be the only edifice in Ireland deserving the name of castle. Its remains consist of the keep, four lofty square towers, and various other towers and outworks; and they show it to have been erected in the mixed Anglo-Norman style of military architecture, or that style which may be said to have characterized the best military edifices of the first half of the 13th century. The area of its site is still enclosed by ruined towers and embattled walls, and comprises about four acres. The castle was originally erected by Hugh de Lacy, to secure his large possessions in Meath,—or, according to Camden, it was erected by William Peppard or Pipard, previous to the grant of Meath to De Lacy; it was evidently constructed or remodelled to be the chief military strength of a large extent of territory; and it, in consequence, became the scene of many great military events, and even the most important stronghold of the English Pale. Hugh de Lacy, on completing the building, departed for England, and left the fortress under the command of his confidential friend, Hugh Tyrrel; and Raymond Le Gross was at that time in Wexford, celebrating his nuptials with the sister of Earl Strongbow. Roderic O'Connor, king of Connaught, observing the favourableness of the juncture for a rush against the Anglo-Norman power, assembled a large confederated army, suddenly entered the territory of Meath, spread desolation in the track of his march, and menaced the castle of Trim with destruction. Tyrrel, advised of O'Connor's approach, despatched messengers to Raymond for assistance, and did not doubt that he would suspend his festivities to run to the succour of the palatinate; yet he saw that O'Connor would arrive with an overwhelming force before Raymond could reach Meath, and, thinking himself too weak to offer an effective resistance, he burnt and otherwise destroyed the fortifications, and abandoned the mere shells of them as a prey to the invader. The Irish monarch, satisfied with the demolition of so great a strength, commenced a retrograde march toward home; but he was pursued by Raymond, and received some chastisement in the loss of a portion of the rear of his army. Hugh Tyrrel now returned to the ruined castle, re-edified it in preparation for the return of Hugh de Lacy from England, and is supposed to have made it much stronger than at its original construction. During the ferocious contests between the younger Hugh de Lacy, and William Earl of Pembroke, and while Trim was regularly and strenuously besieged by the latter, the castle was defended with great gallantry, and not a little difficulty, and eventually resisted all the attacks for its capture. The existing pile is generally believed to have been built subsequently to this event, or about the year 1220, by the younger Hugh de Lacy; nor is it assigned to this period on the evidence of record only, but on that also of its own architectural character. "When private dissensions were superseded by public exigency, the castle of Trim proved of great utility to the general interests of the narrowed 'pale,'" to which the influence of the English was for many ages confined. In 1399, Richard II., when in Ireland, and immediately after receiving intelligence of the successful progress in England of his rival and eventual successor, the Duke of Lancaster, sent as prisoners to the castle of Trim two illustrious young men who had attended him in his Irish expedition,—a son of the Duke of Gloucester, and Henry, the son and heir of the Duke of Lancaster, and afterwards King Henry V. In 1422, Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March and Ulster, then Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, died in the castle of Trim. This great structure was also the residence, for some time, of Richard Duke of York, father of Edward IV.; it was the meeting-place of several parliaments, and, during the intestine wars of the 17th century, it was repeatedly the scene of smart and important action. The castle was dismantled soon after the year 1650; and it has ever since remained in a state of progressive decay.

Monastic Buildings.—The remains of the once magnificent abbey of St. Mary stand on the left side of the river, and eastern verge of the town, about 100 yards from the river, and 250 from the castle. Their principal feature is a part of the tower of the church, now called the Yellow Tower, the remainder of which is traditionally said to have been destroyed during the wars of the 17th century. This tower is the most lofty remnant of the Anglo-Norman architecture now existing in Ireland, and seems to have originally been a massive structure. The walls which surrounded the buildings of the abbey can still be traced; and immediately beyond are extensive remains of the fortifications which formerly surrounded the town. The original church of Trim, whose site afterwards came to be occupied by the abbey, is usually alleged to have been built by either St. Patrick or one of his nephews, and to have served both as the church of a monastery, and as the cathedral of a diocese. The real abbey appears to have been founded by some of the De Lacy family; yet it no doubt was preceded by some ecclesiastical structure of very much higher antiquity. "The buildings," says Mr. Brewer, "suffered severely in the various assaults to which the town was exposed, and were re-edified by the De Lacy family, towards the close of the thirteenth century, but were again destroyed by fire in 1308. On the dissolution of religious houses, the principal estates of this abbey, which were very extensive, were granted to Sir Anthony St. Leger, Knight. Among its possessions were eighty acres of land, called Porchfield, situated near the abbey, which were given to this society by Richard Duke of York. The abbot and monks appear to have been much attached to the Princes of the house of York, as they were indeed nearly all classes in this part of Ireland. In 1467, the abbot Christopher went to England on an embassy to King Edward IV.; and a future abbot was an active supporter of the impostor Lambert Simnel. Among the reliques and curiosities possessed by this abbey, was an image of the Virgin Mary, celebrated throughout the kingdom for the performance of miracles. In the year 1538, this far-famed image was publicly burnt by the agents of the Reformation."—A Franciscan friary formerly stood at Trim, on the ground which was afterwards occupied by the court-house; it is believed to have been founded, in the 13th century, by the Plunkett family; it was reformed, before the year 1325, by the Observantines; and, in 1390, in consequence of a flood of the Boyne, the buildings of the friary were undermined, and a large portion of them fell to the ground.—A Dominican friary formerly stood near the gate on the outlet toward Athboy; it was founded, in 1263, by Sir Geoffrey de Geneville, lord of Meath, who became one of its friars, and died within its walls; it obtained great celebrity, and was the meeting-place of several parliaments of the nation, and several general chapters of the Dominican order; and, in 1368, it was destroyed by fire.—A friary or hospital of Cross-bearers formerly stood in Trim; it is supposed to have been founded by one of the bishops of Meath, and, at all events, received valuable donations and endowments from these prelates; its buildings are said to have been very magnificent, but, excepting a few amorphous vestiges, have been all swept away; and its great hall is supposed to have been the meeting-place of several of the parliaments which were held in Trim. A priory of important pretensions, and claiming to have been for some time the seat of the diocese of Meath, stood at the village of Newtown, in the vicinity of Trim. See NEWTOWN-TRIM.

Other Public Buildings.—The church, situated near the northern extremity of the northern section of the town, is a respectable structure; is connected with a tower of great antiquity; and shares with the church of Navan the honour of being the modern cathedral of the diocese of Meath. See ARDBRACCAN. The Roman Catholic chapel is a spacious structure; and is situated in the vicinity of the Wellington Pillar, and near the southern extremity of the southern section of the town. The Wellington Pillar crowns a rising ground; consists of a handsome Corinthian column, surmounted by a statue of the Duke; and was erected by subscription, in commemoration of the military achievements of the illustrious native of Meath,—and originally a near neighbour of the townspeople of Trim. See DANGAN.

The county court-house is a modern structure. The new gaol, situated 200 yards south of the Castle, and 230 east of the Wellington Pillar, is a spacious series of buildings, with a circular outline, strongly arrests attention by both its situation and its plan, and presents a striking contrast to the large feudal castle, with which it is grouped in nearly all views of the town from the north, the east, and the south. "The general appearance of the prison," says the official report of 1843, "was unexceptionably clean; and presented everywhere an appearance of the greatest order and regularity. This prison presents more facilities, and is altogether better calculated for an efficient system of penal discipline, than any other county gaol I have this year inspected. Some of the cells are sufficiently commodious for working in; but there is one great defect, in the absence of a proper method of warming the different cells and corridors. This was a great oversight in the design and erection of this prison, especially as dampness prevails in it, probably, it is said, from the nature of the stone of which it is built. There are also some defects observable in point of ventilation and sewerage; but in the latter case these are in a great measure counteracted by the additional attention devoted by the gaol officers to that subject. The accommodation available in this prison is very extensive, and adequate to the reception of a much larger number of prisoners than it usually holds in confinement." The prison contains 112 cells, and 29 other sleeping-rooms, each with one bed. In 1843, the average number of prisoners was 81; the highest number, 104; the total number, inclusive of debtors, 391; the number of recomittals, 18; and the total expenditure, £1,551 9s. 9d. The only other noticeable public buildings are an infantry barrack, a bridge, a fever hospital, a charter school, and a Poor-law workhouse.

Poor-law Union.—The Trim Poor-law union ranks as the 42d, and was declared on May 22, 1839. With the exception of one townland in co. Kildare, it lies wholly in co. Meath; and it comprehends an area of 113,529 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 31,758. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are, Gallow, 1,464; Gaultrim, 1,533; Killecooley, 1,929; Trim, 5,926; Laracor, 2,395; Rathmolyon, 2,604; Rathcor, 2,890; Killaconnigan, 2,328; Kildalkey, 2,931; Athboy, 5,237; and Killyon, 2,991;—the last of which includes the townland belonging to co. Kildare. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 7 and 21; and of the latter, 3 are elected by each of the divisions of Trim and Athboy, 2 by each of the divisions of Laracor, Rathmolyon, Rathcor, Killaconnigan, Kildalkey, and Killyon, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The division of Killecooley lies in the barony of Upper Navan; the division of Trim lies partly in Upper Navan and partly in Lower Moyferagh; the divisions of Laracor, Rathmolyon, and Rathcor, lie in the barony of Lower Moyferagh; the divisions of Killaconnigan, Kildalkey, and Athboy, lie in Lune; the division of Gallow lies in Upper Deece; the division of Gaultrim lies in Lower Deece; and the division of Killyon lies partly in Upper Moyferagh and partly in Carbery. The number of valued tenements in the Carbery district is 14,—in the Lower Deece district, 209,—in the Upper Deece district, 229,—in the Lune districts, 1,925,—in the Lower Moyferagh districts, 1,991,—in the Upper Moyferagh district, 443,—in the Upper Navan districts, 730,—in the entire union, 5,541; and of this total, 3,543 are valued under £5,—587, under £10,—311, under £15,—184, under £20,—144, under £25,—92, under £30,—131, under £40,—90, under £50,—and 450, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £105,353 6s. 10d.; the total number of persons rated is 5,345; and of these, 1,657 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,048, not exceeding £2,—462, not exceeding £3,—241, not exceeding £4,—and 163, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Dec. 14, 1839,—to be completed in March 1841,—to cost £5,750 for building and completion, and £1,040 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches, obtained for £450 of purchase-money and £60 of compensation to occupying tenant, and to contain accommodation for 500 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Oct. 11, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £3,175 18s. 8½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £369 3s. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 181. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital at Trim, and dispensaries at Trim, Augher, Athboy, Ballyvor, Enfield, and Rathmolyon; and, in 1839-40, they received £585 17s. 6d. from subscription, £873 4s. 6d. from public grants, and £10 from other sources, expended £358 in salaries to medical officers, £174 4s. 4d. for medicines, and £63 2s. 1d. for contingencies, and the dispensaries administered to 9,344 extern patients. The fever hospital at Trim was erected in 1840, by means of two sums of respectively £304 14s. from subscription and £609 8s. from public grants; and it possesses sufficient capacity for the wants of the whole union at any ordinary period. The Trim dispensary serves for a district of 30,535 acres, with a pop. of 7,511; and, in 1839-40, it expended £104 1s. 9d. and administered to 3,275 patients.

Trade.—Trim, though the county town of Meath, and a place of such ancient, great, and prolonged consequence, is neither a seat of much trade nor a scene of any considerable thoroughfare; and it can boast of no source of prosperity more productive than the sale at its weekly markets of a large proportion of the agricultural produce of the surrounding country. "For several years," says an official report in 1833, "the town has been declining, and it now presents a very impoverished appearance. It has no extensive trade or manufacture. The markets have improved within the last few years,—a circumstance which the inhabitants ascribe to the discontinuance of the collection of tolls and customs." "Corn," says another official report in 1838, "is bought in Trim for two mill-owners in the town, and two near it; also by dealers who live in various directions, and whose transactions cannot therefore be ascertained, but the greater part of the corn collected by them is re-sold in Navan. The price of wheat in Trim is usually 2s. a barrel under Navan, and oats about 1s.; the differences between the prices of Trim and Dublin are something more. A difference of 2s. a barrel in wheat is equal to 16s. a ton; and 1s. a barrel in oats is equal to 11s. 5d. a ton. The corn of this part of Meath is not of superior quality, which is by some persons ascribed to the soil, and by others to bad husbandry. The trade of Trim and its neighbourhood is principally with Dublin and Navan. Loading is conveyed there for 13s. 4d. per ton. Coal is obtained from Navan; but turf fuel is almost generally used. Twenty-two carts on an average, each conveying about a ton weight, pass through Trim daily, plying between Dublin, Trin, Athboy, Castlepollard, Granard, &c., on the western road; and Oldecastle, Killysandra, &c., on the northern road, leading to the district west of the town of Cavan." The chief appliances of manufacture within the town are a flour-mill, a brewery, and a tannery. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on March 27, May 8, June on a day not uniform, Oct. 1, and Nov. 16. The Boyne navigation, which extends as yet only to Navan, was authorized by Act of parliament to be extended to Trim; and 1½ mile of the extension hither was actually excavated, but the work was abandoned from want of sufficient funds. An opinion prevails that the extension to Trim might be completed for £6,000, and that it would be of essential benefit to this town's markets. The public conveyances in 1838 were an omnibus and a car to Dublin, a mail-car to Killeck, a mail-car in transit between Dublin and Athboy, and a coach in transit between Dublin and Killeshandra.

Municipal Affairs.—Trim was erected into a borough by Walter De Lacy, Lord of Meath, in the reign of Richard II.; it has charters or kindred documents of 1 Edward III., 17 Richard II., 10 Henry VII., 6 Henry IV., another year of Henry IV., some year of Henry VI., 13 Elizabeth, and 5 James I.; and it was included in the 'New Rules' of 25 Charles II. On the death of Walter De Lacy, Lord of Meath, without issue, the lordship or liberty of Trim, as a moiety of the lordship of Meath, passed to Geoffrey De Geneville, as the husband of De Lacy's elder sister; this moiety, very early in the 14th century, devolved upon Lord Roger De Mortimer, in right of his wife; and, as part of the lordship of Meath, it afterwards, in common with the earldom of March, became vested in the Crown. The borough, as constituted by charter, comprehended the whole of the actual town, and a considerable extent of surrounding country; yet the limits—though supposed to regulate the magisterial authority of the chief magistrate of the corporation, and also the jurisdiction of a court which continued to exist in 1833—are not marked by defined boundaries, and have, for a long time past, been very imperfectly known. The corporation, according to charter, is entitled, 'The Portreeve, Burgesses, and Freemen of Trim'; and consists of one portreeve and an unlimited number of burgesses and freemen. "Trim," says the summary statement of the Municipal Corporations Commissioner in 1833, "attracted the attention of the English on their arrival on the island; and being made the residence and seat of government of De Lacy, became, in the language of the charter of Richard II., (1393,) the place where all the fideles of the county of Meath congregated, and valuable privileges were accordingly granted by several charters to its inhabitants. It returned members to parliament so early as the second year of Queen Elizabeth, a circumstance which proves its importance at that date. It continued to return two members to the Irish parliament up to the year 1800. It was then deprived of the elective franchise by the Act of Union, and the sum of £15,000 was paid as compensation for that loss to the Marquis Wellesley, under the 40 Geo. III., c. 34. The borough court having fallen into disuse, the corporation may be said to have ceased to exercise any municipal functions; and the only way in which the public are affected by it, is that it supplies a resident local magistrate in the person of the portreeve. This, however, is not of much consequence, as there is a resident stipendiary magistrate in the town, and there are several county justices in its neighbourhood. This corporation is peculiar in being, as at present constituted, perfectly democratic, and consisting of a far greater number of persons than any corporation in the district I visited; it is, however, in reference to the population at large, exclusive and intolerant, and therefore obnoxious to them. From the present disposition of the corporate lands, an inconsiderable benefit results to about 60 individuals; by the application of their produce to public purposes, substantial advantages might be conferred upon the entire district." The assizes for the county of Meath are held in Trim twice a-year; courts of quarter-sessions, twice a-year; and courts of petty-sessions, on every alternate Saturday. Trim is the head-quarters of the constabulary force of the county, and also of one of the 8 districts through which that force is distributed. The streets of the town are kept in repair as part of the roads of the county.

Statistics.—Pop. of Trim, in 1831, 3,282; in 1841, 2,269. Houses 353. Area of the Upper Navan section, 59 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,753; in 1841, 1,079. Houses 190. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 62; in manufactures and trade, 95; in other pursuits, 44. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 93; on their own manual labour, 92; on means not specified, 1. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 211; who could read but not write, 78; who could neither read nor write, 161. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 166; who could read but not write, 123; who could neither read nor write, 232. Area of the Lower Moyfenagh section, 91 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,529; in 1841, 1,190. Houses 163. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 42; in manufactures and trade, 119; in other pursuits, 49. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 125; on their own manual labour, 66; on means not specified, 9. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 318; who could read but not write, 80; who could neither read nor write, 167. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 204; who could read but not write, 102; who could neither read nor write, 203.

History.—"The ancient name of this place," says a complete and luminous digest of the History of Trim in the Irish Penny Magazine, "was Atha-Trim, the Pass of Trim. In 432, an abbey was founded here, which was subsequently one of the 12 rural deaneries within the diocese of Meath. In 783, Trim was destroyed by fire. In 1108, Connor O'Melaghlin, assisted by the forces of Ulster, burnt the town of Trim, when above 200 persons then in the church perished in the flames. In 1127, Connor, the son of Ferral O'Loughlin, inflicted a similar visitation on this place. In 1143, Trim was again consumed by fire. In 1155, the town and abbey suffered from a conflagration. In 1173, Hugh De Lacy built a strong castle, environed with a large and deep ditch, which being furnished and completely garnished, he departed for England, leaving the same in the custody of Hugh Tyrrel. * * The castle so constructed was subsequently the residence of King John while in Ireland, from which circumstance one of its towers is still popularly called King John's, and a sealing, supposed to have belonged to that prince, was found in the ruins some time since. In 1195, Pope Celestine III. confirmed the church of St. Bridget of Trim to the nunnery of Clonard. In 1203, Trim was again destroyed by fire. In 1212, about this time the Grey friary was founded here. In 1258, an arrangement was entered into in this year as to the advowson of the church of Trim, between the bishop of Meath and Geoffrey De Geneville, who, by marrying the sister and co-heiress of Walter De Lacy, had become lord of half of Meath, the moiety that accrued to him being distinguished as the lordship or liberty of Trim, from this place the Caput Baronie and the seal of the castle, where the courts were held. The other moiety of Meath passed with the second sister to John De Verdon, Baron of Dundalk. In 1263, the said Geoffrey De Geneville founded the Dominican friary here; others attribute its foundation to the Husseys, Barons of Gaultrim. In 1285, a general chapter of the order was held in the last-mentioned establishment. Various records occur subsequent to this date as to the extent of the lordship or liberty, and also of the manor of Trim. They are, however, of too local interest to be here detailed. In 1290, the abbey was rebuilt by the De Lacy family, who filled it with canons regular. In 1291, a remarkable convention was held in the Dominican friary here, for the purpose of promoting and strengthening the powers of the church. In 1308, Geoffrey De Geneville became a friar in the Dominican monastery here, resigning the lordship of Trim to the then rightful heir, Lord Roger De Mortimer. This little town was, however, at this period more particularly distinguished in consequence of the court held there by Richard, Earl of Ulster, the most powerful of the Irish nobility, and whose influence had frequently been treated by the king as superior to that of the viceroy. He here received his followers with a parade and ostentation offensive and alarming. He feasted his attendants with all the splendour of a sovereign, and actually affected to confer the honour of knighthood; it was but the natural result of appointing a weak-minded though a gallant and courageous vice-regent, to control one who reigned paramount in the hearts and wishes of the Irish people. Enough to add, the unfortunate Gaveston was in this instance Lord-lieutenant. The Earl even threatened him with open hostilities; but before their jealousies could produce any violent effect, the favourite was suddenly recalled, and the kingdom resigned to its wonted distractions. In 1314, Lord Geoffrey De Geneville died, and was interred in the Dominican friary, as was his son, in 10 years afterwards. In 1330, the Boyne overflowing its banks in this year, the Grey friary was undermined, and a considerable part of it fell; some years after which, Roger De Mortimer became legally seized of the castle of Trim, with sundry liberties, privileges, and royalties, which were confirmed to him in 1350. In 1350, the bishop of Meath instituted proceedings for the advowson to the church of Trim, but was defeated. Soon afterwards, a very curious record establishes that, from the time of the arrival of the English, the king had a right of passage on the Boyne, for floats and timber-boats, extending from the town of Drogheda to the bridge of Trim, and of a prescribed breadth from the centre of the channel. In 1359, John De Watenhall, chancellor of the liberty of Trim, was summoned to attend a great council here. In 1368, the abbey and Dominican friary were destroyed by fire. In 1375, the prior of St. Peter's, being a peer of parliament, was in this year summoned to a meeting of that body in Dublin. In 1390, on the news of the Duke of Lancaster's progress in England, King Richard, who was then in this country, imprisoned his and the Duke of Gloucester's sons in the castle of Trim. The historian cannot forget that the son of Lancaster alluded to was no less dignified an individual than the royal hero of Agincourt! But we must not let that name pass by without deducing from it an additional evidence of the obscurity to which the history of our native land is consigned. How few are aware that our forefathers of the Pale career over the fertile plains of Leinster. How few are they that look upon the venerable remains of Trim, and catch the classic association that within its walls that prince was imprisoned before his accession to the British throne:—

'Have seen young Harry with his beaver on;
His cuises on his thighs—gallantly armed;

'What! rate—rebuke—and roughly send to prison
The immediate heir of England! Was this easy?
May this be washed in Leth— and forgotten'

• • • • But, to resume.—In 1400, Alexander Petit, bishop of Meath, was interred in the abbey of Trim. In 1407, a parliament was held here; as also in 1416. In 1418, Edmund, Earl of March, granted a rectory and its appurtenances to the abbey of Trim; and, in the same year, Matthew Hussey, Baron of Gaultrim, died and was buried in the Dominican friary here. In 1422, Lord Mortimer died of the plague in the castle of Trim. In 1446, a parliament was held here, when, amongst other statutes of more national importance, it was enacted that the English should not wear their beards after the Irish fashion, nor the Irish use shirts coloured with saffron! In 1447, the plague raged violently here, and carried off many persons. In 1459, a mint was, by the king's command, set up in the castle here, when silver and brass money, of which several specimens have been found, and are in the cabinets of the curious, were coined. In 1460, on the accession of Edward IV., the lordship of Trim vested in him by inheritance from De Mortimer; and in the same year, he constituted Gorman Lynch, of London, goldsmith, warden, and master-worker of the coin within the castles of Dublin and Trim, &c., &c., for life. In 1467, the grants to the abbot of Trim were not only excepted from the statute of reassumptions passed in this year, but still further confirmed, and in the same year the mint was again opened here. In 1447, Lord Grey, then Lord-deputy of Ireland, was confirmed in his offices of seneschal and treasurer of Meath, and empowered to coin silver at this castle. In 1478, an act of parliament was passed empowering the Abbot of Trim to reassume all lands alienated from this abbey. In 1484, a parliament was held here, as also in 1485, 1487, and 1491. In 1488, the Abbot of Trim received the royal pardon for having been concerned in the rebellion raised on behalf of Lambert Simnel, and at the same time Sir Richard Edgecumbe took the homage of various gentry at Trim. In 1495, the Lordship of Trim, with all its liberties, was annexed to the crown by act of parliament. In 1527, the Abbot was licensed to purchase lands for the use of his convent to the annual value of £20. In 1535, — Hussey, the last prior of the House of Crossbearers here, voluntarily departed from his house, and the crown thus became possessed of its possessions, prior to the general suppression, a circumstance essentially affecting the law as to its tithes, &c. In 1541, the possession of the abbey of Trim in rectories, granges, houses, lands, glebes, gardens, weirs, &c., were ascertained on inquisition, as also their annual values, and the same were thereupon granted to the respective patentees of the Crown.—The Grey friary was also found possessed of various mills, water-courses, weirs, houses, gardens, lands, &c., which were similarly disposed of, as were the possessions of the still more magnificent priory of Crossbearers. In 1506, Sir Henry Sidney had the royal orders to inquire whether a confirmation of the charter of Trim would be prejudicial to the Crown, and if not so, to grant it. In 1568, Luke Dillon, the Irish Attorney-general, obtained a grant in reversion to him and his heirs male, of certain possessions of the abbey then leased for years to Sir George Stanley. In 1572, a lease for years of the lordship of Trim was granted to Sir George Stanley. In 1603, Robert Draper, rector of Trim, was promoted to the see of Kilmore. About the same time, Sir Roger Jones was seized of the two water-mills, a tuck-mill, the Dominican friary, the abbey of the Blessed Virgin, a castle, and divers houses here. In 1605, Sir James Hamilton of Killelagh had a grant of the manor of Trim in fee-farm. In 1642, in the May of this year, Trim was taken by Sir Charles Coote. The Irish, however, surprised it at break of the following day, when Coote issuing from the town, on the sentinel's alarm, met and routed the Irish, but was himself killed at the close of the action. In 1662, Richard Plunket, a Franciscan friar of this town, compiled a Latin and Irish vocabulary which he finished in this year. It is yet extant in manuscript, and Mr. Lhuyd made considerable use of it in his Archæologia. In 1691, 'the gentlemen of the county of Meath (says Story), meeting at Trim, agreed to scour the red bog, high that place, where the rapparees haunted, and had done much mischief during the last winter. The issue was that 35 were killed, and 6 more fairly hanged.' In 1734, Richard Colley, the first of his family who assumed the name of Wellesley, a cognomen so very ancient and interesting in Irish history, represented this borough in the Irish parliament until elevated to the title of Morington in 1746."

TRIMLESTOWN, a quondam parochial chapelry in the parish of Trim, barony of Upper Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Trimlestown-house, the old dilapidated seat of Lord Trimlestown, is situated on the banks of the Boyne, near the road to Athboy, and about 2 miles west-north-west of the town of Trim. The mansion is a spacious structure, with ornamental towers, an embattled parapet, and other features of the style of domestic architecture which prevailed in the second half of the 16th century. A small chapel adjoins the mansion, and forms the cemetery of its noble proprietors. The demesne is truly beautiful; and the consignment of it to neglect and disorder excites like the surprise and the regret of a stranger. In 1461, Sir Robert Barnewall, a descendant of the Barnewalls of Creakstown-castle in the county of Meath, was created Baron Trimlestown in the peerage of Ireland. His son Christopher, the second Baron, was connected with the treason of Lambert Simnel, but obtained a pardon for his offence. Matthias, the eighth Baron, was excepted from pardon and deprived of his estates by Cromwell; but he reacquired a considerable portion of his property after the Restoration. The son and two grandsons of Matthias, who figured in courtesy as the ninth, the tenth, and the eleventh Barons, were staunch Jacobites, and were not recognised by the law as peers. In 1795, Thomas, by courtesy the thirteenth Baron, was legally restored to the possession of his dignity. The present Lord Trimlestown was born in 1796, and succeeded to the title in 1839.

TRINITY, a benefice or parochial union in the county of Waterford, Munster. Its seat is in the city of WATERFORD. See WATERFORD (COUNTY OF THE CITY OF). The benefice comprises the curacies of Trinity, St. Michael's, and St. Olaves, and the rectories of Kilmarragh, Kilburne, and Killoteran. The curacies are urban parishes within the city of Waterford; and the rectories are rural parishes in the vicinity of the city. See KILCARRAGH, KILBURN, and KILLOTERAN. Length of the union, 4 miles; breadth, 1½. Pop., in 1831, 17,240. Gross income, £745 0s. 4d.; nett, £637 10s. 4d. Patron, the Crown. The curacies of Trinity, St. Michael's, and St. Olaves, the rectory of Kilmarragh, and part of the sinecure rectories of Kilburne, Kilmeaden, and Riesk, form the corps of the deanery of Waterford. Gross income arising from sinecure rectories, chapter dividends, and lands demised as dean, £612 10s. 3½d.; nett, £581 17s. 9½d. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Dunhill, in the dio. of Lismore. The places of worship within the curacies will be noticed in the article on the urban parishes of Waterford. The reports of the Commissioners of Public Instruction exhibit the benefice of Trinity so far differently from the Report on Ecclesiastical Revenues, as to exclude part of the parish of Kilburne, and return the total population of the union in 1831 at 16,830,—consisting of 2,007 Churchmen, 19 Presbyterians, 235 other Protestant dissenters, and 14,569 Roman Catholics. In 1834, 18 daily schools in the union had on their books 947 boys and 210 girls.

TRINITY-ISLAND, an islet in Lough Key, barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connanght. An abbey is alleged by Archdall to have stood on this islet as early as the year 700; but the only abbey of the place which is known to authentic history was a Premonstratensian one, founded in 1215, by Clarus MacMoylin O'Moilechony, archdeacon of Elphin. "In 1231, Dionysius O'Morhda, who had retired from the bishopric of Elphin, died here. In 1284, the Abbot Gillyfa M'Eulyahana O'Connor was chosen Bishop of Elphin, and King Edward I. first granted his approbation in October, 1285. In 1307, the Abbot Cabel or Charles was elected bishop of Elphin; he kept possession of that see during the space of three years and a half; but, through the opposition of William Birmingham, the Archbishop of Tuam, he was at length compelled to return to this abbey. In 1406, the abbey was consumed by an accidental fire occasioned by the negligence of a woman. Inquisitions were taken on the 27th, 32d, and 36th Elizabeth, on the possessions of the abbey, which do not appear to have been considerable."

TRIOGE (THE), a rivulet of Queen's county, Leinster. It rises on the north side of Cullenagh mountain, and pursues a northerly course of about 12 miles, through the parishes of Ballyroun, Kilcolemanbane, Borris, and Arden, to the river Barrow, on the boundary with King's county, at a point about 2 miles north-east of Mountmellick. In its progress, it washes the town of Maryborough.

TRISTERNAGH, a townland in the parish of Kilbixy, barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is situated on the south-west bank of Lough Iron, 2½ miles east-north-east of Ballinacarrigy. Within this townland, and on the banks of the lake, formerly stood the abbey of Tristernagh, founded, either in the reign of Henry II. or almost immediately afterwards, by Geoffrey De Constance (r Constantia). The church was a beautiful and magnificent edifice, in the form of a cross, considerable in extent, and built of a blackish coloured stone; and its steeple consisted of a square tower, surmounted by an octagon, and, in 1780, after having suffered much dilapidation, continued to be 74 feet in height. In 1783, this interesting pile was utterly demolished by its then proprietor Sir Pigott William Piers; and its site was afterwards occupied by a cow-house and a stable. The "tasteless and unfeeling demolisher of the edifice," says Mr. Brewer, "was earnestly solicited by his neighbours to abstain from so wanton an outrage. We are assured that Lord Sunderlin offered to purchase the ruins at a high price, solely with a view to their preservation. The name of Tristernagh should never be mentioned without an expression of contempt (as regards this transaction), towards that of Sir Pigott William Piers." Adjacent to the site of the extinct abbey is the neglected and now dilapidated mansion of Tristernagh-house, the residence for several ages of the baronet family of Piers. "This family"—we again quote from Brewer—"entered Ireland in the person of Captain William Piers, an officer in Queen

Elizabeth's army; who is noted in history as the officer to whom the famous Shane O'Neil was betrayed, and delivered up, by his Scotch auxiliary forces. It will be recollected that O'Neil was decapitated; and Piers sent the head of the chieftain to London, for which ungracious, but important, service, he was rewarded by Elizabeth with large grants of land, including the estate of Tristernagh, which still remain the property of his descendants. Sir Henry Piers, son of Captain William Piers, and grandfather of the historian of Westmeath, was a man of letters, and author of a book of travels. James, son of Sir Henry, embraced the Roman Catholic religion, and became D.D. in that church. He was royal professor of the Aquinatic college at Bordeaux, and published several literary works. Sir Henry Piers, Bart., the member of this family in which the topographer is most interested, wrote, in 1682-83, a 'Chorographical Description of the County of Westmeath,' which is printed in the first volume of the Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicis. Near the entrance to the demesne of Tristernagh stands the ruin of the chapel of Templecross, used as the cemetery of the Piers family, and containing an altar monument to the memory of the first Sir Henry Piers, the author of the book of travels. This chapel is "memorable as the place where the corp-nomh or 'blessed body,' a relic of extraordinary sanctity, was found. The relic consists of a small wooden box, about the size of a pocket Bible, having brass clasps, studded with valuable stones, and marked with a crucifix. Its contents, if any, are unknown; and no hand has been found of nerve sufficient to force it open. It is used as a test of evidence; and an oath on the corp-nomh is considered of peculiar solemnity, which, if given in support of falsehood, is sure to be visited in some dreadful manner on the guilty person. When any one wishes his statements to be received with implicit confidence, he avers its truth by the corp-nomh that 'arose' at the Templecross."

TROMAUN, a village in the parish of Athleague, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connanght. It stands a little west of the road from Roscommon to Lackan, 3 miles south of Roscommon, and the same distance east-north-east of Athleague. It contains a police barrack and a school; and in its vicinity is the mansion of Rocksavage. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 203. Houses 32.

TROOPERSTOWN-HILL, a mountain in the parish of Knockrath, 1½ mile south-east of Laragh, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Its summit has an altitude of 1,408 feet above the level of the sea.

TRORY, or ST. MICHAEL'S TRORY, a parish 3 miles north of Emiskillen, and partly in the barony of Tyrkenney, but chiefly in the baronies of Lurg and Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The three sections lie mutually detached; the Tyrkenney section lies 5 furlongs east of the Lurg section, and 3 furlongs north of the Magheraboy section, the Lurg section half-a-mile north-north-west of the Magheraboy section; and all are separated from one another by the intervention of the parish of Derryvullane. The two principal sections extend from the vicinity of Emiskillen to within about 2½ miles of Castle-Archdall. Length of the Tyrkenney section, southward, ½ a mile; breadth, ¼ a mile; area, 107 acres. Length of the Lurg section, south-south-eastward, 1½ mile; breadth, inclusive of a portion of Lough Erne, 1½; area, 1,564 acres, 2 roads, 25 perches,—of which 641 acres, 1 road, 33 perches are in Lower Lough Erne. Length of the Magheraboy section, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, inclusive of a portion of Lough Erne, 2 miles; area, inclusive of the Tyrkenney section, which the Ordnance Survey exhibits as belonging to Magheraboy, 4,504 acres, 35 perches, — of which 1,190 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are in Lower Lough Erne, and 135 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches are in the river Erne and small lakes. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townland of Drumarrow from the barony of Magheraboy to Tyrkenney; and this townland now constitutes the Tyrkenney section. Pop. of the whole parish, in 1831, 2,012; in 1841, 2,028. Houses 342. Pop. of the Lurg section, in 1831, 386; in 1841, 418. Houses 64. Pop. of the Magheraboy section, in 1841, 1,548. Houses 266. Pop. of the Tyrkenney section, in 1841, 62. Houses 12. The surface, in a general view, consists of low, fertile land; the northern part of the Magheraboy section, and about two-thirds of the Lurg section, are ornate with wood and fine cultivation; and the whole parish is a softly beautiful portion of Lower Lough Erne and its immediate shores. About one-fifth of the territorial surface is abbey land and tithe free. The Lurg section contains the seats of Rockfield and Prospect-house, a Methodist chapel, a graveyard, Gubbusk-Point, and the islands of Innisfree, Hay, Big Paris, and Little Paris; and the Magheraboy section contains the parsonage, the church, the seat of St. Angelo, the whole of Wolf-Lough, part of Racecourse-Lough, Derryvullane-Lough, and Drumgray-Lough, and the islands of Cherry, Trasna, Car, Ferney, White, and Long. The road from Enniskillen passes northward through both of these sections. — This parish was originally a part of the parish of DEVKISH [which see], but is now a distinct district, a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £116 10s. 3d.; glebe, £90. Gross income, £206 10s. 3d.; nett, £187 16s. 9d. Patron, the incumbent of Devinish. The church was built in 1778, by means of a sum of £300, levied off the parish. Sittings 230; attendance 130. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,016 Churchmen, 5 Presbyterians, and 991 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school had on its books 26 boys and 10 girls; and 5 hedge-schools had on their books 156 boys and 81 girls. In 1843, a National school at Tullyavey was salaried with £15 13s. 4d. from the Board, and had on its books 19 boys and 15 girls.

TRORY, co. Donegal. See TORR.

TROSTAN, a mountain in the parish of Layde, 31 miles south-west of Cusendall, barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. Its summit has an altitude of 1,810 feet above the level of the sea.

TROUGH, a barony in the extreme north of the county of Monaghan, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north-west, the north, and the north-east, by the county of Tyrone; on the east, by the county of Armagh; on the south, by the county of Armagh and the barony of Monaghan; and on the south-west, by the barony of Monaghan. Its length, south-south-eastward, is 9½ miles; its greatest breadth is 6½; and its area is 37,376 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches, — of which 292 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches are water. A considerable district in the west is part of the Slieve-Beagh mountains [see SLIEVE-BEAGH]; and a height in the south, called Enagh-hill, has an altitude above sea-level of 359 feet. Trough is by far the poorest barony in the county; and its prevailing soil is either a churlish, stiff, yellow clay, or a poor spongy loam, lying on a cold grit, with hardly any appearance of limestone; yet pleasant districts occur around Glasslough and Emyvale, and along the route of the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry. The Blackwater river traces the chief part of the north-eastern boundary; and the Mountain river rises among the Slieve-Beagh uplands in the extreme west, and flows eastward through the interior. The seat of Trough-lodge occurs 1½ mile south by west of Emyvale; and is now included in Mr. Anketell's fine demesne of Anketell's Grove. The linen manufacture partially or wholly employs a large proportion of the population. — This barony contains the whole of the parish of Donagh, and part of the parish of Errigall-Trough. Its principal villages are Emyvale and Glasslough. Pop., in 1831, 19,220; in 1841, 18,709. Houses 3,290. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,630; in manufactures and trade, 671; in other pursuits, 187. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 59; on the directing of labour, 1,057; on their own manual labour, 2,296; on means not specified, 76. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,758; who could read but not write, 1,647; who could neither read nor write, 3,832. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 900; who could read but not write, 2,070; who could neither read nor write, 5,364. — Trough lies partly within the Poor-law union of Monaghan, and partly within that of Clogher. The total number of tenements valued is £2,940; and of these, 1,137 are valued under £5, —1,004, under £10, —423, under £15, —161, under £20, —66, under £25, —33, under £30, —50, under £40, —19, under £50, — and 47, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £20,929 5s. 3d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £1,862 9s. 11d., and £1,228 1s. 4d., — and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £1,603 5s. 7d., and £1,085 9s. 5d.

TRUBLY, or TUBBERVILLE, a parish in the barony of Lower Dece, 3 miles east-north-east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ¼; area, 854 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches, — of which 10 acres, 8 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 92; in 1841, 73. Houses 12. The land is arable and good. The river Boyne describes the western boundary. The road from Trim to Tara passes through the interior. — This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TRIM [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £46 3s. 1d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 88; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TRUGHENACKMY, a barony of the county of Kerry, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Clanmaurice; on the east, by the counties of Limerick and Cork; on the south, by the barony of Magonihy; and, on the west, by the barony of Corkaguiney, and the bays of Tralee and Ballyheigue. Its length, westward, is 22½ miles; its greatest breadth is 13 miles; and its area is 195,752 acres, — of which 602 acres are tideway. It extends quite across the county; and comprises conspicuous and characteristic portions of both the Kerry highlands and the Kerry vales. The rivulets Feale, Brenagh, and Blackwater, and the crownlands of Pobble-o'-Keeffe, form the boundary along the east. The Stacks mountains and the Clanrudy mountains extend along the northern boundary; the Slievemish mountains occupy the western part of the southern boundary; and a principal and central portion of the vast alpine region of the three counties of Kerry, Cork, and Limerick, constitutes the whole of the eastern district. The principal summits in the north are Taylogh-hill, Cahán, Enaghadave, Dearnabeg, and Knocknaglaghan; the principal in the east are Knockbrack, Knockagagh, Knockmanaghan, Knocknagossy, Knockfraghagh, Knockacur, Knockanadirive, and Mount-Eagle-Loyal; and the principal in the south-west are Siievenish, Cahreconree, and Bautregean,—the last possessing an altitude of 2,784 feet above the level of the sea. The principal low grounds are the vales of the Maine and the Fleskroe, the strath of Castle-Island, the valley of the Lee, the plain of Ardfer, and the immediate sea-board of the bays of Tralee and Ballybeigue. The surface of the barony has, in a general view, been described as "comprising a large district of high pasture-ground where tillage has but lately been introduced, and a breadth of rich flat land stretching to the sea-coast, and interspersed with some deep bogs." One of the voluminous reports of the Poor Inquiry, published in 1836, exhibits detailed and valuable information respecting Trughenackmy, the chief parts of which will be found extracted in our article on the county of KERRY, and the remaining portions of which, so far as of any comparative importance, may now be given in a brief series of very brief excerpts. "The soil on the low grounds is a rich loam, lying on a rocky limestone or gravel, and perhaps more suitable for pasture than corn, as the wheat it bears is rarely of good quality; it will produce large crops of that grain, and also of oats and barley. After being tilled for some years it quickly forms a rich turf, even under the bad system of having no clover or grass seeds sown." "Sheep are seldom pastured on the low ground among the dairy cows, and the fields consequently do not graze evenly. The butter is principally of the first and second quality, and on some farms is very slightly salted, and sent by stean to the London market, where a better price is got for that which is newly made, and has only a small quantity of salt. The general system of dairy management is considered to be very good." "The Tithe Composition Act caused much pasture-ground in this barony to be tilled, by equalizing the tithes on the land of the same quality, whether in tillage or grass. Its effect has perhaps hardly yet ceased on uneven land, and pasture lands, bad or inconvenient from other causes, are still being broken up." "The reclaimed land is in general shallow peat, lying on clay or gravel; but little pains are taken to mix the subsoil with that spongy substance. It is principally more or less wet, and on its enclosures very imperfectly drained by ditches and open furrows, and, except where it is naturally dry, has not been made sound enough to work with a plough, or carry cattle in the winter, without treading or injuring the surface. Lime has been used extensively and most beneficially in this cultivation, and on even and better pieces of the land has been spread on the natural surface, and made meadow-ground that yields good crops of coarse hay, but is very insufficiently drained." "Sea-sand is used extensively on land near the coast, and is considered a valuable manure for all crops, especially on bog soil. The banks of it are said to be inexhaustible, but they vary much in quality; the richest contains nearly 80 per cent. of broken shells, but they are always under water; and the sand must be got by dredging. In some convenient situations good sand is laid on the shore at 2½d. per ton, the purchaser finding the boat; 30 tons per statute acre are often laid on land, and repeated in less quantities with every course of crops. Sea-weed is not plentiful on the shores of this barony. It is let with the farms that belong to the proprietors of the shores, but there are rocks under water at a distance from the land where it may be cut by any person; some quantity is thus obtained by those who have no shores, but not nearly enough to make it plentiful or cheap." "A disposition to give leases is still prevalent among the landlords in this barony.

In numerous instances leases evidently have promoted the outlay of capital by the tenants, and the most improved systems of farming are perhaps only to be found on farms leased for a long time, and on land occupied by the proprietors; still there are many lowland farms under leases that are tilled and treated in a very unprofitable manner, from the poverty or want of skill of the occupiers; and the advantage of a lease is apparent rather in the few superior instances that can be shown than in a visible general superiority over holdings at will." "A little land is still held in common by several tenants, but that tenure is equally disliked by landlords and tenants, and such farms have yearly been divided into several lots." "The farmers and labourers of this barony have better prospects before them than many of their neighbours in adjoining counties. The enclosed land has not been exhausted by over-cropping, and there is a large extent of new ground that can be profitably cultivated with great facilities of getting lime to it at a very cheap rate, and on terms very favourable to the farmers, from the situation and number of the bogs. There is much land also along the courses of the rivers that may be considerably improved in quality by embankments, to guard against occasional floods. On the sea-shore there is still some quantity of the richest alluvial salt marshes unimproved. A large bank is in progress, which will defend 250 acres, now of little or no value, from being flooded in high spring tides. Several roads have been lately made through the barony, and from its central situation between different large towns, there is a great probability that it must be crossed by other lines that are in contemplation." "This barony contains part of the parishes of Annagh, Ardfer, Currans, Killecoleman, Killeentierne, and Killoeglin, and the whole of the parishes of Ballinculane, Ballymacelligott, Ballinaghlish, Ballysedy, Brossa, Castle-Island, Clogherbrien, Dysert, Fenit, Kilgarrylander, Kiltallagh, Noughaval, O'Brennan, Ratase, and Tralee. The towns and chief villages are Tralee, Castle-Island, Blennerville, Chapel-town, Scartaglin, Currans, Brackhill, Milltown, Killorlghu, and Castlemaine. Pop., in 1831, 57,828; in 1841, 66,613. Houses 10,295. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 8,492; in manufactures and trade, 2,194; in other pursuits, 1,230. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 392; on the directing of labour, 4,144; on their own manual labour, 7,114; on means not specified, 326. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 10,911; who could read but not write, 2,649; who could neither read nor write, 15,201. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,161; who could read but not write, 2,856; who could neither read nor write, 21,039.—Trughenackmy lies partly within the Poor-law union of Tralee, and partly within that of Killarney. The total number of valued tenements is 9,475; and of these, 5,687 are valued under £5,—1,245, under £10,—711, under £15,—494, under £20,—321, under £25,—221, under £30,—309, under £40,—157, under £50,—and 330, at and above £50.

TRUMMERY, the ruins of an old church and a pillar-tower, in the parish of Magheramesk, barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. They are situated on the southern verge of the county, 14 mile south-east of Soldierstown, and 5 west by south of Lisburn. The church and the tower are supposed to have been built about the same period, as large portions of sandstone of uniform lithological character are used indiscriminately in every part of their masonry. Excavations were made in the bottom of the tower in June 1842, and terminated in the discovery of a skull and other human bones; and this fact, combined with the recent discovery of similar remains in the bottoms of the pillar-towers of Clones in co. Monaghan, and Ardmore in co. Waterford, has been strenuously urged in favour of the hypothesis that the pillar-towers of Ireland are sepulchral monuments. The ruins of the old church measure 48 feet by 15 within the walls; the west gable is nearly entire, and contains a window with a high pointed arch,—the only window which the edifice possessed; the door was near the centre of the south side, and is now represented by only a choked-up archway; and the ruin of a small apartment—traditionally called a vault or crypt—is attached cross-ways to the slender remains of the east gable. "Behind the gable, at its junction with the corner of the church," writes a well-informed contributor to an extinct periodical, "rose the tower,—a cylinder of graceful proportions, about 60 feet high, tastefully crowned with a cupola curiously raised on a frame of basket-work, the rim of which had fitted the circumference, the diameter being nearly five feet; over the frame was spread a deep covering of mortar in which were closely laid thin flags of limestone, regularly decreasing in breadth from the wall up to the centre, forming a light and firm arch; over this was a covering of mortar, well paved with limestone gravel; lastly, a coat of strong cement completed the crown. There were two great entrances into the tower—the first, a low, narrow, strong archway of red freestone, opening on the south, through which you first enter the church; at the east gable a door led to the apartment alluded to, and from thence into the tower. The second entrance or doorway was right over the archway, about 5 feet high by three wide; handsomely cased with yellow and red freestone, at the height of six feet from the floor. To the right of the arch, as you entered, several stones, connected with the wall inside, led up to the door. A few feet from the ground were two loop-holes, one due east, the other north-west, well cased with freestone. About three feet under the crown were two square holes, east and west; over each jutted a flag of freestone, for the purpose of preventing the rain that fell on the crown trickling down and injuring the ends of an oak beam that crossed the tower; the beam fell in the memory of two respectable men yet living in the neighbourhood, it was called the Bell-tree. About the middle of the tower, inside, were some square holes, but from their scattered situation they could not have served the purpose of joists. The outer work of the tower was of undressed but well chosen land-stones,—that rule by masons called breaking the joint, quite neglected,—yet the inside wrought with the strictest order, and a considerable quantity of freestone used; perhaps this has led some into an error those who have asserted the tower was composed of a double wall, but it was no more than the common thickness of such works—scarcely 3 feet. In the adjoining townland, at a short distance, was the fort of Inmislochlin, which commanded the oft-disputed pass of Kilwarlin; it is said this fort was garrisoned by an army in 1641. About equidistant is the hamlet of Soldierstown, which had a barrack in that year for two companies of foot soldiers and a troop of horse. Tradition says, those troops, bringing some field-pieces to an adjoining eminence, beat down the church; from the situation of the tower there was no possibility of escape, consequently a great breach was made in the side next the church, but only in the outer half of the tower wall. Nature, as if willing to hide the breach from the eye of the curious visitant, bestowed on it a strong covering of ivy, which gave it a truly romantic appearance; about 20 years past, a wretch wantonly cut the roots, the ivy died, and tearing it off for fuel, many of the stones were loosened; these were beat out by mischievous boys, still loosening others till the breach almost met round; yet a few straggling stones seemed struggling to support the mighty mass, until the latter end of October 1828, a thoughtless youth beat out these supporters; a short time after, this venerable monument of antiquity, that for generations arrested the eye of the traveller, became, what it now appears, a heap of ruins."

TRUSKMORE, a mountain in the parish of Ross-inver, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It forms the culminating part of the range of mountains which extends from Benbulbin to Glenade; and it sends a large portion of its eastern declivities beyond the boundary-line of Sligo into the county of Leitrim. Its summit is situated on the eastern verge of co. Sligo, 2 miles north of the beautiful lake of Glencar, and has an altitude of 2,113 feet above the level of the sea. See GLENCAR and BENBULBIN.

TRYBANE, a small fishing harbour in the bay of Killybegs, between the harbours of Killybegs and Ballytherland, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is dry at low water, and has a very indifferent quay; but it possesses important natural advantages, and is easily capable of material improvement. Trybane is a coast-guard station; and, in 1836, the district of this station, situated between the district of Killybegs on the west and that of Durin on the east, had employed in the fisheries 1,035 fishermen, 4 open sail-boats, and 176 row-boats.

TRYBANE-MUCKRAS, a small fishing harbour at the south-west extremity of the parish of Glencolumbkille, and in the vicinity of Carrigan Head, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It has no quay and a difficult landing-place; and, in consequence of its want of a pier, several boats have been lost.

TRYENACH. See TRAWEENACH.

TRYVETT, or TRAVET, a parish in the baronies of Ratoath and Skreen, 2 miles north of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, in the direction of south-east by east, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2¼. Area of the Ratoath section, 1,207 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches; of the Skreen section, 2,962 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 418; in 1841, 416. Houses 71. Pop. of the Skreen section, in 1831, 341; in 1841, 263. Houses 44. The surface consists of some of the best land in the kingdom. The principal residences are Grange-house and Gerardstown-house. The roads from Dunshaughlin to Skreen and Navan, and that from Ratoath to Skreen, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Title composition, £200 5s. The rectories of Tryvett and KILBREW [see that article], constitute the benefice of Tryvett. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 769. Gross income, £410 15s.; nett, £323 15s. 11d. Patron, the Crown. The church is situated in Kilbrew. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 414; the Protestants of the union to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 751; and there was no school.

TUAM, a parish in the baronies of Ballymore, Clare, and Dunmore, co. Galway, Connaught. The Clare and the Dunmore sections contain the city of TRAM; see next article. Length, west-north-westward, 8 miles; extreme breadth, 7¼;—but these measurements include a detached district of the parish of Liskeevy and three detached districts of the parish of Dunmore, which lie isolated within the limits of the parish of Tuam. Area of the Ballymore section, 2,316 acres, 31 perches,—of which 93 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches are water. Area of the Clare section, 5,819 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches,—of which 153 acres, 22 perches are in Lough Clonkeen. Area of the Dunmore section, 16,879 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches,—of which 40 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches are water, and 7 acres, 4 perches lie detached. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 14,219, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, in 1841, 13,425. Houses 2,300. Pop. of the Ballymoe section, in 1831, 518; in 1841, 542. Houses 100. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clare section, in 1831, 1,863; in 1841, 1,855. Houses 332. Pop. of the rural districts of the Dunmore section, in 1831, 4,955; in 1841, 4,994. Houses 872. The surface contains many swells, undulating ridges, and variously shaped hillocks, and possesses numerous little districts of pleasant verdure, ornate wood, and especially tillage cultivation; yet it aggregately presents a dimly flat, bleak, morassy, and repulsive appearance, and, to a stranger from any region of natural picturesqueness, romance, or beauty, is almost as depressing to the fancy as the fens of the east of England. The loftiest grounds are two heights of respectively 238 and 182 feet of altitude above sea-level, the former in the northern district, and the second $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of the town. Turloughs and sinking rivulets abound; and the former are generally constituted by prolonged or seasonal winter floods, in flat and featureless portions of the course of streams, and are singularly staring and ungraceful features in the landscape. The grand draining stream of the parish is the Clare,—sometimes called the Tuam river,—one of the most noted streams in Ireland for turloughs—and not a little noted also for its dives into the earth, and long runs through natural limestone tunnels. Heath, morass, brown bog, and spongy meadows, are so fearfully spreading and abundant as to render large portions of the parish almost utterly impervious, and to convert them, at certain seasons, into strong fastnesses, akin in character to those which disgraced and encumbered so large a portion of Ireland previous to the age of cultivation and social order. The public roads athwart the parish, however, are well made and in excellent condition. The principal lakes are Levally in the north-east, and about half of Cloonkeen in the south. The principal hamlets are Levally, Cloonderane, Cloonascragh, Clashroe, Kilmore, Cloonfish, Killealaun, Newtown-Morisk, Rinkapean, and Beagh; but the habitations which compose the hamlets, as well as the more dispersed houses of the peasantry, are, in general, sheer huts,—the lowest and most miserable abodes of squalidness and destitution. The principal country residences are Gardenfield-house, Carnaun-house, Castletown-house, Carrowrevagh-house, Queensfort-house, Queensfort-lodge, Wilfort-cottage, and Birmingham-house. The other chief objects of interest in the rural districts are a ruined castle in the north, a ruined nunnery in the south, two forts in the south, and a chapel-of-ease at Levally. The mail-road from Dublin to Westport passes through the interior; and various roads radiate from the town.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Tuam. Vicarial tithe composition, £379 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £28. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £195 2s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; and are inappropriate in the vicars-choral of Tuam cathedral. The vicarages of Tuam, CLARETEAM, KILCONLA, KILBANNON, LISKEEVY, and ADDERGOOLE, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Tuam. Length, 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 27,902. Gross income, £741 16s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £625 15s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also one of the vicar-choralships of the cathedral. Two curates receive each a salary of £75. The parochial church is situated in the town of Tuam, and serves as the cathedral of the diocese. Sittings 400; attendance 250. The chapel-of-ease at Levally is simply a school-house, fitted up for the purposes of public worship. Sittings 50; attendance 50. There is a church also in Kilconla. The Roman Catholic chapel or cathedral in the town of Tuam is served by 4 officiates, and has an attendance of 8,000 at three services. The Roman Catholic chapel at Courtown has an attendance of from 1,000 to 2,000. The Roman Catholic chapels at Wood-Quay and Belclare have an attendance of respectively about 300 and about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Corrofin, in the parish of Kilmocree. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Addergoole, Liskeevy, Kilconla, and Kilbannon. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish of Tuam amounted to 428, and the Roman Catholics to 14,511; the Protestants of the union to 533, and the Roman Catholics to 29,380; 28 daily schools in the parish had on their books 904 boys and 335 girls; and 40 daily schools in the union had 1,416 boys and 666 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £35 a-year and other advantages from the archbishop of Tuam; one, with £15 from the National Board, and £15 and other advantages from subscription; one, with £15 from the National Board, and £10 and other advantages from subscription; and one, with £10 from the National Board;—and one was the Roman Catholic college of St. Jarlath, situated in the town of Tuam, conducted by 6 professors, and supported by £2 a-year from each Roman Catholic parochial clergyman in the diocese, £26 5s. from each lay boarder, £18 11s from each ecclesiastical boarder, £4 from each lay day scholar, and £3 8s. from each ecclesiastical day scholar.

TUAM, one of two denominations of a bog, in the parishes of Tuam and Cummer, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connought. The other denomination is Ballinderry. The bog extends from the western vicinity of the town of Tuam, to a point 3 miles south of the town, and comprises an area of 4,306 acres. Its altitude above high-water level in Galway bay is 119 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet. "This bog," reported Mr. Jones in 1814, "is very firm, and one of the best circumstanced bogs in this district for improvement, having the Castlemoyle river running through it, and a lake or turlough on the west side, both of which would receive the waters of the bog. The islands that are in it nearly divide it into two parts, from north to south, near Tuam, and adjoining the road to Clonthrower-Derry. Mr. Morris has improved about 20 acres. The under strata are limestone, rock, gravel, and marl. The method taken to reclaim this bog was by spreading the gravel on the surface after it had been pretty well drained, and then planting potatoes on it; when these were dug out, more gravel was spread, and oats sown, and produced a most excellent and abundant crop. This improvement took place, as I was informed, in the space of about 3 years. On the reclaimed part there is a small plantation of alder, ash, and sycamore, which is in a very thriving state. The process of burning the surface of such bogs as are improved in this part of the country very frequently does not take place; the principal cause of which I conceive may be, that very little rape is cultivated, for which ashes are deemed more beneficial in the first instance than gravel or clay. The bog is averagely 25 feet deep." Estimated cost of reclamation, £5,980 10s.

TUAM,

An episcopal, market, and post town, the ecclesiastical metropolis of Connought, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Tuam, and bar-onies of Clare and Dunmore, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the river Clare, at the intersection of the road from Dunmore to Galway with the mail-road from Dublin to Westport, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Dunmore, 9 east-north-east of Headford, $10\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by west of Monivae, $11\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Hollymount, $14\frac{1}{2}$ east-south-east of Ballinrobe, 15 west-north-west of Castle-Blakeney, 16 north-north-east of Galway, $20\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Castlereagh, $20\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Ahascragh, $23\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Castlebar, 27 west-north-west of Ballinasloe, 34 south-west of Boyle, $34\frac{1}{2}$ south-east by south of Westport, and $99\frac{1}{2}$ west of Dublin.

Environns.—The general character of the environs of the town has already been indicated in our notice of the parish. The country immediately adjoining the Dublin and Westport mail-road exhibits some amenities; yet even this is totally destitute of picturesqueness, and not a little encumbered with bog and morass; and the country for miles distant in all other directions is such a dismal series of swamps, turloughs, bogs, and dripping corn-fields, as no man of idealism can gaze upon without feeling as if he were suddenly seized with ague. "Neither Tuam nor its environs," says the graphic writer of the Tour in Connaught, "are attractive for a day's sojourn, not to speak of a life's residence. Here is a town, once a borough, and in all likelihood to be a borough again, an archiepiscopal see, the residence of two most reverend lords, with a population of 15,000, and yet there is no public walk, no library, either circulating or stationary, but (and I use the words of Dutton, the author of the Statistical Survey of Galway) 'there is a billiard-room, and over it a reading-room, (that is, I suppose, a room where there may be one or two Dublin papers, one or two provincial, an almanack, and a racing calendar,) which is a great relief to many shopkeepers, as it takes away from them that great nuisance in country towns, idle loungers, who fill their shops, and frighten away many timid country people, especially women. Valuable use this for a library! The country, as you leave Tuam on the way to Headford, is exceedingly ugly; on your left you see a low flat with a desolate lake, whose waters flow towards Galway. I scarcely could bring myself to believe that a lake could be an ugly thing until I saw some of those in Galway and Mayo, surrounded by the dreary rockiness of the uncovered limestone wastes, or by the brown desolation of the bog; and a turlough is still worse; that is, a depressed basin of the limestone district, which in winter is covered with water, but which, as there is no outlet, becomes dry in summer by evaporation, or by a swallow (as it is called) in the centre, leaving a whitish clayey soil, covered with a coarse weedy herbage, on which depasture a flock of ragged mangy sheep, or of plucked uncomfortable geese. I do not know which would be the greater purgatory to me,—to draw out life in a town like Tuam, or sigh it away by the side of a turlough in its vicinity: I believe I would prefer the latter.'"

Interior of the Town.—Tuam, as to at once site, alignment, and architecture, is but too much in harmony with the character of its environs. Its site possesses one or two undulations, which relieve it from absolute monotony; yet, in a general view, it is low, flat, and altogether insipid. Its alignment compresses a portion of the best houses into a compact town-centre, and admits of their disposition, partially at least, into rather spacious street-line; but, with these exceptions, it is at once straggling, sinuous, and irregular, to a degree utterly incompatible with comfort, neatness, or even ordinary convenience. Its architecture—if public buildings, the principal private residences, and a few business and

Tuam, in fact—if its magnitude, pretensions, and ecclesiastical importance be taken into account—is by far the worst built town in Ireland. Of 1,056 inhabited houses which it contained in 1841, no fewer than 825 were mere mud cabins, and each of so many of these mud cabins as 511 had only one apartment! We can state also, on the authority of accurate, though not official enumeration, that, in the year 1834, about one-third of all the inhabited houses were either totally destitute of windows, or possessed only little apertures, stuffed with old hats, straw, or other materials, not less indicative of poverty than incapable of transmitting light. The town, indeed, has recently experienced considerable improvement, in the partial widening of streets, the accession of a few good houses, and the sweeping away of a portion of the grosser features of its filth and penury; yet, even in spite of this improvement, it continues to be most emphatically a poverty-stricken town,—a chaos of horrid huts radiating out in streams from a nucleus of orderly and tolerable dwellings. The compact part of the town measures about 350 yards from south to north, and from 130 to 350 from east to west; it is bounded, on the south, by Mary's-Abbey and the police barrack,—on the west, by the cathedral, the old church, and the old Roman Catholic chapel,—on the north, by the river Clare,—and, on the east, by the episcopal demesne, the archiepiscopal residence of the Roman Catholic archbishop, and the grounds adjacent to the Roman Catholic cathedral; it consists of a small, central, open area, around the market-house, and five streets radiating from that area toward the south-east, the south-west, the west, the north, and the east; and it may, in a general view, be pronounced pretty well edified, or comparatively free from the squalid and mere cabin character of the rest of the town. The south-eastward street leads out the thoroughfare to Ballinasloe and Dublin; but, immediately on leaving the compact town, subsides into open road, overlooked only by the gaol, the court-house, the glebe-house, and one or two other buildings. The south-westward street leads out the thoroughfare to Athenry; and, on leaving the compact town, it describes a curvature of 300 yards toward the west,—is partially edified over that curvature with cabins,—is winged on the south with the barrack, and with a group of lanes measuring about 150 yards by 100,—sends off a street of cabins 250 yards in length, curving north-westward, to communicate with the thoroughfare to Galway,—and suddenly deflects to the south-south-west, and carries along a street of cabins 300 yards in that direction upon the thoroughfare to Athenry. The westward street, after leaving the compact town, is nearly unedified over a distance of 280 yards, or till it falls upon the communicating street of cabins from the preceding outlet; and it then sends a street of cabins about 900 yards west-south-westward, along the thoroughfare to Galway. The northward street leads out the thoroughfare to the county of Mayo, and is connected by a stone-bridge with a suburb on the north bank of the river Clare; and this suburb consists principally of a street about 140 yards in length, and somewhat parallel with the river,—a one-sided street, 450 yards in length, extending north-north-eastward, close to the bishop of Tuam's demesne, and along the road to Ballingaddy,—and a curving street of 280 yards in length, northward and north-westward, along the road to Hollymount and Castlebar, and continuing to be partially or stragglingly edified over a further distance of 900 yards. The eastward street leads out the thoroughfare to Dunmore; and, after passing on the north side the entrance to the bishop of Tuam's demesne, and on the south side the Roman Catholic archbishop's residence, the Roman Catholic college of St. Jarlath, and the end of the lane which leads up to the Roman Catholic cathedral, it sends eastward, but not strictly in a straight line, a street of cabins, about 1,000 yards in length. The town, on to every extremity which we have specified, is wholly situated within the municipal boundaries; and then, as represented upon a map, it appears to consist of a small nucleus or main body, and of long, sprawling, straggling, miserable outlets, which look as if wandering away to hide their misery in the surrounding bogs and turloughs.

Public Buildings.—Monastic writers say that an abbey was founded at Tuam so early as the year 487, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; that the church of this abbey was made a cathedral or the seat of a diocese, by St. Jarlath, in the beginning of the 6th century; that the nucleus of the city of Tuam was built around the cathedral, or adjacent to it, in honour of St. Jarlath; and that the remains of the saint were preserved, at the city in a chapel called 'Temple-na-serin,' the Church of the Shrine.' In 1140, the priory of St. John the Baptist was founded at Tuam, by Tirdelvac O'Connor, king of Ireland; and on the general dissolution of monasteries, it was granted to Richard, Earl of Clare, but to what order of monks or friars it belonged cannot now be ascertained. Either in the reign of John, or in the beginning of the reign of Henry III., an abbey for Premonstratensian canons was founded at Tuam by one of the family of De Burgh. The stone cross of Tuam, now a neglected and dilapidated monument, is one of the finest specimens of the structures of its class any where to be found in Ireland. The castle of Tuam was one of the most remarkable of the various great and magnificent edifices erected during the stormy reign of Roderick O'Connor; and it popularly bore the name of the Wonderful-castle,—not, as has been generally supposed, because it was the first edifice of its class erected in Ireland,—but because it displayed a novel style, and possessed very great strength. It was built in the Norman fashion of the period, and consisted of a strong keep, with an extensive court-yard, surrounded by outworks, with towers at the angles, and protected by a deep fosse, into which the water of the river Clare was forced to flow. The cathedral of St. Jarlath was also re-edified by the founder of the castle. But all the ancient ecclesiastical edifices of Tuam, together with a portion of the city, were destroyed by fire in 1244. The present cathedral of the Protestant diocese of Tuam is only part of the original structure, designed on a comparatively extensive scale; and it is an ancient and neat, but somewhat small structure, adorned externally with a tower and spire, and fitted up internally, and in a neat but not showy manner, with the usual appliances of a cathedral. The old Roman Catholic chapel is a very plain building. The present Roman Catholic cathedral is one of the costliest, best designed, best executed, and most magnificent modern Gothic ecclesiastical edifices in the three kingdoms; it was long in the course of erection under the late archbishop Kelly, and was brought to completion by the present archbishop MacHale; it was the product not alone of Roman Catholic zeal and liberality throughout the diocese of Tuam, and partially throughout Ireland, but of large and opulent donations by many wealthy professing Protestants, including one or two members of the royal family; it was constructed and embellished with the most durable and ornamental materials, inclusive of some blocks of choice marble from Italy; it exhibits, both externally and internally, all the principal and many of the minute or accessory features of the old pointed or Saracenic style of architecture; and it displays, to the surrounding landscape, an imposing cruciform mass, pierced with multilined windows, ribbed with graduated buttresses, bristled with carved pinnacles, and surmounted from the intersection of its nave and transept with a parapet, pinnacled, and arch-pierced quadrangular tower. "Archbishop MacHale," remarked the author of the Tour in Connaught, in allusion to the Wonderful-castle or Castrum mirificum of King Roderick O'Connor, "Archbishop MacHale is determined to have his 'Basilica Mirifica.' The whole Established church, with all its tithes and church-lands, with all the machinery of its ecclesiastical boards, may more, with all the private and public influence of its valuable clergy, could not raise such a splendid edifice as this." The magnificent pile stands on the summit of a long swell or undulation of ground, on the south-eastern outskirts of the town; it commands an extensive prospect of the circumjacent flat country, and is itself seen on all sides from a considerable distance; and when beheld from the east in such grouping that the town is hid from the view, it has a most noble and picturesque effect; but when seen, or even thought of, in association with the streets and gatherings of squalid hovels in its vicinity, its very brilliance does not more dazzle the imagination than astonish and disgust the moral feelings.—The palace or diocesan house of the bishop of Tuam is situated in the immediate north-eastern vicinity of the compact portion of the town, and is a commodious but quite plain structure; and the demesne, which surrounds it, and spreads away from behind it, is bisected by the Clare river, possesses a pleasant aggregation and disposition of wood, and contributes a very agreeable feature to the scenery of both the town itself, and its environs. The residence of the Roman Catholic archbishop is in the near neighbourhood of the entrance to the Protestant bishop's demesne, but on the opposite side of the street; and it is a neat and sufficiently capacious, yet comparatively unpretending house, immediately overlooking the thoroughfare, and without any attached demesne. The college of St. Jarlath, or Roman Catholic boarding and day school, principally for the training of young men for official situations in the Roman Catholic church, is a large plain building, adjacent to the archbishop's residence. See TUAM (PARISH OF). The market-house is a plain and rather ricketty building in the centre of the town, and serves the purposes of reading-room, assembly-room, and civil miscellanea. The bridewell contains the usual accommodation of temporary prisons, sufficient for the separate imprisonment of the sexes; and it is in good order, and has always been correctly kept. The cost of maintaining the bridewell during 1843 was £18 9s. 3d. for salary to the keeper, and £38 3s. 4d. for subsistence, fuel, and incidents. The other public buildings are a Presentation nunnery, a court-house, a barrack, a bridge, several schools, and a work-house,—the last of which will be noticed in next section.

Poor-law Union.—The Tuam Poor-law union ranks as the 75th, and was declared on Sept. 19, 1839. It lies wholly within the county of Galway, and comprehends an area of 135,233 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 74,153. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Tuam, 14,381; Cummer, 3,695; Amaghdown, 2,851; Headford, 7,400; Downpatrick, 6,308; Clare-Tuam, 3,199; Kilbannon, 5,416; Lisgeevy, 6,424; Dunmore, 6,240; Cloonbern, 6,414; Killerran, 4,643; Abbey, 4,693; and Monivea, 2,418. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 10 and 31; and of the latter, 6 are elected by the division of Tuam, 3 by each of the divisions of Headford, Downpatrick, Lisgeevy, Dunmore, and Cloonbern, 2 by each of the divisions of Kilbannon, Killreran, and Abbey, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The barony of Ballymoe contains the whole of the division of Cloonbern, and part of that of Tuam; the barony of Dunmore contains the whole of the divisions of Lisgeevy and Dunmore, and part of the divisions of Tuam, Kilbannon, and Killreran; the barony of Clare contains the whole of the divisions of Cummer, Annaghdown, Headford, Downpatrick, and Clare-Tuam, and part of the divisions of Tuam, Kilbannon, Killreran, Abbey, and Monivea; and the barony of Tyaquin contains part of the divisions of Killreran, Abbey, and Monivea. The number of valued tenements in the Ballymoe districts is 991,—in the Clare districts, 4,430,—in the Dunmore districts, 4,059,—in the Tyaquin districts, 968,—in the entire union, 10,448; and of this total, 7,074 are valued under £5,—1,952, under £10,—503, under £15,—234, under £20,—105, under £25,—62, under £30,—97, under £40,—74, under £50,—and 287, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £86,286 0s. 5½d.; the total number of persons rated is 10,448; and of these, 1,643 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,692, not exceeding £2,—1,597, not exceeding £3,—1,207, not exceeding £4,—and 968, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on July 2, 1840,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £6,700 for building and completion, and £1,400 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches, obtained for £300 of purchase-money and an annual rent of £10 1s. 11½d.,—and to contain accommodation for 800 paupers. The total expenditure up to Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,112 19s. 5½d.; and at that date, the workhouse was not opened for the admission of paupers. The medical dispensaries within the union are dispensaries at Tuam, Dunmore, Headford, Milltown, and Monivea; and, in 1840-41, they received £546 0s. 6d. from subscription, £546 0s. 6d. from public grants, and £16 7s. 7d. from other sources, expended £617 10s. in salaries to medical officers, £303 12s. 5½d. for medicines, and £161 4s. 10½d. for contingencies, and administered to 19,873 patients. The Tuam dispensary serves for a district of 110,000 acres, with a pop. of 39,450; and, in 1840-41, it expended £342 7s. 11½d., and administered to 7,912 patients.

Trade.—Tuam, as a seat of trade, has made more improvement during the last few years than any other inland town of Connaught; and, in fact, it required to make very large improvement in order to shake off the lethargy which appeared long to characterize it. Its weekly markets are the scene of very extensive traffic, in the disposal and purchase of agricultural produce; and its daily retail business is extensive in the supply of a great and populous circumjacent country. The operation of the Church Reform Act, in enabling the townspeople to obtain long tenures from the sec of Tuam, appears to have been very beneficial. So vast a thoroughfare pours through the town from the west of Connaught to the centre and the east of Ireland as to have occasioned Tuam to be termed 'the Gate of Mayo.' The town has an extensive brewery, several tan-yards, several flour-mills, some manufactures of linen and coarse canvass, two inns and posting establishments, a loan fund, and a branch-office of the National Bank of Ireland. The weekly market is held on Thursday; and fairs are held on May 10, July 4, Oct. 19 and 20, and Dec. 15. A weekly newspaper, called the Tuam Herald, is published on Saturday. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Ballinasloe, a coach to the terminus of the Grand Canal at Balinasloe, a car to Ballinrobe, a mail-car to Dunmore, a mail-car to Headford, a car to Westport, a car and a mail-coach to Galway, and a mail-coach in transit between Westport and Ballinasloe. In 1843, the Tuam loan fund had a capital of £746, circulated £2,998 in 1,323 loans, realized a nett profit of £4 13s. 9½d., and belonged to 15 proprietors.

Municipal Affairs.—Tuam was incorporated by charter of 11 James I.; and it has also a charter of 4 James II. The old limits of the borough were neither defined by charter nor ascertained by perambulations, yet were understood to extend about 2 miles around the town; and the limits proposed for the new arrangement include all the straggling outskirts of the town, and all the intervening open spaces, yet pass in straight lines from point to point at the extremities of the outskirts. The corporation, according to charter, is called, "The Sovereign, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Tuam," and consists of a sovereign, 12 free burgesses, and a commonalty. The officers named in the charters are the sovereign, the burgesses, and 2 sergeants-at-mace; and other officers, stately or occasionally appointed, are a town-clerk, a recorder, a treasurer, constables, scavengers, inspectors of markets, a bellman, and a weigh-master. The sovereign, at the commencement of last century, appears to have received the entire corporation revenues, subject to certain payments to the other officers, and to the expenses of an entertainment to the corporation; and, in 1833, he continued to receive a salary of £50 a-year. In 1833, the number of free burgesses continued to be complete; but no freemen were regularly admitted as such, excepting one honorary freeman, the Marquis of Anglesea. "At the period of the Legislative Union," said the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations in 1833, "the borough of Tuam was under the patronage of the Hon. Walter Yelverton, and John, Lord Clanmorris; and the sum of £1,000 was paid to the former, and £14,000 to the trustee in the marriage settlement of the latter, as compensation for the loss of the privilege of sending members to parliament. The corporation has since become independent; and, in the year 1811, the entire body of the burgesses was voluntarily changed. On the 30th September in that year, seven burgesses having resigned, their places were filled by persons elected by the remaining 5 then present, and the new burgesses being sworn, those 5 then immediately resigned, and the number was soon afterwards completed by new elections. It was resolved by the sovereign and burgesses, in 1818, that no second member of the same family or connection should be elected a Burgess; but the resolution was rescinded in 1822. Of the present burgesses, it was stated to us that there are two families, of each of which there are two burgesses; that four of the burgesses are nearly related; and that there is a family connection through them all. The office is sometimes canvassed for. The sovereign and burgesses of Tuam are all, with one exception, of the Roman Catholic religion, which is that of the majority of the inhabitants and persons in trade. It was stated to us that there are not now any religious or political prejudices in the election of burgesses, but that within the last few years great efforts have been made by individual burgesses to have their own friends elected, in order to have a majority. The free burgesses have not any emoluments; they are exempt from the tolls and customs claimed by the corporation; some take advantage of the privilege, others do not. They have not individually any functions or duties to perform, but, with the sovereign, they constitute the select or governing body of the corporation. * * No particular individual can be pointed out as exercising paramount influence in the corporation since the change of its members in 1811, and the proceedings of the sovereign and free burgesses are of a more popular character than those of any other corporate body which we have visited. The admission of the commonalty to some share in the corporate proceedings, and the perfect freedom from religious distinction between the free burgesses and the great majority of the community, are strongly calculated to prevent the dissension which too commonly prevails in other places between the corporation so called and the inhabitants. But without evincing that marked hostility to be found elsewhere, the inhabitants of Tuam are far from being satisfied with the present constitution of the municipal body; and they naturally object to the power of self-election vested in the free burgesses, which in practice leads to the exclusion of the commonalty from all control over the details of corporate business, and the application of the corporate revenues. It seems to be considered that the number of free burgesses is too small, and it has been suggested as an improvement, that they should be increased to 24. We found no objection on the part of any member of the corporation to its being constituted on more popular principles; and one of the free burgesses stated that the general feeling of the inhabitants was to share in corporate privileges, and of the burgesses to extend those privileges to them. The present legal condition of the corporation is doubtful. Repeated instances occur of elections of free burgesses and sovereigns by less than a majority of the entire number of free burgesses. The resignation of 7 free burgesses in 1811 left but 5 remaining, thereby in fact dissolving the corporation, if the minority was legally competent to accept those resignations. The subsequent elections were by those 5, and afterwards by the persons whom they had elected. The proceedings to disfranchise the non-resident free burgesses in 1817, do not appear to have been conducted with much regularity; in one instance only 5, in others only 6 were present, including the sovereign, until the numbers were increased by those elected in room of the disfranchised members. The giving to the inhabitants as the commonalty, without any form of actual admission to the freedom of the borough, the right of voting at elections, on vacancies happening in the sovereign's year of office, does not seem warranted, even by the liberal interpretation of the charter, which gives to such persons an inchoate title to their freedom, and there are not, in fact, any other freemen to represent the commonalty on such occasions." "The revenues of the corporation are derived solely from tolls and customs at markets and fairs; but no regular accounts of either them or the expenditure appear to have been latterly kept. The corporation does not exercise any criminal jurisdiction. A borough-court was formerly held every Wednesday, but was discontinued in 1826. No manor-court is held within the borough. A court of quarter-sessions is held twice a-year; and a court of petty-sessions, every Wednesday. Tuam is the head-quarters of one of the 7 districts of the constabulary of the west riding of the county of Galway. The streets of the town are repaired by county presentment.

Episcopal History.—The bishopric of Tuam is usually said to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Jarlath, and to have been under the incumbency of a regular series of Milesian prelates, who rejoiced in the names of Ferdomnach, Eugene Mac-Clerig, Muschad O'Niac, and others equally wild and unpronounceable. The see, however, is little if at all known to authentic record till the middle of the 12th century; and then it bursts distinctly and permanently into view. In 1150, Maurice or Muredach O'Dubhai, bishop of Tuam, died; and he bore so high a reputation that the annalists say, "in him Ireland died." Edan O'Hoisin became bishop in 1150, and died in 1161. "Cardinal Paparo invested him with the pall in the year 1152, at the synod of Kells, when the following 7 suffragan bishops were assigned to him, viz., the bishops of Mayo, Killalla, Clonsfert, Achonry, Cluan, and Duach [Kilmaeduaigh]; of which number the see of Mayo was afterwards united to Tuam, as was also the see of Enagh-dune [Annaghdown]. This last see is omitted in the distribution made at that time; the union of it to Tuam, or the converting of it into a parish-church, being probably then in contemplation. The see of Roscommon also was afterwards translated to that of Elphin; while the see of Cluan or Clonmacnoise was annexed to that of Armagh, after a very protracted suit upon the matter at the court of Rome." Catholicus or Cadla O'Dubhai became archbishop in 1161, assisted at the second council of Lateran in 1179, and died in 1201. Felix O'Ruadan, a Cistercian monk, and uncle to Roderick O'Connor, became archbishop in 1201, and resigned in 1235. Marian O'Lagnan, dean of Tuam, became archbishop in 1235, went to Rome for confirmation of his dignity, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and died in 1249, at Athlone. Florence MacFlin, chancellor of Tuam, and sub-deacon of the Pope, became archbishop in 1250, took possession of both the office and the emoluments of the see of Annaghdown, and died in 1256. "There is extant a remarkable petition of this archbishop to King Henry III., wherein he suggests, 'that the church of Enachlune was but a parish-church belonging to the archbishopric of Tuam, but was made a bishopric by the king's presenting two bishops to it.' The petition goes on to say, 'that the archbishop had procured a bull from the Pope to reduce it to a parish-church as before.' And the prayer of the petition was for the king's confirmation of the Pope's bull. The king granted what he had desired, on condition that he would yield a parcel of land within the town, whereon to build a castle, by way of exchange for other lands of equal value, to be settled on the church in lieu of it. This was in the year 1252. And yet we shall see that controversies were carried on for 76 years after, concerning the bishopric of Enaghduane, during which time the king's assent frequently occurs to elections for that see. About the year 1255, he took a journey to England, accompanied by the bishop of Killalla, on the behalf of himself and his suffragans, together with other bishops and clergy of Ireland, to complain to the king of many grievances. Whereupon the king issued a writ to his son, prince Edward, to whom he had made a donation of Ireland, commanding him to call together the archbishops, bishops, abbots, the barons, judges, and all the great men, and by the advice of Sir John Fitz-Jeffry, Lord-justice of Ireland, and other discreet men of the council, to apply a remedy to the grievances complained of. Our author adds, 'what remedy the bishop met with I know not; nor any one else I believe.' Walter De Salern was made archbishop in 1257, by papal provision, and in spite of the election of another by both the chapter and the king; but he died so soon after that he never beheld his see. Thomas O'Connor, bishop of Elphin, was made archbishop in 1259, and died in 1279. Stephen of Fulburn, a native of Cambridgeshire, and bishop of Waterford, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1286, by papal provision, and in defiance of two other elections, and died in 1288. 'Fulburn was of the order of Knights Hospitallers. This knight had a sharp conflict with, and gained a victory over, John De Ufford, who had been elected bishop of Enaghduane, and had obtained the royal assent, on March 16, 1282. While he was bishop of Waterford, he was made Lord-justice of Ireland; and though removed in the year following, he again entered upon that office in 1282, upon the resignation of Robert De Ufford.' William De Birningham, son of the dynast or petty prince of Athenry, became archbishop in 1289, and died in 1311. 'He was obliged, however, to submit contentedly to one Gilbert, a Franciscan friar, who was quartered upon his sees as bishop of Enaghduane; while Gilbert himself was fined, and made to pay £300, because he had been elected to the remaining one without the king's previous license, and had not had his subsequent assent.' Malachy Mac-Eda, bishop of Elphin, became archbishop in 1313; he recovered the see of Enaghduane or Annaghdown, and governed it during 20 years after it had been held by Gilbert and three successors during about as long a period; and he died in 1348. Thomas O'Carrol, archdeacon of Cashel, and canon of Ardfer, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1349, by papal provision and in defiance of the previous election of Robert De Birmingham; he was appointed to one or two other sees, but would not accept them because the appointments were unaccompanied by papal provision; and, in 1365, he was translated by the Pope to the archbishopric of Cashel. John O'Graila, archdeacon of Cashel, became archbishop of Tuam in 1365, and died at Limerick in 1371. Gregory, bishop of Elphin, became archbishop in 1372, and died in 1384. Gregory O'Moghan was appointed to the archbishopric by the anti-Pope Clement VII., in 1385, but was deprived by Pope Urban VI. in 1386. William O'Connacain was made archbishop by papal provision in 1386; he suffered much from his deprived predecessor, Gregory O'Moghan; he was forcibly translated to the see of Clonfert by Boniface IX., to make room for his successor in 1394; but he sank into great depression, neglected to accept his bull of translation, and speedily died. Maurice O'Kelly, bishop of Clonfert, was made archbishop in 1394, and died in 1407; and during his incumbency, the bishopric of Annaghdown was once more detached from Tuam, to continue separate during two or three incumbencies. John Babynghe, a Dominican friar, became archbishop by papal provision in 1410, and died in 1411. Cornelius, a Franciscan friar, became archbishop by papal provision in 1411. John Baterley or Barley became archbishop by papal provision in 1427; and he is said to have published many works, which all perished. Thomas O'Kelly, bishop of Clonfert, became archbishop by papal provision in 1438, and died in 1441. John De Burgo became archbishop in 1441, and died in 1450. Donat O'Murphy or Imurphy, an Augustinian canon, became archbishop by papal provision in 1458, founded the wardenship of Galway, with its college of a warden and vicars, and died about 1484. William Shivy or Joy became archbishop by papal provision in 1485, and died in 1501. Philip Pinson, an English Franciscan friar, was appointed to the archbishopric at the instance of Henry VII. in 1503, and died of the plague at Rome three days after his appointment. Maurice De Portn or O'Fihely, a Franciscan friar, who had been educated at Padua, and had assisted at the first and second sessions of the council of Lateran in 1512, was made archbishop of Tuam by papal provision in 1506, died in 1513, and was surnamed Flos-Mundi, 'the flower of the world.' Thomas O'Mullaly or Laly became archbishop in 1513, presided at a synod at Galway the canons of which are lost, and died in 1536. Christopher Bodekine, bishop of Kilmacduagh, became archbishop of Tuam in 1536, and died in 1572. William Laly or Mullaly, dean of Tuam, became archbishop in 1573, held also the see of Annaghdown with his archbishopric, made a nearly successful effort to hold also in commendam the sees of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh, and died in 1585. Nehemiah Donellan became archbishop in 1595, and voluntarily resigned in 1609. William Daniel, treasurer of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1609, translated into the Irish language the Greek New Testament and the Book of Common Prayer, was also a good Hebrew scholar, and died in 1628. Randolph Barlow, dean of Christ-church, Dublin, and archdeacon of Meath, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1629, and died in 1637. Richard Boyle, who had been archdeacon of Limerick, dean of Waterford, and bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, and was brother to Michael, bishop of Waterford, became archbishop of Tuam in 1638, and died in 1644. John Maxwell, bishop of Killalla and Achonry, and previously bishop of Ross in Scotland, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1645, and died in 1646. 'He died of vexation and disappointment from the confusion of the times. Burnet gives him the character of a man of eminent parts, also that of an excellent preacher. But he adds, that by his forwardness and too great aspiring, he had been the instrument of that which brought on all the disorders of Scotland.' Samuel Pullen, chancellor of Cashel and dean of Clonfert, became archbishop in 1660, was the first of a series of archbishops who held the see of Killeenora in commendam with that of Tuam, and died in 1667. John Parker, bishop of Elphin, became archbishop of Tuam in 1667, and was translated to the see of Dublin in 1678. John Vesey, bishop of Limerick, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1678, and died in 1716. 'With his archbishopric he held also the quarta pars archiepiscopalis, which is the fourth part of the revenues of every clergyman in the diocese, payable to the archbishop. On being driven from his see and country by the rigours of Tyrconnel's government, Vesey found refuge in London, where he served a lectureship at the salary of £40 a-year. While in the former possession of his see, he had been called into the privy council. He lived afterwards to be three times one of the Lords-Justices of Ireland, being joined in commission, in 1712, with Sir Constantine Phips, lord-chancellor,—in 1714, with the primate Lindsay and the same Phips,—and in the same year, with Robert Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, in conjunction with Archbishop King." Edward Synge, bishop of Raphoe, was made archbishop of Tuam in 1716; he resigned the quarta pars archiepiscopalis, which his predecessors had for a long period enjoyed; and he also procured an act of parliament for permanently alienating the quarta pars from the see. Dr. Josiah Hort, bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh, was appointed to the see of Tuam in 1742; Dr. John Ryder, bishop of Down and Connor, was appointed in 1752; Dr. Jemmot Browne was appointed in 1775; Dr. Joseph Dean Bourke, bishop of Leighlin, was appointed in 1782; Dr. William Beresford, bishop of Ossory, was appointed in 1794; the Hon. William Le Poer Trench, D.D., a pious and learned man, and bishop of Elphin, was appointed in 1819; and the Hon. Thomas Plunket, D.D., son of Lord Plunket, was appointed in 1839.

The Diocese.—The see of Ardagh, suffragan to the archbishopric of Armagh, was held in commendam with the see of Tuam by Dr. Hort in 1744, and by his successors down to the recently deceased Dr. Le Poer Trench. The Church Reform act dissolved the connection between Tuam and Ardagh, annihilated the archiepiscopal dignity of Tuam, and annexed to the diocese of Tuam the dioceses of Killalla and Achonry. Dr. Trench, therefore, was the last Protestant archbishop of Tuam; and Dr. Plunket is bishop of Tuam, Killalla, and Achonry. The gross and the nett episcopal income of Tuam, upon the average of 3 years ending in 1831, was respectively £5,020 1s. 3½d., and £4,018 17s. 9½d.; the gross and the nett episcopal income of Ardagh, held in commendam with Tuam, was respectively £3,186 2s. 6½d., and £2,977 11s. 3d.; and the episcopal income of the united sees of Tuam, Killalla, and Achonry, under the new arrangement, is £5,000. The economy estate of the cathedral is the only property belonging to the dean and chapter in their corporate capacity; and the annual average income from it, in 1831, was £174 10s. 10½d. The dean, in 1831, derived a gross income of £680 15s. 2d. from his corps of 9 sinecure rectories or part-rectories; and held also the prebendal benefice of Ballymore, in the dio. of Armagh. The provost derived a gross income of £426 4s. 7½d. from his corps of 7 sinecure rectories; and held also the benefice of Monaminy, in the dio. of Clogher, and the benefice of Feonagh, in the dio. of Ardagh. By order of the lord-lieutenant and privy council, dated Nov. 23, 1843, the revenues of the provostship, which were suspended by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, have been disappropriated, and distributed to the amount of £182 8s. 2½d. amongst the vicarages of the parishes, within which the rent-charges arose, and the residue transferred to the general fund of the Commissioners. The archdeacon received an income of £240 from his corps of 4 sinecure rectories; and held also the benefices, forming the corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of Limerick, and the benefices of Clonmel and Templerobin, in the dio. of Cloyne. The prebendary of Kilmeen received £75 from his corps of Kilmeen prebend; and held also the benefice of Oranmore, in the dio. of Tuam, and a vicar choralship, and a minor-canony of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The prebendary of Killybegs received £144 6s. from his corps of 11 sinecure rectories or part-rectories. The prebendary of Taghsaxon received £7 10s. from his corps of Taghsaxon prebend; and held also the chaplaincies of the Foundling Hospital, and of one of the garrison chapels in the city of Dublin, and the office of catechist to the school of the Incorporated Society in Dublin.

The prebendary of Kilmoylan received £154 from his corps of the sinecure rectory of Kilmoylan; and held also the benefices of Kilmoylan vicarage, Moylough, Agharti, and Kilmacraean, in the dio. of Tuam. The prebendary of Kilmainmore received £410 from the corps of his prebend; and held also the benefices of Kilmainbeg and Moorgara, in the dio. of Tuam. The prebendary of Balla received £190 from the corps of his prebend; and held also the benefices of Roslee and Minola, in the dio. of Tuam. The prebendary of Faldoun received £102 11s. 8d. from the corps of his prebend; and held also the sinecure prebend of Ballinoulter, in the dio. of Clonfert, the sinecure archdeaconry of Ardagh, the benefice of Athenry, in the dio. of Tuam, the united benefices of Dunlir, Moylavy, Dysert, Kippock, Drumcar, and Monasterboice, in the dio. of Armagh, and the office of vicar-general of the united dioceses of Clonfert and Kilmacdagh. The prebendary of Lackagh received £100 from the corps of his prebend; and held also the benefice of Cloon, in the dio. of Ardagh.

The diocese of Tuam is the largest in Ireland; and comprises a great portion of co. Galway, a great portion of co. Mayo, and a considerable portion of co. Roscommon. It extends from Achill-Head and Slyne-Head on the west, to the river Shannon below Athlone on the east; and from the Nephin mountains and Lough Conn on the north, to the bay of Galway on the south; yet it becomes comparatively narrow as it approaches the east, and it makes its terminating approach to the confines of Leinster, by means of a small district which lies slightly detached beyond an intersecting sweep of the diocese of Clonfert. Its length is 60 Irish or 77 statute miles; its breadth is 50 Irish or 63 statute miles; its area is 974,879 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches; and its population in 1831 was 446,703. Dr. Beaufort—estimating its superficial extent at 1,135,750 acres, and the number of its parishes and churches at respectively 89 and 24—assigns 675,250 acres, 49 parishes, and 12 churches to the county of Galway, 424,700 acres, 37 parishes, and 11 churches to the county of Mayo, and 35,700 acres, 3 parishes, and 1 church to the county of Roscommon. The number of parishes in the diocese is 91; of benefices, 33; of resident incumbents, 22; of non-resident incumbents, 11. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £16,464 16s. 7½d.; glebes, £723 7s. 5½d. Gross incomes, £17,637 2s. 2d.; nett, £15,296 6s. 6½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 28, the diocesan; of 2, incumbents; of 1, lay parties; of 1, alternate parties. Appropriate tithes, £1,777 4s. 0½d.; impropriate tithes, £713 10s. 7d. Number of stipendiary curates, 21; aggregate amount of their salaries, £1,503 1s. 6½d. Number of churches, 31; sittings 7,130. Cost of building 18, building and enlarging or repairing 2, enlarging 3, and repairing 1 of the churches, £17,847 15s. 4½d.—of which £8,040 13s. 9½d. were gifts from the late Board of First Fruits, £7,976 6s. 2d. were lent by that Board, £553 16s. 11d. were private donations, and £1,000 were raised by parochial assessment. Number of churches, according to the reports of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, 31; of other places of worship belonging to the Establishment, 18; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 4; of meeting-houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters, 6; of Roman Catholic chapels, 134. In 1834, the population consisted of 9,619 Churchmen, 367 Presbyterians, 65 other Protestant dissenters, and 467,970 Roman Catholics; 1 benefice contained no member of the Established church, 1 contained not more than 20 members of the Established church, each of 2 not more than 50, each of 5 not more than 100, each of 13 not more than 200, each of 6 not more than 500, each of 3 not more than 1,000, and each of 3 between 1,000 and 2,000. In the same year, 370 daily schools, which made returns of their attendance, had on their books 16,247 boys, 8,020 girls, and 476 children whose sex was not specified; 83 daily schools, which made no returns of their attendance, were computed to be attended by 5,561 scholars; 308 of the total number of schools were supported wholly by fees; and of 145 which were supported or aided by endowment or subscription, 51 were in connection with the National Board, 1 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 2 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 7 with the Kildare Place Society, and 16 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Province.—Though the Protestant province or archbishopric of Tuam has ceased to exist, yet it still figures prominently in history, it contributes its limits to recent ecclesiastical statistics of comparatively great value, and it was identical in extent with the existing Roman Catholic province of Tuam; and on all these accounts, but especially for sake of the second, it claims separate and distinct notice. The bishoprics suffragan to Tuam at the date of the Church Reform act were Killalla, Achonry, Elphin, Clonfert, and Kilmacduagh; but Achonry was annexed to Killalla, and Kilmacduagh was annexed to Clonfert, so that there were only 3 suffragan bishoprics. The wardenship of Galway was, and continues to be, in most respects, a jurisdiction of a character nearly akin to episcopal; and hence the warden of Galway was, in a sense, a fourth suffragan; but, in all general or cumulative statistics, this wardenship is usually treated as simply one of the benefices of the diocese of Tuam.—Area of the province, 2,431,806 acres, 1 rood, 91 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,169,685. Number of parishes, 278; of benefices, 102; of resident incumbents, 76. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £39,160 19s.; glebes, £2,816 5s. 4d. Gross income, £42,738 19s. 3d.; nett, £36,892 2s. 1½d. Patron of 5 benefices, the Crown; of 83, diocesan; of 4, incumbents; of 6, laymen and corporations; of 4, alternate parties. Appropriate tithes, £7,827 13s. 0½d.; inappropriate tithes, £9,183 7s. 6½d. Number of stipendiary curates, 63; aggregate amount of their salaries, £4,615 12s. 4d. Benefices with churches, 93; without churches, 9. Total of churches, 104; sittings 27,401. Cost of building 60, building, enlarging, or repairing 5, enlarging 8, and repairing 3, of the churches, £81,714 11s. 1½d.; of which £25,133 6s. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £46,170 15s. 5d. were lent by that Board, £1,654 3s. 0½d. were proceeds of private donations, and £7,914 17s. 3½d. were raised by parochial assessment. Number of churches, according to the report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, 110; of other places of worship belonging to the Establishment, 25; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 7; of meeting-houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters, 27; of Roman Catholic chapels, 340. In 1834, the population consisted of 44,509 Churchmen, 800 Presbyterians, 369 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,188,568 Roman Catholics; 1 benefice contained no member of the Established church, each of 3 benefices contained not more than 20 members of the Established church, each of 5 not more than 50, each of 14 not more than 100, each of 32 not more than 200, each of 19 not more than 500, each of 16 not more than 1,000, each of 9 not more than 2,000, and each of 4 between 2,000 and 5,000. In the same year, 1,122 daily schools, which made returns of their attendance, had on their books 47,212 boys, 25,599 girls, and 610 children whose sex was not specified; 119 daily schools, which made no returns of their attendance, were computed to be attended by 7,735 scholars; 850 of the schools were supported wholly by fees; and of the 391 which were supported wholly or partially by subscription, 90 were in connection with the National Board, 6 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 7 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 8 with the Kildare Place Society, and 95 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic Diocese.—The Roman Catholic province of Tuam continues to be fully recognised in the Roman Catholic hierarchical arrangements; its dioceses of Tuam, Killalla, Achonry, Elphin, and Clonfert, are severally unannexed, or have each a bishop for itself; its quondam wardenship of Galway was recently constituted a diocese, and also has a bishop for itself; and its diocese of Kilmacduagh is annexed to the diocese of Kilfenora in the province of Cashel, and, jointly with that diocese, is suffragan alternately to Cashel and to Tuam. The dignitaries of the Roman Catholic diocese of Tuam are the archbishop, the dean, the chancellor, the archdeacon, and the prebendaries of Taghsaxon, Faldown, Lackagh, Kilmainmore, Kilmoylean, Kilmeen, Balla, and Killybegs. The archbishop's parish is Tuam. The number of parochial clergy is 50; and the number of coadjutors or curates is 66. The following are the names of the parishes, together with the sites of their respective chapel or chapels:—1. Tuam,—Tuam and Cartoon; 2. Kilmeena,—Kilmeena and Kilmeacassar; 3. Kilmain,—Kilmain; 4. Balla,—Balla and Bulcarra; 5. Westport,—Westport, Lecanvy, and Drum; 6. Glenamadda,—Glenamadda and Kilmelag; 7. Spiddal,—Mimma; 8. Clare Tuam,—Corrofin and Abbeyville; 9. TUBBRID, a parish in the barony of Iverk, 3½ miles east-south-east of Piltown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,004 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 213; in 1841, 241. Houses 36. The land is of inferior quality. The chief objects claiming notice are the hamlet of Barabally, a cromlech, a 'holy well,' a Roman Catholic chapel, and the ruins of Tubbrid-church.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of FIDDOWN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £50. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Killanaspig, and has an attendance of 699; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Moineoin in the parish of Rathkyran, and the chapel of Carrigeen in the parish of Portnascully. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by from 100 to 150 scholars; and a pay daily school was attended by from 90 to 100 in summer, and from 10 to 12 in winter.

TUBBRID, a parish in the barony of West liffa and Offa, 3½ miles south-south-west of Cahir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-south-eastward, 5½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 4½; area, 12,572 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 12 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,590, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 4,550; in 1841, 4,874. Houses 749. The outline of the parish is nearly that of two limbs of a cross; and the one extremity rests upon the summit-line of the Galtee mountains from 5 to 6½ miles west of Cahir, while the other comes in contact with the Suir at a point 2½ miles south by east of Cahir. The whole of the northern district is mountainous and pastoral; and most of the southern district is valley-ground, and good arable land. One summit on the northern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,969 feet; and one in the interior, 2 miles south of the former, has an altitude of 856 feet. One stream runs down the whole of the western boundary, from an elevation of 1,702 to one of about 170 feet above sea-level; and another runs partly on the eastern boundary and partly in the interior, from an elevation of 1,553 feet to a confluence and a common level with the Suir. The seats are Kilroe-house, Burgess-cottage, Ballygarra-house, and Scart-house; the chief antiquities are the ruins of a castle, the ruins of two churches, the site of two castles, and the site of three churches; and the principal hamlet is Ballyhooley. Within the limits are two constabulary stations. Within the ruined old church of Tubbrid lie the ashes of the quaint and credulous old historian, Dr. Geoffrey Keating. The mail-road from Dublin to Cork by way of Cahir passes through the interior; and that from Dublin to Cork by way of Clonmel passes near the southern boundary.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £323 17s. 10d.; glebe, £54. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £458 10s. 1½d.; and are appropriated to the deanery of Lismore. The vicarages of Tubbrid, WHITECHURCH, and BALLYBAON [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Tubbrid. Length, 10½ miles; breadth, 4½. Pop., in 1831, 8,738. Gross income, £632 6s. 1d.; nett, £550 4s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, at the cost of £1,107 13s. 10½d.; of which £923 were borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £92 6s. 2d. were a donation from the incumbent, and the remainder was a grant from the late diocesan out of the rectorial tithes of the parish of Cahir. Sittings 200; attendance 30. The Tubbrid Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of

2,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tullaghorthon. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Ballybacon. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 88, and the Roman Catholics to 4,701; the Protestants of the union to 121, and the Roman Catholics to 9,075; one daily school in the parish was salaried with £8 a-year from the Association for Discourte-nancing Vice, and £10 a-year and other advantages from Lord Waterpark, and had on its books 102 boys and 100 girls; 3 other daily schools in the parish were supported wholly by fees, and had on their books 108 boys and 59 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 423 boys and 284 girls.

TUBBRID, a demesne on the southern border of the barony of Clannaurice, 1 mile east of Ardfer, co. Kerry, Munster. It derives its name from an old well which superstition regards as "holy;" and it possesses great beauty of situation, much picturesqueness of natural feature, and a large aggregate of tasteful decoration. Dr. Smith takes prominent notice of it in pp. 207 and 208 of his work on Kerry.

TUBBRIDBRITTAIN, a parish in the barony of Cranagh, 3½ miles south-east of Urlingford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,140 acres, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,103; * in 1841, 1,293. Houses 212. Green-hill, the highest ground, has an altitude above sea-level of 528 feet; and a height at the Roman Catholic chapel has an altitude of 491 feet. The principal seat is Gore's-grove; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of a church, Tubbrid-castle, and another castle. The road from Urlingford to Tullaroan passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ACHOUR [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £83 6s. 8d., and the rectorial for £166 13s. 4d.; and the latter are impropriate in the corporation of the city of Kilkenny. The reason of the great discrepancy between the statement of the pop. of 1831 by the Census and that by the Ecclesiastical Authorities, is that 10 townlands of Tubbridbrittain are included in the perpetual curacy of Clonantagh; and that these are treated by the Census as belonging to Tubbridbrittain, and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities as belonging to Clonantagh. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants of the section of the parish unannexed to Clonantagh amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 541; the Protestants of the section annexed to Clonantagh amounted to 42, and the Roman Catholics to 508; and 2 daily schools in the former section—one of which was salaried with £20 a-year from local contributions—had on their books 141 boys and 82 girls.

TUCKER (LOUGH), a lake on the mutual border of the parishes of Drungoon and Knockbride, 2½ miles north-west of Shercock, barony of Clonchee, co. Cavan, Ulster. It extends south-westward, and measures about ¾ of a mile in length. The road from Kingscourt to Cootchill passes its north-east end; and Knapagh-house stands near its north-west bank.

TULLA, or TULLAGH (LOWER), a barony in the south-east of the county of Clare, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Upper Tulla; on the north, by the barony of Upper Tulla and the bay of Scariff; on the east, by Lough Derg and the river Shannon, which separates it from the counties of Tipperary and Limerick; on the south, by the county of Limerick, and the barony of Lower

* The Ecclesiastical Authorities exhibit the pop. of 1831 as only 550.

Bunnatty; on the south-west, by the barony of Lower Bunnatty; and on the west, by the baronies of Lower Bunnatty and Upper Bunnatty. Its greatest length, south-south-westward, is 14½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 10½; and its area is 78,381 acres, 19 perches,—of which 5,416 acres, 1 perch are water. A considerable portion of the surface, particularly in the middle part of the northern border and the middle part of the south-western district, is mountainous and moorish; but most of the remainder, particularly along the Shannon and in the southern district, is aggregately good land. A large proportion, especially on Scariff bay, along Lough Derg, around Killaloe, along the Shannon, and around Lough Doon, is highly picturesque. The principal mountain summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Knocknalecka, on the northern boundary, 818 feet; another height on the northern boundary, 1½ mile east of Knocknalecka, 1,019 feet; Glennagallagh, in the parish of Killaloe, 1,746 feet; Glennagallagh, on the boundary between the parishes of Killokeneddy and O'Brien's-Brigge, 1,438 feet; a height 2 miles west-north-west of the city of Killaloe, 1,353 feet; Cragnamurragh, on the mutual border of the parishes of Killokeneddy and O'Brien's-Brigge, 1,729 feet; a height 1½ mile south-west of Kilbane, 1,181 feet; Knockaphunta, in the parish of Kilscealy, 843 feet; a height 1½ west by north of Knockaphunta, 1,018 feet; and a height on the mutual border of the parish of St. Munchin's and a detached district of O'Brien's-Brigge, 875 feet. Loughs Bridget, Derrynone, Kilgory, Cullauntheeda, and Castle lie on the boundaries; and Loughs Doon, Aroher, Clonlea, and Cloonbrick lie in the interior. The baronies of Lower Tulla and Upper Tulla constituted, till of late, only one barony, and are returned as one in the Census of 1831. The old castles within both are eleven in number, and are situated at Fortnamore, Tereadagh, Tomgraney, Ballinahinch, Cahir, Innismahon, Milltown, Coolreath, Lissefin, Ballykeely, Mountallion, Terenane, Kilkishen, Rosvoe, Mount-casheal, Cappagh, Truigh, Arrighnamore, Newtown, Rinnuagh, Coolistage, and Monegenagh. Pop. of the undivided barony of Tulla, in 1831, 61,063. Houses 9,585. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 7,950; in manufactures and trade, 1,117; in other pursuits, 1,112.—The barony of Lower Tulla contains the whole of the parishes of Clonlea, Killaloe, Killokeneddy, Killurin, Kilscealy, Kiltonanlea, O'Brien's-Brigge, and Ogonelloe. The towns and chief villages are Killaloe, O'Brien's-Brigge, Kilkishen, Kilbane, O'Callaghan's Mills, Broadford, Cloonlara, and Bridgetown. Pop., in 1841, 32,217. Houses 5,032. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,413; in manufactures and trade, 699; in other pursuits, 336. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 86; on the directing of labour, 1,295; on their own manual labour, 3,945; on means not specified, 122. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,465; who could read but not write, 2,114; who could neither read nor write, 6,513. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,051; who could read but not write, 2,900; who could neither read nor write, 8,905.—Lower Tulla is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Scariff, Ennis, and Limerick. The total number of valued tenements is 3,727; and of these, 1,882 are valued under £5,—891, under £10,—392, under £15,—194, under £20,—105, under £25,—56, under £30,—67, under £40,—38, under £50,—and 102, at and above £50.

TULLA, or TULLACH (UPPER), a barony in the north-east of the county of Clare, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west, the north, and the north-east, by the county of Galway; on the east, by the county of Galway, the bay of Scariff, and the barony of Lower Tulla; on the south-east and the south, by the barony of Lower Tulla; and on the south-west and the west, by the barony of Upper Bunnatty. Its greatest length, south-south-westward, is 14½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 11½; and its area is 96,730 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches,—of which 2,911 acres, 29 perches are water. A large proportion of the surface is mountainous and moorish upland, of small value in its present condition, but capable of being, at a moderate expense, well reclaimed and made very valuable by means of enclosing, draining, liming, top-burning, and irrigating. The principal summits in the north are seven of respectively 990, 1,312, 992, 724, 1,028, 448, and 589 feet of altitude above sea-level; the principal in the east are three of respectively 1,028, 944, and 765 feet of altitude; the principal in the south are four of respectively 541, 818, 1,019, and 308 feet of altitude; and the principal in the west are four of respectively 533, 1,064, 755, and 829 feet of altitude. Part of the water area is in a portion of Scariff bay; and most of the remainder is in Loughs O'Grady, Bridget, Anilloon, Kilgory, Cullauntheeda, Ea, and Graney. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the whole of the parish of Kilmurry, and the whole of the parish of Kilfinaghta, with the exception of the townland of South Bunnabia, from Upper Tulla to Lower Bunnatty,—pop., in 1841, 4,433; and the townlands of Cappaghduff and Knockaphart, in the parish of Inniscultra, from Upper Tulla to the barony of Leitrim in co. Galway,—pop., in 1841, 182.—The barony of Upper Tulla, as at present constituted, contains part of the parish of Inniscultra, and the whole of the parishes of Feacle, Kilnoe, Moynoe, Tomgraney, and Tulla. The principal villages are Scariff, Tulla, Tomgraney, Feacle, and Baurroe. Pop., in 1841, 30,186. Houses 4,865. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,320; in manufactures and trade, 619; in other pursuits, 241. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 72; on the directing of labour, 1,015; on their own manual labour, 4,001; on means not specified, 92. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,476; who could read but not write, 1,859; who could neither read nor write, 6,892. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,600; who could read but not write, 2,437; who could neither read nor write, 8,710.—Upper Tulla is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Scariff, Limerick, and Ennis. The total number of valued tenements is 2,824; and of these, 1,482 are valued under £5,—515, under £10,—256, under £16,—188, under £20,—144, under £25,—67, under £30,—78, under £40,—44, under £50,—and 80, at and above £50.

TULLA, TULLACH, or TULLOH, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. Length, southward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 24,531 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches,—of which 147 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are in Lough Cullauntheeda, and 239 acres, 4 perches are in other lakes. Pop., in 1831, 7,514; in 1841, 8,748. Houses 1,361. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 6,640; in 1841, 7,531. Houses 1,173. The central district—which is the broadest and largest—consists, in general, of good land, and possesses a very fair amount of embellishment; but the southern district is hilly, and the northern district is almost wholly mountainous. Previous to the formation of the direct road from Killaloe to Ennis, and the new road from Limerick to Gort—both of which traverse the interior—the parish was hardly accessible; but since the formation of these roads, it has become greatly improved, and has lost much of its former dreariness and wildness. The three loftiest summits in the north have altitudes of respectively 533, 800, and 1,004 feet of altitude above the level of the sea; and the highest ground in the south has an altitude of 308 feet. The Affick rivulet flows along the whole of the western district, and descends within the parish from an elevation of 516 feet above sea-level; and a rivulet which flows along the eastern boundary descends, while there, from an elevation of 755 feet. Lough Cullaunyeeda lies on the southern boundary, and has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 97 feet; Loughs Roslara and Cloondanagh lie in the interior, and have surface-elevations of respectively 141 and 177 feet; and the other principal lakes are Lough Ea on the northern boundary, and Loughs Cloondoonay, Clooncoose, and Liskenny in the interior. The principal seats are Nutgrove-cottage, Bunavory-house, Woodlawn-house, Newtown-Grove-house, Garreeragh-house, New-Lawn, Maryfort, Fortanmore, Fortanbeg, Castleview-cottage, and Kiltanun-house,—the last the handsome residence of J. Melloney, Esq., situated $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the town of Tulla. “The Affick rivulet, one of the numerous tributaries to the Fergus, which here change their name every townland they pass through, runs through the demesne of Kiltanun, and, in its progress for a short distance and at a few feet under the surface, passes through a succession of limestone caverns, not an unusual occurrence in this limestone district. A path leads along the limpid stream; and through the chinks and apertures of the rocks the ivy and other trailing plants hang down. This subterraneous course of the stream forms an interesting and romantic appendage to the demesne, and is a place of considerable resort during the summer months.” The principal hamlets are Derrybeg, Drumhouniv, Liskenny, Ballinakill, and Mall; and the principal antiquities are several forts, five ruined castles, one ruined church, and a cromlech.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £184 12s. 3d.; glebe, £9. Gross income, £193 12s. 3d.; nett, £128 3s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Tulla in Killaloe cathedral. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £92 6s. 1d.; and one moiety of them is appropriated to the prebend of Tulla, and the other moiety to the sinecure benefice of Ogashin. The church was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapels at Tulla and Drimsharley have an attendance of respectively 4,000 and 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 172, and the Roman Catholics to 7,848; and 4 pay daily schools—one of which was classical, and one wholly for females—had on their books 221 boys and 124 girls. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Tulla were salaried with respectively £15 and £18 10s. from the National Board, and had on their books 152 boys and 121 girls.

TULLA, TULLAGH, or TULLOH, a small market and post town in the parish of Tulla, barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Ennis to Killaloe with the new road from Limerick to Gort, 3 miles north-west by west of O'Callaghan's Mills, $\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of Broadford, $\frac{1}{2}$ east by north of Ennis, and 1004 west-south-west of Dublin. The summit of the hill on which it is situated commands an extensive view of the surrounding country, singularly diversified with rock, lake, bog, pasture, moorland, tillage-ground, and demesne, and displaying a confused epitome of the variform surfaces of the county. The town contains the parish-church, the glebe-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, a National school, a bride-well, a dispensary, a small court-house, a graveyard, and the ruins of a small and very ancient church. The dispensary is within the Scariff Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 10,014; and, in 1839-40, it received £96 4s., and expended £88. Fairs are held on March 25, May 13, Aug. 15, Sept. 30, and Dec. 7. The town is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions, and courts of petty-sessions,—the latter on the second Thursday of every month; and is the head-quarters of one of the 8 districts of the constabulary force of the county. Area of the town, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 874; in 1841, 1,217. Houses 188. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 91; in manufactures and trade, 125; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 133; on their own manual labour, 102; on means not specified, 20.

TULLAGH, co. Carlow. See TULLOW.

TULLAGH, a parish on the coast of the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of ARREYSTRAND, the small sea-port of BALTIMORE, and the island of INNISHERKIN: see these articles. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,349 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,422; in 1841, 3,690. Houses 682. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of Baltimore and Innisharkin, 1,937. Houses 331. Pop., in 1841, exclusive of Baltimore and Arreyststrand, 3,358. Houses 620. The mainland district comprises the southern or seaward part of the peninsula on the east side of Baltimore Harbour; and consists, in an aggregate view, of good land. Tullagh proper is situated a little north of Baltimore. The principal residences are Baltimore-castle, Lough-Hyne-house, and Baltimore-house. The ruins of Baltimore-castle, crowning the summit of a rock, and overlooking the pier of Baltimore, have a picturesque appearance.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £37 10s. Gross income, £337 10s.; nett, £263 17s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1818 by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 65. The Rathmore Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in the parish of Creagh. The Innisharkin Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cape Clear Island. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 325, and the Roman Catholics to 3,171; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £4 a-year from a fund left by the late Roman Catholic bishop, Dr. Collins, and one with subscriptions collected by the Roman Catholic parochial clergyman for 16 poor children—had on their books 202 boys and 78 girls.

TULLAGHAGH, or TULLYHAW, a barony in the extreme north-west of the county of Cavan, Ulster. It forms the north-western wing of the county, and projects lengthwise, from the main body of the county, away between Fermanagh and Leitrim. It is bounded, on the north and the north-east, by the county of Fermanagh; on the east, by the baronies of Lower Loughree and Tullaghanohu; and, on the south, the south-west, and the west, by the county of Leitrim. Its length, south-eastward, is 19½ miles; its breadth is from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$; and its area is 90,701 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches,—of which 2,605 acres, 34 perches are water. The south-eastern district, or that adjoining the main body of the county, contains much good land, and possesses many amenities of character, and a large amount of picturesque and very diversified scenery; but the central and the north-western districts are moorish and mountainous, and, in spite of containing some romantic, grand, and sublime scenes, are prevailingly wild, cold, savage, and dismal. The sources of the Shannon [see article SHANNON], occur in the north-west. Loughs Macnean, both Upper and Lower, lie on the western part of the northern boundary, and greatly relieve the scenery in their neighbourhood; and the lakes of Templeport, Ballymacgowran, Derycossa, Bunerky, Bellaboy, Lakelield, Brackley, Glebe, and Killyran, diversify, and, in some degree, beautify the south-eastern district. The principal mountain-summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are,—on the northern boundary, Tiltin-Bane, 1,949 feet,—Cuilcagh, 2,188 feet,—Cratty, 1,213 feet,—and Legavegra, 1,279 feet; on the southern boundary, Slievenakilla, 1,793 feet,—and Moneensauran, 1,533 feet; and, in the interior, Corneage, 736 feet,—and Benbrack, 1,648 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Drumreilly, Kinawley, and Tomregan, and the whole of the parishes of Killinagh and Templeport. The principal villages are Swanlibar, Ballyconnel, and Bawnboy. Pop., in 1831, 22,467; in 1841, 24,992. Houses 4,163. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,414; in manufactures and trade, 698; in other pursuits, 174. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 57; on the directing of labour, 893; on their own manual labour, 3,281; on means not specified, 55. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,285; who could read but not write, 2,005; who could neither read nor write, 5,417. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,080; who could read but not write, 2,269; who could neither read nor write, 7,486.—Tullaghagh lies partly within the Poor-law union of Cavan, and partly within that of Eumiskillen. The total number of valued tenements is 3,221; and of these, 1,795 are valued under £5,—894, under £10,—291, under £15,—98, under £20,—45, under £25,—25, under £30,—32, under £40,—13, under £50, and 28, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £20,428 15s. 6d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840 were £951 8s. 3d., and £855 17s.—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £1,029 7s. 2d., and £970 2s. 10d.

TULLAGHALLEN. See TULLVALLEN.

TULLAGHAN, a village in the parish of Rossinver, barony of Roslogher, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the coast, half-a-mile west-south-west of the mouth of the Drowes river, 2½ miles west-south-west of Bundoran, and 12½ north-north-west of Manor-Hamilton. In its vicinity are Tynte-lodge, Lork-house, Fairview, Mount-Herbet, Star-lodge, Duncarbery-castle, Ward-house, and other villas. Pop. returned with the parish.

TULLAGHAN, or TULLAGHAAN, a bay in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It opens immediately east of the headland which screens the east side of Blacksod bay, has an entrance width of 2½ miles, penetrates the land north-north-eastward 5½ miles, has an intricately outlined interior, and, amid a series of contractions and expansions, possesses an extreme interior width of about 2 miles. It is shallow, encumbered with shoals, and of small economical importance. About the middle of its east shore is Croy-lodge, the scene of the recently published work called 'The Wild Sports of the West'; and a little below that place is Tullaghan or Ballycroy ferry, carrying across the thoroughfare from Newportpratt to Belmullet. The ferry varies in width with the tide, and, at high water, is about 1½ mile in width; and, in good weather, it is always crossed with ease, and without much delay. The station for the boats, a coast-guard station, and the hamlet of Tullaghan, are on the west shore of the bay.

TULLAGHANBROGUE, or GROVE, a parish 4 miles south-west of Kilkenny, and partly in the barony of Cranagh, but chiefly in that of Shillelogher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, westward, 3¼ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Cranagh section, 1,160 acres, 21 perches; of the Shillelogher section, 2,327 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 627, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 620; in 1841, 1,078. Houses 174. Pop. of the Shillelogher section, in 1841, 695. Houses 115. The surface, in a general view, consists of pretty good land, and displays a well-wooded and very ornate appearance. A principal feature is Desart-court, the demesne of the Earl of Desart. "This demesne, from its elevation and extensive plantations, is a remarkable feature in this district of country. The house is a handsome Grecian structure; and in the comparatively large extent of plantations which are in this demesne, is the largest and finest oak tree in Ireland. About two miles west from Desart, near the cross-road leading to Killenale, is Ballykeefe wood, a part of the demesne of Desart, and a feature in the country from its elevation on the sides of the hills." To the east of the demesne are the ruins of a church; and within the demesne are the ruins of a church and a castle. The principal hamlet is Coolapoge.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ISCHIOLOCHAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £77 10s.; glebe, £4 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £154; and are appropriated to the vicars choral of Christ-church cathedral, Dublin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 623; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TULLAGHANOGUE, a parish in the barony of Upper Navan, 2½ miles south-east of Athboy, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,414 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 112; in 1841, 178. Houses 36. The surface consists of good arable land, and is traversed by the road from Athboy to Trim. The principal residences are Sherborne-lodge, Shamrock-hill, and Clifton-lodge,—the last the seat of the Earl of Darnley. "The surrounding estates," remarks Mr. Fraser, "particularly the large tract of land possessed by the Earl of Darnley, as also the late estates of Lord Sherborne, have been highly improved; and the comfortable farm-houses and good husbandry cannot fail to attract the attention of the traveller, and make some amends for the flat and featureless country between this point and Trim." The hamlet of Tullaghanogue is situated on the north-east verge of the parish.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of TAIN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent £24 18s. 5½d. The rectorial tithes are of unknown value, and are inappropriate in James O'Reilly, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the

* This, however, includes only the Shillelogher section of the parish; and even in giving this section, the Census exhibits it as consisting of the three parishes or denominations of Tullehane, Lislane, and Dreen.

Roman Catholics to 108; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TULLAGHENOG. See TULLAGHANOG.

TULLAGHER, or TULLOCHER, a village in the parish of Dysertmoore, barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the right bank of the river Nore, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Inistiogue, and 5 north-west of New Ross. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel and the site of an old castle. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 170; in 1841, 187. Houses 30.

TULLAGHERIN, TULLAHERIN, or TULLOWHERIN, a parish in the barony of Gowran, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of the village of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,052 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 895; in 1841, 976. Houses 143. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is traversed by the roads from Gowran to Bennet's Bridge and Stonyford. The principal residences are Castlefield-house, Blackwell-lodge, Kilbline-castle, and Summerhill-house. The chief antiquities are the ruins of Ballyholey church, on the north-eastern verge of the parish; the ruins of a castle, on the northern border of the parish; an old castle and the ruins of a church, at Kilbline; and a pillar-tower and the ruins of a church, at the hamlet of Tullagherin. The pillar-tower stands 8 feet from the north-west angle of the ruined church; its circumference, at 3 feet from the ground, is 50 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet; its entrance is about 12 feet from the ground; round its top appear to have been 8 windows, 4 of which remain in the one undilapidated side; and the material of which the tower has been constructed is siliceous breccia,—while that of the church is limestone.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFANE [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £250; glebe, £9 4s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £210; and are appropriated to the precentorship of St. Canice cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at the hamlet of Tullagherin, and has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Thomastown, the chapel of Mung in the parish of Columbkille, and the chapel of Kilminogue in Church-Jerpoint. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 866; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 200 scholars; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 147 boys and 55 girls.

TULLAGHPONHAIR, the site of an old monastery, in the vicinity of the town of Naas, barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Archdall alleges that the monastery was founded in the 7th century by St. Fechin, and endowed by the king of Leinster; but confesses that it figures obscurely in record.

TULLAGHGARVEY, a barony in the north-east of the county of Cavan, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the counties of Fermanagh and Monaghan; on the east, by the county of Monaghan and the barony of Clonchee; on the south and the south-west, by the barony of Upper Loughree; and on the west, by the barony of Lower Loughree. Its greatest length, east by southward, is 14 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its breadth, in the opposite direction, is from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 miles; and its area is 50,902 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches,—of which 1,027 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches are water. Its outline is nearly triangular, with the sides facing the north, the south-east, and the south-west. The eastern corner is occupied with the beautiful, ornate and lake-embellished district around Cootehill; a part of the western corner is occupied with the charming little tract around the seat of Castle-Saunderson; and a small portion of the valley of the Annalee is pleasant and somewhat ornate ground; but nearly all the vast remainder of the surface is bleak, and presents the chilled and broken appearance which is so singularly characteristic of about two-thirds of the county. Mayo Hill seems to be the highest ground, and has an altitude of 602 feet above the level of the sea. The Annalee river, inclusive of its chief head-water or tributary of the Cootehill river, waters the interior from end to end. The principal lakes, additional to those in the vicinity of Cootehill, are Loughs Killyhandrick, Drumlany, Derryboon, Corsmottog, and Cornagall.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Annagh, Drumgoon, and Laragh, and the whole of the parishes of Drung and Kildrumsherdon. The towns and chief villages are Cootehill, Redhill, Bellanacargy, Clementstown, and Tullyvin. Pop., in 1831, 35,177; in 1841, 37,532. Houses 6,358. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,797; in manufactures and trade, 1,431; in other pursuits, 332. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 125; on the directing of labour, 1,814; on their own manual labour, 4,488; on means not specified, 133. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,747; who could read but not write, 3,533; who could neither read nor write, 6,882. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,142; who could read but not write, 4,911; who could neither read nor write, 9,563. Tullaghgarvey lies partly within the Poor-law union of Cootehill, and partly within that of Cavan. The total number of tenements valued is 4,708; and of these, 1,414 are valued under £5,—1,864, under £10,—810, under £15,—290, under £20,—138, under £25,—59, under £30,—69, under £40,—14, under £50,—and 00, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £37,664 12s. 7d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £2,998 5s. 10d., and £2,505 19s. 6d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,688 8s. 1d., and £2,245 6s. 10d.

TULLAGHIGORE, a parish in the barony of Upper Dunluc, co. Antrim, Ulster. Area, 432 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. Pop., in 1841, 90. Houses 16. It has ceased to be recognised in the ecclesiastical divisions; and is usually regarded as forming part of the parish of BALLYMONEY; which see.

TULLAGHLEASE, or TULLILEASE, a parish, 7 miles north-north-east of Newmarket, and partly in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, partly in that of Duballow, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Orrery and Kilmore section, 1,287 acres; of the Duballow section, 7,005 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 2,308, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,155; in 1841, 3,278. Houses 484. Pop. of the Duballow section, in 1831, 2,155; in 1841, 2,933. Houses 429. The surface is part of the northern verge of the county, and part of the upland territory which forms the frontier toward the south-western part of co. Limerick; it consists principally of a portion of the glen and the hill-screens of the river Allua; it boasts little land except such as is of coarse quality; and it is traversed or impinged upon by the roads from Newmarket to Charleville, from Newmarket to Ballingarry, and from Kanturk to Newcastle.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £170; nett, £158 5s. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are estimated to be worth £85 a-year, and are impropriate in Mr. Hewston of Charleville, and rented by Mr. John Sullivan of Tullaghlease. There is no church; and the curate of the adjoining parish performs the occasional duties for a salary of £50. A private house appears to be sometimes used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of about 16. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Knocktemple and Kilbolane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 2,222; and a pay daily school had on its books 30 boys and 22 girls. Fairs are held at Tullaghlease on Jan. 16, April 29, June 29, Oct. 24, and March 1.

TULLAGHLEASE, co. Down. See TULLYLISH.

TULLAGHMACJAMES, one of several denominations of a bog, situated at a mean distance of 34 miles north by west of Urrlingford, and round the junction-point of co. Tipperary, Munster, with co. Kilkenny and Queen's co., Leinster. The other denominations are Clonmeen, Bawnauaghy, Graigue, Bawnmore, Derryvella, Loug Orchard, and Cooleneey. The bog is bounded, on the north, by Clonmeen and Togher; on the east, by Bawnauaghy and Bawnmore; on the south, by the road from Bawnmore to Derryfadda; and on the west, by Loug Orchard, Killoran, and Cooleneey. Its area is 5,370 acres. Its highest ground lies 434 feet, and its lowest pass for the discharge of water 386 feet, above the level of the sea. Its interior consists principally of fluid peat or quagmire; but its margins are tolerably firm, and have been used as turbary. Its greatest depth is 30 feet; and its mean depth is 19 feet. The Blackwater rivulet runs westward, nearly through its centre, and effects the drainage of a large portion of it to the Suir; and the Templequane rivulet effects the drainage of a district of it on the east to the Nore. Estimated cost of reclamation, £4,868 2s. 6d.

TULLAGHMAIN. See TULLAMAIN.

TULLAGHMELAN, or TULLOCHMELAN, a parish in the barony of West Iffa and Offa, 44 miles south-west by west of Clonmel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, northward, 24 miles; extreme breadth, 14; area, 2,695 acres, 2 roads, 35 perches,—of which 20 acres, 2 roads, 12 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 1,100; in 1841, 1,155. Houses 169. The Suir traces all the eastern boundary, and separates the parish from co. Waterford. The surface consists of good land, exhibits some agreeable natural diversities, possesses a comparative profusion of artificial embellishment, and is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Cork by way of Clonmel. Knocklofty-house, the seat of the Earl of Donoughmore, is a principal feature, charmingly situated on a lofty natural terrace which overlooks the Suir. The mansion itself is a plain structure; but the demesne attached to it is extensively beautiful, and both richly and venerably wooded. Newcastle, the principal hamlet in the parish, had, in 1831, a pop. of 54.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £206 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £14. The rectory of Tullaghmelan, and the parable of MOLOUGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Tullaghmelan. For all practical purposes, however, the parable or parish of Molough is included in the benefice of NEWCASTLE: which see. Gross income of the benefice of Tullaghmelan, £220 15s. 4½d.; nett, £185 2s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefice of Tullaghmelan and the sinecure rectory of Newcastle constitute the corps of the treasurership of Lismore cathedral. Gross income of the sinecure rectory of Newcastle and of lands belonging to the treasurership, £214 10s.; nett, £207 10s. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Shanrahan and Templetemny, in the

dio. of Lismore; and is non-resident in Tullaghmelan. A curate receives a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house. The ruins of an old church exist in the west. The present church stands in the east, near the Suir, and is in excellent repair. Sitings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballybaron. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,122; and a daily school was salaried with £5 a-year from the rector, and £16 17s. and other advantages from Lord Donoughmore, and had on its books 50 boys and 30 girls.

TULLAGHNISKEN, TULLANISKEN, or TULLYNISKEN, a parish in the barony of Dunganon, 3 miles north-north-east of the town of Dunganon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains part of the village of COAL-ISLAND: which see. Length, south-eastward, 31 miles; breadth, from ½ to nearly 2; area, 4,461 acres, 1 road, 3 perches,—of which 26 acres, 9 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,102; in 1841, 4,106. Houses 731. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,936. Houses 701. The surface consists of middle-rate land, and presents a well-cultivated and somewhat ornamental appearance. The minerals appeared for a considerable period to be rich, comprised a principal portion of the coal-field of Ulster, and occasioned an influx of population and seeming promises of prosperity; but they have eventually been found of such comparatively small value as not to compensate the costs of being worked. The canal which was cut to connect the mineral-field, and particularly the village of Coal-Island, with the Blackwater and Lough Neagh, traverses the south-eastern district, and offers all its important facilities of conveyance to trade, but it has for some time been of comparatively little real use. One manufactory of spades is carried on at Coal-Island, and another in the interior of the parish. The principal country residences are Bloom-Hill-house and Lisbue-house. The road from Dunganon to Stewartstown, and that from Moy to Cookstown pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £271 18s. 11d. Gross income, £471 18s. 11d.; nett, £380 18s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1792, at the cost of £553 16s. 11d.,—of which £461 10s. 9½d. were a gift from the late Board of First Fruits, £35 16s. 6½d. were raised by parochial assessment, and £56 9s. 7½d. were the proceeds of private subscription; and a gallery was erected in 1823, at the cost of £73 16s. 11d., of which £39 16s. 5½d. were raised by subscription, and the remainder was raised by parochial assessment. Sitings 300; attendance 300. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Drunglass and Killyman. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,171 Churchmen, 470 Presbyterians, 37 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,448 Roman Catholics; the parochial daily school was salaried with £8 a-year from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and £5 from the rector, and had on its books 100 boys and 40 girls; a daily school at Greenagh was salaried with £2 a-year from Lord Castle-Stewart, and 10s. from the rector, and was usually attended by about 18 scholars; and a pay daily school at Edendock had on its books 78 boys and 46 girls. In 1843, a National school at Edendock was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 100 boys and 43 girls.

TULLAGHOBIGLY, or RYETULLAGHOBIGLY,

a parish on the west coast of the barony of Kilmacrenan, 6 miles south-west of Dunfanaghy, co. Donegal, Ulster. It includes a number of islands, and comprehends a large district on the mainland. Length of the latter, in the direction of south by east, 11½ miles; extreme breadth, 8½. Area of the whole, 68,608 acres, 2 roads, 21 perches,—of which 785 acres, 1 road, 16 perches are in Tory Island, 1,720 acres, 2 roads, 18 perches are in lakes, and 92 acres, 2 roads, 11 perches are tideway of the Guidore. Pop., in 1831, 8,466; in 1841, 9,049. Houses 1,665. The coast extends from the small headland at the east side of the entrance of Ballyness bay, past that bay westward to Bloody-Foreland, and thence southward to the mouth of the Guidore estuary. See BLOODY-FORELAND and GUIDORE. The principal islands belonging to the parish are Tory-Island, Innishbeg, Innishdovey, Innishoblin, Innishirrer, Innismeen, Unfinn-Island, Go-Island, Bo-Island, and Gola-Island. See TORY, INNISHOBLIN, and GOLA. Most of the water area of the parish is comprised in the lakes of Via, Ania, Acarten, Lougha, Nahrack-baddy, Keel, Atirrive, Nannasheefroge, Agannive, Dunlewy, Sand, Trusk, Altan, Alluige, Muilt, and Nacung,—the last of large extent, a prominent feature in the landscape, and possessing a surface-elevation of 188 feet above the level of the sea. The river Guidore flows along the western boundary; and the rivulet Clady flows in the interior westward from Lough Nacung. About one-fourth of the parochial surface is arable land; and all the vast remainder is very mountainous, moorish, or boggy. The summit of Errigal, situated in the east, has an altitude above sea-level of 2,462 feet; the summit-ground of the peninsula which terminates in Bloody-Foreland, has an altitude of 1,035 feet; the summit of North Carn-treeua mountain, situated nearly in the centre of the parish, has an altitude of 1,396 feet; and the summit of West Dooish, situated a few perches beyond the eastern boundary, and within the adjoining parish of Gartan, has an altitude of 2,143 feet. The northern district of the mainland of the parish, and part of the central district, are identical with the greater portion of the little territory of Cloghanely. The village of Falcarragh and the parish-church are situated in the north-east corner of the parish, and at the head of Ballyness bay; a road leads southward thence to Lough Nacung, distant 6½ miles, and has upon it the hamlets and residences of Bedlam, Cashel-glebehouse, Lower Beltany, Upper Beltany, Lower Fawnahoy, and Upper Fawnahoy; a road circles round the coast from Falcarragh, and has upon it Derryconnor hamlet, Magheracourty hamlet, Bonier hamlet, a Roman Catholic chapel, Magheraclogher hamlet, and the hamlet of Clady-Bridge; and a road comes in from Millford, past West Dooish, proceeds westward down the vale of Lough Nacung and the Clady rivulet, and has on or near it Money-more hamlet, Dunlewy hamlet, and Dunlewy-house. Most of the objects and scenes of chief interest within the parish are noticed as follows in the excellent Hand-Book of Mr. Fraser:—"The glen through which the road winds from Muckish to Falcarragh, displays some very lofty and magnificent mountain scenery; and as we proceed, the ocean, Tory-Island, and the islets nearer the land, Horn-Head, the coast, and country along the shore, gradually open to view; and from parts of the descent to Falcarragh, many of the scenes connected with this part of the coast are exhibited in their most interesting points of view. The small town of Falcarragh, which is pleasantly situated in the centre of a flat and comparatively fertile part of the country, contains a small inn where a car can be hired, a post-office, and two good shops which supply necessities to the surrounding district. The coast-guard station is a short distance from the town; and about a mile to the west is the church of Tullaghobigly. * * The head of Ballyness bay is about a mile from Falcarragh. It runs about two and a half miles into the land, and is about a mile and a half in breadth. It branches out into several arms, along which there are considerable tracts of fertile lands. This part of the country is, in common with the whole line of coast, very bleak and much exposed to the influence of the storms, from whatever point they blow, but chiefly to the Atlantic winds. Ballyness bay is completely barred with sand, and long tracts of dreary arid dunes, partially covered with sea-bent, lie along the sea-beaten shores. * * There is a good road from Falcarragh to Dunfanaghy on the one hand, and another is carried along the coast by Clady and Gweebarra bridges to Dunlough. The summit of Bloody-Foreland, which is a tame and softly-rounded heath-clad hill, is about eight miles west from Falcarragh. Its altitude is 1,035 feet; and it commands an extensive view of the coast and of the bleak moorland, of which the greater part of the district called Cloghanely is composed. In proceeding, we pass the hamlets of Bedlam and Derryconnor at from one and a-half to three miles from Falcarragh, and in rounding the points of Ballyness bay, some beautifully romantic scenes are presented to view. Cashel-glebe-house, the residence of the rector of Tullaghobigly, is about a mile above the hamlet of Bedlam, and about two and a-half miles from Falcarragh; and a little above it are upper and lower Beltany. These places are situated near the foot of the beautiful mountain glen which runs from Ballyness bay to Dunlewy. * * At two miles from Glenbeg bridge we reach Calabarger bridge, and thence proceed along the new road by Dunlewy to the sea, passing through an interesting and reclaimable valley, which is bounded on the south by the mountain of Dooish, and on the north by Errigal and the mountain group which connects with it. Dunlewy-house, the occasional residence of J. Dombain, Esq., is situated near a small lough of that name which connects with the larger Lough Nacung. The two are about two miles long, and a third of a mile broad, and from the source of the Clady; they stretch along the southern base of Errigal, and add much to the splendid scenery around that fine mountain. Errigal, which is the great feature of the district, and the highest mountain in Donegal, raises its conical summit to the height of 2,462 feet. The ascent to it is easy by commencing by about a mile to the eastward, where the sides of the mountain gently blend with the high adjoining moorlands. From the summit of Errigal, which is very narrow under favourable circumstances, a magnificent view is obtained of a great part of the mountainous district of Donegal, and of a long range of coast." See ARRIGAL.—Tullaghobigly is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £220; glebe, £30. Gross income, £250; nett, £220 8s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1792 by means of a gift of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 25.* The Roman Catholic chapel at Gortaburk has an attendance of 2,000; and that at Gorteen has an attendance of 1,200. In 1854, the parishioners consisted of 241 Churchmen, 61 Presbyterians, and 8,569 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. and other advantages from Robinson's Fund, and the others were pay schools at Ardes, Cross-Roads,

* Just at the date of the report, the church was unroofed, and many of the parishioners were attending Raymunder's church.

Derrybeg, Bedlam, and Magheraorty—had on their books 94 boys and 37 girls. In 1843, one National school at Derrybeg was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 69 boys and 44 girls; one at Tory Island, with £8, and had 40 boys and 19 girls; one at Gortahurk, with £12, and had 58 boys and 23 girls; one at Meenacaddy, with £8, and had 30 boys and 10 girls; one at Dunlo, with £6 13s. 4d., and had 25 boys and 10 girls; one at Buninaver, with £8, and had 53 boys and 25 girls; and one at Dore, with £8, and had 50 boys and 36 girls. Tullaghobigley is divided for civil purposes into two districts, East and West. Pop., in 1831, of East Tullaghobigley, 5,203; of West Tullaghobigley, 3,263.

TULLAGHOG, or TULLYHOG, a village in the parish of Desertrcright, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the road from Cookstown to Stewartstown, 3 furlongs east of the village of Desertrcright, 2 miles south-south-east of Cookstown, and 2½ north-west by west of Stewartstown. Adjoining it is the glebe-house of Desertrcright. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 137; in 1841, 103. Houses 21.

TULLAGHONOH, or TULLYHUNCO, a barony in the west of the county of Cavan, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Tullaghagh and Lower Loughtee; on the east, by the baronies of Lower Loughtee, Upper Loughtee, and Clonmahon; on the south, by the county of Longford; and, on the west, by the counties of Longford and Leitrim, and the barony of Tullaghagh. Its length, southward, is 14 miles; its greatest breadth is 5; and its area is 40,891 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 2,801 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches are water. The northern part of the central district consists of good land, and has a rich and ornate appearance; but some portions of the other districts are hills and moors of comparatively little value, and nearly all are bleak and disagreeable. Some good scenery, however, occurs in the extreme south, among the intricate shores and the singular screens of Lough Gowna. By far the greater part of the water area of the parish is comprised in parts of Loughs Gowna and Oughter; and most of the remainder is in the small lakes, Clonty, Lagheen, Town, Bawn, Derryskit, Dumb, Mill, Rockfield, Gorty, and Swan. The river Erne flows northward through the interior; and the Woodford river flows on the northern boundary.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Kildallon, Killeshandra, and Scrabby. The towns and chief villages are Killeshandra, Arragh, and Scrabby. Pop., in 1831, 18,722; in 1841, 19,808. Houses 3,394. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,551; in manufactures and trade, 753; in other pursuits, 284. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 96; on the directing of labour, 1,254; on their own manual labour, 2,144; on means not specified, 94. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,488; who could read but not write, 1,730; who could neither read nor write, 3,400. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,753; who could read but not write, 2,577; who could neither read nor write, 4,361.—Tullaghonoh lies partly within the Poor-law union of Cavan, and partly within that of Granard. The total number of tenements valued is 2,541; and of these, 848 are valued under £5,—897, under £10,—411, under £15,—153, under £20,—94, under £25,—40, under £30,—43, under £40,—18, under £50,—and 37, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £22,085 4s. 5d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840 were £2,129 10s. 5d., and £1,508 11s. 6d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £1,697 5s. 6d., and £1,419 8s. 6d.

TULLAGHORTON, a parish 2 miles east by north of Clogheen, barony of West Liffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 3½; area, 6,889 acres, 36 perches,—of which 7 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches are in Lough Bay. Pop., in 1831, 1,965; in 1841, 2,198. Houses 331. The surface is part of the southern verge of the county, and climbs to the summit-line of the Knockmeledown mountains; and it consists of a section of these mountains, and a section of the valley of the Tar. About one-half is mountainous ground, in two moieties respectively waste and reclaimed; and about the other half is limestone land, well adapted to either tillage or pasturage. The Sugarloaf mountain, on the southern boundary, attains an altitude of 2,144 feet above sea-level; a streamlet, which tumbles down along the western boundary, descends while there from an elevation of 1,460 feet to a confluence with the Tar, at an elevation of about 160 feet; and the Tar, while running eastward through the interior, descends to an elevation of 124 feet. The little lake Bay lies in the southern district among the mountains. The principal residence is Ballybay-house; the principal hamlet is Ballybay; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of a church, the ruins of a castle, and the site of a castle. The mail-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Clonmel, passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial title composition, £138 9s. 3d.; glebe, £1 10s. Gross income, £139 19s. 3d.; nett, £132 7s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Clonmel, in the dio. of Lismore, and is non-resident in Tullaghorton. A curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £10. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £250; and are appropriated to the sinecure prebend of Tullaghorton, held by a separate incumbent. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tubbrid. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 2,036; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 126 boys and 56 girls.

TULLAGHOUGHT, TULLAGHOUGHT, TULLAGHTHOUGHT, or TULLOGAUGHT, a parish in the barony of Kells, 2½ miles south-south-west of Kilmaganny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,601 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,563; in 1841, 1,750. Houses 269. The parish lies at the southern extremity of the barony, and on the western verge of the county; and is traversed by the road from Knocktopher to Carrick-on-Suir. The pop. of 1831 is not returned by the Census, and, as exhibited in the report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, is inclusive of 25 in the district of Brown-mountain, which is alleged to be extra-parochial on account of never having paid tithes or church rates. One height on the southern boundary of the parish has an altitude above sea-level of 788 feet; and one in the northern district has an altitude of 484 feet. The principal hamlets are Tullaghought, Cassan, Carragh, Barnathasoma, and Ellenmount; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of a castle, and the ruins of two churches. Near the hamlet of Tullaghought is Kilmacoliver, the seat of Mr. Osborne; and near that seat is the Ormond slate-quarry.—This parish is an entirely inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. "Tullaghought," say the Commissioners of Public Instruction, "is wholly inappropriate, and no curate is paid by the proprietor. The spiritual duties are performed by the perpetual curate of Kilmaganny, and it is doubtful whether Tullaghought is not joined to this parish in respect of cure of souls, as it once paid church rates to Kilmaganny, though the payment was disputed." In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 1,578; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 80 boys and 46 girls.

TULLALEASE. See TULLAGHLEASE.

TULLAMACJAMES. See TULLAGHMACJAMES.

TULLAMAIN, a parish in the barony of Shillelogher, 2 miles north-east of Callan, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,171 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 416; in 1841, 294. Houses 45. The surface consists, in general, of very good land; and is drained southward, through the centre, by a small affluent of the King's river, and traversed south-westward by the mail-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Clonmel. A graveyard marks the site of the ancient church.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CALLAN [which see], in the dio. of Osory. Tithe composition, £105. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 410; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TULLAMAIN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3 miles west of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. It consists of a main body and a detached district, the latter situated 3 furlongs west of the nearest point of the former. Length of the main body, in the direction of west by south, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Length of the detached district, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 7 furlongs. Area of the whole, 2,217 acres, 13 perches; of the detached district, 470 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 941, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 503; in 1841, 688. Houses 103. The surface consists, in general, of good land. The main body contains a very large aggregate of demesne-ground and woodland, belonging to the seats of Tullamain-castle and Tullamain-lodge,—the former the residence of John Meagher, Esq. The detached district contains the hamlet of Rosegreen, a National school, a constabulary barrack, and the ruins of a church. The road from Cashel to Clonmel crosses the south-west corner of the detached district; and the direct road from Fethard to Tipperary passes through both that district and the main body.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £140; nett, £125 7s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Red-City, in the dio. of Cashel, and the benefice of Enly, in the dio. of Enly; and is non-resident in Tullamain. There is no church; and a curate performs the occasional duties of Tullamain and Red-City for a stipend of £5. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 20 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 504 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 151 boys and 63 girls.

TULLAMORE, a parish. See KILBRIDE-TULLAMORE.

TULLAMORE,

A post and market town, and the capital of King's county, in the parish of Kilbride-Tullamore, barony of Ballycowan, King's county, Leinster. It stands on the Grand Canal, on a small affluent of the river Clodagh, on the road from Moate to Portllington, and on the north road from Birr to Dublin, 5½ miles south of Kilbeggan, 5½ south-east of Clara, 7½ west-south-west of Philipstown, 9½ north-east by east of Frankford, 11 south-east of Moate, 11½ north-west by west of Mountmellick, 12½ north-west of Portllington, 17 west-south-west of Edenderry, 17½ north-east by east of Birr, and 46½ west by south of Dublin.

Environs.—The site and the immediate environs of Tullamore are a sort of oasis in the vast tract of morass which bears the name of the Bog of Allen, and constitutes a prominent portion of central Leinster. See ALLEN (BOG OF). Most of the approaches to the town conduct through scenes of bleakness, sterility, and dreariness, peculiarly repulsive and depressing; yet the immediate environs, though quite destitute of any very striking natural feature, possess a comparative profusion of artificial decoration, and compose a general picture of a decidedly pleasing and even softly beautiful character. The noble, extensive, and richly-wooded demesne of Lord Charleville, adjoining the south-west side of the town, not only contributes a great and charming feature to the general landscape, but also contains within itself a series of very fine close views. See CHARLEVILLE. Durrow-Abbey demesne, situated nearly 3 miles to the north-north-west, and long the residence of the Stepney family, possesses interest as the site of one or two singular objects of antiquarian curiosity, but particularly as the scene of the mysterious murder of the late unfortunate Lord Norbury. See DUNNOW. Slagh or Sraghkearne-castle, situated on the banks of the canal, within a few minutes' walk of the west side of the town, is an old fortalice, built in 1588 by John Briscoe, an Elizabethan officer. The upper windows of this old tower are accessible by a spiral stone stair, and command a pleasing view of Lord Charleville's deerpark. The estate of Slagh, on which the fortalice stands, originally belonged to a family of the name of Kearney; and a part of their old mansion, inhabited by them prior to 1588, still stands adjacent to the tower. Other objects of chief interest within about 3 miles of the town, are the seats or villas of Brookfield-house, Clonad-house, Ross-house, Castlevue, Sereggan, Coleraine-house, and Silverbrook, the woods of Derryclare, Derrygonan, Scrob, Clonad, Bracklin, and Oe, and the ruins of Killurin church, of Ballycowan-castle, of Ballykilnurry-castle, and of five other churches and three other castles. A stone with date and armorial bearings in the castle of Ballycowan, was picked out of the wall by an enthusiastic local antiquary, and conveyed to his residence in Tullamore.

Progress of the Town.—“About 14 years ago,” said Sir Charles Coote in 1801, “Tullamore was but a very mean village, with scarce any better houses than thatched cabins, which were almost destroyed by accidental fire, occasioned by the launching of a balloon, and has since risen, phoenix-like, from its ashes to its present pre-eminence. It is certainly the best town in the county, and bids fair to be little inferior to any town in Ireland. The houses are all slated, built mostly two stories in height, and ornamented with window-stools and top-courses of a fine hewn stone. * * * Lord Charleville gives the utmost encouragement for building. He has hitherto invariably let leases for ever of the town plots, at 1s. per foot in front, and the tenant gets three lives of a reasonable proportion of the adjoining parks from 16s. to 20s. per acre. So rapidly has this town increased in wealth and consequence within these few years, that these parks now set for six guineas per acre, and are sought for with avidity at a still more enormous rent.” The improvement of the town previous to 1800 was probably more rapid than that of any other town in Ireland, and seems to have been occasioned partly by the reaction which followed its calamity, but chiefly by the judicious, liberal, and stimulating encouragement of Lord Charleville; and though it has not been proportionally rapid till the present period, it has continued, on the whole, to be progressive and decided. First the opening of the Grand Canal, next the extension of that rock, next the introduction upon it of light passage-boats, and next the increase of its traffic by the introduction of steam navigation upon the Shannon, have successively exerted a beneficial effect upon Tullamore; and finally, the accomplishment of the project—so long desiderated, so often proposed, and so unaccountably delayed—of removing hither the county business from the miserable bog-environment village of Philipstown, has given a powerful and permanent acceleration to the town's prosperity. A curious fact, however, is that the best private residences in the town were built before the commencement of the present century.

Streets and Buildings.—The streets are regular, wide, and well-aligned; many of the shops and the private dwellings display a neatness, an amplitude, and a pretension, which would do credit to a place of much greater population and importance; and the general appearance of the town, not only as seen groupedly from without, but as examined street by street from within, is cleanly, modern, and respectable. The parish-church stands on a rising ground, and among some fine old trees, in the vicinity of the town; and is a highly creditable structure, built in 1818 after designs by the architect, Mr. F. Johnston. The old parish-church is now a ruin, and stands at Kilbride, about a mile from the town. Protestant religious service was long conducted in a chapel-of-ease built in 1726. The Roman Catholic chapel is a large and somewhat pretending edifice, but has a lumpy appearance, and produces an effect upon the fancy more striking than agreeable. The two Methodist meeting-houses are plain buildings. The principal schools are a free school, supported by Lord Charleville; a school in connection with the National Board; and a school in connection with the Baptist Society. An old horse barrack at the end of Barrack-street, is spacious, and—as appears from an inscription on the right pier of the entrance-gate—was erected in 1716. Within the upper rooms of the barrack, in 1761, a splendid entertainment was given to the townspeople, by the then Earl of Charleville, in honour of the coronation of George III. The gaol and the court-house—usually the most conspicuous objects in an Irish county town—are a singularly arresting and pleasing feature in Tullamore, standing adjacent to each other on a raised platform at the west end of the town, and displaying with great effect their respective styles of architecture, the one castellated and the other Grecian. The gaol is, of course, a new structure; it has from its first occupation, been kept in good order, and under sound regulations; and it contains 124 single cells, 5 solitary cells, 8 day-rooms and 2 for females, 8 work-rooms, 7 yards and 2 for females, 1 excellent steam-kitchen, 1 chapel of 8 divisions, 2 hospitals with each 6 wards, and 2 laundries. During 1843, the average number of prisoners was 121²/₃; the maximum number 160; the total number, inclusive of debtors, 950; the number of recommitments 26; and the total expenditure, £1,678 17s. 5¹/₂d. The Poor-law union workhouse is a conspicuous object in the vicinity of the town. The only other noticeable public building is the county hospital.

Poor-law Union.—The Poor-law union of Tullamore ranks as the 74th, and was declared on Sept. 16, 1839. It lies partly in co. Westmeath, but chiefly in King's co., and comprehends an area of

137,908 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 52,852. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are, in co. Westmeath Rahugh, 1,736, and Kilbeggan, 4,759; and in King's co., Durrow, 2,484, Tullamore, 11,519, Killough, 4,019, Raham, 4,032, Ballycommon, 1,266, Killelconfert, 1,187, Philipstown, 3,409, Kilmonaghan, 3,358, Clara, 5,416, Rathfeston, 1,559, Killeagh, 2,399, Cappincor, 3,070, and Genshill, 2,609. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 24; and 5 of the latter are elected by the division of Tullamore, 2 by each of the divisions of Kilbeggan, Killough, Raham, Philipstown, and Clara, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Rahugh and Kilbeggan lie within the barony of Moycashel; the division of Durrow lies partly in the barony of Moycashel, but chiefly in that of Ballycowan; * the divisions of Tullamore and Raham lie in the barony of Ballycowan; the division of Killough lies in the barony of Ballyboy; the divisions of Ballycommon, Killelconfert, and Philipstown, lie in the barony of Lower Philipstown; the divisions of Kilmonaghan and Clara lie in the barony of Kilcoursey; the division of Rathfeston lies in the barony of Upper Philipstown; and the divisions of Killeagh, Cappincor, and Genshill, lie in the barony of Genshill. The number of valued tenements in the Moycashel districts is 1,330, in the Ballyboy district, 789, in the Ballycowan districts, 3,207, in the Genshill districts, 1,407, in the Kilcoursey districts, 1,673, in the Lower Philipstown districts, 1,028, in the Upper Philipstown district, 224, in the whole union, 9,757; and of this total, 6,166 are valued under £5, 1,596, under £10, 702, under £15, 390, under £20, 256, under £25, 132, under £30, 166, under £40, 94, under £50, 25, and 255 at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £87,818 8s.; the total number of persons rated is 9,757; and of these, 2,137 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1, 1,851, not exceeding £2, 956, not exceeding £3, 673, not exceeding £4, and 583, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on April 13, 1840,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £5,950 for building and completion, and £1,265 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches, obtained for £585 of purchase-money, and £100 of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was June 9, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,651 1s. 1d.; and the total previous expenditure was £827 0s. 4d. The number of pauper inmates in Dec. 1842 was 291. The medical charities within the union are an infirmary at Tullamore, and dispensaries at Clara, Genshill, Kilbeggan, and Philipstown; and, in 1839-40, they received £214 7s. 9d. from subscription, £846 17s. 5d. from public grants, and £59 9s. 8¹/₂d. from other sources, expended £488 2s. 3¹/₂d. in salaries to medical officers, £160 7s. 5¹/₂d. for medicines, and £494 6s. 11¹/₂d. for contingencies, admitted 475 intern patients, and administered to 4,654 external patients. The infirmary at Tullamore serves for the whole of King's county;

* The portion of this division within Moycashel, says an official report of 1843, "is the small townland of Raheenbeg isolated in the barony of Ballycowan, King's county, to which it has been annexed by a proclamation of the Lord-lieutenant and council, dated 9th February, 1842, in pursuance of the General Valuation Act, 6 and 7 William IV.; but as this transfer does not affect the present registered electors, except that the period of registry shall expire in each case, it has been considered advisable to require the clerk of the union to distinguish the number, however few, of the tenements transferred."

Trade, &c.—Tullamore, in consequence both of its position on the Grand Canal, and its central situation in reference to the surrounding country, is a place of considerable business. It is the principal town and chief shipping station on the entire line of the canal, and besides being touched by all the boats in transit to Dublin from both Ballinasloe and the Shannon, it has swift iron passage-boats of its own in communication with the metropolis. Fairs are held on March 19, May 10, July 10, Oct. 21, and Dec. 13. All the usual handicrafts, stores, and other appliances exist for the accommodation of a great inland agricultural market, and for the supply of an extensive rural district with the miscellaneous goods of a general retail trade. The average annual amount of the sales of grain during the 10 years ending in 1836, consisted of 45,000 barrels of wheat of 26 stones per barrel, 35,000 barrels of oats of 16 stones per barrel, and 20,000 barrels of barley of 16 stones per barrel. A brewery and a large distillery have long been at work; and the linen manufacture was long ago introduced. The town has a savings' bank, and a branch office of the Bank of Ireland. In 1843, the Tullamore Loan Fund had a capital of £920, circulated £3,331 in 1,618 loans, realized a nett profit of £58 14s. 1^dl., and expended for charitable purposes £24. At the principal inn, post-horses and carriages can be hired; and at some other inns, cars may be had. A public car passes through the town, in transit between Birr and Mullingar. Tullamore is the head-quarters of the constabulary of King's county, and of one of the 5 districts of that force; the residence of a stipendiary magistrate; and the seat of the courts of assize for the county, of courts of quarter-sessions, and of courts of petty-sessions—the last on every Saturday.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 223 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,342; in 1841, 6,342. Houses 1,061. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 43; in manufactures and trade, 565; in other pursuits, 754. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 159; on the directing of labour, 540; on their own manual labour, 579; on means not specified, 84. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,201; who could read but not write, 358; who could neither read nor write, 958. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 872; who could read but not write, 688; who could neither read nor write, 1,515.—Tullamore gives the subordinate title of Baron to the Earl of Charleville.

TULLAROAN, a parish in the barony of Craughagh, 44 miles south-south-west of Freshford, and on the western border of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 12,359 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 3,962, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,631; in 1841, 3,490. Houses 535. Pop. of the village of Tullaroan, in 1831, 182. Houses 31. The original or uncorrupted name is Tullaghrohan; it is formed of two Irish words which signify a hill and a rivulet; and it aptly designates a district of hilly and much diversified surface, enlivened by the silver lines of numerous streams. Tullaroan lies within the extensive cantred of Grace's country, which belonged for centuries to the family of Grace; it gave the family one of their titles, and, on account of its central situation, was adopted as their principal residence; and, in this connection, it has often borne the alias name of Grace's parish. It comprises 29 townlands; and is divided into two sections, called First Tullaroan, and Second Tullaroan. It consists of a series of hills round the borders, and of a large interior valley, in which a number of subordinate vales meet; and though not remarkably wet, is oftener washed by showers than the great central plain of the county. A rivulet rises on the northern boundary, runs southward through the interior, receives little tributaries from all the hills which surround the valley, and pursues its way southward, to fall eventually into the King's river. The Munster river runs along the western boundary, and separates the parish of Tullaroan from the county of Tipperary. One summit on the north-western boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,081 feet; one on the south-eastern boundary has an altitude of 700 feet; and four in the interior have altitudes of respectively 809, 942, 957, and 971 feet. Three-fourths of the surface "consist of hills, which enclose an uncommon fine vale of rich pasturable and meadow ground, opening to the south on the rich and well-planted country that lies between it and the southern mountains of the counties of Kilkenny and Tipperary, with Slievenaman rising majestically to the view, at about seven miles' distance. The landscape of the parish is as good as it is possible for a piece of ground without wood and water to be. There is a great diversity of surface in the vale; round these the hills beautifully undulate; between these, a number of small valleys run into a great vale, and which, if planted, would make a very fine appearance. The hills are all capable of cultivation to the top, and are part of a branch of hills which run in a western direction from this parish into the county of Tipperary for several miles. The vale consists of a fine aluminous soil, capable of the highest improvement, especially from the number of streams that run through calcareous beds. The calcareous earth that is to be found in many parts of it, must necessarily cause a great mixture of carbonate of lime, which is the most productive soil that can be found in this country. The soil of the hills consists of argillaceous clay and peat, every acre of which lime and marl could reclaim." A comparatively small aggregate of boggy and moorish ground lies dispersed in pedicles, and is all of a kind which can be easily reclaimed. There are no woods. Culin is almost everywhere found; and thin seams of coal occur. Limestone is not known to occur in situ within the great interior valley, but abounds in boulders along the course of the streams. Ferruginous argillite is the prevailing rock of the hills; and siliceous schist is raised in a few quarries.

Tullaroan being comprehended in the territory of Leinster, became, on the demise of King Dermot MacMurrough, the property of Richard, Earl of Pembroke, surnamed Strongbow, by whom the district subsequently termed Grace's Country, was, with other lands, bestowed on Raymond le Gros in marriage with Basilia de Clare, his only sister. It would appear that various small portions of this great territory were granted in fee, at an early period, though probably the paramount jurisdiction of the Grace family continued to be acknowledged. That powerful family had, for their principal seat, Courtstown-castle, in which noble building they continued to reside, with possession of the extensive tract emphatically denominated Grace's Country, until the year 1701, at which time was carried into effect an act of forfeiture, incurred by a zealous adherence to the disastrous fortunes of the second James. The history of this unexpected and ruinous forfeiture, unfolds one of the most sordid and malevolent acts of treachery presented by the annals of Irish topography, even in pages relating to the bitter animosities of the seventeenth century. Baron John Grace, of Courtstown, was a minor at the time the manor of Tullaroan was seized by the commonwealth, after the temporary triumph of the popular party, in the expulsion of the Stuart family. By a special ordinance of the lord-protector, however, he recovered that manor and other large estates; and these were specifically confirmed to him by the act of settlement on the Restoration. Steadfast in his principle of adherence to the Stuart family, he afterwards raised and equipped, at his own expense, a regiment of foot in the service of James II., and shared in the misfortunes of his party, on the utter discomfiture of that prince's hopes at the battle of the Boyne. Baron John Grace died in 1690, leaving, among other issue, Robert Grace, the next proprietor of Tullaroan. This Robert was lieutenant-colonel of his father's regiment of foot, in the service of King James; but the Courtstown estates were for some time secured to his family by the articles of Limerick, in which himself and his second son, John, were included. He died in 1691, leaving issue two sons, Oliver and John. Baron Oliver Grace, of Courtstown, survived his father only nine days, dying unmarried in 1691. He held, for a short period, the rank of major in the army of King James, when severe indisposition obliged him to retire to the south of France, after which he never saw his father, or even knew of his decease, having returned in exhausted health, a very short time preceding that event, and consequently subsequent to the ratification of the treaty of Limerick. In this treaty his father and his younger brother, as we have already seen, were included, though his fatal absence from Ireland necessarily precluded him from participating in its benefits. These circumstances were known only to his immediate family, and the utmost secrecy was observed respecting them, as certain ruin was evidently involved in the disclosure. Their marked and efficient exertions for King James against the prevailing government, and their great possessions were no ordinary incentives to confiscation. On his death the manor of Tullaroan, and his other estates, which, as he was ignorant of his father's death, he never even knew he had inherited, immediately passed to his next brother, John Grace, then of Courtstown-castle. In his undisturbed possession they remained till the year 1701, when a bill of discovery was maliciously filed against him by the Dowager Viscountess Dillon (the relict of his uncle, Sheffield Grace), upon his refusing to comply with her demand of £500, which she had endeavoured to extort from him by threat of this base disclosure. He was necessarily obliged, by this most infamous act, to set forth his title before the court of claims, where the treacherous informer had previously discovered the concealed circumstance of Oliver's survivorship. His estates were soon pronounced to have been forfeited by his elder brother Oliver, the presumed proprietor of them for nine days, who was found (under the general act of attainder against King James's adherents), to have been indicted and outlawed in the county of Meath, for bearing arms under that prince; which outlawry, owing to his absence from Ireland, on the surrender of Limerick, had never been reversed. Tullaroan and his other estates, thus forfeited, produced at that time an annual rent exceeding £9,000, and had been in the possession of the Grace family 530 years. The village of Tullaroan at present consists of a few cabins, and the neighbourhood entirely depends for interest with the traveller on the ruins of ancient buildings, and the tales of other times. To those who derive pleasure from traditional story, Grace's Country affords an almost exhaustless source of amusement. The various contests between the Graces, the Fitzpatricks, the MacMurroughs, and other rival sects in the days of black rent and coigne and livery, before the power of the laws efficiently interfered in the adjustment of party quarrels, are still locally mentioned as events of importance to the feelings of the existing generation."

Courtstown-castle, the magnificent residence of the barons of Grace's Country, is separately noticed. See COURTSTOWN. A tradition prevails that the original pile, or Tullaroan-castle, occupied a different site from Courtstown-castle, and was destroyed in a hostile irruption of the Irish. Almost every townland contains a rath, a moat, a lis, a Druid's chair, or some other pagan remain of religion or defence. The most perfect one of the raths is situated in the townland of Courtstown, and consists of a central citadel of nearly half-an-acre in area, surrounded by a very deep fosse, and concentric exterior intrichments, enclosing an area of about 6 acres. Two other raths, supposed to have been "talk-moats" or places of assembly, are situated within $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile of the large rath; and they are about 50 yards in diameter, and have burrows or mounds in the middle, and a step or swell in the ground along the side banks,—the whole enclosed with fosses. Another large rath occurs on the lands of Rathely-Grace, on the northern border of the parish; it is situated in the midst of fine undulating pasture hills, overlooking the valley of Clomanta on the north, and the valley of Tullaroan on the south; and it comprises a fosse-enclosed citadel of nearly two acres in area, and may still be traced, as to its exterior rampart, in very large banks and dykes across the adjoining fields. A moat or place of assembly, consisting of an artificial mound, 20 feet in height, and cut round with a tier of seats or steps, occurs within 50 yards of the old church of Tullaroan. The interesting ruins of Tullaroan church and Grace's chapel, forming one group of masonry, and both founded by the Grace family, are situated about $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile to the east of Courtstown-castle. "The architecture of the church exhibits nothing curious or uncommon, though many circumstances mark its antiquity. Its smallness, its semicircular as well as pointed arches and narrow oblong windows, seem to indicate that its construction was in the 12th century. The east and south exterior walls are still standing, but most of the north wall has been thrown down, and the high gable to the west is nodding to its ruin. The eastern window, consisting of two narrow oblong divisions, is still entire. An entrance through a pointed arch, and 3 windows, are to the south. The interior consists of a choir 35 feet by 18, and a nave 37 feet long, divided by a wall, through which is a pierced high pointed arch, supporting a belfry. In the choir there are two seats erected in the wall, which must have been constructed long after the church was built,—as the arches of them are beautifully turned, in the order of Henry VII.'s chapel, which Dr. Milner calls the second order of the pointed arch. Had the person who got these erected, also got the east window altered, and its arch made of the same order, Tullaroan church would have presented a singularly handsome appearance even in decay. There is a niche in the south wall near the eastern window terminating with a pointed arch at top, and at bottom with a concave stone for the purpose probably of containing the holy water. Beyond this niche is a small arched doorway leading from the church into Grace's chapel, which forms the southern wing of Tullaroan church, and produces in the general outline of the building the figure of a Greek gamma Γ , or two sides of an oblong. The dimensions of this chapel are about 27 feet by 17, and the workmanship of it is so excellent, that the exterior walls are to this day almost uninjured, though for more than two centuries exposed to every vicissitude of weather. It has two narrow windows of pointed arches, adorned with labels to the east, a large window consisting of three similar divisions to the south, and to the west a window like those to the east, and a very richly ornamented entrance through a pointed arch. This doorway is profusely decorated with sculpture in bold alto-relievo. The exterior mouldings of a very deep architrave meet in a high point, surmounted with a large trefoil leaf, on either side of which are smaller trefoil leaves, that terminate an exceeding rich catenation work, formed from the interwoven stocks of the bearded corn-ears and trefoil leaves which project alternately from this vegetable chain. At the turn of the arch on each exterior side of the architrave, is a knot of four leaves curiously entwined, somewhat similar to a Stafford knot; and lower down, another description of knot with two leaves, and at bottom a large single rose. The intricate moulding of these flowers in Kilkenny marble, exhibits an astonishing degree of accuracy and delicate precision. A rose is also on each side of the large trefoil leaf already mentioned, as surmounting the architrave, and over this trefoil leaf stand the armorial bearings of the founder." In the village of Tullaroan, about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile north of the church, are two handsome stone crosses, erected by the Grace family; and at a place about 2 miles distant, on the road to Kilkenny, is another stone cross.—Tullaroan parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CALLAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £513 4s. 4d. The Roman Catholic chapel is a well built structure, situated in the village of Tullaroan, and has an attendance of from 1,600 to 1,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Freshford and Three-Castles. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 3,685; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 150 boys and 78 girls. A small portion of the quoad civilia portion—that portion, apparently, which contained the surplus population in the Census returns of 1831 over the returns of the Ecclesiastical Authorities—is included in the quoad sacra parish of Clomanta; and, in 1834, a pay daily school in this district was usually attended by about 45 girls in summer, and about 12 in winter. In 1843, a school for boys and a school for girls in the village of Tullaroan were salaried with respectively £15 and £8 a-year from the National Board, and had on their books 267 boys and 180 girls.

TULLIG, a village in the parish of Kilhallyowen, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated amidst a bleak district of country, about a mile from the nearest part of the coast, 3 miles west-north-west of Carrigaholt, and 6½ south-west of Killee. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 269. Houses 50.

TULLIG-POINT, a small headland on the north coast of the parish of Kilhallyowen, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west by south of the village of Tullig, and 5½ north-east by east of Loop Head. Its altitude above sea-level is 189 feet.

TULLOW, or TULLOPHELIN, a parish in the barony of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. It contains, on its western margin, a part of the town of Tullow; see next article. Length, southward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,889 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,688; in 1841, 4,478. Houses 730. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,459. Houses 398. The surface, in a general view, is pleasantly diversified, and consists of very good land. The highest ground is in the north-west, and has an altitude above sea-level of 386 feet. The river Slaney waters all the northern and the western boundaries, and descends while there from an elevation of upwards of 276 feet to one of 108 feet; and the rivulet Derreen flows along the western boundary, and has, about the middle point of its progress there, an elevation of 248 feet. The principal country residences are Ballymurphy-house, Coppenghous, Rathglass-house, Paulville-house, and Tullow-cottage,—the last the occasional seat of Robert Doyne, Esq.; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of Templemore church, the ruins of Coppengh-castle, the site of another castle, and the fort of Moatadower. The road from Dublin to Newtownbarry passes through the interior. Within the limits of Tullow, as we have stated them, lies the townland or quondam parish of Tankardstown.—Tullow parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £600; glebe, £32. Gross income, £632; nett, £581 18s. Patron, the Marquis of Ormond. The church was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £1,689 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 355. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Pubbledrum and Grange. In 1834, the inhabitants of Tullow, exclusive of Tankardstown, consisted of 500 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 2,092 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of Tankardstown consisted of 42 Churchmen, and 1,059 Roman Catholics; 4 daily schools in Tullow-proper,—one of which was supported by subscription, and one salaried with £20 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 378 boys and 68 girls; and 2 pay daily schools in Tankardstown had on their books 101 boys and 72 girls.

TULLOW, a market and post town, partly in the parish of Fennagh, but chiefly in that of Tullow, barony of Rathvilly, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the river Slaney, and on the road from Dublin to Wexford by way of Newtownbarry, 4½ miles south-south-west of Rathvilly, 7½ west by south of Carlow, 7½ south-west by west of Hacketstown, 8½ south by west of Balinglass, 10 north by west of Newtownbarry, 10½ west of Tinehelly, and 38 south-south-west of Dublin. The surrounding country is, on all sides, pleasantly diversified; and towards the south and the east, blends in noble perspective with the mountains of Wicklow. The land, over all the environs to a considerable distance, has a rich soil, is in a state of good cultivation, and displays the agreeable accompaniment of neat and comfortable, though small farm-houses. The Slaney is spanned at the town by an elegant stone bridge. The public buildings are a parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a small monastery, a small convent, a fever hospital, a sessions-house, and several schools. The church and the Roman Catholic chapel are handsome modern structures, the former adorned with a tower and the latter with a spire; and these shoot so aloft from the general mass of the town's architecture as to form striking features in the landscape, and to draw the attention to the town from a great distance in the surrounding country. The inmates of the monastery and the nunnery superintend three of the schools in the town. The fever hospital is within the Carlow Poor-law union, and serves principally for the mere town of Tullow; and, in 1839-40, it expended £198 19s. 1d., and admitted 228 patients. A dispensary attached to the fever hospital, serves for a district of 27,710 acres, with a pop. of 9,861; and, in 1839-40, it expended £76 10s., and administered to 1,705 patients. An old monastic establishment stood at Tullow; but hardly anything is known respecting it, except that its inmates followed the rule of St. Augustine, and that its possessions were granted, at some time subsequent to the general dissolution, to Thomas, Earl of Ormonde. "The castle of Tullow was erected late in the 12th century, by order of the Anglo-Norman government, under the inspection of Hugh De Lacy, Earl of Meath. This was held by Colonel Butler, in 1650, against Oliver Cromwell, but after a valiant resistance, was taken by the parliament forces under Colonels Hewson and Reynolds. As was usual in the ferocious wars of the 17th century, the reduction of the castle was followed by the infliction of detestable cruelties on the subdued garrison." The town has, for some time past, been in a prosperous condition. An extensive retail trade is carried on with the surrounding country. A considerable quantity of flour is made at the mills of Messrs. Doyle & Pinn. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 20, April 21, July 10, Sept. 8, and Oct. 29. Post-horses can be hired at the inn. In 1843, the Tullow Loan Fund had a capital of £750, circulated £2,350 in 775 loans, realized a net profit of £7 1s. 2d., and belonged to 10 proprietors. Tullow is the head-quarters of one of the 4 districts of the constabulary force of the county; and it is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter held on every Saturday. The public conveyances in 1838 were a mail-car in transit between Newtownbarry and Goresbridge, a coach in transit between Dublin and Newtownbarry, and a coach in transit between Dublin and Wexford. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 1,929; in 1841, 3,007. Houses 530. Area of the parish of Tullow section, 58 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,019. Houses 332. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 95; in manufactures and trade, 210; in other pursuits, 76. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 216; on their own manual labour, 126; on means not specified, 24. Area of the Fennagh section, 38 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,078. Houses 198. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 84; in manufactures and trade, 102; in other pursuits, 35. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 95; on their own manual labour, 112; on means not specified, 7. "Theobald, the grandson and heir of Sir Edmund Butler of Rosera and Cloughrenan-castles, was created, in 1603, Viscount Tullowphelin. The titles of Ormonde and Ossory were likewise secured to him; but his lordship dying in 1613, without issue by his wife, the Lady Elizabeth Butler, only child of Thomas, tenth Earl of Ormonde, K.G., his line became extinct. Richard, the fifth son of the first Duke of Ormonde, was in 1639 created Baron of Cloughrenan, Viscount Tullow, and Earl of Arran, but died without issue male in 1685. These titles were in 1693 again revived in the person of Charles, the second and youngest son of the justly celebrated Thomas, Earl of Ossory, and brother of the unfortunate Duke of Ormonde, who was attained in 1716. This Earl of Arran also died without issue male in 1738, when these titles became a second time extinct."

TULLOW, co. Dublin. See TULLY.

TULLOWBEG, a chapelry in the parish of Fennagh, counties Carlow and Wicklow, Leinster. See FENNAGH.

TULLOWGREEN, or TULLOWCRINE, a parish in the barony of West Idrome, 2 miles north of Leighlin-Brigge, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 5,899 acres, 33 perches,—of which 18 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 1,344; in 1841, 1,492. Houses 224. The rivulet Dinane flows along the western boundary, separating the parish from Queen's county and the county of Kilkenny; over the whole of its connection with the parish, it runs upon lofty moorlands; and, at about mid-distance of its run along the boundary, it has an elevation above sea-level of 608 feet. The river Barrow traces the whole of the eastern boundary; and takes leave of the parish at an elevation above sea-level of 133 feet. A stream, formed by the confluence of three rivulets from the interior of the parish, falls into the Barrow, at the point where that river takes leave of Tullowgreen. The eastern district of the parish is part of the beautiful valley of the Barrow; but the central and the western districts are a prominent part of the great congeries of moorish and mountainous upland which lies round the junction-point of the counties of Carlow, Queen's, and Kilkenny. Gailows-Hill, in the interior, has an altitude of 974 feet above sea-level; and the summit of Cloughgrenan, a little beyond the northern boundary, has an altitude of 1,038 feet. The chief residence is Coolnakisha-house; and the principal antiquity is the ruin of St. Bridget's church. The roads from Leighlin-Brigge and Old Leighlin to Carlow and Dublin pass through the interior.—This parish is an appropriate rectory, in the dio. of Leighlin. The tithes belong to the dean and chapter of Leighlin cathedral. The perpetual curate of Old Leighlin is employed by the appropriators as stipendiary curate of Tullowgreen. The church was quite recently built by means altogether independent of any public fund. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 159, and the Roman Catholics to 1,199.

TULLOWHERIN. See TULLACHERIN.

TULLOWMAGRIMAH, or TULLOWMAGINNA, a parish, 3½ miles south-south-east of Carlow, and partly in the barony of Forth, but chiefly in that of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Forth section, 703 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches; of the barony of Carlow section, 3,360 acres, 20 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,111; in 1841, 1,125. Houses 178. Pop. of the barony of Carlow section, in 1841, 764. Houses 118. The surface consists of arable and pasture land of various qualities; it possesses a considerable amount of wood and other embellishments; and it is traversed by the road from Tullow to Leighlin-Brigge. The principal residences are Castletown-house, Rathcrogue-house, Green-house, Castle-lodge, Kilballyhue-house, Tinriland-house, and Linkardstown-house; the principal hamlet is Tinriland; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of a church, and of the castles of Ballyloo, Graigueahig, and Graigueaspiddoge.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of STAPLESTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £320 15s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to chapels in the adjoining parishes. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 82, and the Roman Catholics to about 1,014; and 2 daily schools were supported partly by subscription and partly by aid from the National Board, and had on their books 161 boys and 176 girls.

TULLOWMOY, a parish, 3½ miles south-south-east of Stradbally, and partly in the barony of Ballyadams, but chiefly in that of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Ballyadams section, 677 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches; of the Stradbally section, 5,330 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,627, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,527; in 1841, 1,675. Houses 264. Pop. of the Stradbally section, in 1831, 1,491; in 1841, 1,499. Houses 235. The southern district and part of the central district are a portion of the Slievemary mountains; and the other districts are, in a general view, ornate champaign ground. The land varies in rental or annual value from 4s. to £3 per plantation acre. The highest ground is in the south, and has an altitude above sea-level of 1,079 feet. The rivulet Strid rises among the mountains near the southern boundary, and runs northward through the interior. The road from Stradbally to Carlow passes across the eastern wing. The principal residences are Raheen-alboun-house, Tullowmoy-house, Cloppook-house, and Fallow-cottage; and the other principal objects of interest are the ruins of two churches, a Druidical altar, a large cave near a burying-ground, the Piper's Pit, the Ass's Manger, the hamlet of Luggacurren, a Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, and a National school.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £300; nett, £283. Patron, the diocesan. There is no church; the incumbent is non-resident; and a curate receives a salary of £10 for performing the occasional duties. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballyadams and Rathaspeck. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,494; and a day daily school had on its books 27 boys and 3 girls.

TULLY, or TULLYFERNE, a parish in the barony of Kilmacrennan, co. Donegal, Ulster. Its west side contains the village of MILLFORD; and its east side contains some outskirts of the town of RAMELTON: see these articles. Length, south-south-westward, 7½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 5½; area, 16,612 acres, 10 perches,—of which 383 acres, 39 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,096; in 1841, 6,141. Houses 1,159. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,735. Houses 993. The surface extends from near the south base of Knockalla mountain, to a point about a mile south of Ballyyarr wood; it is bounded, over part of the south-east, by the small ramification of Lough Swilly, which goes up to the vicinity of Ramelton; and it has, on the western boundary, Lough Fern, a small part of the run of the river Lennan, and a long sweep of the upper portion of Mulroy bay. The northern district is bleak; the central district is dappled with cold and naked loughlets; and the southern district is pleasant, and possesses a considerable quantity of wood. Lough Fern has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 69 feet. The chief of the loughlets in the interior are Loughs Columbkil, Doo, and Nakey. The greater portion of the woods in the south is clustered into the groves of Ballyyarr and Drummonganah. The principal country residence is Ballyyarr-house. The roads from Letterkenny and Ramelton to Carrickart, Ros-guil, and Rathmullen, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TULLYAGHNISH [which see], in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £500 12s. 8d.; glebe, £256. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 365. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killygarvan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 296 Churchmen, 3,327 Presbyterians, and 2,755 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools at Ballygay, Cairne, Millford, Brownow, and Tyrhoman, were usually attended by about 229 scholars; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 a-year, and occasionally £10 additional from the fund of Erasmus Smith, and two with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 332 boys and 194 girls.

TULLY, TULLOW, or BULLOCK, a parish in the barony of Rathdown, 3 miles south of Kingstown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains part of the village of CABINTERTY: which see. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,285 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,385; in 1841, 1,207. Houses 192. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,181. Houses 178. The surface, in a general view, is a beautifully broken and tumulated tract of country, extending eastward from the base of the Three-Rock mountain, and profusely decorated with demesnes, groves, and villa-grounds. The road from Dublin to Enniskerry, by way of the Scalp, passes along part of the western boundary; the road from Dublin to Bray, by way of Cabinterty, touches the eastern boundary in the vicinity of Cabinterty; and much of the exquisite scenery commanded by vantage-grounds along these romantic roads lies within Tully. One very fine feature, extending across the centre of the parish, is the small and verdant vale called Glen-Druid, deriving its name from a cromlech or Druidical altar, and watered by a merry brook which brings down the drainage of the neighbouring hills, and carries it off to the sea by way of Loughlinstown. "Glen-Druid," remarks Mr. Fraser, "is also remarkable, as the commencement on this line of road (that from Dublin to Bray, by Cabinterty), of that lovely combination of grassy slope and fertile mead—of swelling knoll and verdant lea—of pastoral hill and fruitful dale—of smiling vale and gloomy dell—of rugged rock and wild ravine—of bleak mountain and copsed glen—of wood and water, which pervade the greater part of the county of Wicklow." Glen-Druid-house, adjacent to the glen, is the villa of Mr. Barrington. Cabinterty-house, adjoining the eastern boundary, is the residence of Miss Byrne, a descendant of the powerful sept of the O'Byrnes of Wicklow, who for centuries held large possessions and bore extensive sway within that county. Brenanstown-house, a little north of Glen-Druid-house, is the modern mansion of George Pim, Esq. Leopardstown-house, situated in a beautifully wooded and comparatively extensive demesne near the north-western extremity of the parish, was formerly the seat of Lords Castlereagh. "Adjoining the grounds of Waltersland, the residence of W. H. Smith, Esq., is a field called Silver-park, from the great number of silver coins and ornaments found there. On clearing the rocky ground, more than one hundred graves were discovered, together with numerous spear-heads, and other warlike instruments, confirming that a battle had been fought there; there were also discovered some urns of baked clay, containing ashes and burnt bones; and a small chamber, about a foot and a-half square, formed of four upright stones, with one on the top and one at the bottom." The principal seats, additional to those we have named, are Murphystown, Lilliput, Sandyford, Burton-hall, Rockland, Glen-Druid-cottage, Meredith-lodge, Kingstown-house, Rockville, and Glenamuck-house. In the centre of the parish, and near the head of Glen-Druid, are the hamlet and the ruined castle of Carrickmines; and on the south-eastern border are the ruined church, the churchyard, the carns, and the two crosses of Tully. The original church is alleged to have been built by the Danes, and dedicated to their king and patron, St. Olave.—This parish is nominally an appropriate curacy, but practically a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MOSKSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £97 6s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £194 12s.; and are appropriate to the deanery of the cathedral of Christ-church. The Roman Catholic chapel at Cabintee has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kingstown and Bray. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 213 Churchmen, 17 Protestant dissenters, and 1,156 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools at Clonkeen and Cabintee—the former of which was partially supported by subscription—had on their books 62 boys and 52 girls.

TULLY, or COGLANSTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Kilcullen, but chiefly in that of East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. It consists of four mutually detached districts, the most easterly or south-easterly of which is in the barony of Kilcullen, while all the others are in the barony of East Ophaly. Distance of the first district from the town of Kildare, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south by east; length, south-south-westward, $2\frac{1}{2}$; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$. Distance of the second district from Kildare, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-west; length, northward, $\frac{3}{4}$; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$. Distance of the third district from Kildare, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east; length, west-north-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Distance of the fourth or Kilcullen district, 3 miles south-east; length, north-eastward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$. Area of the Ophaly districts, 4,017 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches; of the Kilcullen district, 1,147 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,065; in 1841, 1,279. Houses 197. Pop. of the Ophaly districts, in 1831, 811; in 1841, 975. Houses 146. The first district contains Tully-house, the ruins of a church, and a considerable portion of Maddenstown bog. The second district consists of a main portion of the group of trappean uplands called the Redhills. The third district contains Rathbride-house, Erindale, Rosmore-lodge, and a graveyard. The fourth district contains Newpark-house, a graveyard, and an old castle.—This parish is a wholly appropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Kildare. The tithes belong to the see of Kildare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 36, and the Roman Catholics to 1,053; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TULLY, a small bay and an old castle in the parish of Innismacsaigh, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The bay projects half-a-mile westward from Lower Lough Erne, with a breadth which gradually diminishes from $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile to $1\frac{1}{2}$ furlong; and its head is situated scarcely a mile east of the village of Church-hill. The castle stands on a broad promontory which invades the shore-line of Lough Erne immediately north of the bay; but it is distant about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile north-north-west from the head of the bay, and about the same distance north-east of Church-hill. The breadth of Lough Erne from the shore at the castle is $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ north-eastward, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ northward; and as it here spreads out its greatest expanse of water, and displays its greatest profusion of islands, and is overhung by the richest portion of its hill-screens, the view of it from the castle is surpassingly brilliant and beautiful. "In its general character, as exhibited in its ruins," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "Tully-castle appears to have been a fortified residence of the usual class erected by the first Scottish settlers in the country—a keep or castle turreted at the angles, and surrounded by a bawn or outer wall, enclosing a court-yard. It is thus described by Pinnar in 1618, 'Sir John Hume hath 2,000 acres called Carrynroe. Upon this proportion there is a bawne of lime and stone, 100 feet square, 14 feet high, having four flankers for the defence. There is also a fair strong castle 50 feet long and 21 feet broad. He hath made a village near unto the bawne, in which is dwelling 24 families.' The castle was founded by Sir John Hume, who received an ample grant of land at the settlement of Ulster. It remained with his male descendants until the year 1731, when it passed through the female line into the possession of the Loftus family. It is now the property of the Marquis of Ely, who has a beautiful seat—Ely Lodge—in the immediate neighbourhood. The castle was destroyed during the rebellion of 1641, and was never afterwards rebuilt. At that terrible period, it became the refuge of a considerable number of the English and Scotch settlers in the country. The discontented Irish of the county having, however, collected themselves together under the command of Rory, the brother of the Lord Maguire, they proceeded to the castle on the 24th of December; and having commanded the Lady Hume and the other persons within it to surrender, it was given up to them on a promise of quarter for their lives, protection for their goods, and free liberty and safe conduct to proceed either to Monea or Enniskillen, as they might choose. With the exception of the Lady Hume, and the individuals immediately belonging to her family, the whole of the persons who had so surrendered, amounting to fifteen men, and, as it is said, sixty women and children, were on the following day stripped and deprived of their goods, and inhumanly massacred, when also the castle was pillaged, burnt, and left in ruins.

TULLY, a hamlet in the parish of Ballinakill, barony of Ballinabinech, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands in a singularly secluded situation, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of Renvyle-house, $1\frac{1}{2}$ north of the upper part of Ballinakill Harbour, and $12\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Clifden. A road leads direct to Tully and Renvyle from Galway and Oughterard, through one of the wildest and most sublime portions of Connemara, disclosing some of the most magnificent scenery of the western highlands of the kingdom, and, in particular, sweeping round the eastern and northern bases of Binabola or the Twelve Pins, and commanding close views of the ravines, the stupendous fissures, the glens, the impending cliffs, the frowning escarpments, and the soaring pinnacles of that grandly alpine group of mountains. A clean little inn has been fitted up at Tully by Mr. Blake, for the accommodation of tourists. The hamlet stands on the summit of a bill, whence a prolonged slope of land, which might easily be made arable, falls gradually off to the sea; it contains a National school, and a constabulary barrack; a little to the south of it stands a Roman Catholic chapel; and adjacent to it on the west lies Tully lake, about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in length. The character of the surrounding scenery, or of that which occurs in the approaches to Tully, is noticed in the articles on RENVYLE, SALRUC, LEENANE, KILLERY, BINABOLA, and CONNEMARA; which see. Pop. of the hamlet returned with the parish TULLYAGHNISH, or TULLYAUGHNISH, a benefice or parochial union, in the barony of Kilmacrennan, and dio. of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies on Lough Swilly and Mulroy bay, and consists of the rectories of TULLY and AGHNISH: see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 11,033. Gross income, £1,550 17s. 6d.; nett, £1,291 9s. 1d. Patrons, the provost, fellows, and scholars of Trinity college, Dublin. The incumbent holds also the benefice and prebend of Clondelhorky, in the dio. of Raphoe, but resides in Tullyaghnish. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is in Agnish; and the other places of worship are two Presbyterian meeting-houses of the General Assembly in Agnish, one Presbyterian meeting-house of the General Assembly in Tully, two Reformed Presbyterian meeting-houses in Agnish, a Methodist meeting-house in Agnish, a Roman Catholic chapel in Tully, and a Roman Catholic chapel in Agnish. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 820 Churchmen, 5,225 Presbyterians, and 5,524 Roman Catholics; 25 daily schools had on their books 718 boys and 497 girls; and there were 5 Sunday schools in Tully and 1 in Agnish.

TULLYALLEN, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, but chiefly in the barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. The Louth section contains part of the town of DROGHEDA: which see. Length of the Meath section, south-south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 949 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Length of the main body of the Louth section, east-south-eastward, 4 miles; breadth, from ¾ to 3¼ miles; area, 7,344 acres, 22 perches,—of which 953 acres, 11 perches form the detached townland of Newtown-Stalaban, situated a little to the east of Drogheda, and 84 acres, 2 perches are tide-way of the river Boyne. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,399;* in 1841, 4,642. Houses 873. Pop. of the Meath section, in 1841, 130. Houses 23. Pop. of the rural districts of the Louth section, in 1841, 3,473. Houses 648. The narrowest part of the main body of the Louth section is at the east end, and contains the portion of the town of Drogheda; and the broadest part is very nearly at the west end. The rivulet Mattock separates the Louth section from the Meath section, and afterwards traces the western and the southern boundary of the former down to its confluence with the river Boyne; and that noble and majestic stream thence traces all the remainder of the southern boundary of both the main body and the detached district. The surface of the parish is pleasantly though not boldly diversified, and presents a large aggregate of beauty, both in natural feature, and in artificial decoration. Louth-Hill, overlooking the east bank of the Mattock, has an altitude above sea-level of 399 feet. The banks of the Boyne are charmingly featured; and boast here the possession of the ground on which the celebrated battle of the Boyne was commenced, and of the obelisk which was erected to commemorate that great event, and which indicates the place where the army of King William crossed the river. See BOYNE. In the vicinity of the obelisk are the spot where Duke Schomberg was killed, a spot called King William's glen, and various minute localities identified in record or by tradition with some memorable scenes or incidents of the battle of European liberty. On the east bank of the Mattock are the interesting ruins of the abbey of Mellifont and the chapel of St. Bernard. See MELLIFONT. The village of Tullyallen stands 2½ miles north-west by west of Drogheda, on the road thence to Kells; and the church stands about 7 furlongs west of the village. Pop., in 1831, of the village of Tullyallen, 181; of the hamlet of Beg-of-Rath, 128. Houses in these, respectively 40 and 26. The principal country residences are Mattock-lodge, in the Meath section; Newtown-house, in the detached district; and Townley-hall, the fine seat of B. T. Balfour, Esq., in the main body.—This parish has incorporated with it the quondam parish of Mellifont, and is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Glebe, £8 6s. 8d. Gross income, £100 12s. 9d.; nett, £98 11s. 3d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The parish belongs to the Marquis of Drogheda; and is reported to be tithe-free. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 45 to 100. The Tullyallen and the Newtown Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 476 to 600 and 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 186, and the Roman Catholics to 3,783; and 4 daily schools had on their books 196 boys and 122 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £12 a-year from the National Board; one, with £40 from Mr. Balfour of Townley-Hall; one, with £10 from the National Board; and one at Townley-Hall was supported by Lady Florence Balfour.

TULLYBRACKKEY, or TULLABRACCA, a parish in the baronies of Cosma and Small County, 2½ miles north by east of Bruff, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Cosma section, 2,045 acres; of the Small County section, 1,164 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 1,437, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,774; in 1841, 1,473. Houses 248. Pop. of the Cosma section, in 1831, 784; in 1841, 963. Houses 165. About one-fourth of the surface consists, in the aggregate, of rather indifferent land; but all the remainder consists of prime land. The road from Bruff to Limerick passes through the interior. On the west side of that road is Cahir-house; and adjoining Cahir is Rockbarton, the fine seat of Viscount Guilmamore. The grounds of Cahir contain some interesting ruins; its vicinity contains the ruins of Glenogra-castle; and the whole parish is a prominent southern portion of the circular section of rich plain, profusely sprinkled with rare and curious objects of antiquarian interest, and surrounding the romantic waters of Lough Gur. See GUR.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £280 10s. 6d.; glebe, £159 5s. Gross income, £439 15s. 6d.; nett, £375 1s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1819, by means partly of a gift of £1,107 13s. 10d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and partly of a donation of £1,107 13s. 10d. from Lord Guilmamore. Sittings 120; attendance 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 1,803; and a pay daily school had on its books 58 boys and 22 girls.

TULLYCANNA, a village in the parish of Ambrosstown, barony of Barrie, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Duncormuck to Taghmon, 3 miles north by west of Duncormuck, and 9 south-west by west of Wexford. In its vicinity are a constabulary barrack and the ruins of a castle. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 123. Houses 28.

TULLYCORBET, a parish 3 miles north of Ballybay, and partly in the barony of Cremorne, but chiefly in that of Monaghan, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Length, south-south-eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Cremorne section, 1,588 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches,—of the barony of Monaghan section, 6,324 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches,—of which 120 acres, 13 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,833; in 1841, 5,096. Houses 913. Pop. of the barony of Monaghan section, in 1831, 4,000; in 1841, 4,232. Houses 760. Some tracts of bog occur in the north, and an extensive tract occurs in the east; yet most of the parochial surface consists of very good land. Most of the water area lies in Loughs Corfin, Coohy, and Coogans; but the total number of lakes is nine. The principal residence is Mullan-house. The roads from Ballybay to Monaghan and Armagh pass through the interior. —This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £400; glebe, £63. Gross income, £463; nett, £425 15s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £850 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 50. The Presbyterian meeting-house at Bradox is attended by 370; the Presbyterian meeting-house at Cahans, by 430; the Scotch Reformed Presbyterian meeting-house, by 200; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,200;—and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the Roman Catholic chapel of Ballybay. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 244 Churchmen, 1,578 Presbyterians, and 3,178 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools at Corboy, Drumrock, Leon, Creagh, Tullycorbet, Corravally, and Drumlongfield, had on their books 422 boys and 236 girls. The school at Creagh was salaried with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and that at Tullycorbet, with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice. In 1843, a school at Corboy was salaried with £12 a-year from the National Board, and had on its books 55 boys and 47 girls.

TULLYCLEA, or BALLINAMALLARD (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises in the barony of Omagh; and runs about 10 miles south-westward through that barony, through the co. Fermanagh district of Magheracross, past the village of Ballinamallard, and along the boundary between the parishes of Torry and Derryvillane, to Lower Lough Erne at a point about 4 miles north by west of Enniskillen.

TULLYCRINE, a bog on the northern border of the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 1,035 acres. "This bog," says the official report of Mr. Colbourne, "is bounded on the north and east by the Dunbeg river, on the west by Brislike bog, and on the south by high lands of Tullycrine; it is extensive and very irregular in its shape, producing but little in quantity, being narrow; it is mostly a firm bog, the wide parts only are wet, its greatest depth only 16 feet." Estimated cost of reclamation, £734 5s.

TULLYGOLINE, an estate of the Irish Waste Land Society, in co. Limerick, Munster. It is held under a different arrangement from that of the Society's other estates. The Society simply lent upon it the sum of £3,000,—to be laid out in improvements, according to their rules, and under their superintendence,—and to yield them, from the trustees of the estate, an interest of 7 per cent. As we omitted to notice, in their proper place, the other and more important estates of the Irish Waste Land Society, we may here insert a brief notice of them, and of the Society itself, from the work of Mr. and Mrs. Hall:—"This Society was established in the year 1836. It is incorporated by charter. During the first three or four years of its existence it made very little way; the directors knew comparatively nothing of the country; they had most unmanageable materials to deal with; a people averse to improvements; and, above all, landlords whose apathy or distrust, whose unreasonable demands or expectations, formed an almost impassable barrier. Such disadvantages, although they operated largely in disheartening the shareholders generally, inducing many of them to withdraw, and threatening the Society with sudden death, are beginning to be overcome; and a certainty is now secured that at no distant period the parties interested will not only receive a fair return for the capital invested, but will enjoy the satisfaction of knowing that they have essentially promoted the welfare of Ireland,—not alone by the results they may exhibit, but as setting an example that will encourage others, by manifesting the importance to all parties of rendering available the abundant resources of the country. The Society have now four estates in hand under leases of 99 years, comprising in the whole 18,365 statute acres. Of these estates two (Ballinakill and Kilkerrin) are in the county Galway; one (Glensake) is in the county of Sligo; and the other (Tullygoline) is in the county of Limerick. Ballinakill is held under lease from Sir John Burke, Bart., of Marble Hill, Galway—a gentleman who has been described to us as a true patriot, who cordially co-operates with the Society in their plans of improvement. It comprises 1,366 acres; and is situated 7 miles from Loughrea, and 9 from Portumna. When the Society took it, in 1836, it contained only five tenants, occupying as many miserable hovels; and whose rental amounted in the aggregate to 50s. per annum—this being generally in arrear. Under the company the number of tenants has been increased to 40, having 32 acres now reclaimed—19 under crop, and increasing the quantity of reclaimed land every year, occupying 32 neat cottages, and paying a rental of £84 per annum. The number of tenants is rapidly increasing, and the houses are daily improving in conveniences and comforts. This was the first estate taken by the Society. The next was Glensake, in the county of Sligo, situate 8 miles from Ballina, and 9 from Töbercurry, and comprising 5,698 statute acres. In 1837, the number of tenants was no more than 7 holding small farms of from 6 to 8 acres each; paying, or rather being liable to pay, an aggregate rental of about £30. The tenants now amount to 44, occupying comfortable cottages, many of them holding farms of forty Irish acres, and paying altogether an annual rent of £230, with the prospect of a considerable increase as additional land is brought into cultivation. Kilkerrin, the third estate, is a very large tract of land (consisting of 9,562 statute acres), on the borders of the bay of Galway, and came into the hands of the company in August 1841, at which time there was not a foot of road on the property, and it was consequently almost impossible for any but a native to climb over the rocks, wade through the bogs, or traverse the dense fields of oats and potatoes growing along the coast. There were about 116 tenants holding under the landlord, and as many more under-tenants, the total population amounting to 1,100 souls, possessing cottages, boats, cattle, and other property, but the land was divided into the smallest patches, all intermingled with each other, so that none but the owner could know the right proprietor of each field. The rent agreed to be paid by the Society for this property was nearly covered by that paid by the tenants. The whole estate has since it has been in the company's possession, been accurately surveyed, valued, and divided into farms, consisting of a due portion of each kind of land, and is now re-let to the tenants on the estate, in farms proportionate to the number of acres they before held, and at such increased rent as suffices to insure a very fair return to the Society for the outlay and rental. Six miles of very good road have already been made by the Society. The Society and their managing director, Colonel Robinson, are very sanguine as to the results of their operations upon these three estates; and they appear—of late years at least—to be conducting them upon safe and sound principles; obtaining the assistance of rational and zealous agents; cultivating the good-will and not exciting the suspicions of the tenants; encouraging them to exertions by rewards and prizes for the best cattle, houses, and crops, establishing model schools in connection with the farms, and employing skilful practical teachers of agriculture. They have met with no obstacles which they could not overcome, and bear testimony first to the security with which capital may be invested in Ireland; next to the certainty of its yielding a fair return; and next to the vast advantages that must result to that country from its employment."

TULLYLISH. a parish in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It lies on the western border of the county, and contains the village of GILFORD: which see. Length, southward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 11,707 acres, 1 perch,—of which 43 acres, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,501; in 1841, 12,600. Houses 2,142. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 12,017. Houses 2,038. The surface is beautifully diversified with undulations, hills, and winding dells, and vales; consists, in a general view, of good land, in a comparatively excellent state of cultivation; abounds in close scenes of a gently beautiful and truly romantic character; and presents a general joyous appearance of ornament, industry, prosperity, and comfort in the reciprocal connections of its own condition with that of the people. The river Bann passes westward through nearly the centre, in a capriciously sinuous course, along a valley of charming features, and between banks which are everywhere powdered, spangled, and brilliant with villas, gardens, groves, and bleaching-grounds. Three principal localities, both of beauty and of manufacture, along the course of the river, are the hamlet of Hall's Mills, in the east, noted so far back as a century ago, for a very extensive bleaching-green; the village of Gilford, in the centre, whose linen, flax-spinning, and bleaching trade may be regarded as a department or branch of the prosperous and interesting trade of Banbridge; and the delightful little village of Moyallen, in the west, whose environs, now exquisite for their ornament, and noted for their bleachfields and their vitriol-works, were formerly noted for the existence of a large, fallen, soil-covered forest of oak, ash, alder, and other trees. The Newry Canal traces the southern part of the western boundary, to the vicinity of the Bann, lends to the inhabitants its valuable advantages of communication, and passes away into the county of Armagh. Most of the canal's connection with Tullylish is between the 14th and the 15th locks. The Ulster railway likewise offers to the parishioners its rich facilities of conveyance. The church of Tullylish stands high over the river Bann, less than a mile south-east of Gilford. The principal seats within the parish are Moyallen-house, Stranmore-house, Moyallenville, Tullylish-house, Kernan-house, Leanderg-house, Milltown, Bannville, and Gilford-castle,—the last the seat of Sir William Johnston, Bart. Two small lakes—Loughs Kernan and Drumaragh—occur in the south; and the former of these—about $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile in length, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in breadth, and nearly 20 feet in depth—was the scene of a most savage and infamous murder of nearly 40 Protestants, in the rebellion of 1641. "The fact," says the old chorographer of Down, was thus:—"Some time after the breaking out of the rebellion, Sir Phelim O'Neill sent fourscore Protestants from the county of Armagh towards Claneboys in this county. The bridge of Portadown being then destroyed by the rebels, these unhappy sufferers in all probability took their way by Scarva-bridge, then a noted pass from one county to the other. They were met by Captain Phelim M'Art M'Brien and his company of rebels; who not having patience to conduct them as far as Claneboys in the eastern part of the county, forced them on Lough Kernan, then covered with ice, where they all miserably perished. Of this tragical scene, there is yet a current tradition remaining among some of the ancient people of the parish; and about twenty years ago, several human bones were taken out of the lake, of which some were locked together, and with them some brogues and shoes, with other pieces of leather. However, let the reader take the whole account of it, as it stands in the deposition of Peter Hill, Esq.; sworn by virtue of a commission from the government on the 29th of May, 1645, who says 'that, about the beginning of March, 1641, fourscore men, women, and children, English and Scottish, were sent by direction of Sir Phelim O'Neill from the county of Armagh to Claneboys in the county of Down, where they were met by Captain Phelim M'Art M'Brien, and his company of rebels, most of his own sept, who carried and forced all these Protestants to a lough called Lough Kernan in the same county, and forced them upon the ice, both men, women, and children; that finding the ice so frozen that they could not be drowned, they forced them as far as they could on the ice; but not daring to pursue them for fear of breaking the ice under their own feet, they took the sucking children from their parents, and with all their strength threw them as far as they were able towards the place where the ice was weak, whereupon their parents, nurses, and friends, striving to fetch off the children, went so far that they broke the ice, and both they and the children perished together by drowning, all save one man that escaped from them wounded, and one woman.'—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £152 16s. 5d.; rectorial tithe composition of four townlands payable to the vicar, £73 15s. 5d.; glebe, £60. Gross income, £286 11s. 10d.; nett, £200 19s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes of the other townlands than the vicar's four, are compounded for £269 11s. 8d.; and are appropriated to the deanery of Dromore. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built about 110 years ago, at a cost now unknown; and enlarged in 1827, by means of a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 850; attendance 800. The Presbyterian meeting-house which formerly belonged to the Synod of Ulster has an attendance of 800. The Presbyterian meeting-house which formerly belonged to the Secession Synod has an attendance of from 300 to 400. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 50. The Friends' meeting-house has an attendance of from 80 to 100. The Bann and the Clare Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,862 Churchmen, 3,555 Presbyterians, 108 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,205 Roman Catholics; and 16 daily schools—each of two of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, one with £8 from the National Board and £4 from subscription, one with £12 from the National Board and £8 from subscription, and one with £7 from the Association for Discourteous Vice and £8 from subscription—had on their books 530 boys and 402 girls. In 1843, a National school at Bann was salaried with £20 a year from the National Board, and had on its books 97 boys and 62 girls; one at Ballinacarrick, with £15, and had 49 boys and 28 girls; one at Ballylough, with £12, and had 59 boys and 40 girls; one at Clare, with £12, and had 45 boys and 33 girls; one at Lisaliffy, with £8, and had 24 boys and 29 girls; two at Moyallen, with respectively £15 and £18, and had 75 boys and 60 girls; and two at Gilford, with respectively £12 and £10, and had 83 boys and 96 girls.

TULLYMORE, a demesne in the parish of Skerry, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-north-east of Broughshane, barony of Lower Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. The mansion is a seat of Earl O'Neill; it is built of cut stone, and is plain, yet handsome; and it contains some good paintings. The demesne is well ornamented with wood, particularly elms and oak trees; and the gardens are well laid out, and comparatively extensive. The sept of the MacQuillans formerly possessed the surrounding district, and are said to have had a castle at Tullymore.

TULLYNAKILL, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Lower Castlereagh, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-east by south of Comber, co. Down, Ulster. It contains the village of ARDMILLAN: which see. Its length, south-south-eastward, is $\frac{2}{3}$ miles; its breadth, exclusive of its portion of Lough Strangford, is 2 miles; but its breadth, inclusive of its portion of Lough Strangford, becomes its length, and is 3 miles; and its area is 2,923 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 7 acres, 7 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,386; in 1841, 1,416. Houses 253. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,308. Houses 232. The surface lies along the west shore of Lough Strangford; consists, in general, of prime land; and is traversed across the west wing by the road from Newtown-Ardes to Killyleagh. The breadth of the strand of Lough Strangford within Tullynakill, or of the portion of its bed which is alternately covered and forsaken by the tide, varies from $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile to very nearly 2 miles; and the isles and islets either within this strand, or on its seaward margin, are Wood Island, Watson's Island, Gull Rock, Downey's Rock, Bird Island, Duck Rock, Long Island, Rolly Island, Beagh Island, Calf Rock, Horse Island, and Mahee Island,—the last inhabited and comparatively large. In the northern district, adjacent to the strand, are some limestone quarries.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithes composition and gross income, £110 10s. 1d.; nett, £102 13s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefices which constitute the corps of Kilroot prebend in the cathedral of Connor; and is non-resident in Tullynakill. The rectorial tithes belong to the see of Down; but the whole parish being bishop's land, no composition for these tithes appears to have been made. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 70. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 67 Churchmen, 1,314 Presbyterians, and 21 Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 37 boys and 33 girls.

TULLYNAWOOD, a lake in the parish of Keady, barony and county of Armagh, Ulster. It extends north and south, lies within $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile of the southern boundary of the county, and measures about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in length. In its vicinity are the seats of Mountain-lodge and Dalkey-house.

TULLYOBIGLEY. See TULLAGHOBIGLEY.

TULLYRATH. See TALLERATH.

TULLYROE AND DOUGH, a bog of two denominations in the parish of Killeearagh, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It measures nearly $\frac{2}{3}$ miles in length; and extends southward from the vicinity of Kilkee, or of the head of Moore bay, to the vicinity of the estuary of the Shannon a little east of the entrance of Poolnasherry Harbour. Its area is 1,992 acres. The two denominations of the bog are mutually separated by a small and slender isthmus of sound land; and Tullyroe is situated to the south, and Dough to the north. "Dough bog," said the official report of Mr. Colbourne in 1814, "can be effectually drained at a small expense, by deepening the present stream (which discharges into Moore bay), sufficiently to receive the water from the new drains, which are levelled across in the best direction for draining; and with the surface drains, will consolidate the bog, and render it fit for cultivation. The summit of Dough bog is 116 feet above high water, which gives ample fall; and there is no difficulty to encounter in the drainage, except the wetness of the bog; this, however, will only require more time to cut the drains, as they can only be proceeded in by small cuttings, giving time between each cutting for the edges of the drains to get tolerably firm. The depth of this bog averages about 16 feet; the main drains will average 9 feet in depth; the cross or surface drains 4 to 5 feet deep, divided into patches of from 5 to 10 acres, and may be afterwards increased by covering some of the drains. Tullyroe bog discharges its water partly by the Dunaha stream into the Shannon, and partly into Poolnasherry Harbour; the new drains are laid out in the best direction, and the surface drains must be numerous, as the bog is very wet. The summit of this bog is 131 feet above high water, and its average depth about 17 feet. The estimated expense of draining Tullyroe and Dough bogs is £2,271 6s. 5d."

TULLYRUSK, a parish in the barony of Upper Massarene, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles east-north-east of Glenavy, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,779 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,300; in 1841, 1,304. Houses 237. The surface is very diversified in character, but, in a general view, is upland and pastoral. The magnificent panorama-viewing mountain, Devis, whose summit overlooks the town of Belfast on the east, and has an altitude of 1,567 feet above the level of the sea, sends down its western skirts and offshoots within the eastern border of Tullyrusk. Various vantage-grounds within the parish command extensive and superb views of the broad waters and emerald shores of Lough Neagh. A bog of about 100 acres in extent lies within the parish, and is known as the Brown Moss. The parochial area is distributed among the 4 townlands of Budor, Dunkiltrod, Tullyrusk, and Knockern. The road from Lisburn to Antrim passes through the interior. The principal hamlets are Fourscore, Dundrod, and Knockern. The old church of Tullyrusk appears to have measured about 62 feet by 17, but is all removed except the foundations. Around its site is a burying-ground, still in use.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of GLENNAVY [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithes composition, £55 6s. 11d.; glebe, 18s. 5d. The rectorial tithes possess double the intrinsic value of the vicarial, yet are compounded for £15 15s.;

and they are inappropriate in the Marquis of Hertford. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,153 Churchmen, 659 Presbyterians, 60ther Protestant dissenters, and 662 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 105 scholars; and 4 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 121 scholars.

TULLYVERY, a village in the parish of Killyleagh, barony of Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 752. Houses 84. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 62; in other pursuits, 5. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 39; on their own manual labour, 67.

TULLYVIN, a village in the parish of Kildrumsherdin, barony of Tullaghgarvey, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Cootehill, on the road thence to Cavan. Within about a mile of it are Tullyvin-house, the seat of M. J. Boyle, Esq.; Rakenny, the seat of T. L. Clements, Esq.; Retreat, the seat of C. J. Adams, Esq.; Ashfield-lodge, the seat of Col. Henry Clements; Fort-Henry; Wood-lodge; Laurel-lodge; Vicars-hill; Drumshiel-house; and Carrick-cottage. A fair is held at Tullyvin on May 4. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 112. Houses 20.

TULLYVIN, or TULLAGHMIN, the unknown site of an ancient monastic or ecclesiastical establishment, in the barony of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. Monastic annalists allege that the establishment was an abbey, founded in the 7th century by St. Molagga.

TULSK, a post village, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Ogulla, barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. It stands at the intersection of the road from Roscommon to Boyle, with the road from Longford to Ballaghaderreen and Swineford, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Elphin, $5\frac{1}{2}$ west of Strokestown, 8 south-east of Frenchpark, $9\frac{1}{2}$ east of Castlereagh, $9\frac{1}{2}$ north by west of Roscommon, $15\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Longford, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Dublin. Adjacent to the village are the lodge of Fitzstephen French, Esq., the proprietor of the immediately surrounding lands,—and Cargin-house, the seat of D. Kelly, Esq.; within 2 miles are Foxborough-house, the seat of Mr. Taaffe,—Clonnyquin-house, the seat of William French, Esq.,—Toomona-house, the seat of another gentleman of the name of French,—and Rosmore-house; and at the distance of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the north-west are Rath-Croghan and Relickna Riagh,—places remarkable for caves, ancient burying-grounds, and some rude remains which tradition associates with the history of the kings of Connaught. An extensive tract of country around Tusk, and extending from the barony of Roscommon into the neighbouring baronies, is reputed to be one of the richest large tracts of land in Ireland; and the portion of it which immediately surrounds the village, is believed to be the most fertile and luxuriant. "The country is almost destitute of timber, or even thorn hedges, and the few seats appear as specks in the immense space, everywhere perceivable from the open nature of the country. The large grazing farms, stocked with the best description of sheep and cattle, the long and gentle swelling ridges into which the surface is thrown, with the intervening low flats of brown marsh and dark bog, while they show the sad apathy and carelessness of the farmers, serve to heighten the depth of the surrounding verdure." A small stream passes through the village; and is here spanned by a bridge. Tusk was formerly a place of importance, and possessed a somewhat celebrated abbey, and one of the strongest castles in Ireland; but it is now a decayed and poor village, and contains nothing more remarkable than one shop, a schoolhouse, a constabulary barrack, and the ruins of its ancient abbey. "The castle," says Mr. Weld, "is reported to have been built about the year 1406, by O'Connor Roe. When the Earl of Kildare, in the year 1499, led his forces into Connaught, he threw garrisons into the four castles of Athlone, Roscommon, Tusk, and Castlereagh. In Moryson's Itinerary, the castle of Tusk is also mentioned as one of the strong places in the county of Roscommon, which were maintained at the charge of Queen Elizabeth. The five principal castles at that period were those of Roscommon, Athlone, Tusk, Boyle, and Ballinasloe.—The abbey, situated at a short distance from the bridge, is merely separated from it by a piece of low waste ground, over which there is a free passage; and on the opposite side of the building, an extensive cemetery spreads under the ruins, in which, though still in common use, the graves are few in proportion to the space assigned to them. Mr. Archdall, in his Monasticon, describes the abbey as still pretty entire, though in ruins. The walls of the church, and of some of the dependencies of the abbey, are indeed still standing; but the only part which attracts attention at first view, is that on the side next the bridge, where two pointed arches, inserted in a massive wall, and resting upon an intermediate round pillar, still remain in perfect preservation. Whether these arches were intended to open a communication with a small aisle, or with a chapel contiguous to the church, appears questionable; for openings into an aisle, of the length off the wall in which they are placed, it might have been supposed that a third arch, or even a fourth one, might have been found expedient; whilst a double portal, as a mere entrance to a chapel, appears to have been an unusual style of construction. Whatever might have been their purpose, the arches were admirably executed, as their complete preservation to the present day sufficiently testifies. The faces are bevelled and indented, but there were no sculptured ornaments; the pillar is built of stones laid in regular courses, much in the style of some in the abbey of Boyle. The capital is octagon, with rounded plain moldings, projecting considerably. These arches are not more than about 8 feet in span, yet their effect in the ruin is striking; the proportions appeared to me very pleasing. No other parts of the ruins are of a character to attract much notice, except it be the east window of the church, the stone casings of which were entire; but the mullions had either fallen out or been wilfully removed. Several tombs had been erected within the walls of the church, the most remarkable one amongst which belonged to the Plunket family, with an inscription dated 1670. Mr. Archdall says that little is known of the history of this abbey; but it is supposed to have been founded by M'Duill or O'Dowell, as late as the 15th century, and to have been given to the Dominican friars.—Tusk was incorporated by charter of 14 Charles II. The corporation was styled 'The Portreeve, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Tusk,' and consisted of a portreeve, 15 free burgesses, and a commonalty; but it became extinct at the Legislative Union,—it had no property,—and it does not seem to have ever performed any duty except the sending of members to the Irish parliament. The £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union, was granted to James Caulfield, Esq., guardian of Sir George Caulfield, then a minor. Fairs are held at Tusk on March 31 and Nov. 18. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Saturday of every month. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 133. Houses 21.

TUMNA, TOOMNA, or TOEMONIA, a parish in the barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It extends along the right bank of the river Shannon, from a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Lough Allen, to the immediate vicinity of Carrick-on-Shannon. It contains the village of BATTLE-BRIDGE: which see. Length, south-south-westward, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 9,188 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 77 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches are in small lakes, 730 acres, 27 perches are in the river Boyle and its lacustrine expansions, and 163 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 4,451; in 1841, 4,180. Houses 738. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,033. Houses 714. The principal lacustrine expansion of the Boyle river within the parish is the comparatively large and intricate Lower Lough Oakport. The chief of the small lakes is Lough Shanballybaun, and lies north of Lough Oakport. The northern and narrow district of the parish is nearly all bog; and both this and the other districts are nearly all identical, in history, physical character, and georgic condition, with the estate of COOTEHALL: see that article. The surface, in a general view, consists of hills, chiefly of limestone gravel, and abounding with good soils, interspersed through bogs; and by lowering some of the water-courses, and opening a free passage for the pent-up stagnant pools in the bogs, several hundred acres of valuable surface were brought into use during the few years preceding 1830, and were then producing corn, potatoes, and meadow-grass, and sustaining the tread of cattle in places which, a brief period before, no man could traverse without the risk of sinking to the arm-pits. In 1830, the reclaimed bog and marsh land was worth from 10s. to 15s. per acre a-year; and the sound ground on the hills was chiefly under oats and potatoes. "Flax," said Mr. Weld in that year, "used to be grown here to a considerable extent, whilst the linen manufacture flourished, but the cultivation at present is very limited. Wheat is raised only in small quantities. The pastures were, to all appearance, very poor, and overrun with rag-weeds, owing to the mistaken practice which is so prevalent amongst the small farmers here, as well as in other parts of the country, of taking the utmost from the soil in successive crops of potatoes and grain, and then leaving it to throw up grasses naturally." A considerable detached district of the parish of Ardcarne lies isolated in the centre of the parish of Tumna. The road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Boyle, and the roads from Battle-Bridge to Boyle and to Sligo, traverse the interior. A monastery for Dominican friars was founded at Tumna by O'Connor; and, by an inquisition in the 28th year of Queen Elizabeth, it was found to have passed into the possession of the friars of the third order of St. Francis, and to be endowed with a church, a cemetery, a quarter of arable and pasture land, and the appurtenances and tithes adjacent to the friary, valued at 10s. a-year.—Tumna is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDCLEAR [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £70; and the latter are inappropriate in Viscount Lorton. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Cootehall; but the attendance upon it is not distinctly enough returned. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 247, and the Roman Catholics to 4,475; and, in spite of the populousness of the parish, there was no school.

TUMORE, or TOOMOUR, a parish in the barony of Corran, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, in the direction of north-west by north, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from 1 to $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 10,834 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 101 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,388; in 1841, 3,319. Houses 576. The surface extends from the boundary with co. Roscommon to the immediate vicinity of Ballymote; and it is prevalently bleak, yet has some warm spots, and presents great variety of character. The southern district comprises part of the Carlow mountains; but does not possess any of their loftier summits; yet a summit 1,062 feet of altitude above sea-level, is situated only about 5 furlongs beyond the eastern boundary. The principal of the small lakes containing the water area of the parish are Loughs Feenagh, Davena, Templevane, Corrado, Drumskeagh, and Ballinacurrow. The chief residences are Mount-Dodwell and Battlefield-house. The principal hamlet is Kesh; and this contains a Roman Catholic chapel and a constabulary barrack. The road from Ballymote to Boyle passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ENLACHFAD [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £170, and the rectorial for £124 5s.; and the latter are inappropriate in Sir Henry Montgomery. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drinnart. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 102 Churchmen, 36 Presbyterians, and 3,367 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and the other with £12 from the National Board, and advantages worth about £3 from Lord Kingstown—had on their books 141 boys and 65 girls. In 1843, a National school at Templevane was salaried with £12 from the Board, and had on its books 67 boys and 35 girls; and one at Kesh was salaried with £15, and had 86 boys and 60 girls.

TUMORE, co. Mayo. See TOWNMORE.

TUNNYQUIN, a hamlet in the parish of Ogulla, barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught.

TUNS (THE), a cluster of rocks in the barony of Bargie, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-east of the Great Saltee Island, and $\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Carnore Point, co. Wexford, Leinster.

TUOMORE. See TOWNMORE and TUMORE.

TUOSIST, KILMACALOGUE, or KILNICHAELOGUE, a parish in the barony of Glanerought, 11 miles south-west by west of Kenmare, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, south-westward, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$. Area, 39,341 acres. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 6,208; but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 6,376; in 1841, 7,485. Houses 1,254. The surface includes very nearly all the portion of the south-western screen of the Kenmare estuary, which belongs to co. Kerry; and is bounded, on the north-east, by the glen of the rivulet Sheeny,—along the south-east, by the summit-line of the Caha mountains,—on the south-west, by the artificial boundary-line with co. Cork,—and, along the north-west, by the Kenmare estuary. It is extremely rugged, surpassingly wild, and both crowdedly and loftily upland; and may be summarily described as a chief and dense portion of a vast congeries of savage mountains, intersected by short glens, and skirted along the Kenmare estuary by a narrow band of practicable ground. Its scenery is prevalently grand and mighty, and occasionally romantic or boldly beautiful. The summit of Hungry Hill is at the southern extremity of the south-eastern boundary, and has an altitude above sea-level of 2,249 feet. See HUNGRY. The summit-line of the Caha mountains extends along the whole of the south-eastern boundary, northward from Hungry Hill; and is pierced at one place by a recently-formed tunnel, which conducts into Kerry the new road from Glengarriff to Kenmare. The principal mountain-summits in the interior are those of Drum, Knockgarron, and Glenkeagh. The principal hamlets are ARDGROOM and ARDEA: see these articles. Ardgroom harbour projects from the Kenmare estuary on the boundary between Tuosist and co. Cork; and is noticed conjointly with the hamlet of Ardgroom. Kilmacalogue harbour opens nearly a mile north-east of the north side of the entrance of Ardgroom harbour, penetrates the parish east-south-eastward to the extent of 2½ miles, and possesses excellent anchoring-ground in 3 or 6 fathoms, and with a complete circuit of shelter. "When you are in the mouth of this harbour," says Dr. Smith, "you may run holdly up, keeping a south-east by east course, which carries you clear of a sunk rock, which is known by the sea breaking over it, facing a point about half-a-mile distant, and opposite the church of Kilmackeloge. The western point, called Calaris, may be kept as close aboard as you please; after doubling which, you may anchor in 8 or 10 fathoms water, clean ground, or may run up as far as a small high island, fronting the harbour's mouth, called Dutch Island, where there is good anchorage, and safe riding on either side of it. But just abreast of this island, the bottom is not very clean; but in all other places round it, and between it and the mainland on either side, there is clean holding-ground, in 6 or 7 fathoms water. From the said island, as far up as the tide flows, you may safely anchor in the middle of the channel, in from 8 to 3 fathoms, or run aground on banks of ooze, slab, and gravel, and be safe without anchor or cable. This is also a very proper place to greave or careen a ship in, if occasion requires. In the entrance on the larboard, as you sail in, you will observe a high earthen cliff, from the lower point of which is a rock, uncovered at low water, but visible during the flood, by the sea breaking over it; to avoid which, the opposite shore is to be kept nearest on board. There are several fine creeks and nooks in this harbour, where even large ships may lie aground to their bends in slab, or may moor head and stern, or between all-fours." "The greatest part of the parish of Tuosist," says the same writer, "except some arable land near Ardea-castle, and some parts about Kilmackeloge, is almost one continued rock, terminated with bog, affording very indifferent food for cattle, and it is justly esteemed the least profitable and most irreclaimable land in the whole county. The greatest part of the parish was formerly the estate of the O'Sullivan's, whose residence in these parts was at the castle of Ardea, pleasantly and boldly situated in a romantic manner on an high cliff, inaccessible from the sea, commanding an extensive prospect of the river of Kenmare. Towards the bottom of the harbour of Kilmackeloge is also the residence of a branch of the O'Sullivan's, called MacFinnen Duff, near whom lives Mr. Silvester O'Sullivan, whose house is pleasantly situated between two rivulets, which joining soon after, form a considerable stream, that discharges itself into the above-mentioned harbour. Near this place is a considerable fresh-water lake, called Lough Quinlan, in which are some small floating islands, much admired by the country people. These islands swim from side to side of the lake, and are usually composed at first of a long kind of grass, which being blown off the adjacent grounds about the month of September, and floating about, collect slime and other stuff, and so yearly increase until they come to have grass and other vegetables grow upon them. This lake is the head of one of the above-mentioned rivulets, which afford fine trout, and salmon of a most excellent flavour."—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KENMARE [which see], in the dio. of Ardref and Aghadoc. Tithe composition, £228 13s. 7½d.; glebe, £4 4s. The church is a ruin. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,200 and 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Kenmare and Templenoe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 6,673; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 113 boys and 23 girls. In 1843, one National school at Daurus was salaried with £15 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 93 boys and 34 girls; and one at Laragh was salaried with £15, and had 105 boys and 33 girls.

TURANEY, or TIRANNY, a barony on the western border of the county of Armagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Tyrone; on the east, by the barony of Armagh; on the south, by the county of Monaghan; and, on the west, by the counties of Monaghan and Tyrone. Its length, in the direction of south by east, is 13½ miles; its breadth is from 2½ furlongs to 3½ miles; and its area is 27,397 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches,—of which 152 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches are water. The river Blackwater traces much of the western boundary and the whole of the northern boundary; so that the right side of the pretty valley of that river is almost strictly identical with all the northern half of the barony. The Ulster Canal extends southward along the western border, over nearly two-thirds of the entire length of the barony, and often in the very near vicinity of the Blackwater. The southern extremity of the barony is mountainous and wild; but the other districts bear a close resemblance, in at once configuration, soil, and culture, to the rich and fertile main body of the county. The land is fertile; the farms are tolerably well divided; and the agriculture is in an improved and comparatively good condition. A tract around Tynan, and thence toward Armagh, possesses a good limestone soil.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Derrynoose, Eglis, Keady, and Tynan. The principal villages are Tynan and Middleton. Pop., in 1831, 16,471; in 1841, 16,450. Houses 2,966. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,132; in manufactures and trade, 708; in other pursuits, 229. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 62; on the directing of labour, 771; on their own manual labour, 2,220; on means not specified, 16. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,547; who could read but not write, 1,720; who could neither read nor write, 2,790. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 980; who could read but not write, 2,603; who could neither read nor write, 3,861.—Turaney lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Armagh. The total number of valued tenements is 2,652; and of these, 1,032 are valued under £5,—892, under £10,—372, under £15,—151, under £20,—61, under £25,—31, under £30,—33, under £40,—17, under £50,—and 43, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £20,373 11s. 2d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840 were £1,253 19s. 5d., and £1,073 6s. 2d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £1,379 8s. 5d., and £1,069 15s. 1d.

TURBOT-ISLAND. See TARBET.

TURBOTSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Mullingar, barony of Moyashel and Magheradenison, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the western verge of the parish, and near the road from Mullingar to Ballinacragh, 2½ miles west-north-west of Mullingar. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath takes designation from Turbotstown, and has chapels here and at Faughalstown.

TURGESIUS' FORT, a conspicuous artificial mound, on the summit of a hill near the head of Lough Derravaragh, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The traditions of the surrounding country assert it to have been constructed by a Danish chief of the name of Turgesius.

TURIN. See RATHCONNEL.

TURK, or TOAC, a lake, a mountain, a residence, and a waterfall, in the northern district of the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. The lake is now better known as the middle one of the three celebrated lakes of Killarney. See KILLARNEY (LAKES OF). The road from Killarney to Kenmare passes up the right bank of the lake, and under the north and the west skirts of the mountain, and commands excellent views of the scenery of both, particularly of the lake. The mountain is interposed between the lake and the lumpsish, lofty, and conspicuous mass of Mangerton, and it screens and even precipitously overhangs the lake's south shore. Though figuring somewhat diminutively when seen from a distance and grouped with its immediate and bulky neighbour, Mangerton, yet when seen from a boat on the bosom of the lake, it appears soaring, magnificent, and sublime,—its precipitous brow, its almost mural sides, and its steeply descending skirts appearing sheeted with wood, from the lofty sky-line down to the water's edge. The residence of Turk, or Turk-cottage, a private retreat of Mr. Herbert, is situated at the eastern extremity of the lake, amidst beautifully-disposed and well-kept pleasure-grounds, and contains a miscellaneous library, and several neat though small apartments. The waterfall occurs about a furlong south-east of the cottage, in a chasm between Turk mountain and Mangerton; it is formed by the rivulet which flows from the Devil's Punch Bowl, and bears the horrible name of the Devil's Stream; and it is a descent of about 60 feet, and, in rainy weather, exhibits a continuous sheet of foam from its platform sheer down to the basin. "This cataract, after falling into a deep and gloomy reservoir below, hurries impetuously along the bottom of a rocky glen, and passing beneath a small bridge of Gothic arches, mingles its waters with those of the lake. One side of the glen is completely perpendicular, and richly clothed with larch and fir, planted by Colonel Herbert. Owing to the extreme perpendicularity of the sides of the glen, immediately near the waterfall, the men employed in planting the firs were obliged to be lowered by ropes from the top, carrying the young trees with them, and seeking for a bed of earth of sufficient depth to protect their roots; and in this tedious, expensive, and dangerous manner, Turk Cascade has been so improved by human aid, that the majority of strangers would prefer it to O'Sullivan's Cascade on the Lower Lake, or Derry-Cunmyhly waterfall on the Upper." [Guide to Killarney.]

TURLOUGH, a parish in the barony of Carra, 3½ miles north-east by east of Castlebar, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 8½ miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 24,506 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches,—of which 368 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are in Lough Conn, 1,483 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches are in Lough Cullen, and 396 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 6,929; in 1841, 7,430. Houses 1,332. The northern district is mountainous; the north-eastern district, southward from the head of Lough Cullen, is an expanse of bog; and the central and southern districts are much diversified in both configuration and soil, but, on the whole, comprise a large proportion of good arable and pasture land. The Pontoon is on the northern boundary, at the isthmus between Loughs Conn and Cullen. See PONTON. The scenery of the northern district is intricate, romantic, powerful, and replete with well-defined and imposing character. The summit of Bennevagh is the highest ground, and has an altitude of 1,208 feet above sea-level; but both this mountain and the other uplands of the north are only frontier portions of the great and lofty mountain congeries of north-western Mayo, and are overhung at a brief distance to the north by the monarch mass of Nephin. The chief islet in Lough Cullen belonging to Turlough is Llanee. The two principal of the small lakes lie in the centre of the parish, bear the names of Derrylick and Levallinee, and have surface-elevations above sea-level of respectively 84 and 95 feet. The height and appearance of Loughs Conn and Cullen are stated in the articles CONN and CULLEN: which see. The Castlebar or Clydagh river runs partly across the interior, and partly along the eastern boundary to Lough Cullen. The road from Castlebar to Swineford passes east-north-eastward through the interior; and the mail-road from Castlebar to Ballina and Sligo passes north-north-eastward, and departs from Turlough at the Pontoon. The scattered but pleasantly situated village of Turlough stands on the former of these roads, and on a low and broad-based hill, possessing the character more of a great swell than of an ordinary upland. This village contains the parish-church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Methodist meeting-house, a school, a dispensary, a police barrack, a pillar-tower, and some remains of an old abbey. The pillar-tower is in a state of complete preservation, has a conical cap, and appears to the eye remarkable tall and beautiful. The dispensary is within the Castlebar Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 32,120 acres, with a population of 10,471; and, in 1840-41, it expended £117 18s. 11½d., and made 5,879 dispensations of medicine to 2,032 patients. Fairs are held on June 13, and Aug. 23. Adjoining the village of Turlough are Charleville-house, and the beautiful demesne of Turlough,—the former the seat of Col. Fitzgerald, and the latter the quondam residence of the unfortunate George Robert Fitzgerald. The principal hamlets are Burren, Lack, Toor, and Viewmount. The chief antiquities, additional to the abbey and the ruined tower at Turlough, are the ruin of Moyheencastle, Carn-castle, and another castle. A Roman Catholic chapel and a school occur 1¼ mile north by west of the village of Turlough; another Roman Catholic chapel occurs in the western part of the central district; and a constabulary barrack occurs in the Castlebar and Ballina road near the Pontoon.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CASTLEBAR [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £207 13s. 10½d. The parish of Turlough, and about half of the parish of KILDECAMOGUE [see that article], constitute the perpetual curacy and the separate benefice of Turlough. Length, 15½ miles; breadth, 9½. Pop., in 1831, 10,591. Gross income, £98 2s.; nett, £76 14s. Patron, the incumbent of Castlebar. The church was built in 1820, at the cost of £830 15s. 4d., and enlarged in 1824, at the cost of £369 4s. 7½d.; and the former of these sums was a gift, and the latter a loan, from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 150. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 40 to 50. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels at Park, Crunlin, and Kildecamogue, have an attendance of respectively about 1,200, from 500 to 600, and about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish of Turlough consisted of 662 Churchmen, 201 Presbyterians, and 6,595 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the portion of Kildcamogue included in the perpetual curacy of Turlough consisted of 98 Churchmen and 3,811 Roman Catholics; 2 pay daily schools were in operation in the chapel and at Arva in the portion of Kildcamogue; and 8 daily schools in the parish of Turlough had on their books 280 boys and 213 girls. One of the schools in Turlough was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and £7 from the Presbyterian minister; one, with £6 and school requisites from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and £3 10s. from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £15 and school requisites from the Tuam Diocesan Society; one at Meaghanny, with £12 and school requisites from the Baptist Society; one, with £10 from the parochial Roman Catholic clergyman; and the other two were pay schools at Crumlin and Drumdaif.

TURLOUGH, the general name of a periodical or seasonal lake, of a kind very common in the counties of Roscommon, Galway, and Mayo, Connaught. The usual bed of the lake is a valley or hollow in the midst of a limestone plain, either so shallow as to admit of the complete evaporation in spring of the waters which have accumulated and remained during winter, or pierced with apertures, provincially called swallow-holes, and communicating with natural subterranean tunnels which are choked up with back-water during winter, but continue open during summer. The beds of most of the turloughs are very verdant, and have in summer the appearance of rich meadows; but the turloughs themselves are in almost every instance cold, tame, shivering features in the landscape, and bear a close resemblance to the overflows of a river in a flat, low, country during a freshet.

TURLOUGHMORE, a large turlough, partly in the parishes of Lackagh, Atheury, and Cummer, but chiefly in that of Kilmoylan, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies in the course of the Clare river,—remarkable for its occasional subterranean character; and is the most conspicuous turlough in Ireland. It measures 3 miles in length southward, and 1½ in extreme breadth westward; but it has a very intricate outline, and might be regarded as consisting of a group or string of small and mutually connected turloughs. At its north end is Corrofin-lodge; at its north-eastern extremity is Ardskeagh-house; and on its west bank is Corbally-house.

TURRYGLASS. See TERRYGLASS.

TURVEY, the demesne of Lord Trimelstown, in the parish of Donabate, barony of Nethercross, 2½ miles north-north-east of Swords, co. Dublin, Leinster. The mansion is a plain building, and has in front a terrace which commands an extensive prospect over sea and land; but it is now in a dilapidated condition. "The manor of Turvey or Much-Turvey," says Mr. Brewer, "belonged at an early period to the Butler family, and this manor or rather the seneschalship of it was granted in the third year of Queen Mary by Thomas, Earl of Ormond, to Sir Christopher Barnewall, a lawyer of great eminence, and high sheriff of the county of Dublin in 1500, who died at this place in 1575. Turvey has since constituted a principal seat of the Barnewall family; and in the year 1645, Nicholas Barnewall was created Baron of Turvey, and Viscount Barnewall of Kingsland."

TURVEY-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Lusk, barony of East Balthorey, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Lusk to Swords, ¾ of a mile west of Turvey-house, 2½ miles south-west of Lusk, and 2½ north by east of Swords.

TUSCAN-PASS, LAMB'S-PASS, or PASS-TURRISHANE, an ancient fastness in the parish of Donaghmore, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It was the most southerly of three passes affording a dangerous communication between the central district of the mutual borders of the counties of Down and Armagh, and it was commanded by a castle, the foundations of which were not long ago, and perhaps still are, capable of being traced. The other two passes were those of POYNTZ and SCARVAUGH: see these articles.

TUSCAR, or TUSCAR ROCKS, a group of rocks in the barony of Forth, 4½ miles south-east by east of Greenore Point, and 5½ east-north-east of Carnsore Point, co. Wexford, Leinster. It consists of 4 masses of rock, arranged in a line from north to south, bearing the names of Tuscar par excellence, the North Hen and Chickens, and the South Hen and Chickens, and all lying within a space of about 2 furlongs from extremity to extremity. A lighthouse on the Tuscar Rocks is one of the most valuable works ever constructed on the Irish coast, is seen at a great distance, and guides the mariner throughout the west side of the southern entrance of St. George's Channel. "The work was commenced in the summer of 1813, and on the evening of Sunday, June 4, 1815, the light, the mariner's guiding star to the Irish channel, was first exhibited. It consists of 21 Argand lamps, acting on reflectors, having seven lamps presenting one light every two minutes, and one seven of the 21 presents a deep red light each six minutes—the term of the revolution. The lights are 105 feet from the base, and the vane from high-water mark is 134 feet. The entire construction is a fine work of art; and though the furious billows have beaten to the height of fifty feet on the cone-shaped building, not the least effect or injury has been yet sustained."—[Hall's Ireland.] The cost of maintaining the lighthouse during 1840 was £1,229 8s. 1d.; and, during 1843, it was £604 14s. An appalling accident, which occurred during the erection of the lighthouse, is noticed as follows by Mr. and Mrs. Hall:—"On the evening of the 16th of October, a strong gale sprung up from the south-west, and increased in fury till the 18th. The condition of the unfortunate men on the rock became frightfully awful. The huge billows began to roll over the entire extent of the rock, exceeding a surface of more than three acres. The very summit of the building was far overtopped. The sheds and workhouses were swept away in an instant; the loss of human life at the moment was more than thirty, and those only who clung to chains and large blocks survived the following wave. Every succeeding wave swept away some poor wretch. Some bound themselves by ropes to the chains and blocks, and fortunately the tide began to lower, yet the fury of the elements abated not. The unfortunate survivors prepared against the horrors of the next full tide, which, if possible, was more dreadfully violent. In this condition they remained for 48 hours, never free from the running of the sea, and frequently buried at high tide many feet beneath the moving mountains of water. The building itself was demolished, and several poor creatures were hurled along with the mass of stones into the abyss. Others were torn from the chains, benumbed and exhausted, whilst several died lashed in the embrace of the iron chain, which had almost cut their bodies in two. Nineteen shattered and mutilated creatures were at length, with great difficulty, rescued from their horrid condition."

TWELVE-PINS. See BINADOLA.

TWO-MILE-BORRIS. See BORRISOLEAGH.

TWO-MILE-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Kilgrant, 2½ miles east-north-east of Clonmel, barony of East Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster.

TWO-MILE-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Dungarvan, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It is situated on the river Brickey, and has fairs on July 25 and Oct. 18.

TYAQUIN, a barony in the interior of the eastern division of the county of Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the barony of Ballymoe; on the east, by the baronies of Killian and Kilconnel; on the south, by the baronies of Kilconnel and Athenry; and, on the west, by the baronies of Clare, Dunmore, and Ballymoe. Its length, south-south-westward, is 18 miles; its breadth is from a few perches to 10½ miles; and its area is 110,135 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches,—of which 467 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches are water. The surface partakes of every variety of character which distinguishes the eastern section of the county, with the exception of mountain; it is now a series of flat, dismal, unprofitable, and almost impervious bogs,—now an expanse of low and slightly-featured tableland,—now a series of pleasant vales or hollows, screened with swelling knolls and ridges,—and now an agreeably diversified alternation of hill and dale, of woodland and of farm; but, in an aggregate view, it may be pronounced a comparatively tame and very boggy portion of the great bleak plain of Connaught. One chief height in the north has an altitude above sea-level of 333 feet; one, in the centre of the northern district, has an altitude of 427 feet; one, in the south-east, has an altitude of 362 feet; one, in the south, has an altitude of 418 feet; one, in the south-west, has an altitude of 298 feet; one, in the southern part of the western district, called Knockroe, has an altitude of 557 feet; and one, in the western part of the central district, has an altitude of 305 feet. The largest of the numerous lakes which contain the water area, is Lough Kiltullagh, having a surface-elevation above sea-level of 240 feet. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townland of South Cloonlara, in the parish of Boyounagh, from the barony of Tyquin to that of Ballymoe, and the townland of Cooldorragha, in the parish of Killiereran, from the barony of Tyquin to that of Clare. Tyquin-house, the seat of Mr. Burke, is situated in the southern district of the barony, 2½ miles east-south-east of Monivae.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Clonkeen, Kilkerran, and Killascobe, and part of the parishes of Abbeyknockmoy, Ballymacward, Boyounagh, Killiereran, Killimore-Daly, Killoolau, Monivae, and Moylough. The principal villages are Monivae, Castle-Blakeney, Newtown-Bellew, and Caltra. Pop., in 1831, 30,319; in 1841, 31,922. Houses 5,430. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,669; in manufactures and trade, 637; in other pursuits, 324. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 72; on the directing of labour, 996; on their own manual labour, 4,410; on means not specified, 152. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,167; who could read but not write, 1,327; who could neither read nor write, 10,495. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 962; who could read but not write, 1,057; who could neither read nor write, 11,985.—Tyquin is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Ballinasloe, Castlereagh, Loughrea, and Tunn.—The total number of tenements valued is 4,749; and of these, 3,092 are valued under £5,—1,025, under £10,—246, under £15,—96, under £20,—52, under £25,—33, under £30,—40, under £40,—23, under £50,—and 141, at and above £50.

TYAQUIN, one of three denominations of a bog, in the parishes of Clonkeen and Monivae, 3 miles east-south-east of the village of Monivae, barony of Tyquin, co. Galway, Connaught. The other denominations are Menlough and Glentane. Area of the bog, 5,446 acres; altitude above sea-level, 293 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £6,724. The bog is, in general, wet and spongy toward the centre; but it lies high in relation to the surrounding country, is intersected by several streams, and has good declivities for drainage. Its mean depth is about 13 feet; and the strata on which it immediately lies are in some places soft white marl, and in most places limestone gravel.

TYBROUGHNEY. See TIPPERAGHNY.

TYDAVNNET. See TEDAVNNET.

TYFERNAN or TYFARNHAM, a parish in the barony of Corkaree, 3½ miles north by east of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,818 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 726 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches lie detached about ¼ of a mile to the north-west, and 11 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 310; in 1841, 380. Houses 65. The surface consists, in general, of excellent land. The southern district of the main body contains part of the extensive and richly wooded demesne of Knockdrin-castle. The rivulet Gaine traces the south-western boundary of both the main body and the detached district. The road from Mullingar to Castle-Pollard passes through the main body. The principal hamlet is Parsonstown.—This parish is an impropriate rectory and vicarage, and part of the perpetual curacy of LEXER [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £35; and are impropriate in Sir John Bennet Piers, Bart., of Tristernagh abbey. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 304; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 47 boys and 18 girls.

TYHALLON. See TEHALLON.

TYMOLE, TIMOOLE, or TEEMOOLE, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Skreen, 3 miles south-south-west of Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, northward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,033 acres, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 74; in 1841, 71. Houses 9. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Duleek to Dunshaughlin. The southern district contains Guiliamstown-cottage; and the northern district is partly bounded, partly traversed, by Nanny water.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DULEEK [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £45; glebe, £20 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £32; and are impropriate in Mr. Hamilton. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 55; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

TYMON, TIMON, or TINOTHAN, an old castle in the parish of Tallaght, 1½ mile north-east by north of the village of Tallaght, barony of Upper-cross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It crowns a rising ground, is a conspicuous object for many miles around, and commands a noble and extensive view of the beautiful surrounding country. The structure is a square tower of severe character, with few and small windows, and quite destitute of outworks; and it seems to have been built only for security, and was inhabited only in ages and at periods when all thoughts of comfort were superseded by those of mere military defence. "It is stated by Mr. Monche Mason, in his work entitled Hibernia Antiqua, the lordship or manor of 'Timothan,' was granted by King John to Henry de Loundree, in recompence for losses of the church, and for the expense that prelate had incurred in fortifying the castle of Dublin. In 1247, Timothan was constituted a prebend of St. Patrick's cathedral, which prebend still exists, although divested of its endowment, or corps, by accident and lapse of time. From the same work, we learn that, according to an inquisition taken in the reign of Henry VIII., Timon castle was then in a ruinous condition." [Brewer's Ireland.]

TYNAGH, a parish 6½ miles north-west by west of Portumna, and partly in the barony of Longford, but chiefly in that of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. The Leitrim section contains the village of Tynagh. The parish consists of a main body and a detached district, the latter situated 5 furlongs west of the north-western extremity of the former, and belonging to the Leitrim section. Length of the main body, south by eastward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Length of the detached district, westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 4½ furlongs. Area of the Longford section, 3,233 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches. Area of the Leitrim section, 9,286 acres, 31 perches,—of which 633 acres, 23 perches are in the detached district, and 65 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches are in Lough Derg. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 5,748, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,654; in 1841, 5,941. Houses 974. Pop. of the Longford section, in 1831, 1,745; in 1841, 1,604. Houses 274. Pop. of the rural districts of the Leitrim section, in 1841, 3,989. Houses 636. The small portion of Lough Derg within the Leitrim section is part of Ballyisland bay, and lies at the southern extremity of the main body of the parish. Considerable tracts of bog encumber the southern district, in the vicinity of Lough Derg, and large patches occur also in the other districts; yet the parochial surface, in a general view, consists of good land, low in situation, and not over-rich in wood or cultivation. The highest ground is in the west of the main body, and has an altitude above sea-level of only 182 feet. The principal residences are Derrywillin-house, Killeen-house, Streamstown-house, Liscliff-house, Pallas-house, and Flowerhill,—the last two the seats of gentlemen of the name of Nugent. The chief hamlets, within the Longford section, are Moyeenmurragh, Barnaculla, and Straidmore; within the main body of the Leitrim section, Garrawn, Shanvallyard, Ballyglass, Cappagh, Cloonmoylan, and Barroughter; and within the detached district of the Leitrim section, Kylebeg. The principal antiquities in the parish are the ruins of Pallas-castle, of three other castles, and of St. Corban's church. The roads from Portumna to Loughrea, Gort, and Scariff, pass through the interior. The village of Tynagh, the site of the parish-church stands on the first of these roads, 6½ miles north-west by west of Portumna, and 7 east-south-east of Loughrea. Fairs are held on March 27, Aug. 31, and Dec. 11. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 348. Houses 64. —This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £198 14s. 2d.; glebe, £12 11s. 6d. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £48 19s. 8½d., belongs to the see of Clonfert, the prebend of Kilneen in the cathedral of Tynan, and the vicar chorals of the cathedrals of Dublin. The rectories of Tynagh and DONEIRA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Tynagh. Length, 9½ miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 7,992. Gross income, £358 7s. 7½d.; nett, £321 6s. 3½d. Patron, the Marquis of Chancery. The incumbent holds also the united benefices of Clonfert, Clontuskert, and Kilmallinoge, in the dio. of Clonfert, the sinecure archdeaconry of the dio. of Clonfert, and the sinecure prebend of Castropetre in the cathedral of Kildare; and is non-resident in Tynagh. A curate receives a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house, a garden, and 7 acres of land. The church was built in 1702; but a new church is about to be erected, chiefly by means of contributions from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings in the old church, 120; attendance 20. The Tynagh Roman Catholic chapel has 2 officiates, and an attendance of 750. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Doneira. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 52, and the Roman Catholics to 5,610; the Protestants of the union to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 7,943; a hedge-school at Lackaroe in the parish was usually attended by from 35 to 40 scholars; and 3 other daily schools in the parish, at respectively Linchill, Goorahane, and Carba—the first of which was salaried with £2 a-year from the rector, £5 from Lord Clancarty, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 134 boys and 61 girls.

TYNAN (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Monaghan and Armagh, Ulster. It rises in co. Monaghan, flows through Castle-Shane, enters co. Armagh in the vicinity of the village of Middleton, intersects the small westward wing of co. Armagh which is bounded on three sides by co. Monaghan, flows past the town of Tynan, and falls into the Blackwater in the vicinity of Caledon.

TYNAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Armagh, but chiefly in that of Turaney, co. Armagh, Ulster. The barony of Armagh section contains the village of KILLYLEAGH; and the Turaney section contains the villages of TYNAN and MIDDLETON: see these articles. Length, southward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the barony of Armagh section, 4,314 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches; of the Turaney section, 12,731 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 80 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 11,542; in 1841, 11,392. Houses 2,094. Pop. of the barony of Armagh section, in 1831, 2,955. Houses 539. Pop. of the rural districts of the barony of Armagh section, in 1841, 2,522. Houses 456. Pop. of the rural districts of the Turaney section, in 1831, 7,509; in 1841, 7,648. Houses 1,300. The quoad sacra parish of Tynan is exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Middleton, and part of the perpetual curacy of Killyleagh, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 3,905. The surface of the quoad civilia parish extends along the western margin of the county, from the vicinity of Archfield-house on the south to a point on the river Blackwater 2½ miles below Caledon bridge on the north; it is traversed, over nearly three-fourths of its length, from the northern extremity southward, along the west, by the Ulster Canal; and, in a general view, it consists of good land, and possesses a very considerable aggregate of demesne-ground and pleasant scenery. The southern part of the eastern district was formerly in a half waste condition, but is now improved and almost wholly profitable. The lands on one side of the village of Middleton are low, flat, and marshy; but those on the other side are hilly and tolerably good. The land around the village of Tynan, and eastward thence toward Armagh, possesses a fertile limestone soil, and presents a comparative profusion of wood and other decoration. The principal residences are Tynan-abbey, the handsome seat of Sir J. Stronge, Bart., ¼ of a mile south-west of the village of Tynan; Mount-Irwin, the seat of W. Irwin, Esq., 2 miles north-east of Middleton; Fellows-hall, the seat of T. K. Armstrong, Esq., 1½ mile east of Tynan; Woodpark, the seat of A. St. George, Esq., 1½ mile south of Killyleagh; Bondville, the seat of H. F. Bond, Esq., 1½ mile south-south-west of Tynan; Ashford, the seat of R. Harris, Esq., 1 mile south-east of Middleton; Portnelligan, the seat of M. Cross, Esq., 2½ miles east of Middleton; and Darton, the seat of M. Cross, Esq., 5 furlongs south-south-west of Killyleagh. The principal antiquities, additional to those at the villages, are the ruins of Arlconnel-castle, on the western border, 1 mile south by west of Middleton; and the ruins of another castle, 4 miles south of Killyleagh. The roads from Caledon and Monaghan to Armagh pass across the interior.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £800 1s. 7d.; glebe, £190 12s. Gross income, £990 13s. 7d.; nett, £771 3s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. All the following statistics refer only to the quoad sacra parish; those for the other districts being given under the worlts MIDDLETON and KILLYLEAGH. A curate receives a salary of 475. The church was built in 1784, at a cost now unknown; and was enlarged by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 297. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 210. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 353; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Middleton. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 1,472 Churchmen, 695 Presbyterians, and 1,571 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 186 scholars; and 5 daily schools had on their books 169 boys and 144 girls. One of the schools, at Enagh, was partly supported by the rector; one, at Derryhane, was partly supported by subscription; and a third was salaried with an unreported sum from the rector and the curate, and with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith. In 1843, a National school at the village of Tynan had on its books 75 boys and 26 girls.

TYNAN, a village in the parish of Tynan, barony of Turaney, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on one of the roads from Armagh to Monaghan, and on the direct road from Monaghan to Charlemont, ½ a mile east of the Ulster Canal, 1½ south-south-east of Caledon, 1½ south-west of Killyleagh, 2½ north by east of Middleton, 6½ west-south-west of Armagh, 7½ north-east of Monaghan, and 8½ north by west of Dublin. "This town, which is situated on an eminence," says Sir Charles Coote, in his Statistical Survey of the County of Armagh, "is inconsiderable as to the number or neatness of its houses; but it has an excellent church with a handsome steeple. Without the churchyard is a relic of antiquity, an oblong stone of about 18 inches square and 4 feet long, set upon a large block stone, and capped with another, which is square, having its faces concaved, and this covered with a smaller stone. I could not discover any characters on this relic. The oblong stone is divided into square compartments, and had the vestige of some sculpture,—probably a cross had formerly crowned it; it is, however, certain that it has been mutilated. The ruins of an antique castle are situated about one mile from this town." The village contains a Roman Catholic chapel, two schools, a post-office, a dispensary, a small sessions-house, and a constabulary barrack. The dispensary is within the Armagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 17,045 acres, with a pop. of 11,539; and, in 1839, it expended £107 17s., and administered to 1,400 patients. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 243; in 1841, 177. Houses 30.

TYNISH, an inhabited island in the parish of Moyry, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies 3 furlongs south-south-west of the nearest part of the mainland, 5 furlongs east of Myrish, 3½ miles west of Lettermore, and 3¼ miles north-west by west of Garomma. Its length, south-south-westward, is 1½ mile; and its extreme breadth is 3 furlongs. Its inhabitants amount to about 150, and are engaged chiefly in the fisheries.

TYRAWLEY, a barony in the north-west of the county of Mayo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the Atlantic ocean; on the east, by Killalla bay, the county of Sligo, and the barony of Gallen; on the south, by the baronies of Gallen, Carra, and Burrishoole; on the south-west, by the barony of Burrishoole; and on the west, by the barony of Erris. Its length, southward, is 22½ miles; its extreme breadth is 16 miles; and its area is 261,029 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches,—of which 213 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are tideway in the river Moy, and 15,931 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches are fresh water. The greater part of the water area is comprised in the greater portion of Lough Conn, about the half of Lough Cullen, nearly the half of Lough Beltra, and the whole of Loughs Levally, Black, Drumleen, Bunaweela, Tulla, and Cloonagh. The river Moy traces the whole of the western boundary northward to Killalla bay. The western district, increasing from about one-sixth of the whole breadth of the barony in the north to nearly one-half in the south, is, in a general view, champaign, and the seat of by far the larger portion of the population; the other districts are wild, moorish, mountainous, and very thinly inhabited; the southern boundary and the central part of the western district are distinguished by glens or dingles which have a comparatively low summit-level above the level of the sea, and offer an easy natural communication across the north-western mountain-region of Mayo, from the valley of Lough Conn to the west coast of Erris; and the sea-board, over the greater portion of the north, displays, though not in the same degree, a similar wildness and romance to the northern sea-board of Erris, and terminates in a bold, rugged, inhospitable, and powerfully picturesque coast, a chief feature of which is the singular promontory of Downpatrick. See CONN, BELTRA, MOY, MOYNE, KILLALLA, and DOWNPATRICK. The principal mountain summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Nephin, 2,646 feet, overhanging the west side of Lough Conn; Tristia, 1,067 feet, 2 miles west-north-west of Nephin; Bennevagh, 1,298 feet, immediately beyond the south-eastern boundary; Burren, 1,299 feet, immediately beyond the southern boundary, 2½ miles south-west of Bennevagh; Birrincarragh, 2,295 feet, on the south-western boundary; a height 2 miles east of Birrincarragh, 1,695 feet; Mount-Eagle, 1,390 feet, immediately beyond the south-western boundary; Bullaunmore, 1,274 feet, on the western border; Furnaught, 496 feet, on the western border, and north side of the central glen; Croaghan, 789 feet, a little west of the centre of the northern district; Benmore, 1,155 feet, on the north-west border; a height 1,117 feet, on the north-west boundary, 1½ mile from the coast; and Manmaceogh, 1,243 feet, on the north-western sea-board, 3 miles from the sea.

"From Ballina to Killalla," says Dr. MacParlan, "the soil is remarkably various; some deep and rich about Ballina, then for 3 miles to the Moyne, moory and poor. The Moyne, about Killalla, down the Laggan, to the sea, except some moory mixtures, are all a dark brown, sandy, and gravelly loam, most of it on a limestone bottom. The soil of Moyne is a ruddle red, and still of a peculiarly rich quality, on limestone rock and gravel; in richness, therefore, cannot be ascribable to a ferruginous tincture, but to an admixture of bituminous matter. Some other grounds in the neighbourhood have a tilly redness, but they are not only so in colour, but in quality. The distance from Ballina to the sea, north, is about 15 miles, including the Laggan; and from the river Moy, east to the mountains of Erris, west, from 12 to 14 miles, 7 miles of which breadth is mountain on Tyrawley side. The champaign parts of this scope are interspersed with several gentlemen's seats, very prettily situated, in view of the sea. The Moy and Rathfron rivers, the points of land and broken islands of the sea, enliven and improve those views. Palmerstown is beautifully situated in very fine views of the scene; Summerhill enjoys its share of those beauties; and so do many others. In travelling south-west from Kilcummen Head, where the French landed, the grounds swell for a few miles into high hills, the tops of which are covered with heath,—the sides and valleys green, and some remarkably fertile. But these hills soon degenerate into black mountains, which stretch about seven miles deep, all along the north-west border of Tyrawley, meeting, as they proceed, the mountains of Erris, in a run of about 25 miles. In going southward from those mountain hills, through the interior of the barony, as far as Lough Conn, one is induced to esteem it not only a good country for tillage and pasture, but even handsome in point of natural beauties, gentlemen's seats, and improvements. Colonel Cuffe's very extensive and handsome demesne and house are situated to very great advantage, in some very fine views of the Deel river, Lough Conn, and the distant mountain of Nephin, and some others. The prospect from the top of the castle is exceedingly picturesque. This seat is called Deel-castle. Mr. Ormsby's house, Colonel Jackson's, and Captain O'Donnell's little villa, enjoy every advantage of situation on this lake. In this neighbourhood is Abbeytown, on the Deel water; the demesne is of prime quality, and supplies the house abundantly with the usual necessaries. Within a few miles of all those places, Mr. Paget has built an excellent house at Knockglass, and is every day enlarging a good demesne, by reclaiming rivers and bogs. There are also several others. Farther westward, near Mount-Nephin, is Currowkeel, the charming villa of Captain Burke; it is exquisitely neat, and in a most romantic situation. Hereabout, in this direction, is terminated the green part of the barony of Tyrawley. Here rises into the clouds the noted mountain of Nephin; and north and south lies scattered, to an extent of upwards of 60 miles, a continued tract of subordinate mountains, terminating on the one hand in Erris, and on the other, in the Ox mountains, near Ballysodere, in the county of Sligo. Those mountains are not only of prodigious extent in length, but also in breadth. I now write this after travelling them about 12 miles across, from the north-east of Nephin to Newport, without any variety to relieve the eye, except the great and delightful glen of Bohedoon, and the extensive woods that sweep along the windmills of Colnabinn river. All this suddenly appears in descending to the west of Nephin. The river at first sight, for a quarter of a mile down this glen, glares through the wood; and the banks of the river, as much as the leaves and branches disclose, are tinged with a verdure of exquisite hue. The hue woods sometimes branch away from the river, along the glens of Nephin, and sometimes expand into wide skirtings along the base of the mountain. This sort of scenery entertains the traveller for a couple of miles, till after sloping a considerable distance from the glen, Beltra Lake makes its appearance, and soon afterwards the islands of Newport bay and the town.

Tyrawley contains part of the parish of Kilmore-moy, and the whole of the parishes of Addergoole, Ardiach, Ballinahughish, Balliskeary, Crossmolina, Doonfeeny, Kilbelfad, Kilbride, Kilcummin, Kilfian, Killalla, Lacken, Moygowna, Rathreagh, and Templemurry. The towns and chief villages are Ballina, Killalla, Crossmolina, Ballycastle, Rath-lacken, and Kiurcon. Pop., in 1831, 70,238; in 1841, 71,232. Houses 12,307. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 9,927; in manufactures and trade, 1,974; in other pursuits, 861. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 214; on the directing of labour, 2,020; on their own manual labour, 10,215; on means not specified, 313. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,337; who could read but not write, 2,837; who could neither read nor write, 22,274. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,070; who could read but not write, 2,423; who could neither read nor write, 26,823.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Ballina, and partly within that of Castlebar. The total number of valued tenements is 13,619; and of these, 11,381 are valued under £5,—1,585, under £10,—270, under £15,—84, under £20,—72, under £25,—33, under £30,—70, under £40,—26, under £50, and 98, at and above £50.

TYRCONNEL, an ancient toparchy, nearly identical with the present county of Donegal, in the north-west of Ulster. The O'Donnells were the chieftains or sovereigns of this toparchy; and had under them the tributary chiefs of the O'Boyles in Boyleagh and the Rosses, the MacSwines in Bannagh, Rossguil, and Fanad, and the O'Doghertys in Innishowen. Hugh O'Donnell, surnamed the Red, was the most distinguished individual in the line of the chieftains, and made a conspicuous figure in the rebellions against the authority of Queen Elizabeth. See DONEGAL. Niel Garriv O'Donnell, the cousin of Hugh the Red, was made chieftain by government in the place of Hugh; but he proved refractory, and was displaced; and Rory O'Donnell, another cousin of Hugh, was promoted to the chieftainship; and, by letters-patent of James I. in 1603, was created Baron Donegal and Earl of Tyrconnel. Niel Garriv and his allies the MacSwines, rebelled against the appointment of Rory and the authority of government, but were speedily reduced to submission. Even Rory, also, was, only four years afterwards, detected in a conspiracy with the Earl of Tyrone against the government, and sought safety in voluntary expatriation to the continent of Europe. In 1663, Oliver Fitzwilliam was created Earl of Tyrconnel, but he died in 1667, leaving no heir to his title. In 1686, Richard Talbot was created Earl of Tyrconnel; from that year till 1689, when the fallen monarch James arrived in Dublin, he filled the office of Lord-lieutenant; and during the brief period which followed till the destruction of the cause of Jacobitism, he made a conspicuous figure as a Jacobite partisan, and received from the abdicated king the empty title of Duke of Tyrconnel. In 1761, George Delaval Carpenter, fourth Baron Carpenter of Killaghy in the county of Kilkenny, was created Viscount Carlingford and Earl of Tyrconnel. In 1812, George, third Earl of Tyrconnel of this last creation, who had entered the military service of Russia as a volunteer, died of excessive fatigue at Wilna. The fourth and present Earl of Tyrconnel, John Delaval Carpenter, was born in 1790, and has no heir to his title, either apparent or presumptive. His seat is Keplin-park, in Yorkshire.

TYRELLA, a parish on the coast of the barony of Lecale, 3 miles east of Dundrum, co. Down, 11.5 ster. Length, southward, 24 miles; breadth, from 1 to 1½; area, 1,999 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,774; in 1841, 1,079. Houses 196. The surface declines to the middle of the head of Dunderum bay; consists, in the aggregate, of indifferent land; and is traversed by the road from Ardglass to Newry. The principal residence is Tyrella-house, the seat of A. H. Montgomery, Esq. On the coast is a coast-guard station; in the south-east corner are the ruins of the parish-church; and in the north, are a school and a Roman Catholic chapel.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Down [which see], in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £164 15s. 9d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 627; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Loughlin Island. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 113 Churchmen, 166 Presbyterians, and 1,494 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, held during summer, was usually attended by about 45 scholars; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 108 boys and 67 girls.

TYRELL'S PASS. See TYRELL'S PASS.

TYRENASCRAUGH, or TIRANASCRAUGH, a parish in the barony of Longford, 31 miles south-south-west of Eyrecourt, co. Galway, CONNAUGHT. Length, south-eastward, 24 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,629 acres, 31 perches,—of which 41 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 1,093; in 1841, 1,118. Houses 185. The surface lies on the eastern margin of the county; consists pre-eminently of indifferent land, and to a considerable extent of bog; presents a low, flat, featureless appearance; and is traversed by the road from Eyrecourt to Portunna. The principal residences are Ormondview and Longford-lodge; the principal hamlet is Ballinlugh; the principal antiquities are the ruins of a church and of Longford-castle; and the other chief objects of interest are a Roman Catholic chapel and a constabulary barrack.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONONAGHTA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £32 6s. 1½d., and the rectorial for £38 10s. 4½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the see and the deanery of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killinore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 1,082; and there was no school.

TYRERAGH, a barony on the coast of the co. of Sligo, CONNAUGHT. It is bounded, on the north, by the Atlantic ocean and the outer part of the bay of Donegal; on the east, by the baronies of Carbery and Leney; on the south, by the barony of Leney and the county of Mayo; and on the west, by the county of Mayo. Its length, in the direction of west by south, is 17½ miles; its breadth increases from 3½ miles in the extreme east to 13 near the extreme west; and its area is 106,802 acres, 8 perches,—of which 179 acres, 1 perch are tideway of the river Moy, and 327 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches are fresh water. Ardglass harbour or Ballysadere bay forms the greater part of the eastern boundary; and the river Moy and Killalla bay form the whole of the western boundary. The eastern and the central districts consist of a portion of the Ox mountains along the south, and a valley or band of low country along the north; and the western district consists of the right side of the valley of the Moy, and the eastern sea-board of Killalla bay. The principal streams northward to the sea are the rivulets Carrowcar, Duneill, Eskay, Ballybeg, and Fimned; and the principal westward to Killalla bay and the Moy are the rivulets Liffony, Bellawaddy, Devlin, and Bunree. Excepting part of Lough Eskay on the southern boundary, the lakes, though numerous, are all very small. Only part of the central district toward the west ascends to the summit-line of the Ox mountains; and the principal summit of these mountains within the barony have an altitude of 1,778 feet; but three other summits immediately beyond the boundary have altitudes of respectively 1,238, 1,332, and 1,685 feet. Most of the arable portions of the low ground of the barony were originally moor and bog, superincumbent on what is provincially termed laclea [see the article on the county of SLIGO]; and they have a light and gravelly soil, with which is mixed up, in consequence of prolonged courses of tillage and trenching, the originally subjacent laclea. But a very large proportion of the low ground, particularly in the eastern and central districts, still continues in the condition of moor and morass. The bogs, however, are, for the most part, shallow; they lie upon a mixture of clay, black limestone, and black slate clay, which serves as an excellent manure for their reclamation and improvement; they seldom approach nearer the sea than about a mile; and they are belted round the east, the north, and the west, by a well-cultivated, ornate, and populous district of country. "The lower part of Tyreragh," says Mr. Nimmo, in the report of his Coast Survey, "is limestone country, on which for about two miles broad there is a belt of arable land along the shore and the Moy river. Behind this an extensive tract, chiefly bog and moor, gradually rising to the Ox mountains. These hills are composed of gneiss or granite rock, seldom 500 feet elevation, and range from Ballysadere to Foxford, at the first of which places the Arrow,* and at the second the Moy river cross through from the interior. To the westward the primitive rock of this range is traceable towards the mountains of Erris, and to the eastward, by the Sleish and Benbo to Manor-Hamilton, where it is lost; but probably communicates subterraneously with the granite of Donegal. South of the Ox mountains is a valley which may be said to run from Manor-Hamilton to Castlebar, or Clew bay, the extreme parts of which are chiefly a rich limestone country; but the centre sand, or sandstone rocks, with extensive bogs and little cultivation, rising to the sandstone hills which range from the Curlews to Slieve Carne in Mayo. The land communication through Tyreragh has been by one principal road running within half-a-mile of the coast; lately another has been formed from Ballina to Dromore, cutting off a portion of the vertex of the triangle, and then proceeding nearly parallel to the first, to the east end of the barony; but the great tract of moorland above-mentioned is hitherto unopened, and there is properly only one road across the Ox mountains, viz., from Ballina towards Boyle, and through the hollow by Lough Talt. This is too hilly for heavy carriages. An important branch from this pass to the sea has been lately effected by government. The shores of Tyreragh being level and fertile, are well peopled; several good fishing grounds lie near it, especially the bank of Killeenduff or Esky; but as there are no harbours fit for receiving a sailing boat, this source of industry cannot be prosecuted to any extent." The scenery of Tyreragh, though extensively gloomy and devoid of character, includes many agreeable close landscapes, and several very noble large views. "There are in this barony," says Dr. MacParlan, "some situations extremely fine. The prospects from Sir Malbay Crofton's mansion of Tanrego, and some other seats in that part of the barony, are of superior grandeur, including an islanded arn of the sea rising to Ballysalere, the verdant and lofty hills of Benbulbin and Knocknaree, and a well improved country in the neighbourhood of Sligo. A little more to the north the eye sweeps over the great arm of the Atlantic comprising the bays of Sligo, Donegal, and Killybegs, beyond which appears the stupendous promontory of Tellig Head, and some of the improvements and gentlemen's seats in the county of Donegal, backed by a great range of mountains. Farther westward, the seats of Captain Jones, the Messrs. Fenton and some others, improve that scene. And in approaching to the Moy and Mayo, the seats of Mr. Nisbet, Mr. Kirkwood, the river Moy, Killala beyond the Moy, and an arm of the sea full of islands and broken sand banks, including Castleconnor, Moyne Abbey, the very beautiful round tower at Killala, &c., are to a stranger full of novelty and pleasure. In pursuing the Moy to Ardarae the country looks very well; but about Ardarae and its junction by a bridge with Ballina, it is remarkably pretty."—Tyerragh contains part of the parish of Kilmoremy, and the whole of the parishes of Castle-Connor, Dromard, Eskay, Kilglass, Kilmacshalgan, Skreen, and Templeboy. The towns and principal villages are Ardarae, Eskay, Corbally, Bunree, Crockettstown, and Dromore-West. Pop., in 1831, 35,266; in 1841, 36,759. Houses 6,482. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,206; in manufactures and trade, 1,119; in other pursuits, 363. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 110; on the directing of labour, 1,338; on their own manual labour, 5,156; on means not specified, 84. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,917; who could read but not write, 1,821; who could neither read nor write, 11,107. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,167; who could read but not write, 1,554; who could neither read nor write, 13,477.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Ballina, and partly within that of Sligo. The total number of valued tenements is 7,084; and of these, 4,740 are valued under £3,—1,507, under £10,—408, under £15,—136, under £20,—74, under £25,—41, under £30,—59, under £40,—26, under £50,—and 93, at and above £50.

TYRIUGH, a barony in the extreme south of the county of Donegal, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Bannagh; on the north-east, by the barony of Raphoe and the county of Tyrone; on the east, by the county of Tyrone; on the south, by the counties of Fermanagh and Leitrim; and on the west, by the bay of Donegal. Its length, south-south-westward, is 19 miles; its greatest breadth is 17 miles; and its area is 127,902 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches,—of which 5,544 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are water. Lough Esk and the rivulet Esk form the greater part of the north-west boundary; the rivulet Derg traces part of the north-east boundary; the rivulet Termon traces a considerable part of the east boundary; Lower Lough Erne touches, at one point, the southern boundary; the river Erne runs across a portion of the southern border to Donegal bay; and the whole of the head of Donegal bay, together with all the east side of Donegal harbour, lie along the western boundary. The whole of Lough Derg lies in the eastern district; and numerous small lakes are dispersed throughout the southern and the central districts. The extreme northern district—which, however, is narrow, and of comparatively small extent—is mountainous, contains the long alpine defile or pass of Barnesmore, boasts the sublime scenery of that defile, and part of the romantic scenery around Lough Esk, and possesses the two master-heights of Croughnaguer and Liggafania, whose summits have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 1,793 and 1,323 feet. The eastern district, comprising about 46 square miles, principally consists of the wild and gloomy peripherous hill-screen of Lough Derg, but includes also the portion of the shore of Lower Lough Erne which lies around Pettigoe, and contains some vantage-grounds to the south of Lough Derg which command the most extensive and magnificent views of the great basin, the islands, and the hill-screens of Lough Erne. The other districts are of very various character, and partly tame, splashy, and dappled with cold, staring loughlets; but they boast the pleasant terminating portion of the valley of the Erne, the agreeable and occasionally picturesque sea-board of the head of Donegal bay, and, above all, the exquisitely beautiful, the brilliant, and the comparatively extensive district of the Pullans. The summits of Ballykillowen and Ought hills, in the central district, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 626 and 806 feet; the summit of Breesy hill, in the south, has an altitude of 852 feet; and the summits of Killinangel and Ballinacarrick hills, in the west, have altitudes of respectively 254 and 412 feet. See BARNESMORE, ESK, DERG, PETTIGOE, ERNE, PULLANS, and DONEGAL. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townland of Drumlongfield, in the parish of Templecarne, from the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, to that of Lurg, co. Fermanagh.—Tyrhugh contains part of the parishes of Innismacaint and Templecarne, and the whole of the parishes of Donegal, Drumholm, and Kilbarrow. The towns and chief villages are Ballyshannon, Ballintra, Laghy, Bindoran, Single-Street, part of Donegal, and part of Pettigoe. Pop., in 1831, 37,301; in 1841, 36,839. Houses 6,428. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,574; in manufactures and trade, 1,740; in other pursuits, 475. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 192; on the directing of labour, 1,726; on their own manual labour, 4,770; on means not specified, 101. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,273; who could read but not write, 3,100; who could neither read nor write, 7,284. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,258; who could read but not write, 4,575; who could neither read nor write, 9,606.—This barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Donegal, Ballyshannon, and Lougherstown. The total number of tenements valued is 6,263; and of these, 3,626 are valued under £5,—1,683, under £10,—501, under £15,—240, under £20,—85, under £25,—48, under £30,—45, under £40,—21, under £50,—and 34, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £30,332 5s. 6d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £2,282 14s. 9d., and £1,622 4s. 3d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,685 9s. 1d., and £1,839 17s. 7d.

TYRKEERAN, a barony of the county of Londonderry, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by Lough Foyle; on the east, by the barony of Kenaught; on the south and south-west, by the county of Tyrone; and on the west, by the barony or north-west liberties of Londonderry. Its length, north-westward, is 14½ miles; its breadth is from 2½ to 11½ miles; and its area is 93,786 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches,—of which 987 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches are tideway of the river Foyle, and 1,187 acres, 3 roods are fresh water. The head or south side of Lough Foyle is very nearly co-extensive with the northern boundary; and the river Foyle traces the whole of the western boundary. The northern district of the barony is identical with the southern sea-board of Lough Foyle, and the terminating part of Faughanvale and the valley of the river Faughan; the most prominent portion of the central district is identical with the major portion of the valley and hill-screens of the Faughan; the western district is identical with the lower part of the east side of the valley of the Foyle; the extreme southern district consists of part of the Speerin mountains; and the remaining districts consist of a portion of the great mountain congeries of the county of Londonderry, intersected with winding glens and pleasant vales. The principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, on the eastern boundary, Legavanon, 1,289 feet.—Mullaghineach, 797 feet,—and Mullagh-ash, 1,518 feet; in the district east of the glen and valley of the Faughan, a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile from Lough Foyle, 607 feet,—a height 2 miles from Lough Foyle, 541 feet,—Slievebuck, 823 feet,—and a height $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Slievebuck, 970 feet; on the southern boundary, among the Speerin mountains, Sawel, 2,236 feet,—a height a little west of Sawel, 2,037 feet,—and Dart mountain, 1,612 feet; and in the district north-west of the Speerin mountains, and west of the glen and valley of the Faughan, Slieveboy, 854 feet,—Crockdoish, 1,037 feet.—Slievekirk, 1,225 feet,—Ned's Top, 986 feet,—and Brown Mountain, 973 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Upper Cumber and Banagher, and the whole of the parishes of Clondermot, Lower Cumber, and Faughanvale. The towns and principal villages are Muff, Newbuildings, Claudy, Feeny, and the eastern suburb of Londonderry. Pop., in 1831, 32,328; in 1841, 30,925. Houses 5,564. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,717; in manufactures and trade, 1,754; in other pursuits, 296. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 116; on the directing of labour, 1,685; on their own manual labour, 3,914; on means not specified, 52. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,536; who could read but not write, 3,607; who could neither read nor write, 3,928. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,660; who could read but not write, 6,100; who could neither read nor write, 3,385.—Tyrkeeran lies partly within the Poor-law union of Londonderry, and partly within that of Newtownlismavady. The total number of tenements valued is 2,941; and of these, 793 are valued under £5,—921, under £10,—443, under £15,—230, under £20,—160, under £25,—105, under £30,—123, under £40,—58, under £50,—and 105, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £32,860 4s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £2,139 2s. 3d., and £2,255 6s.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,104 2s. 8d., and £2,169 18s. 5d.

TYRKENNEDY, a barony in the eastern district of the county of Fermanagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Tyrone; on the east, by the county of Tyrone and the barony of Magherastephana; on the south, by the baronies of Magherastephana and Knockninny; and on the west, by the baronies of Glenmuley, Magheraboy, and Lurg. Its length, south-westward, is $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its breadth is from $\frac{1}{4}$ to 8 miles; and its area is 54,085 acres, 2 roads, 32 perches,—of which 2,911 acres, 20 perches are water. The water area is comprised in a portion of the foot of Upper Lough Erne, a part of the middle run of the river Erne, and a number of small lakes. The territorial surface is much diversified, and displays a large amount of beauty; but it is nearly identical with the central portion of the east side of the basin of the Erne. See ENNE. Topped Mountain appears to be the highest ground, and has an altitude above sea-level of 909 feet. "The soil of this barony varies considerably; near to Enniskillen it is a rich loam, on a clayey, and, in some cases, a peaty sub-soil, the low moist lands being occupied as meadows and pasture. The grounds of medium elevation are chiefly arable, and consist of a good brown loam, upon a moderately retentive subsoil, and are capable of great fertility if properly cultivated. The remainder of the barony is of a light brown soil, frequently upon a clayey gravel, and a moory or peaty soil upon clay. Cornagrade near Enniskillen affords fine limestone, from which a good part of the barony is supplied. Agriculture has been much neglected by the generality of farmers and their landlords; many of the latter are also absentees. Yet there are two or three instances of gentlemen endeavouring to promote a better system by the introduction of clover, tares, turnips, and rape. The usual course of crops pursued by the farmers on the old plan is: first, oats; second, potatoes manured; sometimes, and not unfrequently, potatoes are taken as the first crop, and as many crops of oats follow in succession as the land will produce; third, oats; fourth, oats. Flax sometimes follows potatoes; and sometimes the first crop of oats. After the fourth year, the land is either manured or limed, or they allow it, according to their own expression, 'to lie out to rest;' if it is manured, it is cropped again for several years as before, or if it is left to rest, it remains in that unproductive and resting state for two or three years, as they say, 'shifting for itself,' without any grass being sown; and they allow that it affords them scarcely any grass the first year, very little the second, and not much the third. The appearance of the pasture fully confirms this statement. The farms vary in size from 5 to 50 Irish acres; the average may be stated at 10 or 12 acres; the proportion in tillage or under the plough two-thirds. The rent of the larger farms £1 10s. per acre; the smaller ones £1 15s. to £2, and some more. Tithe is 1s. 6d., grand jury cess 2s. 9d., parish cess 9d. to 2s. 4d. per acre. Limestone at Cornagrade costs 6d. for a cart-load of about 15 cwt.; when burnt, the price is from 8d. to 10d. per barrel of four bushels. The farmers under these rents and taxes are sinking, and their capital is diminishing. The produce is 8 barrels of wheat, of 20 stones per barrel; 10 sacks of oats, of 24 stones per sack; 8 sacks of barley, of 20 stones per sack; and 40 barrels of potatoes, of 48 stones per barrel. The women generally are not employed in weeding and other outdoor works, so much as they are in England; neither are children brought up to the same industrious habits, the men being more than sufficient for the labour required; at the same time, both they and the men are as much disposed to industry as any people can possibly be when they have a reasonable inducement to work; but their present prospects are a premium to idleness." The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84. transferred the townland of Sessiagh, in the parish of Magheracross, from the barony of Tyrkenney to that of Lurg,—pop., in 1841, 53; the townland of Drumarrow, in the parish of Trory, from the barony of Magheraboy to that of Tyrkenney,—pop. 62; the townland of Monalla, in the parish of Derryvullane, from the barony of Lurg to that of Tyrkenney,—pop. 28; and the townlands of Roscor and Sheridan, in the parish of Magheracross, from the barony of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, to that of Omagh, co. Tyrone,—pop. 204.—The barony of Tyrkenney, as at present constituted, contains part of the parishes of Cleenish, Derrybrusk, Derryvullane, Enniskillen, Magheracross, and Trory. The only town is Lisbellaw, Tempo, and Ballinamallard. Pop., in 1831, 22,802; in 1841, 23,447. Houses 4,100. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,923; in manufactures and trade, 1,151; in other pursuits, 389. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 111; on the directing of labour, 1,118; on their own manual labour, 3,091; on means not specified, 65. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,249; who could read but not write, 2,222; who could neither read nor write, 3,560. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,892; who could read but not write, 3,779; who could neither read nor write, 4,883.—Tyrkeneddy is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Enniskillen, Lowtherstown, and Lisnaskea. The total number of tenements valued is 2,941; and of these, 1,114 are valued under £5,—954, under £10,—381, under £15,—198, under £20,—109, under £25,—66, under £30,—36, under £40,—31, under £50,—and 52, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £28,714 4s. 10d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £2,479 14s. 1d.

TYRONE,

An inland county of the province of Ulster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the county of Londonderry; on the east, by Lough Neagh; on the south-east, by the county of Armagh; on the south, by the counties of Monaghan and Fermanagh; on the south-west, by the county of Fermanagh; and on the west and north-west, by the county of Donegal. The boundary-line, over about 11 miles in the central part of the north, is formed by the watershed of the Sperrin mountains; over 6 miles in the eastern part of the north to Lough Neagh, by the rivulet Ballinderry; over the whole of the line of contact with the county of Armagh, by the river Blackwater; over about 7½ miles of the line of contact with the county of Monaghan, by the river Blackwater; over 10 miles of the line of contact with the counties of Monaghan and Fermanagh, by the watershed of the Slievebennagh mountains; over a large aggregate distance, but with many intervals or interruptions, of the line of contact with the counties of Fermanagh and Donegal, by mountain brooks, and especially by lofty watersheds; and over about 10 miles of the terminating contact with the county of Donegal, down to the junction point with the county of Londonderry, by the rivers Finn and Foyle. The outline of the county, in a loose or general sense, exhibits a broad parallelogram, extending in the direction of south-east by east. The lines of contact with the adjacent counties and with Lough Neagh, measured along all the greater sinuosities, but without including the minor ones, extend 43½ miles along the boundary with Londonderry, 10½ along Lough Neagh, 15½ along the boundary with Armagh, 18 along the boundary with Monaghan, 44 along the boundary with Fermanagh, and 36½ along the boundary with Donegal. The greatest length of the county, in the direction of south-east by east, and along the southern border, from the summit of Crough mountain, 2½ miles east of the Gap of Barnesmore to the river Blackwater at the town of Caledon, is 28½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, and along the western border, over Strabane and Lough Derg, is 30 miles; its least breadth, across the eastern district, and nearly over the village of Donaghmore, is 16 miles; and its area comprises 450,286 acres of arable land, 311,867 of uncultivated land, 11,981 of continuous plantations, 710 of towns, and 31,796 of water,—in all, 806,640 acres. Mr. Griffiths reports that the unimproved pasture-land of the county is, for the most part, situated on an elevated mountain-district, on a substratum of mica slate or red sandstone; that upwards of 80,000 acres might be improved for cultivation, and 120,000 acres improved by draining; and that 112,000 acres are irreclaimable.

Surface.—A band of country along Lough Neagh is low, flat, meadowy, and, to some extent, marshy. A much longer band, of somewhat semicircular form, flanking all the west side of the preceding, and sweeping round from a southerly to a westerly direction in such a manner as to occupy the eastern portion of the southern boundary of the county, possesses the undulated, hilly, fertile, and intricately beautiful character which distinguishes the greater part of the counties of Armagh and Down. A very large district, commencing immediately west and north of nearly the whole extent of this charming belt of country, spreading athwart the greater portion of the central division of the county, and extending northward to the mountains which soar aloft upon the northern boundary, is an almost uniform expanse of moorland, partly relieved and diversified by dells, vales, and other features of natural pleasantness, and partly subdued into civilization by the arts of georgy and agriculture, but prevalently a dreary, featureless, brown, chaotic waste. A district of considerable breadth, and extending diagonally almost from side to side of the county, is an intricate series of hills, vales, mountains, valleys, defiles, swells, and hollows, often presenting scenes of singular beauty, occasionally displaying elaborations of surface almost labyrinthine, and eventually going off at the north-east corner of the county in the brilliant valley of the Strule and the Foyle. The extreme western or rather south-western district consists of a portion of the great alpine region which occupies the greater portion of the county of Donegal, steeply dissevered into sections here by the glens of the rivulets Derg and Mournebeg. The district which forms the middle part of the northern border consists of the Munterlough range of mountains, the west end of the unimproved and alpine range of the Sperrin mountains, and an intervening and parallel alpine glen.

The Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, which passes through the towns of Angharad, Ballygawley, Omagh, Newtown-Stewart, and Strabane, and traverses the county in so diagonal a manner as to be within its limits during the great distance of about 40 miles, commands almost a perfect specimen of the whole county excepting the flat district upon the borders of Lough Neagh. Along the route of this road, from its entering the county to the town of Ballygawley, are low fertile hills, with intervening valleys and hollows of various soil and character; but both hills and low grounds, in general, rich, beautiful, and teeming with flocks and population. About a mile west-north-west of Ballygawley commences the easy ascent of the portion of the high moorland which lies in the very centre of the county, and which is here called the Starbog mountain; here the limestone formation of the undulated and fertile southern district of the county ceases to contribute its rich calcareous detritus to the soil, and is succeeded by a comparatively sterile and a siliceous-contributing formation of sandstone; and here Shantavny, the highest of the sandstone hills in this portion of the moorland region, lifts up its naked and lumpy outline to overlook a vast expanse of dreary heath-clad table-land, chequered with spots of green sward and of tillage. On descending the hills about 9 or 9½ miles north-west of Ballygawley, a good view is obtained of Omagh, of the rich vale in which it stands, and of the circuit of mountains which surrounds it; and from some parts of the road, but especially from vantage-grounds in its vicinity, a general idea may be obtained of the configuration and character of the vast congeries of mountainous upland which occupies so large a portion of the counties of Tyrone, Donegal, and Londonderry, and has its series of culminating points in the central summits of the Sperrin mountains. "The country around Omagh is of the same diversified character as that which generally prevails in the lower levels of this part of the country, namely, hill and dale, in every direction; the former everywhere cultivated; the latter almost invariably containing isolated stripes of bog and marshy lands. The intervening flats are here more boggy and the hills less fertile than in the similarly formed parts of Meath and Louth; and towards the mountain ranges by which the Omagh district is surrounded, the country gradually assumes a wild and more moorland character." Mullaghearn, the commencing height, in this direction, of the mountains which spread away northward toward the Sperrin range, and eastward toward Slievegalion in the south-east of the county of Londonderry, is seen soaring aloft about 5 miles north-east by north of Omagh. But "these upland tracts embrace many smiling valleys, rich spreading vales, cultivated slopes, and wide straths, teeming with fertility. From the formation of this assemblage of mountains, roads traverse the intervening glens; and several of the glens through which the roads are carried exhibit what may be considered, for this part of the country, very picturesque scenery. The glens, too, are enlivened with their little streams—inhabited, and as far as the better soils extend, cultivated." From Omagh to Newtown-Stewart, the road passes down the charming valley of the Strule; and, on approaching the latter town, is delightfully overlooked on opposite sides by the hills called Bessy Bell and Mary Gray. "About Newtown-Stewart, the hills, valleys, and rivers become more defined; the latter are fewer, more evident, possess more volume, and seem to hasten their motion as they draw to the termination of their course; the little hills give way to the more lofty and prolonged ridges; and the valleys are wider, more winding, and continuous." From Newtown-Stewart to Strabane, the road continues to keep company with the Strule,—here changing its name to the Mourne; and this part of the valley of that river, as well as the continuation of it northward under the new name of the Foyle, till the road passes into the county of Londonderry, displays the beauties of luxuriance, configuration, and grouping, in richer tints and with more brilliant effect than probably any other stretch of valley in Ireland. The country immediately around Strabane is a wide, diversified, and magnificent portion of this valley, debouched upon by the convergent valley of the Finn, surrounded by a comparatively distant and very noble perspective of mountains, and possessing, about 2 miles east by north of the town, a height of 969 feet in altitude, whose summit commands a minute panoramic view of the low grounds, and a well-defined prospect of the environing mountains, and of several of the glens and vales with which they are intersected. The portion of the great mountain district of the county due east of Newtown-Stewart, and northward thence to the Sperrin mountains, is singularly characterized by mingled strength and beauty of scenery, and bears considerable resemblance to some of the most celebrated highland scenery of Scotland,—particularly to that of some of the glens of Perthshire,—yet without possessing the latter's superb accessory features of a profusion of wood, and lacustrine expanses of islet water. The most southerly of the prolonged glens of the district is that which possesses the romantically-situated little town of Gortin, and is screened along the north by the Munterlony range of mountains, and brings down the Owenkillew rivulet westward to the Strule at Newtown-Stewart. "Among the cultivated and inhabited glens which branch off the valley of Gortin, and run through this district, there is a great deal of interesting scenery. Several of these lateral glens, with their accompanying named rivers, extend for many miles; and, as they are mostly traversed by roads leading to the more easterly towns in the counties of Derry and Tyrone, they are generally accessible; and though the mountains which bound them do not exceed 1,400 feet, and are generally tame in their outlines, they present, particularly in the lateral valleys, gaps, passes, and glens, many picturesque and striking scenes. Connected with the above, we may notice the long and interesting glen which lies between the Munterlony and Sperrin mountains, and through which a road runs from Newtown-Stewart to Draperstown, with an extension to Strabane. The Sperrin mountains are the loftiest in the district, and they are much more continuous and better defined than the parallel ridge of Munterlony." See SPERRIN.

The principal hills and mountains in the division of the county east of the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, and south of the glen of the Owenkillew river, are a height 4 miles east-north-east of Aughnacloy, 635 feet in altitude above sea-level; a height 2 miles north of Ballygawley, 863 feet; a height 4½ miles east of Ballygawley, 404 feet; Shantarny, overhanging the mail-road west-north-west of Ballygawley, 1,035 feet; Barbrack mountain, 2½ miles south of Pomeroy, 946 feet; a height 4 miles north-west of Coal-Island, 330 feet; a height 4½ miles west-south-west of Cookstown, 771 feet; a height 2 miles north-north-west of Pomeroy, 993 feet; a height 5½ miles north-west of Pomeroy, 911 feet; Mullaghearn, 5 miles north-east of Omagh, 1,778 feet; a height ½ of a mile south of Mullaghearn, 1,381 feet; Firmount, 5 miles north-north-west of Cookstown, 1,188 feet; Belevannamore, 2 miles west of Firmount, 1,261 feet; a height, 1¼ mile north-west of Belevannamore, 558 feet; a height 4 miles east of Gortin, 1,096 feet; a height 1¼ mile south-south-west of Gortin, 1,370 feet; and Mary Gray, 1 mile east-south-east of Newtown-Stewart, 826 feet. The principal hills and mountains in the division of the county east of the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, and north of the glen of the Owenkillew river, are Broughderg, 6½ miles east of Gortin, 1,088 feet of altitude above sea-level; Slieve-more, 2 miles north by east of Gortin, 1,262 feet; Munterlony, 4 miles east of Slieve-more, 1,432 feet; a height 3½ miles north of Gortin, 969 feet; a height 4 miles north-west of Gortin, 617 feet; Mullaghearn, 4 miles north of Slieve-more, 1,701 feet; a height 1 mile east of Mullaghearn, 1,800 feet; Straw mountain, 1½ mile east by north of Mullaghearn, 2,085 feet; Dart mountain, on the boundary, 1 mile east of Straw mountain, 1,612 feet; a height on the boundary, 1¼ mile east of Dart mountain, 2,037 feet; Sawel, on the boundary, 2 miles east of Dart mountain, 2,236 feet; Minard, on the boundary, 2½ miles east by north of Sawel, 1,550 feet; a height on the boundary, 1¼ mile east of Minard, 2,064 feet; Knockivoe, east by north of Strabane, 869 feet; a height 2½ miles south-east of Strabane, 1,094 feet; a height 3½ miles east of Strabane, 1,343 feet; Dunerton-hill, overhanging the Foyle at the north-western extremity of the county, 416 feet; and Slieve-kirk, on the boundary, 4 miles east of Dunerton-hill, 1,225 feet. The principal hills and mountains in the division of the county west of the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, and south of the river Derg, are a height on the southern boundary 4½ miles south of Clogher, 1,255 feet of altitude above sea-level: a height on the boundary, 2 miles south by east of Five-mile-town, 683 feet; Cole mountain, 3 miles north of Five-mile-town, 920 feet; a height on the boundary, 1½ mile west-north-west of Cole, 1,031 feet; a height on the boundary, 2 miles south of Trillick, 1,046 feet; a height 1½ mile north by west of Trillick, 412 feet; a height 2 miles south of Fintona, 706 feet; a height 1½ mile north of Fintona, 401 feet; Dooish mountain, 2½ miles south-south-west of Drumquin, 1,110 feet; a height 3 miles south of Drumquin, 980 feet; a height 3½ miles west-north-west of Drumquin, 1,117 feet; a height on the boundary, 5½ miles west of Drumquin, 870 feet; Bessy Bell, 1½ mile south by west of Newtown-Stewart, 1,386 feet; Meaghy, 4 miles west of Bessy Bell, 808 feet; Ardbarren, 2½ miles south of Castle-Derg, 628 feet; a height 4½ miles west of Castle-Derg, 541 feet; Mullfya, 5½ miles west of Killeter, 808 feet; Altamullen, 2 miles north of Mullfya, 939 feet; and Croagh, on the boundary, 2½ miles west-north-west of Altamullen, 1,260 feet. And the principal hills and mountains in the division west of the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, and north of the river Derg, are Brandy-hill, 2 miles north by west of Castle-Derg, 601 feet of altitude above sea-level; a height on the northern boundary, 2½ miles north of Castle-Derg, 603 feet; a height 6 miles north-west of Newtown-Stewart, 641 feet; and a height 1 mile east of Clady, 473 feet.

Waters.—The water area of the county, as exhibited in the results of the Ordnance Survey, comprises 21,000 acres, 39 perches of Lough Neagh, in the parish of Ardobe; 322 acres, 22 perches of Lough Neagh, in the parish of Ballinderry; 3,092 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches of Lough Neagh, in the parish of Ballyclog; 2,940 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches of Lough Neagh in the parish of Clonoo; 50 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches of Lough Rogan, in the parish of Donaghendry; 78 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches of Lough Fea, in the parish of Lissan; 29 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches of the river Blackwater, in the parish of Clonoo; 140 acres, 26 perches of unspecified denomination, in the parish of Aghaloo; 127 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches in the parish of Clonfeacle; 13 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches in the parish of Desertcreat; 146 acres, 26 perches in the parish of Donaghmore; 15 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches in the parish of Drumglass; 28 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches in the parish of Kildress; 36 acres, 32 perches in the parish of Killyman; 26 acres, 9 perches in the parish of Tullyniskin; 60 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches in the parish of Carneel; 27 acres, 18 perches in the parish of Aghalurcher; 213 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches in the parish of Clogher; 5 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches in the parish of Errigal-Keerogue; 51 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches in the parish of Errigal-Trough; 537 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches in the parish of Ardstraw; 150 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches in the parish of Upper Badoney; 178 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches in the parish of Lower Badoney; 103 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches in the parish of Camas; 202 acres, 14 perches in the Strabane section of the parish of Cappagh; 154 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches in the parish of Donaghedy; 56 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches in the parish of Leekpatrick; 3 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches in the Strabane section of the parish of Termonmaguirk; 99 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches in the parish of Urney; 64 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches in the Omagh section of the parish of Cappagh; 31 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches in the parish of Cloghermy; 42 acres, 21 perches in the parish of Dromore; 161 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches in the parish of Drumragh; 30 acres in the parish of Kilskeery; 22 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches in the parish of East Langfield;

175 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches in the parish of West Langfield; 76 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches in the parish of Skirts of Urney and Ardstraw; 288 acres, 34 perches in the parish of Termonamongan; and 271 acres, 38 perches in the Omagh section of the parish of Termonmaguirk. Among the numerous small lakes of the county are Loughs Fingroan, Carn, Patrick, Muck, Lee, Cor, Braden, Amagh, Maghera, Mulken, Nageera, Any, Doo, Lack, Bwee, Ayelvin, Chill, Nakiuroey, Tusker, Sallagh, Ahull, and Harry, in the barony of Omagh; and Loughs Maghera, Moor, Ash, Catherine, and Fanny, in the barony of Strabane. The only navigations on the boundaries, or in the interior of the county, are those of Lough Neagh, of the canal from Coal-Island to the river Blackwater, and of the river Blackwater from Lough Neagh to the commencement of the Ulster canal. The river Blackwater rises near the southern boundary of the county, a little north of Five-mile-town, and flows along the southern border, past Clogher and Aughnacloy, and along the southern and south-eastern boundary, past Caledon, Benburb, and Moy, to the south-west corner of Lough Neagh. The Torrent river, the only considerable tributary of the Blackwater within Tyrone, rises on the south-west side of Bartack mountain, and flows very sinuously eastward, past the villages of Castle-Caulfield, Donaghmore, and Coal-Island. The Ballinderry river rises in the moorland region, in the western margin of the barony of Dungannon, 5 miles north of Pomeroy; and flows eastward, along the northern border, past Cookstown, and along the northern boundary, past Coagh, to Lough Neagh. The Tullylea or Ballinamallard rivulet drains the district on the south-western border around the village of Trillick, into the county of Fermanagh, toward Lower Lough Erne. All the other streams of the county consist of the head-waters and forming-tributaries of the river Foyle; they comprise all that great river's affluents of any consequence except the Finn; and they are noticed, with sufficient detail, in the article FOYLE: see *h*ic. The county of Tyrone thus comprehends a small district within the basin of the Erne, a large district within the basin of Lough Neagh, and a still larger district within the basin of the Foyle.

Minerals.—Granitic rocks form a district of country about 19 statute miles in length, and 2½ or 3 in mean breadth, extending west-south-westward from the north-eastern extremity of the county. A formation of mica slate, with interspersed nodules of primitive limestone, occupies a large district in the extreme north-west of the county, measuring 30 statute miles from east to west, and from 7 to 22 in breadth, but lying in strict continuation with a still more extensive tract in the counties of Londonderry and Donegal. Crystalline greenstone rock occupies a district in the north-east, measuring 21 statute miles in length west-south-westward, and from 3 to 6 in breadth, lying immediately north of the granitic rocks, and extending at its east end 6 miles into the county of Londonderry. Tabular trap, in continuation of the vast region of the same rock in the counties of Londonderry and Antrim, constitutes a district of 7½ miles by 5½ at the north-eastern extremity of the county, a little north-east of Stewartstown, but is, to a great extent, as round the margin of the tabular trap region of Antrim, overlaid with a formation of lias green sand and chalk. Rocks of old red sandstone and sandstone-couglomerate constitute a great central district of the county, extending 36 statute miles westward, with a mean breadth of about 10 miles, and continued into the county of Fermanagh down to the east side of Lower Lough Erne; and they also constitute a very narrow belt along the south side of the mica slate district, underneath a district of yellow sandstone, and continued westward into the county of Donegal. A formation of millstone grit, including white sandstone and shale, with thin beds of limestone and coal, constitute a district of 5 statute miles by 4, lying between the village of Drumquin and the boundary, and continued with slender breadth into the north-east corner of the county of Fermanagh down to near the shore of Lower Lough Erne. Rocks of yellow sandstone and sandstone-conglomerate constitute one district of 18 statute miles westward, with a breadth of from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 miles, lying in the midst of the mica slate district between Strabane and Newtown-Stewart; a second district of 28 statute miles westward, with a breadth of from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to 5 miles, between Newtown-Stewart and Omagh, immediately south of the slender belt of old red sandstone rock, and continued in very slender breadth 8 miles within the south-east margin of the county of Donegal; a third district, on the southern border of the county in the vicinity of Clogher, extending 11 statute miles south-westward, with a breadth of from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to 2½ miles; continued partly into the county of Monaghan, and largely into the county of Fermanagh to the vicinity of Maguire's Bridge and Lisnakea; a fourth district of 4 statute miles by from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2½, extending south-south-westward, in the south-eastern border a little east of Aghnacloy; and a fifth district of about 13 or 14 square miles, lying partly around Cookstown, but chiefly extending south-westward from that town. Rocks of carboniferous limestone, exhibiting some diversity of character, constitute a great district in the south of the county, 30 statute miles in length, and from 4 to 11 in breadth, extending west-south-westward from the coal, the new red sandstone and the tertiary formations in the vicinity of Lough Neagh, isolating the third and the fourth tracts of yellow sandstone formation, and passing, at its west end and with its greatest breadth, into the county of Fermanagh, there to be connected with the vast central flat limestone plain of Ireland. A coal formation, containing workable beds of coal, and sometimes termed the Ulster coalfield, constitutes a district of about 5 statute miles by from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to 4 miles, lying around the village of Coal-Island, and south-westward thence to the vicinity of Dungannon, and another but very tiny district, lying about 5 miles north of Coal-Island. A formation of new red sandstone and red marl constitutes a district of about 7 square miles on the north-eastern boundary, immediately west of the tabular trap and lias green sand formations; and another district of 26 statute miles by from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to 4 miles, extending south-south-westward from the tabular trap formation to the vicinity of Caledon, and slightly continued, in the southern part of its breadth, across the Blackwater, into the county of Armagh. A formation of lias green sand and chalk overlies the tabular trap in the north-east to the extent, but interruptedly, of about 5 statute miles by 4. A tertiary formation, composed of alternations of white, brown, and greenish blue clay, with white and grey sand and irregular beds of lignite or wood-coal, and, on the margin of Lough Neagh, with deposits of silicified wood, constitutes a district of 8 statute miles in length, and from 2 to 6 in breadth, extending southward along Lough Neagh, and continued slightly on the north into the county of Londonderry, and largely on the south into the county of Armagh.

The coal formation, greatly the most interesting of the formations which we have enumerated, was officially reported on as follows in 1838:—"This district, which is situated to the north of Dungannon, in the county of Tyrone, though very small, is much richer, that is, it contains a greater number of valuable beds of coal, than any other in Ireland. At present nine workable seams are known, which vary from three to nine feet in thickness. In this district, as well as in all the others, the limestone substratum is succeeded by a succession of black shale, with argillaceous ironstone and occasional beds of sandstone; the whole series amounting to a thickness of about 500 feet. The first or lowest bed of coal which succeeds it, and which has been worked at Drumglass colliery, one mile north of Dungannon, is slaty and impure, and varies from two to three feet in thickness. Above it is a bed of coal four feet six inches thick, of excellent quality. Within the last 14 years, very extensive workings have been made on this bed by the London Hibernian Mining Company, but, unfortunately, the speculation has not hitherto proved remunerative. The company, however, still persevere, and it is to be hoped that their enterprise will at length be crowned with success. At Coal-Island, three miles north of Drumglass, six beds of coal have been discovered, and worked with various success within the last century; and a very deep pit is now being sunk by the Coal-Island Coal Company at Annagher, on the dip of the uppermost bed of coal, which is nine feet in thickness. Unfortunately, the stratification of this district is so much distributed and dislocated by faults, that the extent of coal commanded by each pit is usually very much circumscribed; and this circumstance, when coupled with the soft and incoherent nature of the beds of shale and sandstone which accompany the coal, has added so much to the difficulty and expense of working it, that the mining adventurers have rarely derived any considerable profit. The Tyrone coal district is bounded on the north-east by strata belonging to the new red sandstone formation, whose strata rest conformably on those belonging to the coal series. On the lands of Anaghone and Templeree, situated 5 miles to the north of Coal-Island, a very small coal district, containing two workable beds of coal, were discovered many years since, and extensive coal workings were made on the uppermost of these beds, which was nine feet thick and of excellent quality; but the coalfield was so small, that the whole was soon wrought, and the works abandoned. Some trials have lately been made on the second or undermost bed, which is two feet in thickness; but not proving remunerative, they have also been abandoned. The coal of the Tyrone coal district is very similar to that of Ayrshire. It burns swiftly, and leaves a considerable residuum of yellowish white ashes."

Agriculture.—In consequence of the characteristic configuration of the county, the soils of the low grounds consist, in a large degree, of the detritus of the rocks of the hills and mountains; and in consequence of the great diversity of the geognostic formation of the uplands, the soils are exceedingly various. Yet, in a general view, reclaimed moor or bog may be exhibited as the prevailing soil of the arable lands in the great central district of the county, a gravelly or sandy soil on the skirts of the hill and mountain flanks of many of the glens and vales, and a loam of diversified character, but, to a large extent, light and friable, over the rich fertile grounds of the south and east. Much of the land in the valleys is occasionally flooded and greatly damaged by the rivers; yet only a comparatively small aggregate of the lands which lie higher than the level of the freshets is spouty, morassy, or in any other way naturally wet. "Few farmers hold a larger quantity of land than 40 or 50 Irish acres. The average size of tillage farms is about 12 Irish acres. The dairy and sheep produce bear a very small proportion to the tillage, there being but little dairying and few sheep.

There are no mountain dairy farms. A few of the farmers have the appearance of respectability, and are intelligent for their situation; but the generality of them are indifferently off, and inferior to the farmers in Down and Armagh. In the produce of corn and butter, the increase has been considerable, but in cheese very little. Some few adopt the following rotation of crops:—In the first year, potatoes, for which the ground is manured; in the second year, barley, oats, or flax, with clover or grass seeds; in the third year, the clover is mown; and in the fourth or fifth years, they sow oats; then their land is allowed to rest for two or three years in grass. But the larger proportion of farmers use the destructive rotation of—in the first year, potatoes (manured), and in the second, third, fourth and fifth years, oats; after which they let it rest for two or three years under spontaneous production, or at least with the assistance of what they call 'white grass' (Helius Lanatus), and from this treatment they have of course a miserable pasture. There is very little wheat grown. It is usual to weed the corn crops in June and July; the cost of weeding depends upon the foulness of the crop. The seed of oats is sometimes washed previously to sowing, but this is very rarely done. The quantity of seed in general is regulated by the fertility of the soil, and the kind of seed sown; on this subject, the farmer is guided by a proper judgment. While the crop is growing, weeding and rolling are not sufficiently attended to. The peasantry are in most cases obliged to give duty days, but no considerable loss arises from this practice, as their families are at liberty to cut their own corn, and they themselves are able to give two days in the week to their own concerns. The peasantry generally contrive to get their own little patches of grain sown at a proper time; there will of course be some exceptions. Much of their corn is threshed immediately after it is cut, owing to the pressure from their landlords. From the momentary pressure on the market, the peasant sometimes loses and sometimes gains, according as the price may rise or fall; if the price should remain stationary, he is a gainer, because he saves the loss in weight and the loss by destruction from vermin; the straw when thus threshed is not considered as good for the cattle as if it were threshed according as they may want it. Landlords do not take corn in payment of rent. There are only a few patches of clover and vetches. The plants most usually cultivated are potatoes and oats. A more prolific species of potatoes called 'cups,' was introduced a few years ago, which has been of the greatest advantage to the country generally. This description of potatoe is found to produce well with less manure, so that the farmers say, the cups have driven hunger out of Ireland. The peasantry are very ignorant of any alternation of green and grain crops. Very few of the peasantry cultivate artificial grasses; some, however, cultivate a little clover and white grass, and a small quantity of rye-grass (Lolium). The peasant or cottier consumes the whole produce of his potatoe crops, which is often insufficient for his support. The cultivation of potatoes has increased; but there has been no introduction of artificial manure or peat which could have given rise to this increase, neither has the house-feeding of cattle become more general, and burning of land is not practised here. Very few of the small farmers possess orchards; some have a few greens in their gardens. The butter produced is of second quality, and is packed not after one, but after successive churnings. The mode of saving it is improved. There is very little cheese made."—In 1841, the number of farms, within the rural districts of the county, of from 1 acre to 5 acres in extent, was 14,535; of from 5 to 15 acres, 14,071; of from 15 to 30 acres, 3,776; and of upwards of 30 acres, 1,139;—and within the civic districts of the county, of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 140; of from 5 to 15 acres, 79; of from 15 to 30 acres, 13; and of upwards of 30 acres, 10. In the same year, there were, in the entire county, 23,759 male farmers of upwards of 15 years of age, 3 male farmers of less than 15 years of age, 503 female farmers of upwards of 15 years of age, 34,547 male servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 4,025 male servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 784 female servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 104 female servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 152 ploughmen, 149 gardeners, 2 graziers, 314 male herds above 15 years of age, 1,936 male herds below 15 years of age, 118 female herds above 15 years of age, 887 female herds below 15 years of age, 36 male care-takers, 5 female care-takers, 7 land-agents, 68 land-stewards, 18 game-keepers, and 17 dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—The Irish breed of sheep, long-legged and flat-sided, are the sort generally in use; and they have not, in even the slightest degree, been improved. Most of the farmers are ignorant of even the very existence of any other breed; and, though they knew of both the existence and the attainableness of a better breed, are too poor to procure it. The price of wool is usually from 11d. to 13d. per pound. The Irish breed of cattle also is in general use, and has not been improved. A good bull costs from £4 to £5; and a good breeding cow, from £4 to £7. The fattening of cattle is not practised. A cow of the best description gives 15 quarts of milk for a few weeks after calving, and produces during the year from 60 to 70 lbs. of butter. The horses are of an useful kind, and adapted to the size of the farms and the nature of the country. The pigs are of a good description.—In 1841, the live stock, within the rural districts of the county, consisted, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, of 701 horses and mules, 77 asses, 3,940 cattle, 756 sheep, 3,998 pigs, and 47,708 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 3,182 horses and mules, 223 asses, 15,034 cattle, 3,589 sheep, 6,424 pigs, and 66,845 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 10,096 horses and mules, 148 asses, 31,121 cattle, 7,964 sheep, 12,435 pigs, and 108,621 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 4,712 horses and mules, 11 asses, 16,579 cattle, 5,058 sheep, 5,322 pigs, and 44,988 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 2,570 horses and mules, 16 asses, 10,738 cattle, 6,914 sheep, 2,097 pigs, and 18,897 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 21,261 horses and mules, £170,088; 475 asses, £475; 77,412 cattle, £503,178; 24,281 sheep, £26,709; 30,276 pigs, £57,845; and 288,059 poultry, £7,201. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £745,496. In the same year, the live stock, in the civic districts, consisted, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, of 257 horses and mules, 331 cattle, 66 sheep, 647 pigs, and 1,362 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 28 horses and mules, 129 cattle, 6 sheep, 63 pigs, and 277 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 53 horses and mules, 131 cattle, 10 sheep, 49 pigs, and 279 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 14 horses and mules, 61 cattle, 13 sheep, 20 pigs, and 142 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 23 horses and mules, 49 cattle, 9 sheep, 25 pigs, and 100 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 375 horses and mules, £3,000; 701 cattle, £4,536;

104 sheep, £114; 804 pigs, £1,005; and 2,220 poultry, £56. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £8,731.

Woods.—The plantations within the county, in 1841, consisted of 408 acres and 10,210 detached trees of oaks, 108 acres and 19,600 detached trees of ash, 20 acres and 4,360 detached trees of elm, 48 acres and 28,257 detached trees of beech, 409 acres and 52,222 detached trees of fir, 9,667 acres and 300,580 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 1,261 acres and 12,019 detached trees of orchards. Total of acres of continuous woods, 11,980; total number of detached trees, 427,338,—equivalent to 2,671 acres; grand total of plantations, 14,652 acres. Of the continuous woods, there were planted previous to 1791, 367 acres of oak, 75 of ash, 12 of beech, 45 of fir, 2,141 of mixed plantations, and 168 of orchards; between 1791 and 1800, 4 acres of oak, 5 of ash, 1 of beech, 5 of fir, 1,575 of mixed plantations, and 279 of orchards; between 1801 and 1810, 3 acres of oak, 8 of ash, 6 of elm, 1 of beech, 36 of fir, 1,091 of mixed plantations, and 142 of orchards; between 1811 and 1820, 5 acres of ash, 1 of beech, 110 of fir, 978 of mixed plantations, and 185 of orchards; between 1821 and 1830, 31 acres of oak, 6 of ash, 10 of elm, 27 of beech, 97 of fir, 1,717 of mixed plantations, and 210 of orchards; between 1831 and 1840, 63 acres of oak, 9 of ash, 4 of elm, 6 of beech, 116 of fir, 2,165 of mixed plantations, and 210 of orchards. The principal sheets or masses of wood within the barony of Dunganannon, are in Killymoon demesne, adjoining Cookstown; in the demesne of Seelart-Hall, in the parishes of Ballyelgog and Ardboe; in the demesne of Oaklands, in the parish of Kildress; in the demesne of Wellbrook, parish of Kildress; in the demesne of Lissan, parish of Lissan; in the demesne of Pomeroy, parishes of Pomeroy and Deserteright; in the demesne of Pomeroy, parishes of Deserteright and Derryoran; in the demesne of Lisduh, parish of Tullynisken; in the wood of Belleville, parish of Clonoe; in the glebe of Killory, parish of Clonoe; in the demesne of Northland, adjoining the town of Dunganannon; in the demesne of Roxborough-castle, adjacent to Moy; and in the wood of Bantry, parishes of Clonfeacle and Aghaloo. The principal within the barony of Clogher, are in the episcopal demesne, adjoining the town of Clogher; in the demesne of Augher-castle, adjoining the town of Augher; in the demesne of Favour-Royal, parishes of Carnateel, Errigal-Trough, and Errigal-Keerogue; in the demesne of Ballygawley, parish of Errigal-Keerogue; in the demesne of Cecil, parish of Clogher; in the demesne of Corkreevy, adjacent to Five-mile-town; and in the demesne of Derryhard, parish of Donaghadee. The principal within the barony of Omagh, are in the demesne of Hazel-hill, parish of Termonmagurk; in the demesne of Seskinore, parish of Clogherney; in the demesne of Greenmount, parishes of Clogherney and Clogher; in the demesne of Newgrove, parish of Drumragh; and in the demesne of Relagh, parish of Kilskeery. And the principal within the barony of Strabane, are in the demesne of Factory-Jodge, parish of Cappagh; in the demesne of Earlsfort, parish of Donaghadee; in the demesne of Silverbrook, parish of Donaghadee; in the demesne of Urney, parish of Urney; in the demesne of Holly-hill, parish of Leckpatrick; in the demesne of Baron's-Court, parish of Ardstraw; and in the demesne of Mountjoy-Forest, in the northern vicinity of Omagh:—and the two last of the-e are considerably the most extensive in the county.

Manufactures and Trade.—The statistics of occupations, as exhibited in the Census of 1841, afford the best means of estimating the classifications and probable amount of productive industry; and these statistics may be fully seen in the following digest:—Fishermen, 45; millers, 192; maltster, 1; brewers, 7; distillers, 4; bakers, 170; confectioners, 22; tobacco-twisters, 7; fishmongers, 15; egg-dealers, 92; fruiterers, 9; cattle-dealers, 27; horse-dealers, 3; pig-jobbers, 9; corn-dealers, 9; butter-merchant, 1; butchers and provision-dealers, 35; butchers, 268; poultryer, 1; victuallers, 13; grocers, 193; tobacco-conists, 7; wine-merchants, 4; flax-dressers, 606; carders, 69; spinners of flax, 9,278; spinners of wool, 1,392; spinners of unspecified classes, 36,066; winders and warpers, 165; factory workers, 177; wool-dresser, 1; weavers of cotton, 46; weavers of linen, 2,676; weavers of woollen, 63; weavers of fringe, 2; weavers of unspecified classes, 8,586; manufacturer of cotton, 1; manufacturers of linen, 10; bleachers, 84; dyers, 18; clothiers, 16; cloth-finishers, 28; calico-printer, 1; skimmers, 10; curriers, 22; tanners, 9; brogue-makers, 27; boot and shoemakers, 1,630; tailors, 1,104; sempstresses, 1,158; dress-makers, 1,338; milliners, 113; lace-workers, 7; stay-makers, 15; comb-makers, 2; knitters, 402; hatters, 51; bonnet-makers, 166; cap-maker, 1; gloves, 6; button-makers, 7; hair-dressers and barbers, 8; umbrella-maker, 1; blacking-makers, 5; leather-dealers, 3; flax-dealers, 7; wool-dealer, 1; hosiers, 3; haberdashers, 45; linen-drappers, 2; linen-merchants, 23; yarn-dealers, 12; woollen-drappers, 73; vendors of soft goods, 40; rag and bone dealers, 48; architects, 4; builders, 19; brick-makers, 20; potters, 30; stone-cutters, 141; lime-burners, 17; bricklayers, 13; stone-masons, 601; slaters, 54; thatchers, 54; plasterers, 28; pavier, 1; quarrymen, 15; sawyers, 128; carpenters, 1,191; cart-makers, 28; cabinet-makers, 49; wood-polisher, 1; coopers, 265; turners, 17; mill-wrights, 32; wheel-wrights, 154; ship-wrights, 7; boat-tree and last makers, 2; pump-borers, 2; lath-splitters, 2; reed-makers, 83; shuttle-maker, 1; basket-makers, 28; broom-makers, 39; miners, 171; iron-founder, 1; blacksmiths, 781; farrier, 1; white-smiths, 52; nailers, 215; cutlers, 2; gunsmiths, 11; braziers and copper-smiths, 11; pin-makers, 2; bell-hangers, 2; gas-fitters, 3; coach-smiths, 4; plumbers, 29; tinplate-workers, 22; tinkers, 13; machine-makers, 25; watchmakers, 31; goldsmith, silversmith, and jeweller, 1; coach and car makers, 22; saddlers, 101; whip-makers, 3; rope-makers, 22; paper-makers, 18; letter-press printers, 25; bookbinders, 2; carpet-weaver, 1; chandlers and soap-boilers, 36; painters and glaziers, 102; net-makers, 10; sieve-makers, 6; upholsterer, 1; print-cutter, 1; civil engineers, 2; land-surveyors, 25; measurers, 2; road contractors and makers, 10; bird-dealer, 1; delf and china dealers, 15; stationers, 6; booksellers and stationers, 8; timber-merchant, 1; turf-dealer, 1; ironmongers, 25; merchants of unspecified classes, 108; dealers of unspecified classes, 500; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 138; shop assistants, 233; tradesman of unspecified classes, 1; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 18.

Fairs.—The following are the principal fairs held within the county of Tyrone:—Altmore, June 15, July 15, Aug. 15, and Sept. 15; Augher, March 28, May 12, Aug. 14, and Nov. 12; Anghnacloy, first Wednesday in every month; Ballinahatty, Feb. 12, June 26, Oct. 11, and Dec. 5; Ballygawley, first Friday in every month; Beragh, first Monday in every month; Caledon, second Saturday in every month; Castledanfield, second Monday in every month; Carnateel, Feb. 13, March 11, April 5, May 26, July 27, Aug. 26, Sept. 19, Oct. 24, and Nov. 27; Castlederg, first Friday in every month; Clady, May 16, and Nov. 16; Clogher, twentieth of every mo th; May 2, and July 26; Cough, second Friday in every month; Cookstown, first Saturday in every month; Donaghmore, first Tuesday in every month; Dunnamanna, twenty-seventh of every month; Donnylough, Aug. 12; Dromore, Feb. 1, March 17, May 1, June 5 and 24, August 1, Sept. 29, Nov. 1, and Dec. 26; Drumquin, last Thursday of every month; Dungannon, first Thursday in every month; Fintona, twenty-second of every month, Jan. 1, May 4, and Oct. 30; Five-mile-town, Jan. 23, March 25, June 1, and Aug. 19; Gortin, first Wednesday in every month; Killeter, twenty-first of every month; Mounthfield, last Wednesday in every month; Moy, first Friday of every month; Newtown-Stewart, last Monday in every month; Omagh, first Tuesday in every month; Orritor, second Monday in July; Plumbridge, sixteenth of every month; Pomeroy, second Tuesday in every month; Rock, last Monday in every month; Stewartstown, Wednesday on or after twelfth of every month; Six-mile-cross, nineteenth of every month; Strabane, Feb. 1, May 12, Aug. 1, and Nov. 12; Termon-Rock, last Friday in every month; and Trillick, 14th of every month.

Communications.—The navigation of the Tyrone Canal is wholly within the eastern district of the county. The natural navigations of Lough Neagh and the river Blackwater are upon the eastern boundary; and they lead out to the navigations of the Ulster, the Newry, and the Lagan canals, and connect the county of Tyrone with respectively Lough Erne, the bay of Carlingford, and Belfast Lough. A proposed line of railway, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, commences at the north end of the Commissioners' proposed line from Dublin to Ennis-killen, and proceeds by Ballinamullard, Dromore, Omagh, Newtown-Stewart, and Strabane, to Londonderry; and another proposed line, the survey of which was laid before the Commissioners, commences at Armagh in continuation of the lines to that city from Belfast and Dublin, and proceeds up the west shore of Lough Neagh, to the east of Coal-Island and Cough, to terminate at Coleraine. The principal roads within the county, are the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, through Aughnacloy, Ballygawley, Omagh, Newtown-Stewart, and Strabane; the mail-road from Armagh to Clogher, through Caledon and Aughnacloy; the mail-road from Armagh to Coleraine, through Moy, Dungannon, Stewartstown, and Cookstown; and the post-road from Ennis-killen to Londonderry, through Fintona, Omagh, Newtown-Stewart, and Strabane. The roads to the market towns are in tolerably good repair, and have been so improved that a horse can carry upon a dray double the load which was formerly practicable.

Divisions and Towns.—Tyrone is divided into the four baronies of Dungannon on the east, Clogher on the south, Omagh on the south-west, and Strabane on the north-west. Dungannon, however, was recently divided into the three cantreds or baronies of Lower Dungannon, Middle Dungannon, and Upper Dungannon; Omagh, into the two baronies of East Omagh and West Omagh; and Strabane, into the two baronies of Lower Strabane and Upper Strabane. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Magheracross from the barony of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, to the barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone. The barony of Dungannon contains 12 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes; the barony of Clogher contains 2 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; the barony of Omagh contains 8 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; and the barony of Strabane contains 7 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes. The towns and principal villages are Dungannon, Caledon, Carneel, Aughnacloy, Benburb, Clonfeacle, Moy, Cookstown, Grange, Tullyhog, Coal-Island, Stewartstown, Castle-Caulfield, Donaghmore, Pomeroy, and Cough, in the barony of Dungannon; Clogher, Fintona, Ballygawley, Five-mile-town, and Augher, in the barony of Clogher; Omagh, Beragh, Seskinore, Dromore, Trillick, Drumquin, Castle-Derg, Six-mile-cross, and Termonrock, in the barony of Omagh; and Strabane, Ardstraw, Douglas-Bridge, Newtown-Stewart, Gortin, Dunnamanna, Ballymagorry, and Clady, in the barony of Strabane.—The county is ecclesiastically distributed among the dioceses of Clogher, Armagh, and Derry. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the total of parishes and churches at respectively 35 and 38, assigns 4 parishes and 5 churches to the diocese of Clogher, 20 parishes and 20 churches to the diocese of Armagh, and 11 parishes and 13 churches to the diocese of Derry.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools within the county was 435; of scholars, 18,828; of male scholars, 10,783; of female scholars, 7,568; of scholars whose sex was not specified, 447; of scholars connected with the Established Church, 4,824; of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities, 5,942; of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters, 462; of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community, 7,480; of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained, 120;—and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 435; of scholars, 18,579; of male scholars, 10,876; of female scholars, 7,461; of scholars whose sex was not specified, 242; of scholars connected with the Established Church, 4,621; of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities, 5,840; of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters, 460; of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community, 7,484; of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained, 168. At the close of 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 100 schools, conducted by 136 male and 27 female teachers, attended by 8,189 male and 5,842 female scholars; and aided during the year with £1,711 10s. in salaries, £172 2s. 4d. in free stock, and £182 10s. 8d. in school-requisites at half-price. During 1843, the number of persons committed on charges of felony was 466; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions, was 220; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 35. Of the 466 committed on charges of felony, 146 were charged with offences against the person, 9 with offences against property committed with violence, 103 with offences against property committed without violence, 10 with malicious offences against property, 8 with offences against the currency, and 187 with offences not included in the above categories; 14 were sentenced to transportation, 147 were sentenced to imprisonment, 32 were sentenced to pay fines, 6 were discharged on sureties or were not sentenced, 1 was acquitted as insane, 111 were found not guilty on trial, 122 had no bill found against them, and 33 were not prosecuted. On Jan. 1, 1844, the constabulary force consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 2 second-rate, sub-inspectors, 2 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head constable, 5 second-rate head constables, 24 constables, 114 first-rate sub-constables, 12 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1843, was £18,009 11s. 8d. The head-quarters of the constabulary are at Omagh; and the head-quarters of the 5 districts, comprising 26 stations, into which they are distributed, are at Omagh, Dungannon, Clogher, Cookstown, and Strabane. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Caledon. A stipendiary magistrate is resident at Omagh. The county gaol is at Omagh; bridewells are at Omagh, Strabane, Clogher, and Dungannon; and the district lunatic asylum, to which Tyrone is entitled to send 62 patients, is at Londonderry. The assizes are held at Omagh; courts of quarter-sessions are held at Omagh, Clogher, Dungannon, and Strabane; and courts of petty-sessions are held at Augher, Aughnacloy, Ballygawley, Caledon, Castle-Derg, Cookstown, Dunnamanna, Dungannon, Fintona, Five-mile-town, Gortin, Moy, Newtown-Stewart, Omagh, Pomeroy, Stewartstown, Strabane, and Trillick. The county infirmary is at Omagh; fever hospitals are at Omagh and Strabane; union workhouses are at Castle-Derg, Clogher, Cookstown, Dungannon, Gortin, Omagh, and Strabane; and dispensaries are at Aughnacloy, Ballygawley, Benburb, Caledon, Castle-Derg, Clogher, Cookstown, Dromore, Drumquin, Dungannon, Dunnamanna, Fintona, Gortin, Newtown-Stewart, Omagh, Stewartstown, Strabane, and Trillick. Savings' banks are at Clogher, Cookstown, Dungannon, and Strabane; and loan funds are at Altmore, Benburb, Clogher, Clonacree, Cookstown, Drumquin, Dungannon, Fintona, Kildress, Leckpatrick, Moree, Omagh, Pomeroy, Stewartstown, and Termaurock. The amount of grand-jury presentments in 1842 was £46,686; the annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £363,737; and the annual amount of property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, is £277,556. The total number of tenements valued under the Poor-law is 42,918; and of these, 19,011 are valued under £5,—13,033, under £10,—5,281, under £15,—2,285, under £20,—1,237, under £25,—681, under £30,—712, under £40,—285, under £50,—and 393, at and above £50. The county sent 10 members to the Irish parliament, or two from the county at large, and two from each of the boroughs of Dungannon, Strabane, Clogher, and Augher; but it sends to the imperial parliament only two from the county at large, and one from the borough of Dungannon. Constituency of the county at large in 1842, 2,521; of whom 323 were £50 freeholders, 265 were £20 freeholders, 47 were £20 leaseholders, 1,827 were £10 freeholders, 23 were £10 leaseholders, and 36 were rent-chargers.

Pop. of the county, in 1831, 304,468; in 1841, 312,958. Houses, in 1831, 54,663; in 1841, 54,919. The following statistics are all of 1841:—Families, 57,337; males, 153,463; females, 159,433. Inhabited houses, 54,919; uninhabited complete houses, 2,908; houses in the course of erection, 64. First-class inhabited houses, 664; second-class, 11,703; third-class, 24,443; fourth-class, 18,107. Families residing in first-class houses, 738; in second-class houses, 12,460; in third-class houses, 25,395; in fourth-class houses, 18,739. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 37,276; in manufactures and trade, 16,923; in other pursuits, 3,138. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1,034; on the directing of labour, 19,354; on their own manual labour, 36,392; on means not specified, 557. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 60,396; to clothing, 13,681; to lodging, 4,754; to health, 120; to charity, 1; to justice, 352; to education, 431; to religion, 238; unclassified, 2,643; without any specified occupations, 7,391. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 1,628; to clothing, 48,110; to lodging, 40; to health, 30; to charity, 1; to justice, 2; to education, 131; to religion, 5; unclassified, 6,854; without any specified occupations, 41,375. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write,

50,268; who could read but not write, 31,247; who could neither read nor write, 51,849. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 21,304; who could read but not write, 47,650; who could neither read nor write, 71,425. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 8,711; attending superior schools, 530. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 7,569; attending superior schools, 210. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 41; married, 54; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 38; married, 50; widowed, 12.—Physicians, 28; surgeons, 81; apothecaries, 9; druggists, 2; midwives, 15; nurse-tenders, 15. Barristers, 5; attorneys, 28; clerk of the peace, 1; public notary, 1; law-clerks, 3; excise officers, 62; bailiffs, 62; civil officers, 3; gaol-keepers, 13. Inspectors of schools, 2; school-teachers, 366 males and 91 females; ushers and tutors, 55 males and 16 females; governesses, 24; teachers of music, 8; dancing-master, 1. Clergymen of the Established church, 66; Methodist ministers, 17; Presbyterian ministers, 58; Roman Catholic clergymen, 52; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 20; scripture-readers, 2; parish-clerks, 7; sextons, 21.

Antiquities.—[The antiquities of Tyrone, comparatively with the extent and importance of the county, are neither many nor conspicuous. Probably the parish which contains both the greatest number and the greatest variety, in proportion to its extent, is ARDSTRAW; which see. The most conspicuous of the military antiquities occur at CASTLE-CAULFIELD, BENBURN, and DUNGANNON; see these articles. A very important military antiquity, still in preservation and in use, is connected with Moy, though situated on the Armagh bank of the Black-water at CHARLEMONT; which see. Druidical remains and Danish raths appear to be few. The ancient monastic establishments, whether obscure or conspicuous in record, and whether extinct or prominent in their remains, were a monastery of regular canons of the order of St. Augustine, alleged to have been founded in the 5th century by St. Mac-Artin, and granted at the general dissolution to the bishop of Clogher; a nunnery of canonesses of the order of St. Augustine, at Cluain-Dubbain or Drum-Dubbain, alleged to have been founded by St. Patrick; one monastery of the third order of St. Francis, at Dungannon, founded in the 15th century by Con O'Neill, and granted at the dissolution to Richard Nugent, Earl of Westmeath; a second monastery of the same order at Bullinassaggart, founded about 1489 by Con O'Neill; and four other monasteries of the same order at Corrock, Cervaghkirin, Pobble, and Omagh, all granted at the dissolution to Sir Henry Piers.

History.—[The county of Tyrone is conspicuous in history; it was the principal arena of the contests, incident to the rebellion, recognised as 'the Tyrone rebellion,' of Hugh O'Neill in 1597,—a very circumstantial account of which is given by Fynes Moryson, who was actively employed in its suppression, and by whom it was published in his 'Itinerary'—London, 1617. The O'Neills were kings in Ireland antecedent to Christianity,—tyrannizing it in Ulster, according to Camden, 'before the coming of St. Patrick.' The 'great rebel' was the son of an illegitimate son of Con O'Neill, who was slain by his legitimate brother, Shane O'Neill; and Shane was in his turn assassinated by MacDonnell, the leader of the Scots in Ulster, to whom he had fled for refuge from the English. The chieftainry was claimed by Tirlagh O'Neill, to whose daughter Hugh was married; but Tirlagh being old, was persuaded to relinquish his right in favour of Hugh. Hugh had previously been a frequent visitor at the English court, and at one time stood high in favour with Elizabeth. This portrait of him is drawn by Fynes Moryson.—He was of a mean stature but a strong body, able to endure labours, watching, and hard fare, being withal industrious and active, valiant, affable, and apt to manage great affairs, and of a high, dissembling, subtle, and profound wit, so as many deemed him borne either for the good or ill of his country. For some time after his creation as Earl of Tyr-Oen or Tyrone, he continued 'a good subject,' having entered into a series of articles,—one of which was, 'to cause the wearing of English apparel,' and that none of his men wear glibbes (or long haire). The first intimation of his design to turn out 'an arch-rebel' was given on the death of Tirlagh, who had resigned in his favour when the Earl took the title of the O'Neill,—'which was treason by act of parliament;' still, however, 'excusing himself that he took it upon him lest some other should usurp it.' During the subsequent five or six years, he devoted his energies, with considerable skill and cunning, to the forming, equipping, and disciplining an army; first, obtaining permission to train his men for the ostensible purpose of employing them against the queen's enemies; next, getting license to cover his house at Dungannon with lead, which lead he converted into bullets; and succeeding all the while in lulling the suspicions of the lords-justices, venturing even to present himself before them in Dublin, 'where he was not stayed.' Thus he continued, with all subtlety and a thousand sleights, abusing the state, until he conceived himself ready for action. In 1597, he struck the first blow against the queen's forces; in an attempt to relieve the fort of the Blackwater, they were attacked by the Kernes of Tyrone, and utterly routed, losing 'thirteen valiant captains, and fifteen hundred common soldiers,' their commander, Sir Henry Bagnall, 'Marshal of Ireland,' being among the slain. In consequence of this victory, 'all Ulster was in arms; all Connaught revolted; the rebels of Leinster swarmed in the English Pale; and subsequently Munster was 'corrupted.' Still Tyrone continued his attempts at deception, 'though now,' writes Fynes Moryson, 'the gentleman was grown higher in the instep, as appeared by the insolent conditions he required,' so that 'Carthage never bred such a dissembling fudifrageous wretch.' The unfortunate Earl of Essex was sent to Ireland to subdue Tyrone; the favourite of Queen Elizabeth was, however, no match for the subtle Irishman; and so the enemies of Essex well knew, for the mission was a plot to accomplish his destruction, which it completely effected. His successor was the Lord Mountjoy, a 'bookish man,' at whom the daring outlaw laughed; but by 'woeful experience he found his jesting to be the laughter of Solomon's fool, although the meere Irish, now puffed up with good success, and blinded with happy encounters, did boldly keepe the felde, and proudly dislaime the English forces.' The new Lord-deputy pursued the 'bloody and bold rebels' with fire and sword, slaying them without mercy, cutting down their corn, and subjecting them to frightful visitations of famine and pestilence,* 'proclaiming the heads' of their leaders, and adopting every available means for subduing Ireland. And this was at length effected. One by one, the chieftains submitted, making 'humble suite for mercy,' while Tyrone, who had long calculated upon maintaining his position only by aid of the Spaniards, saw his allies 'walled up' at Kinsale (1601); he was himself, with all his forces, signally defeated, in an attempt to relieve them; he retired to his own fastnesses, where he 'drew faintly his last breath, without hope of better living than as a wood-kerne, or as a fugitive abroad,' and, abandoning all hope of a successful issue, did, in 1602, signify his desire to make absolute submission to the queen's mercy, humbly beseeching her to remember that 'he was a nobleman, and to take compassion on him, that the overthrow of his house and posterity might be prevented.' He received 'security for his life only,' and subsequently accompanied the Lord Mountjoy to London, so that, 'upon his knees,' he might obtain mercy from King James I. On his way from Beaumaris, 'no respect to his lordship could prevent many women who had lost husbands and children in the Irish warres, from flinging dirt and stones at the Earle as he passed, and reviling him with bitter words.' He returned, however, to Ireland; his rank, power, and estates, were partially restored to him; but being, some time after, suspected of attempting a new rebellion, he fled into Spain, leaving his enormous property at the disposal of the king, by whom it was parcelled out and distributed among English settlers; out of this rebellion, therefore, arose the famous 'plantation of Ulster.'" [Hall's Ireland.] Previous to the flight and attainer of O'Neill, Tyrone was divided into the districts of North Tyrone and South Tyrone; but, about the period of 'the plantation of Ulster,' North Tyrone was transferred to the county of Londonderry.

TYRONE, a small bay, and a demesne, in the parish of Drumacoo, barony of Duukellin, co. Galway, Connaught. The bay is a small eastward creek of Galway bay, 4 miles north of Kinvarra; and the demesne adjoins the head of the bay, and is the residence of A. F. St. George, Esq. Tyrone-house, upon the demesne, is a lofty mansion, and on a commanding site, and forms a very conspicuous feature in the landscape of the flat, surrounding country.

TYRONE CANAL, an artificial navigation, in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It connects the coal-field around the village of Coal-Island, with the river Blackwater, at a point 4 miles above that stream's embouchure in Lough Neagh; and it extends, in a south-easterly direction, about 34 miles along the eastern border of the parish of Tullyniskien, and the south-western border of the parish of Clonoe. It was formed at the public expense, with the view of encouraging the working of the collieries; but it was undertaken in the faith of very exaggerated and substantially fallacious representations of the extent and value of the coal-field, and it, in consequence, proved the occasion of a wasteful and useless expenditure. The total tonnage upon it, in the year 1836, was 7,291; and of the export portion of this total, only 718 tons were coals. The items of the exports on the Canal, in 1836, were 18 tons of coals from Drumglass col-

*—Fynes Moryson, who seems to consider the mere Irish men savages, and takes every opportunity so to describe them, bears occasionally reluctant testimony to their civilized habits, as well as indomitable courage. In reference to the cutting down of the rebels' corn in the Queen's county, he says, 'It seemed incredible that by so barbarous inhabitants the ground should be so measured, the fields so orderly fenced, the towns so frequently intersected, and the highways and paths so well beaten as the Lord-deputy here found them.' The horrible straits to which the unhappy Irish were reduced during this rebellion are too revolting for publication. Fynes Moryson, an eye-witness, concludes a more frightful picture by stating that 'no spectacle was more frequent in the ditches of towns, and especially in wasted counties, than to see multitudes of these poor people dead, with their mouths all coloured green by eating nettles, docks, and all things they could find upon above ground.'

liery, and 700 tons of coals from Mr. Griffiths' colliery at Coal-Island, to Portadown; and 500 tons of flour, 1,400 of oats, 55 of potatoes, and 1,308 of brick and tiles, to Belfast and Newry;—and the items of imports were 730 tons of slates from Wales; 20 tons of sheet and lead ore from Liverpool; 150 barrels of herrings from Liverpool; 450 tons of bar and wrought iron from Newport, Bristol, Liverpool, and Glasgow; and 160 tons of square timber, 400 tons of planks and deals, 15,000 staves, 300 tons of salt, and 250 tons of coals, from Belfast and Newry. The canal is fed by the rivulet Torreen; and a railway connects its basin with the collieries.

TYRONE'S DITCHES, some vestiges of old ramparts, in the parish of Ballymore, barony of Lower Orior, between Acton and Poyntz-Pass, eastern verge of the county of Armagh, Ulster. "This part of the country," says Sir Charles Coote, "is extremely well-fortified by nature, lying high, and commanding a great extent of ground, and is celebrated as having been the principal stronghold of the Earl of Tyrone, during his long contested wars with the English government. The vestiges of his intrenchments, where he was encamped, are yet seen, and since his time to the present have been called Tyrone's Ditches. This position was also chosen by this general, as being the most central between Lough Neagh and the sea, and his troops covered the entire line."

TYRREL'S-PASS, a post and market town, in the parishes of Newtown and Clonfad, barony of Fartullagh, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Tullamore to Mullingar, with the mail-road from Dublin to Galway, 2½ miles south-west by west of Beggar's-Bridge, 4½ east-north-east of Kilbeggan, 7 north-north-west of Philipstown, 7½ north-north-east of Tullamore, 8½ south-south-west of Mullingar, 12½ east of Moate, 13½ south-west by west of Kinnegad, 20 east of Athlone, and 40½ west of Dublin. The country immediately around Tyrrel's-Pass is much more diversified than the greater portion of the great plain across the island from Dublin to Galway; it displays, for several miles, a profusion of the low, isolated, gravelly hills and ridges provincially designated eskers; it possesses, south-east of the town, at the distance of respectively 5 furlongs and 3½ miles, the heights of Gallows-hill and Creghan—the former 385, the latter 769 feet of altitude above sea-level, and both commanding a very extensive panoramic view; and it is adorned, within a circle described upon a radius of 2 miles from the centre of the town, with the villas and mansions of Templeoran, Newcastle, Calverstown, West-house, Guilford-house, Judgeville, Cornahir, Tore-house, and Newforest,—the three last, the seats of Dean Vignolles, Mr. Pilkington, and Mr. H. Daniel. The town itself presents a remarkably clean, orderly, neat, and respectable appearance; it possesses the fine features of a handsome church and a small square of comfortable houses, built by the late Countess of Belvidere; and it contains a small Methodist chapel, an old castle, a schoolhouse, an inn, a posting-house, a savings' bank, a dispensary, a loan fund, and a constabulary barracks. "I would not desire or expect," said the Rev. Cæsar Otway, "to meet a much prettier village in England than Tyrrel's-Pass. Wood-crowned hills—dry gravel roads—neat white-washed cottages—comfortable and well-dressed gentlemen's demesnes—a very beautiful new church and steeple—these all meet the eye in and about Tyrrel's-Pass; but all these interested me not so much as the old castle, which stands a little way westward of the village, and which, placed at the extremity of a line of gravel hills that rise out of large bogs which skirt it on either side, guards the only passable road leading to Athlone. This pass—often the scene of bloody contest—has got its name from the ablest partisan soldier that ever Ireland produced, and who lived in the stormy times of Elizabeth, so fertile in every description of great men. This noted soldier was not only remarkable for the courage and devotedness with which he inspired his followers, but also for, in days of unusual treachery, the faithfulness with which he adhered to his cause. True to his employers, attached to his friends, he never despaired of what he thought the cause of his country, which he was the very last to desert. I do not desire it to be understood that I at all approve of Tyrrel's siding with the king of Spain, against his natural sovereign; but treating historically of him, I cannot but speak of him as a valiant soldier, and a consummate guerilla chief. Of English descent, when Tyrone rose in arms against Elizabeth, he took the command of the light-footed and light-armed Irish Bonnaghts, and there was not a mountain-pass from Malin-Head to Slieve-Logher, nor a togher across a bog from Philipstown-Fort to Galway, that he did not know the intricacies of. When, in the year 1597, the new deputy, Lord Burroughs, formed the plan of his campaign against Tyrone, O'Donnell, and Maguire, it was arranged that the Lord-deputy, attended by the Earl of Kildare and the lords of the Pale, should march direct upon Ulster, whilst Sir Croniers Clifford, the president of Connaught, should, with a force of 2,000 men, proceed into his province, and passing through it, turn in on Ulster by the head of the Shannon, taking Maguire's country in flank, and so march on to form a junction with the deputy. Tyrone, one of the wildest men, was not long in ascertaining the details of this plan, and in taking measures to counteract it; and to that purpose he despatched Tyrrel, with 500 picked Bonnaghts, to proceed through the Brenny into Leinster, to raise the O'Moores of Leix, Pheagh MacHugh O'Byrne, and the O'Tooles, who from the mountain glens were ever ready to rush as fit tools for fighting and plundering, and so with these united forces oppose and check Sir Croniers Clifford. Tyrrel, on his way to effect these junctions, was reposing his men in the woods that lie around Lough Ennel, when Sir Croniers, whose army lay at Mullingar, hearing of the Irish partisan being in his vicinity, despatched young Barnewell, Lord Trimleston's son, with half his forces, to destroy Tyrrel; who, aware of his approach, fell back until he gained this pass, which he made more dangerous by felling trees and fixing them on either side of the bogs that flanked the road, and he directed half his little army, under Owney M'Rory Oge O'Connor, to secrete themselves in a hollow in the ground, covered with oak copse, near which the English were to march, in order to gain the pass and assault Tyrrel. Young Barnewell, observing that Tyrrel was making a show of retreating onwards towards Kilbeggan, hastily advanced, leaving O'Connor in his rear; whereupon the Irish rose from their ambuscade, sounding their bagpipes, which was the concerted signal of the English placing themselves between the two fires, upon which Tyrrel turned about, and both he and Owney M'Rory fell on. The English, assailed in front and rear, and unable to deploy—as enclosed between the two bogs and the abbatis of felled timber—fought gallantly, as they always did, but were completely defeated and annihilated. Barnewell was taken prisoner; and not a man escaped to tell Clifford the disastrous tale, except one man, who plunged up to his neck in a quagmire amidst reeds and sedges. O'Connor, who fought on that day like a very madman, had his hand so swollen with fighting and fencing, that it could not be removed from the guard of his sabre until the steel was separated with a file. Clifford, with an army diminished to one-half, now finding himself surrounded by Irish insurgents on every side, was obliged to retreat on Dublin, and it required the greatest prudence and skill to effect his retreat in safety. This was not the only action in which Tyrrel was concerned in this vicinity. A little to the south, and occupying a similar pass in O'Moore's country, he surprised the most consummate of Elizabeth's generals, the Lord Mountjoy; on which occasion the deputy was in imminent danger of his life, and had a horse shot under him. Any one who reads the history of that terrible struggle between the English and the Irish in those wars, will recognise what an important part Tyrrel took in them—how he was mainly instrumental in assisting O'Donnell to pass into Munster, in spite of all Lord Mountjoy's precaution, who had supposed that he had every practicable road guarded, but which Tyrrel and O'Donnell evaded by passing safely over the hitherto impracticable mountains of Slieve-Phelim, and so thence gained the valley of the Shannon, when the English supposed they had enclosed them in the vale of the Suir. Tyrrel led on the vanguard of the Irish forces, at the, to them, disastrous battle of Kinsale. He protected Dunboy as long as it was possible; though often tempted by the English generals, he constantly refused to betray his cause, though thereby he might have saved from an ignominious death his nearest and dearest friends. Often betrayed, and often thereby defeated, yet too vigilant to be taken,—too fertile in resources to be vanquished,—he still held out; when even O'Donnell, in despair, retired beyond the seas, and Tyrone bargained successfully for his pardon; and when at last all was over in Munster, because the country was turned into one wide waste, Tyrrel, instead of surrendering, effected, along with his faithful followers, his retreat out of Desmond, and passed in hostile array, from the farthest mountains of Kerry, through the midst of traitorous Irish and watchful

English, until he arrived in the fastnesses of the county of Cavan—and there history leaves him—for I find no record of his subsequent life or death, after the Lord Mountjoy had the honour to announce to his sovereign that he had pacified Ireland." The Tyrrel's-Pass dispensary is within the Mullingar Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 26,852 acres, with a pop. of 6,714; and, in 1839-40, it expended £82 0s. 7½d., and administered to 1,328 patients. In 1843, the Tyrrel's-Pass loan fund had a capital of £2,176, circulated £8,567 in 1,792 loans, suffered a nett loss of £14 15s., expended for charitable purposes £56 18s. 8d., and belonged to 74 depositors. In the same year, a ladies' small loan fund, which was temporarily in operation for lending wool to the female peasantry, possessed a capital of £18, and lent to the value of £30 in 21 loans. Fairs are held on May 17 and Dec. 17. The town enjoys the advantage of the numerous conveyances in transit between Dublin and Athlone, Ballinasloe, Westport, and Galway; and it stands nearly midway between the Royal canal and the Great canal,—the former at Mullingar, and the latter at Tullamore and Philipstown. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 537; in 1841, 623. Houses 95. Area of the Newtown section, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 361; in 1841, 404. Houses 60. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 30; in manufactures and trade, 27; in other pursuits, 13. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 0; on the directing of labour, 36; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 2. Area of the Clonfad section, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 176; in 1841, 219. Houses 35. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 15; in manufactures and trade, 15; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 25; on their own manual labour, 12.

TYVOURNEY, a hamlet in the parish of Dúnquin, barony of Corkaguiney, Kerry. It stands on the coast, at the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay, 3½ miles south-west of Ventry.

ULAGH, or ULIDIA, an ancient principality, supposed to have included the present county of Down, and a small part of the county of Antrim, Ulster. Ulagh was the native name, and Ulidia the Latin version of it; and it is supposed by some to have been received from a Norwegian called Ulagh, who flourished here long before the Christian era, and by others to have been derived from the Uluntii or Voluntii, whom Ptolemy mentions as the inhabitants of this country. The seat of the petty kings of Ulagh is thought to have been at Downpatrick; and the name Ulagh is supposed to be the etymon of Ulster,—the designation of the northern one of the four provinces of Ireland.

ULLA, a parish. See OULLA.

ULLA (THE), a rivulet of the western border of co. Limerick, Munster. It rises between the mountains Roscagh and Menyeen, and runs about 6 miles south-westward to a confluence with the Feale, at a point about ¼ of a mile below Abbeyfeale.

ULLAHAN (THE), a rivulet of the western border of co. Limerick, Munster. It rises on the south-east side of the mountain Menyeen, and runs about 7 miles south-westward to the Feale, at a point between Abbeyfeale and the mouth of the rivulet Ulla.

ULLARD, a parish, partly in the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, and partly in the baronies of East Idrome and Lower St. Mullins, co. Carlow, Leinster. It lies along the barrow, the Kilkenny section on the west bank of that river, and the Carlow section on the east bank, 2½ miles north-north-east of Graignenanagh. The East Idrome section is separated from the Lower St. Mullins section by an intersection of the parish of Clonygoose, 1¼ mile in breadth; but it lies compact with the northern part of the Kilkenny section. Length of the Kilkenny section, south by eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,186 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches,—of which 42 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches are in the Barrow. Length of the East Idrone section, east-south-eastward, ¾ a mile; extreme breadth, 1½ furlong; area, 72½ acres,—of which 5 acres, 37 perches are in the Barrow. Length of the Lower St. Mullins section, south-south-westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,588 acres, 5 perches,—of which 19 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are in the Barrow. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,139; in 1841, 2,354. Houses 390. Pop. of the Kilkenny section, in 1831, 1,050; in 1841, 1,192. Houses 201. Pop. of the Lower St. Mullins section, in 1831, 1,089; in 1841, 1,151. Houses 187. A portion of the surface is rough pasture-ground; and the remainder is arable land, with a light but tolerably productive soil. The Kilkenny section contains the church, three burying-grounds, a constabulary barrack, and the ruins of a church and a castle; and the St. Mullins section contains Ballyvine-house, and the ruins of Kilcollan church.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £45. The rectories of Ullard and GRAIGUE (see that article) constitute the benefice of Ullard, and the corps of Ullard prebend. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 6,884. Gross income, £765; nett, £699 Os. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was quite recently erected, by means of contributions of £92 5s. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £439 14s. 4d. from private sources. There is a church also in Graigue. The Roman Catholic chapel also is in Graigue. In 1834, the Protestants of Ullard parish amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 2,213; the Protestants of the union to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 6,992; and 2 daily schools—both of which were in Graigue, and salaried by the National Board—had on their books 300 boys and 172 girls. In 1843, a National school at Ullard was salaried with £10 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 122 boys and 94 girls.

ULLID, or ILLUD, a parish in the barony of Iverk, 2½ miles north-east of Mountcoin, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,248 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 646; in 1841, 646. Houses 93. The surface consists, in general, of very good land; and is traversed by the road from Mountcoin to Mullinavat. The chief objects of interest are Ballinaboley wood, the hamlets of Ullid and Knockhouse, and the ruins of Ullid church.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of POLEROAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £45; glebe, £12 12s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £90; and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ULLOE. See OOLLA.

ULRA, a rivulet and a glen in the parish of Doonfenny, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. The rivulet rises on the east side of the mountain of Maumokeogh, and runs about 3 miles northward to the sea, at a point about 2 miles west of the small bay of Buntrahar. The glen is traversed by the rivulet; and forms a feature of considerable interest in the wild and bleak north-western sea-board of Tyrawley.

* This seems to include also the Idrone section; for that section is not separately noticed in the Census of 1831.

ULSTER,

The northern one of the four provinces of Ireland. It is bounded, on the west and the north, by the Atlantic ocean; on the east, by the North channel and the Irish sea; on the south, by the province of Leinster; and, on the south-west, by the province of Connaught. The boundary-line with Leinster and Connaught consists, over a considerable aggregate distance, of many interrupted stretches of water-course and summit-line; but, on the whole, is artificial, capricious, and not a little intricate. Exclusive of about 32 miles along the head and the north shore of Donegal bay, and estimating the measurements only in great lines from point to point, the province presents five sides of respectively 61 miles to the Western Atlantic ocean, 40 to the Northern Atlantic ocean, 81 to the North Channel and the Irish sea, 57 to Leinster, and 44 to Connaught. The longest line which can be drawn westward through the province, extends from Donaghadee in the county of Down, to Feelin Head in the county of Donegal, and measures 103 miles; the longest line which can be drawn southward, extends from Malin Head in the county of Donegal to the village of Finca in the county of Cavan, and measures 89 miles; the longest line which can be drawn north-westward extends from Cranfield Point in the county of Down to Bloody-Foreland in the county of Donegal, and measures 94½ miles; and the longest line which can be drawn south-westward, extends from Fair Head in the county of Antrim to Scrabby-bridge in the county of Cavan, and measures 93½ miles. The area of the province comprises 3,407,539 acres of arable land, 1,764,370 of uncultivated land, 79,783 of continuous plantations, 8,790 of towns, and 214,956 of water,—in all, 5,475,438 acres.

Coasts.]—The western coast, viewed as commencing at the entrance of the bay or gulf of Donegal, makes two great stretches of nearly equal length, the first north-north-eastward to Bloody-Foreland, and the second north-eastward to Malin Head; and, in an aggregate view, it is broken, wild, and intricate, now overhung by alpine cliffs, now flanked with a flat sea-board, either moorish or sandy, and now a rapid alternation of bluff headlands and practicable bays. The northern coast, measured from extremity to extremity, or from Malin Head to Fair Head, trends in the direction of east-south-east half north, but makes a long curvature landward at its middle, and sends off from the west end of that curvature the entrance to the great estuary of Lough Foyle; and it is prevailingly rocky and inhospitable from Malin Head to Lough Foyle, low, beachy, and impracticable along the curvature, and magnificently columnar and basaltic from the east end of the curvature to Fair Head. The east coast trends south-south-eastward from the vicinity of Fair Head along the whole of the east side of co. Antrim, and down to a point of co. Down, 12 miles from the headland at the south side of the entrance of Belfast Lough,—south by westward, and south-south-westward, over the next 16½ miles, or to St. John's Point,—and south-westward, over the last 13½ miles, or from St. John's Point to Cranfield Point, at the north-east or Ulster side of the entrance of Lough Carlingford; and, from Fair Head to the vicinity of Belfast Lough, it exhibits a long and rich series of basaltic cliffs, almost immediately overlooked by chalk mountains capped with basalt,—from Belfast Lough to the extremity of Dundrum bay, south of St. John's Point, it is low, bluff, little indented, and flanked by a champaign or merely undulated sea-board,—and from Dundrum bay to Cranfield Point, or rather round that point to the head of Lough Carlingford, it is a narrow, unindented belt of shore-ground, immediately and stupendously overhung by the alpine acclivities and summits of the Mourne mountains. The great bays or sea-loughs which either bound Ulster or indent its coasts are Donegal bay, partly indenting the western district, but chiefly lying on the boundary with Connaught; Lough Swilly, penetrating the west coast deeply southward, from a point nearer Malin Head than Bloody- Foreland; Lough Foyle, penetrating the north coast in the direction of south-west by south, and forming a great triangular interior expansion; Belfast Lough, running up the eastern sea-board south-westward, between the counties of Antrim and Down; Lough Strangford, forming a great lagoon, north-north-westward, within the champaign part of Down, so as to extend nearly parallel with the coast; and Lough Carlingford, extending north-westward on the boundary between Ulster and Leinster. The chief of the small bays and estuaries which indent the coast are Ballyshannon Harbour, Donegal Harbour, Inver bay, Macswine's bay, Fintragh bay, and Kilcar bay, off the Ulster portions of the bay of Donegal; Malin bay, Glen bay, Loughrusbeg, Loughrusmore, Daurus bay, Guibarra bay, Traevenagh bay, Maghera bay, Innisfree bay, and Guidore bay, between the entrance of Donegal bay and Bloody- Foreland; Curraue bay, Port bay, Ballyness bay, Sheephaven, Traunrossan bay, Mulroy bay, Black bay, between Bloody- Foreland and Lough Swilly; Strathbreaga bay, between Lough Swilly and Malin Head; Cuddaff bay, Tremone bay, and Kinnagoe bay, between Malin Head and Lough Foyle; the mouth of the river Bann, Portstewart Harbour, Portrush Harbour, and Ballycastle bay, between Lough Foyle and Fair Head; Murlough bay, Cushendun bay, Red bay, Glenarm bay, and Lough Larne, between Fair Head and Belfast Lough; Donaghadee Harbour, Cloghy bay, Quintin bay, and Millin bay, between Belfast Lough and Lough Strangford; and Ardglass Harbour, Killough bay, and Dundrum bay, between Lough Strangford and Lough Carlingford. The principal headlands are Ardara Point, Murragh Point, Doorin Point, St. John's Point, Drumanoor Point, Muckross Point, and Carrigan Head, within Donegal bay; Teelin Head, at the north side of the entrance of Donegal bay; Rossan Point, Daurus Point, Aughris Point, Roshin Point, Bloody- Foreland, Rough Point, Ummera Point, Horn Head, Pointahomash, Ballyrooskey Point, and Faimet Point, between Donegal bay and Lough Swilly; Dunaff Head, Malin Head, Glengad Head, Dunmore Head, and Innishowen Head, between Lough Swilly and Lough Foyle; Magilligan Point, Giants' Causeway, Pleskin Head, Bengore Head, Kenbane Head, Fair Head, Tor Point, Garron Point, Ballygawley Head, Skeenaghan Point, the Gobbins, Black Head, and White Head, between Lough Foyle and Belfast Lough; Grey Point, Ballymacornuck Point, the Briggs, Foreland Point, Ballyferis Point, Slanes Point, Blackneb, and Ballyquintin Point, between Belfast Lough and Lough Strangford; and Killard Point, St. John's Point, Mullartown Point, Leestown Point, and Cranfield Point, between Lough Strangford and Lough Carlingford. The islands of largest size are Arran and Tory, on the west coast of Donegal; Inch, in Lough Swilly; and Rathlin, or Raghery, on the north coast of Antrim. The chief of the isles and islets are Hugh Island, Bell's-Isle, Carrickfad, and Innishuff, in the bay of Donegal; Rathlin-O'Byrne Islands, Tormore Island, Innisbarnog, Roaninish, Inniskeel, Upper Innisfree, Inniskeera, Eighter, Innismoy, Laghan, Cruit, Owey, Lower Innisfree, Torglass, Stags of Arranmore, Gola, Innismeen, and Innisrerr, between Teelin Head and Bloody- Foreland; Innisbeg, Innisdoey, Innisboffin, and Frenchman's Rock, between Bloody- Foreland and Malin Head; Innistrathull, Garvan Isles, Sheep Island, Carrickarede, and Innisfidda, between Malin Head and Fair Head; the Maidens, Hunter Rock, and Isle of Muck, between Fair Head and Belfast Lough; the Copeland Islands, Black Rock, Long Rock, Skullmartin, Burial Island, Little Plough Rock, Plough Rock, the Feathers, North Rocks, the Scotchman, South Rock, Hem's Rock, and Angus Rock, between Belfast Lough and Lough Strangford; a profusion of Rocks and islets, and several inhabited isles, within Lough Strangford; and St. Patrick's Rocks, Collet's Rock, Gun's Island, and Cow and Calf, between Lough Strangford and Lough Carlingford. Numerous features of the coasts of Ulster, additional to those here glanced at, will be found noticed in our articles on the counties of DONEGAL, ANTRIM, and DOWN, and in the early sections of our GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

Surface.—The surface of Ulster is much more diversified, more beautiful in the aggregate, and greatly freer from bogs and level grounds, than any of the other three provinces of Ireland. One vast congeries of mountains, exceedingly various in outline, in grouping, and in the character of their intersecting glens and vales, occupies most of the western section of the province, or the greater portion of co. Donegal, a large portion of co. Londonderry, a large portion of co. Tyrone, a considerable portion of co. Fermanagh, and a small portion of co. Cavan; and, excepting in the range of the Sperrin mountains, along the mutual border of Londonderry and Tyrone [see SPERRIN], this enormous congeries—exceedingly the largest in Ireland—is nowhere drawn out into ranges or systems of any considerable extent, but consists of mere groups, assemblages, and even isolated masses of individual mountains. Very many of the summits have altitudes of between 1,500 and 2,000 feet above sea-level; a few have altitudes even upwards of 2,000 feet; and by far the majority are too lofty and conspicuous to be designated mere hills. The basins of the Loughs Macnean and Lough Melvin break precipitously down among the mountains on the boundary with Connaught; the extensive, grand, and brilliant basin of Lower Lough Erne, broadly dissects the mountains a brief distance east of the boundary with Connaught; a rich yet diversified plain continues, and even greatly expands, the disseverment westward from the foot of Lower Lough Erne to all the head of Donegal bay; a very extensive granitic plain, bleak, moorish, wild, and half-chaotic, lies between the central portion of the western section of the vast mountain congeries and the Atlantic ocean; the basin of Lough Swilly and an isthmus of beautiful low country from the head of it to the valley of the Foyle, completely peninsulate Innishowen, or cut off the mountains of that harony from those of the great body of the congeries; innumerable vales, glens, defiles, and 'slacks'—many of them sinuous and fitful in outline, and a large proportion eminently picturesque in character—cut into fragments nearly the whole of the mountain region in the interior of Donegal, Tyrone, and Londonderry, and along most of the mutual border of the first and the second of these counties; the splendid valley of the Foyle, broad, undulated, and beautiful, occupies the northern part of the mutual border of Donegal and Tyrone, and the whole of the small western border of the county of Londonderry; a broad and rich band of champaign seaboard extends, within the county of Londonderry, between the foot of the mountains and the shores of Lough Foyle and the Atlantic, and is crossed by the valleys of the Roe and the Bann, and partly invaded by a grand spur of the mountains terminating in the far-seeing summit of Benyevenagh: the southern portion of the western district of the vast mountain congeries, or that which lies south of the Sperrin mountains, and occupies all the central regions of the county of Tyrone, fuses out into a tabular expanse of moorland, prevailing russet in dress, little diversified in surface, tame, bleak, and dismal; and a rich low country, of various breadth and various character, but comprising a large proportion both of flat meadowy land and fertile undulated arable land, flanks all the east side of the great mountain congeries, and passes around Lough Neagh and across a portion of the Upper Bann and the whole of the Lower Bann, so as to constitute all the valley of the Lower Bann, all the shores and immediate basin of Lough Neagh, and the terminating portion of the valley of the Upper Bann. A little east of the valley of the Lower Bann extends the valley of the river Main, parallel with the valley of the Bann, but in an opposite direction, so as to terminate in the plain at the foot of Lough Neagh; and immediately east of this valley and of the plain along the east side of Lough Neagh, commences the slow eastward ascent of one great tabular mountain mass of trap, which occupies all the centre, most of the north, most of the east, and a considerable portion of the south of the county of Antrim,—is cloven with a series of lateral and parallel vales of pleasant and comparatively soft character toward the west,—describes its summit-line in a culminating ridge at a brief distance from the coast of the North channel and of Belfast Lough,—and breaks declivitously down toward the whole of that coast, displaying an almost constant series of the most magnificent escarpments, and extensively ribbed or cloven into compartments by lateral and parallel glens, ravines, and gorges. Most of the region south of the Antrim trap-mountain system, and of the eastern and central sections of the great mountain congeries of Ulster,—or the region which constitutes most of the county of Down, about two-thirds of the county of Armagh, the south-eastern district of the county of Tyrone, more than one-half of the county of Monaghan, a small part of the county of Cavan, and a considerable part of the eastern half of the county of Fermanagh,—may be summarily described as a constant, intricate, rich, and beautiful intermixture of hills and hollows, swells and dells, totally unlike any other great district in either Ireland or Great Britain, and eminently fitted both to astonish a stranger by their variety, and to charm or even bewilder him by their profusion of agreeable scenery. The Rev. Caesar Otway, referring to this region, though loosely using language in reference to the whole province, says, "The moment you enter Ulster, you perceive its peculiar features, its formation quite distinct from every other portion of Ireland. There are hills, swells, plains, and flat table-lands in the other portions of the kingdom, but here it is as all hill and valley, all acclivity and declivity. Driving along the new line of road that winds around these never-ending hills, you seldom see for a quarter of a mile before you. At first you are struck with the beauty of these eminences, so minutely subdivided, so diversified with patches of grass, oats, flax, and potatoes—the intervening valley either a lake, bog, or meadow. But soon you get tired; your eye becomes tantalized with having a constant barrier presented to its forward prospect; you are displeased that you cannot obtain any extended view of the country you are going through; you are in an eternal defile. Madame de la Roche-Jacquelin, in her interesting Memoir of the War in La Vendée, describes that country as very similar in its hills, valleys, and enclosures, to the province of Ulster." The principal mountain diversifications of surface within or on the southern borders of this great and wonderfully undulated region, are the Slieve-Bragh mountains, a mass of considerable extent, around the junction point of the counties of Fermanagh, Tyrone, and Monaghan; the Mullagh and the Fews mountains, a considerable but very lumpy mass, on the mutual border of the counties of Monaghan and Armagh, but chiefly within the latter; the Slievegullion and the Newry mountains, two superb and lofty nodules in the south-east of the county of Armagh, and connected with the Carlingford range of mountains within the north-east border of Leinster; the Slieve-Croob mountains, an isolated but conspicuous nodule, not far from the centre of the county of Down; and the Mourne mountains, an extensive, alpine, and sublimely characterized congeries in the south of co. Down, or extreme south-east of Ulster. See MOORNE. The district which forms the greater part of the county of Cavan, or the extreme south of Ulster, exhibits, along the eastern border and in some parts of the interior, a few hills in single masses, in small systems, or in moderately prolonged ridges; but these—to quote our own former account of the district—"are little more than sufficient to combine with hillocks and every species of inequalities to give a generally undulated or partially broken appearance to a prevailing expanse of cold champaign country, often bleak in aspect, and freely interspersed with bog and naked waste or pasture." The altitudes of the multitudinous mountain-summits within the province will be found stated in the section "Mountains," of our General Introductory article.

Waters.—The largest lake in Ireland, and one of the largest in Europe, is Lough Neagh, on the mutual border of the counties of Londonderry, Antrim, Down, Armagh, and Tyrone. Two large and very beautiful lakes, are Upper Lough Erne and Lower Lough Erne, both principally within co. Fermanagh, but the former also slightly within co. Cavan, and the latter slightly within co. Donegal. The other principal lakes of the province are Loughs Melvin and Upper Macnean, on the boundary with Connaught; Loughs Gowra, Kinnail, and Sheelin, on the boundary with Leinster; Lough Oughter in the west of the centre of co. Cavan, and in the river-course of the Upper Erne; Lough Ramor, on the south-east border of co. Cavan; the Cootehill lakes, on the mutual border of the counties of Cavan and Monaghan; and Loughs Derg, Esk, and Veagh, respectively in the south-east corner, on the southern district, and a little north of the centre of co. Donegal. Among the multitudinous smaller lakes may be named Loughs Fad, Shannagh, Glen, Gartan, Greenaw, Keel, Fern, Alluigh, Alton, Upper Nacuny, Lower Nacuny, Dunlewy, Anure, Craghy, Crumbane, Barra, Finn, Muck, Namanfin, Tamur, Ananima, Machugh, Derryduff, Sheskinmore, Fad, Doon, Tilttooris, Nallaghraman, Unna, and Unshagh, in co. Donegal; Lough Beg, on the mutual border of co. Londonderry and co. Antrim; Lough Fea, on the mutual border of co. Londonderry and co. Tyrone; Loughs Bradan, Lee, Naghera, Annagh, Mullighruen, Roughan, Ash, and Moore, in co. Tyrone; Lough Big, in co. Antrim; Loughs Homshigo, Drumaran, Monte, Pallramer, Erne, Balloreen, Aghery, Derry, Hiney, Clay, Islandreavy, and Loughbrickland, in co. Down; Loughs Gullion, Annagariff, Gall, Clay, Tullynawood, Sheetin, Cullyhannoo, Patrick, Killybane, Annaghmore, Allua, Ross, St. Peter, Corliss, Cam, Mullaghmore, Shaws, and Shark, in co. Armagh; Loughs More, Emy, Mullaghmore, Drumloo, Slacksgrange, Quig, Lamb, Cleue, Kilcorran, Shan-kill, Magherarany, Cloukeen, Gortwinny, Kilrooskey, Dummys, Aghafin, Creeve, Upper Creeve, Avaghon, Barraghy, Derrygooney, Bawn, Arattan, Gale, Namachree, Shantons, Bellatrain, Boraghy, Morne, Egish, Ross, Mucknoo, Monalty, Fee, Rachans, and Capragh, in co. Monaghan; Loughs Tacker, Sillau, Corraueary, Upper Skeagh, Milltown, Nadreegel, Cornagrone, Gradhan, Corglass, Beehy, Amagh, Carrofin, Tully, Gartiny, Drumany, Crilly, Fabarlagh, Edenterry, Drumard, Corraback, Killynaber, Cuillaghan, Killywilly, Clonty, Derryskitt, Killeshandra, Glasshouse, Rockfield, Garty, Swan, Dawn, Derrycassa, Coologe, Templeport, Bellaboy, Lakefield, Bunarky, Brackley, Cratty, Ardlougher, Moneen, Carrickacladdy, Corrakeeldrum, Newee-lion, Nagloughderg, Garvaghy, and Legalough, in co. Cavan; and Loughs Naman, Meeenaneen, Glenacreswan, Scabban, Keenaghan, Nearty, Rushen, Carrick, Ross, Carron, Derg, Barry, Larra, Cargan, Smaoran, Moore, Head, Drumroosk, Diah, Corban, Mill, Killymackan, Sand, Clommin, Cornabass, Kilgarrow, Accusel, Ballydooligh, and Natroey, in co. Fermanagh.—The only great rivers are the Erne, from the southern boundary of the province, through the counties of Cavan and Fermanagh, and across the south-westward wing of the county of Donegal, to Donegal bay at Ballyshannon harbour; the Foyle from many and voluminous head-waters in the counties of Donegal and Tyrone, along the northern part of the boundary between these counties, and across the western wing of the county of Londonderry, to the head of Lough Foyle; the Bann, from the Mourne mountains through the counties of Down and Armagh, through Lough Neagh, along the boundary between the counties of Londonderry and Antrim, and across the north-eastern wing of the county of Londonderry, to the Atlantic ocean, at a point 7 miles east by south of the east side of the entrance to Lough Foyle; and the Lagan, from the Slievecroob mountains, through the county of Down, and along the boundary between the counties of Down and Antrim, to the head of Belfast Lough. The second-rate rivers and the principal rivulets, are the Esk, the Eanymore, the Bunlahy, the Corker, the Bungosteen, the Ballydoo, and the Glen, to the bay of Donegal; the Owenrocker, the Owenea, the Guibarra, the Guidore, and the Claddy; to the Atlantic ocean, between Teelin Head and Bloody-Foreland; the Owencarrow, to Sheephaven; the Lannan, the Swilly, the Owenkillew, and the Owencrana, to Lough Swilly; the Faughan and the Roe, to Lough Foyle; the Bush, and the Glenbesk, to the Atlantic ocean between the mouth of the Bann and Fair Head; the Glendun, the Glenariff, and the Glenarn, to the North channel, between Fair Head and Belfast Lough; the Ballinahinch or Quoile, to Lough Strangford; the Newry or Narrow Water, to the head of Lough Carlingford; the Main, the Six-mile-water, the Crumlin, the Blackwater, the Ballinderry, and the Moyola, to Lough Neagh; the Annalee, the Cladagh, the Arney, the Sillies, the Ballinamallard, the Kesh, and the Tarmon, into the Loughs and river Erne; the Mourne, the Strule, the Owenkillew, the Glenelly, the Owenreagh, the Derg, the Finn, and the Deel, into the river Foyle; the Mountain river and the Callan, into the Blackwater; the Virginia rivulet, and one or two other small streams in the south-east of co. Cavan, to a chief tributary of the river Boyne; two or three rills in the south-east of co. Monaghan, to the South Lagan or Glyde, which flows through co. Louth; and several rivulets in the south of co. Armagh, to the Castletown river, which washes the town of Dundalk, and flows into the head of Dundalk bay.—The navigable rivers within the province are the Erne from the sea to

Ballyshannon, and from the foot of Lower Lough Erne to Belturbet, in co. Cavan; the Foyle, to Londonderry, and, with artificial aid, to Strabane; the Bann, from the sea to Coleraine, and from the foot of Lough Neagh to the north end of the Newry canal, a little south of Portadown; the Lagan, with artificial aid to Lisburn,—thence continued by canal to Lough Neagh; the Newry or Narrow Water, with artificial aid, to Newry,—thence continued by canal to the navigable stretch of the river Bann; and the Blackwater, from Lough Neagh, to the east end of the Tyrone and the Ulster canals. The artificial navigations, are the Lagan canal, from the navigable stretch of the river Lagan to the south-east corner of Lough Neagh; the Newry canal, from the Newry river in the vicinity of the town of Newry to the navigation of the Bann in the vicinity of Portadown; the Tyrone canal, from the river Blackwater to the collieries at Coal-Island; and the Ulster canal, from the river Blackwater, through the counties of Monaghan and Fermanagh, by way of the town of Monaghan, to Upper Lough Erne. Nothing is wanted to render the inland navigations of the province complete, and to connect these with the inland navigations of the basin of the Shannon, the interior of Leinster, and the water-communications thence to the south-west, the south, and the east of the kingdom, but one canal to connect Ballyshannon with Lower Lough Erne, another to connect Coleraine with Lough Neagh, and a third to connect Belturbet with some point upon the Upper Shannon; and all these three practicable and desirable lines, particularly the last, have already challenged attention. See articles SHANNON and ERNE.

Minerals.—A great field of granite extends along the western seaboard of co. Donegal, from Lough Swilly to Guibarra bay; a small district of granite, detached from the preceding, extends westward from Glenties to the sea; a considerably extensive field of granite commences around Slievegallion on the south-eastern border of co. Londonderry, and extends south-westward thence a considerable distance into co. Tyrone; a patch of granite lies immediately north-west of Ballinagh in co. Cavan; and a very extensive granite district comprises the Newry mountains, a chief portion of the Mourne mountains, and much of the intervening and adjacent country around the town of Newry, and on the mutual border of the counties of Armagh and Down. A vast district of tabular trap occupies by far the greater portion of co. Antrim; all the east and north shores of Lough Neagh; the eastern district of Londonderry to the town of Maghera, and to within 4 miles of the towns of Dungiven and Newtownlimavaddy; a pendicle of the north-east extremity of co. Tyrone; a pendicle of the north-west extremity of co. Down; and a considerable portion of the north-east district of co. Armagh, around the towns of Lurgan and Portadown. An extensive field of crystalline greenstone extends upon the mutual border of the counties of Londonderry and Tyrone, immediately north of the granitic district which commences around Slievegallion; and numerous protrusions and dykes of crystalline greenstone and other species of trappean rocks occur in various districts, particularly in the tabular trap region of co. Antrim, and in the north-west, the west, and the south-west of co. Donegal. Altered rocks in the neighbourhood of granite, including gneiss, clay slate, greenstone, greenstone slate, serpentine, micaceous slate, micaceous shining slate, and flint slate, constitute all the portions of the Mourne mountains not occupied by granite, and also form a broad skirt round three of the exterior sides of the great granitic district around the town of Newry.

A very extensive region of metamorphic schistose rocks, principally mica slate, and enclosing numerous nodules and patches of primitive limestone, occupies most of the centre and all the west of co. Londonderry, a portion of the north-west of co. Tyrone, and upwards of one-half of co. Donegal, from end to end of that county, and along all its eastern border and all its centre, from Innishowen Head to Teelin Head; and large patches or small detached districts of the same class of formations, occur in the western district or upon the western seaboard of co. Donegal. Quartz rock constitutes an area of considerable aggregate extent, but consisting of numerous mutually detached portions throughout the west and north-west of co. Donegal, from the island of Arran to Malin Head. Primitive limestone, often of such a texture as to constitute very excellent and beautiful marble, is diffused in very numerous nodules and patches among the crystalline and metamorphic geognostic formations of co. Donegal, and throughout the great micaceous schist region of the counties of Donegal, Londonderry, and Tyrone. A region of transition rocks, consisting principally of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate, and supposed to be a continuation of the great region of transition rocks which lies across Scotland to the coasts of Galloway, commences along the coast of co. Down from Belfast Lough all the way south to the skirts of the Mourne mountains at Dundrum bay, extends quite across the province to a brief prolongation into the Leinster county of Longford, and constitutes the greater portion of the counties of Down, Armagh, Monaghan, and Cavan. Old red sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitute a narrow but long belt along the greater part of the south edge of the great micaceous schist region of Donegal, Londonderry, and Tyrone; and they also constitute a large and broad district of country, which includes all the central moorlands of co. Tyrone, and extends from within 3 miles of Cookstown in the direction of south-west by west, across Tyrone and Fermanagh to Lower Lough Erne. Yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitute a considerable district in the counties of Tyrone, Monaghan, and Fermanagh, extending south-westward from within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Aughnacloy to the vicinity of Lisnakea; a lesser district in co. Fermanagh, on the west side of Lower Lough Erne; a similar district in the north-west corner of co. Fermanagh, around Lough Melvin; a considerable district in the counties of Donegal and Tyrone, extending from the vicinity of the north-east corner of Lower Lough Erne to the eastern vicinity of Omagh; a considerable district in the north-western division of co. Tyrone, between Newtown-Stewart and Strabane; a belt along part of the south edge of the great micaceous schist region within the southern part of co. Donegal, from the vicinity of Killybegs bay round by Lough Esk to about the east end of the Pillars; and an extensive district of very fitful and various breadth, and with several ramifications, within co. Londonderry, from Magilligan Point, and along the eastern and the southern shores of Lough Foyle, south by eastward to the immediate vicinity of Moneymore. Carboniferous or mountain limestone, of various geognostic character, constitutes a small district lying isolated among other rocks, in co. Londonderry between Maghera and Slievegalion; a small district in the extreme south-east of co. Monaghan, around Carrickmacross, and forming part of a considerable district which lies isolated, round the junction point of the counties of Monaghan, Meath, and Louth, among a formation of transition rocks; and an extensive region, occupying considerable portions of the counties of Donegal, Fermanagh, Cavan, Monaghan, and Tyrone, forming part of the vast flint limestone plain of Ireland, and extending from the belt of yellow sandstone in the south of co. Donegal, south-eastward up the basin of the Erne, to the head of Lough Oughter and the immediate vicinity of the town of Cavan, and from around Stewartstown and the vicinity of Cookstown south-westward to the boundary with Connaught, whence it passes into continuation with the carboniferous limestone formation of Connaught, Leinster, and Munster. Millstone grit, including white sandstones and shale, with thin beds of limestone and coal, constitutes a small district on the mutual border of the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh, extending south-westward from the vicinity of Drmquin; a considerable district occupying upwards of one-half of the north-western division of co. Fermanagh, and extending northward from the shores of Lough Macnean; a small district on the mutual border of the counties of Fermanagh and Cavan, between Swanlinbar and Ballyconnel, and a considerable district, partly within co. Fermanagh, but chiefly occupying the extremity of the north-westward wing of co. Cavan, and passing thence into continuation with the great millstone grit and coal formations around the basin of Lough Allen. Rocks of the coal formation constitute one small district in the vicinity of Carrickmacross and Kingscourt, in the counties of Monaghan and Cavan, passing thence into co. Meath; another around Coal Island and toward Dungannon, co. Tyrone, and another on the north coast of co. Antrim, at Fair Head and the vicinity of Ballycastle;—and in the second and the third of these, a considerable quantity of coal has been mined. New red sandstone and red marl constitute a band of country along the course of the river Lagan, from a point about 4 miles west of Dromore to the head of Belfast Lough, and thence along the south shore of the Lough to the vicinity of Hollywood, and along the north shore of the Lough to the vicinity of White Head; a pendicle across the head of Lough Strangford, in co. Down; an interrupted belt along the east coast of co. Antrim, from the vicinity of Larne to the north side of Red bay; a long band of country of various breadth, partly in the counties of Armagh and Londonderry, but chiefly in the county of Tyrone, from around the town of Caledon northward to a point about 2 miles north of Moneymore; and a narrow and sinuous belt along the edge of the tabular trap region within co. Londonderry, from the ocean southward to a point about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Dungiven. Lias green-sand and chalk constitute a slender zone round most of the tabular trap formation, interposed between the trap and the new red sandstone, partly at the north-east corner of co. Tyrone, extensively through the eastern division of co. Londonderry, and very conspicuously along some of the north, a great part of the south, and nearly the whole of the south-east and the east of co. Antrim. Rocks of the tertiary formation constitute a district on the shores of Lough Neagh, partly within the co. of Londonderry, but chiefly within the counties of Tyrone and Armagh. A more minute view of the geognostic structure of the province, together with the lithological character of many of the rocks, may be obtained by reference to the chapter on Minerals in our General Introduction.

Farms and Live Stock.—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the province 100,817 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 98,992 of from 5 to 15 acres, 25,009 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 9,591 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the civic districts of the province, 1,398 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 613 of from 5 to 15 acres, 120 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 64 of upwards of 30 acres.—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the province, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 5,945 horses and mules, 1,524 asses, 26,662 cattle, 10,446 sheep, 47,816 pigs, and 356,099 poultry; on farms of from 1 to 5 acres, 22,552 horses and mules, 5,113 asses, 94,992 cattle, 43,430 sheep, 64,794 pigs, and 430,606 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 66,734 horses and mules, 5,870 asses, 208,170 cattle, 73,334 sheep, 112,233 pigs, and 677,055 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 34,626 horses and mules, 594 asses, 107,073 cattle, 36,887 sheep, 44,174 pigs, and 273,227 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 25,568 horses and mules, 236 asses, 88,957 cattle, 48,570 sheep, 23,495 pigs, and 158,691 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, are 155,425 horses and mules, £1,243,400; 13,337 asses, £13,337; 525,854 cattle, £3,418,051; 212,671 sheep, £233,936; 292,512 pigs, £365,638; and 1,805,678 poultry, £47,390. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts of the province, £5,321,752.—In the same year there were within the civic districts of the province, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 3,028 horses and mules, 90 asses, 3,443 cattle, 192 sheep, 8,876 pigs, and 13,156 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 643 horses and mules, 15 asses, 1,366 cattle, 54 sheep, 953 pigs, and 2,766 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 616 horses and mules, 6 asses, 1,047 cattle, 106 sheep, 568 pigs, and 2,354 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 268 horses and mules, 2 asses, 528 cattle, 114 sheep, 128 pigs, and 844 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 192 horses and mules, 1 ass, 348 cattle, 75 sheep, 80 pigs, and 584 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 4,747 horses and mules, £37,976; 114 asses, £114; 6,732 cattle, £43,758; 541 sheep, £595; 10,614 pigs, £13,268; and 19,704 poultry, £493. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts of the province, £96,204.

Woods.—In 1841, the plantations within the province consisted of 2,836 continuous acres and 102,911 detached trees of oak, 1,309 continuous acres and 867,485 detached trees of ash, 302 continuous acres and 74,898 detached trees of elm, 357 continuous acres and 179,612 detached trees of beech, 3,536 continuous acres and 375,694 detached trees of fir, 61,710 continuous acres and 1,890,252 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 9,533 continuous acres and 67,731 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 79,783 continuous acres and 3,558,583 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 22,242 acres, and making, with the continuous woods, a grand total of 102,025 acres of plantations. Of the continuous woods, 2,011 acres of oak, 699 of ash, 141 of elm, 164 of beech, 235 of fir, 18,091 of mixed plantations, and 1,324 of orchards, were planted previous to 1791; 138 acres of oak, 249 of ash, 27 of elm, 18 of beech, 181 of fir, 4,834 of mixed plantations, and 941 of orchards, were planted between 1791 and 1800; 379 acres of oak, 87 of ash, 24 of elm, 25 of beech, 413 of fir, 7,066 of mixed plantations, and 1,261 of orchards, were planted between 1801 and 1810; 96 acres of oak, 185 of ash, 42 of elm, 62 of beech, 893 of fir, 8,572 of mixed plantations, and 2,080 of orchards, were planted between 1811 and 1820; 71 acres of oak, 69 of ash, 24 of elm, 67 of beech, 846 of fir, 11,089 of mixed plantations, and 2,421 of orchards, were planted from 1821 till 1830; and 141 acres of oak, 220 of ash, 44 of elm, 21 of beech, 968 of fir, 12,058 of mixed plantations, and 1,506 of orchards, were planted between 1831 and 1840.

Occupations.—As a means of somewhat minutely estimating the classification and the comparative amount of the productive industry of the province, we shall here give a digest of the statistics of occupations as exhibited in the Census of 1841:—Farmers, 272,140; servants and labourers, 289,318; ploughmen, 1,051; gardeners, 1,463; graziers, 20; herds, 10,976; care-takers, 266; land-agents, 56; land-stewards, 627; gamekeepers, 96; dairy-keepers, 90; fishermen, 1,906; millers, 1,551; maltsters, 5; brewers, 85; distillers, 79; wine-cooper, 1; bakers, 1,698; confectioners, 244; soda-water-makers, 9; cordial-makers, 3; salter, 1; salt-manufacturers, 6; tobacco-twisters, 164; fishmongers, 153; egg-dealers, 594; fruiterers, 59; cattle-dealers, 212; horse-dealers, 24; pig-jobbers, 91; salesmasters, 2; corn-dealers, 67; seedsmen, 13; flour-merchants, 7; butter-merchants, 32; cheesemonger, 1; huxters and provision dealers, 471; butchers, 1,872; poultryers, 68; victuallers, 205; grocers, 1,771; tea-dealers, 12; tobaccoconists, 70; wine-merchants, 11; tavern-keepers and vintners, 2,359; hotel and inn keepers, 1,134; lodging-house-keepers, 338; water-carriers, 20; flax-dressers, 3,549; carders, 286; spinners of flax, 52,886; spinners of cotton, 507; spinners of wool, 8,257; spinners of unspecified classes, 208,845; factory-workers, 6,667; winders and warpers, 6,117; wool-dressers, 2; weavers of cotton, 3,614; weavers of linen, 17,339; weavers of woollen, 473; weavers of silk, 23; weavers of fringe, 3; weavers of unspecified classes, 69,010; manufacturers of cotton, 126; manufacturers of silk and tins, 2; manufacturers of lace, 2; manufacturers of linen, 79; manufacturers of thread, 137; bleachers, 2,266; dyers, 263; clothiers, 86; cloth-finishers, 402; calico-printers, 104; skippers, 31; curriers, 226; tanners, 145; leather-dresser, 1; brogue-makers, 519; boot and shoe makers, 14,961; tailors, 8,940; sempstresses, 28,864; dress-makers, 13,407; milliners, 1,250; lace-workers, 89; tambour-workers, 518; stay-makers, 238; comb-makers, 27; artificial florist, 1; knitters, 6,285; hatters, 365; straw-hatters, 454; bonnet-makers, 1,975; straw-workers, 148; cap-makers, 49; glovers, 24; brace-maker, 1; button-makers, 9; wig-maker, 1; hair-dressers and barbers, 117; umbrella-makers, 21; blacking-makers, 24; leather-dealers, 81; flax-dealers, 52; wool-dealer, 1; hosiers, 235; haberdashers, 306; yarn-dealers, 66; drapers, 3; linen-draper, 251; linen-merchants, 78; woollen-draper, 466; silk-mercers, 21; trimming-seller, 1; pedlars, 3; venders of soft goods, 220; furriers, 4; dealers in old clothes, 96; rag and bone dealers, 401; architects, 76; builders, 164; brick-makers, 203; potters, 86; stone-cutters, 1,115; lime-burners, 75; plaster of Paris manufacturers, 2; bricklayers, 387; stone-masons, 5,166; slaters, 361; thatchers, 356; plasterers, 369; paviors, 38; quarrymen, 130; sawyers, 1,176; carpenters, 10,365; undertaker, 1; cart-makers, 156; cabinet-makers, 642; wood-polishers, 6; coopers, 2,503; turners, 233; millwrights, 374; wheelwrights, 836; shipwrights, 433; block-makers, 36; saddletree-maker, 1; boot-tree and last makers, 15; pump-borers, 22; cork-cutters, 32; lath-splitters, 26; reed-makers, 380; shuttle-makers, 7; card-makers, 17; brush-makers, 60; basket-makers, 257; broom-makers, 245; miners, 315; iron-founders, 180; blacksmiths, 6,382; farriers, 21; whitesmiths, 455; nailers, 1,785; cutlers, 52; tool-makers, 25; hackle-makers, 24; gunsmiths, 83; braziers and copper-smiths, 201; wire-workers, 15; pin-makers, 7; needle-maker, 1; bell-hangers, 10; gas-fitters, 18; coachsmiths, 18; spur and bit maker, 1; harness-platers, 2; plumbers, 76; tinplate-workers, 378; tinkers, 237; machine-makers, 766; optician and mathematical instrument maker, 1; clock and watch makers, 13; watchmakers, 361; musical instrument makers, 9; goldsmiths, silversmiths, and jewellers, 32; coach and ear makers, 240; carvers and gilders, 36; saddlers, 702; harness-makers, 49; whip-makers, 45; rope-makers, 370; paper-makers, 204; quill-manufacturers, 20; letter-press printers, 379; lithographic printers, 13; bookbinders, 156; paper-stainers, 19; carpet-weaver, 1; mat-makers, 71; chandlers and soap-boilers, 376; starch-manufacturers, 35; blue-makers, 2; vitriol-makers, 3; glue and size makers, 4; glass-makers, 86; painters and glaziers, 1,008; fishing-tackle makers, 4; net-makers, 88; heddle-makers, 4; bird-stuffer, 1; toy-maker, 1; sail-makers, 40; sieve-makers, 54; tobacco-pipe makers, 43; trunk-makers, 15; upholsterers, 36; feather-dressers, 8; bellows-makers, 14; chimney-sweeps, 143; firemen, 67; pattern-drawers, 12; print-cutters, 14; statuary, 2; civil-engineers, 39; land-surveyors, 325; measurers, 16; road-contractors and makers, 131; contractors of public works, 5; miscellaneous manufacturers, 17; feather-dealers, 50; furniture-broker, 1; bird-dealer, 1; glass and delph dealers, 35; delph and china dealers, 41; miscellaneous dealers, 2; stationers, 31; print-seller, 1; toy-dealers, 2; booksellers and stationers, 114; timber-merchants, 18; coal-merchants, 27; turf-dealers, 3; paper-merchants, 3; ironmongers, 133; physicians, 328; surgeons, 565; dentists, 5; apothecaries, 99; druggists, 24; midwives, 175; nurses, 162; officers of institutions, 46; judges, 3; stipendiary magistrates, 11; sheriffs, 6; coroners, 4; seneschals, 7; barristers, 46; proctors, 8; attorneys, 219; clerks of the peace, 3; public notaries, 9; law-clerks, 56; excise-officers, 1,258; civic officers, 8; inspector of weights and measures, 1; constabulary, 1,400; bailiffs, 428; city-constables, 99; town-serjeants, 3; gaol-keepers, 101; serjeant-at-mace, 1; inspectors of schools, 12; school teachers, 3,479; ushers and tutors, 831; governesses, 246; teachers of drawing, 4; teachers of music, 50; teachers of dancing, 10; librarian, 1; clergymen of the Established church, 437; Baptist ministers, 2; Methodist ministers, 115; Presbyterian ministers, 393; Independent ministers, 4; Moravian ministers, 6; Roman Catholic clergymen, 376; ministers whose denominational connection was not specified, 295; missionaries, 7; Scripture-readers, 52; parish-clerks, 40; monks and nuns, 18; sextons, 121; artists, 17; portrait-painter, 1; engravers, 59; play-actors, 33; musicians, 416; merchants of unspecified classes, 1,143; bankers, 58; brokers, 29; pawnbrokers, 122; agents, 153; auctioneers, 81; appraisers, 4; dealers of unspecified classes, 4,774; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 1,341; shop-assistants, 2,129; commercial travellers, 18; writing-clerks, 2,115; collectors of rates, 15; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 22; apprentices of unspecified classes, 166; newsvenders, 13; post-masters and mistresses, 104; letter-carriers, 75; post-drivers, 127; weigh-masters, 38; ship-agents, 6; pilots, 108; sailors, 1,194; harbour-masters, 10; boatmen, 323; lighthouse keepers, 28; lockgate-keepers, 19; tollgate keepers, 41; coach and ear drivers, 249; carriers, 2; carmen, 1,900; veterinary surgeons, 12; horse-trainers, 46; cow doctors, 6; overseers, 48; pound-keepers, 10; bath-keepers, 5; sportsmen, 37; woodrangers, 60; nurserymen, 47; gate-keepers, 92; hostlers, 59; domestic servants, 72,326; washerwomen, 1,997; lamplighters, 5; labourers and porters, 4,556; messengers, 138; and paupers, 8,916.

The Linen trade.—The manufacture of linen, which has for so long a period made a chief figure among the industrial occupations of the Irish, belongs in so general a view to Ulster, that a comprehensive notice of it is a proper and almost necessary topic for the section of an article on this province.—The earliest English writers upon Ireland state that linen fabrics were made by the Irish, and constituted an essential part of their dress. An act, passed in the reign of Henry VIII., to prevent the forestalling of linen and linen-yarn, states that the Irish had, during an hundred years, been exporters of these articles. An act was passed in the reign of Elizabeth to prohibit the steeping of flax and hemp in rivers; and necessarily presupposes the manufacture of linen to have then become so extensive as to render the steeping of flax in rivers a public and serious nuisance. Moryson, who was secretary to Lord Mountjoy, observes that Ireland produced much flax, which the inhabitants worked into yarn; and an act of parliament, passed about the time when Moryson wrote, prohibited the higher orders from wearing an extravagant quantity of linen in their shirts. Lord Strafford, who flourished in the reign of Charles I., had his attention arrested by the important condition of the linen manufacture, and adopted effective measures for its encouragement. In 1673, when the annual import of flax and linen fabrics from France into England was estimated in value at £507,000, Sir William Temple asserted that, by simply encouraging the spinning of flax, the French and the Dutch might soon be driven out of the market. In 1678, an act was passed to prohibit the importation of foreign linen, and to encourage the linen manufacture of Ireland; in 1685, through the influence of France upon James II., this act was repealed; and immediately after the Revolution, the importation of French linen was condemned, and finally suppressed, by the parliaments of Ireland, Scotland, and England. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, many French Protestants, who excelled in the manufacture of linen, were induced, both by their attachment to the political principles of the British Revolution, and by the apparently favourable condition of the Irish linen trade, to become settlers in Ireland; and they made so powerful an accession to the numerical strength, and especially to the factorial skill of the local manufacturers, that their arrival constituted an entirely new and most important era in the history of the manufacture. Mr. Lewis Cromelin, the most conspicuous figurant among these immigrants, obtained a patent for carrying on and improving the linen manufacture, accompanied with a grant of £800 per annum as interest of £10,000, which he was to advance as working capital, £200 per annum for his trouble, £120 per annum for three assistants, and £60 per annum for the support of a French minister in the town of Lisburn; in 1705, he wrote a work, successfully combating some prejudices which prevailed against the cultivation of flax and the making of linen; and during the period of his activity, he imported from Holland a thousand looms and improved spinning mills, improved the production of linen fabrics from prevailing coarseness to comparative fineness, and greatly increased both the extent and the market celebrity of the manufacture. In the fourth year of the reign of Queen Anne, linen was for the first time exported free of duty; and in the ninth year of the same reign, a general board of trustees of the linen and hempen manufacture was established for Ireland, and afterwards a separate board for each of the four provinces. In the eighth year of George I., a grant of £1,500 was made to the General Board toward the erection of a linen hall in Dublin, for the more regular sale of white linen; two years afterwards, a grant of £2,000 was made for the encouragement of the growth of flax and hemp; and at various subsequent periods, arts too obscure to be noted otherwise than in cumulo, have been passed for encouraging and regulating the linen manufacture. In 1719, public lappers were appointed to examine and measure webs in the markets throughout the country; in 1728, white or bleached linen ceased to be sold in the fairs and street markets; about the same period, the bleaching of linen became a separate business; and subsequent to the separating of the brown linen trade from that of the white linen, the brown fabrics exposed for sale in the markets were marked by a public seal-master, and the white or bleached fabrics were stamped in the linen hall at Dublin. About 1785, linen halls, to drain off part of the business from the Dublin linen hall, were built by subscription at Newry and Belfast; but the former of these was soon diverted from its purpose; and the latter, though it did not rival the Dublin hall, and eventually ceased to hold regular markets, has been of very considerable service in facilitating the general linen trade, and in enabling merchants to assort cargoes for exportation.

From the establishing of the Dublin linen hall till the year 1824, minute statistics were made and preserved of the yearly condition of the linen trade; but, since 1825, when the commercial intercourse between Ireland and Great Britain was resolved into a coasting trade, the statistics either ceased to be made or became completely confounded and of no practicable utility. In the beginning of the reign of William III., the annual value of the linen exported from Ireland was only £6,000. During the effluxion of the 18th century, up to about 1796, the trade made steady and rapid progress; and then, when the annual value of exported linen was about £3,697,503, the trade reached a culminating point; yet in 1809, though the number of yards exported was 2,800,937 fewer than in 1796, the annual value, in consequence of advance in price, was £5,853,917. Subsequently to 1809, the trade very materially declined; about the years 1820—1824, it sank comparatively low; and during some subsequent years, it continued low, though fluctuating; but, during the last 14 or 15 years, it has revived and progressed; and now it is once more in a decidedly prosperous condition,—probably more prosperous than at any previous period of its history. “The last available return,” remarked Mr. and Mrs. Hall in 1842, “is that furnished by the Railway Commissioners for 1835, by which it appears there were shipped from Ireland in that year 70,209,572 yards of linen, the value of which was £3,730,854. At present the annual value of the linen cloth manufactured in Ulster, cannot be less than £4,000,000 sterling. The number of persons employed in all branches of the manufacture is about 170,000; we may safely assert, that 500,000 derive their subsistence from it. The annual amount of wages may be calculated at £1,200,000; and the total capital employed, in all branches of the business, is estimated at £5,000,000 sterling. The fall that has taken place in the price of linen cloth since 1823, has been extraordinary. The article which was then sold at 2s. 1d. per yard, could, in 1831, be bought at 1s. 4d., and, in 1841, at 11d.; whilst now, 1842, it is worth only 9d. ! The great increase in the quantity exported, is mainly attributable to the gradual substitution of mill-spun for hand-spun yarn, by which a considerable diminution in the cost of the production has been effected. The introduction of machinery for spinning linen yarn, although, doubtless, affording employment to a large portion of the population, has been productive of any thing rather than improvement in the condition of the weaver. Towards the end of last century, and subsequently, while spinning by hand continued remunerative, the linen weaver, in the country districts of Antrim, Down, and Armagh, enjoyed for an Irish peasant a high degree of comfort. Generally possessed of a small holding of land, the loom supplied himself and his sons with regular employment, in the intervals of agricultural labour; while the females of his family found nearly constant occupation in the spinning of flax, often the produce of his own farm. A web, when finished, was readily disposed of at one of the numerous markets attended by the linen factors. The introduction of machinery necessarily effected a total change. Female labour was at once rendered comparatively valueless; and the domestic manufacture of yarn comparatively impossible. The weaver now felt himself obliged to enter into an engagement with a manufacturer, from whom he receives the yarn, and to whom he returns the web when woven. A large share of the profit, which formerly accrued to the weaver, has been thus transferred to other quarters.” Some additional notices of the linen trade will be found in the section on Manufactures in our General Introduction.

Communications.—The railway for goods and passengers between Belfast and Armagh will be noticed in the article ULSTER RAILWAY: which see. A brief line of railway, for strictly local purposes, has been constructed from Belfast to Cavehill. One line of railway was proposed by the Public Commissioners, to connect Armagh with Dublin, by way of Castle-Blaney, Carrickmacross, and Navan; and another line was proposed by them, to connect Enniskillen with Dublin, by way of Lisnaskea, Cavan, Ballyjamesduff, and Virginia, and to unite with the former at Navan. One line of railway, surveyed by other parties, and submitted to the notice of the Public Commissioners, proposes to connect Enniskillen with Londonderry, by way of Ballinamallard, Dromore, Omagh, Newtown-Stewart, Strabane, Lifford, and St. Johnston; another, to connect the Enniskillen and Dublin line at Cavan, by way of Cootchill, with the Armagh and Dublin line at Castle-Blaney; another, to connect Armagh with Dundalk and Drogheda, by a route a little west of the Armagh and Dublin line to Castle-Blaney, and thence south-eastward to Dundalk; another, to connect the Belfast and Armagh line at Portadown, by way of Tanderagee, Newry, and Carlingford, with Dundalk, and thence along the coast with Drogheda; another, to connect Armagh with the preceding at a point a little south of Tanderagee; and another, to connect Armagh with Coleraine, by way of Charlemont, the west shore of Lough Neagh, Portglenone, and Kilrea.—The inland navigations of the province, whether by lake, river, or canal, have already been noticed in the section entitled “Waters.”—The roads of Ulster, in spite of the prevailing hilliness of the surface, are, in a general view, well constructed, minutely ramified, and excellently maintained. The principal lines of mail-road within the province are the Dublin and Belfast, by way of Newry, Loughbrickland, Banbridge, Dromore, Hillsborough, and Lisburn; the Newry and Kilkeel, by way of Warrenpoint and Restrevor; the Newry and Downpatrick, by way of Rathfriland, Castlewellsan, and Clough; the Downpatrick and Killough; the Downpatrick and Strangford; the Downpatrick and Donaghadee, by way of Killyleagh, Killynch, Comber, and Newtown-Ardes; the Newtown-Ardes and Portaferry, by way of Greyabbey and Kirkcubbin; the Belfast and Donaghadee South, by way of Newtown-Ardes; the Belfast and Donaghadee North, by way of Hollywood and Bangor; the Newry and Armagh, by way of Markethill; the Armagh and Coleraine, by way of Moy, Dungannon, Stewartstown, Cookstown, Moneymore, Magherafelt, Tubbermore, Maghera, and Garvagh; the Newry and Portadown, by way of Tanderagee; the Markethill and Richhill;

the Banbridge and Lurgan; the Armagh and Belfast, by way of Richhill, Portadown, Lurgan, Moira, and Lisburn; the Portadown and Guilford; the Lurgan and Antrim, by way of Glenavy and Crumlin; the Belfast and Ballycastle, by way of Carrickfergus, Larne, Glenarm, and Cushendall; the Belfast and Londonderry, by way of Antrim, Randalstown, Ballymena, Ballymoney, Coleraine, and Newtownlimavaddy; the Antrim and Ballyclare; the Ballymena and Broughshane; the Ballymoney and Ballycastle, by way of Darvoek; the Coleraine and Bushmills; the Randalstown and Magherafelt, by way of Toome-bridge and Castle-Dawson; the Magherafelt and Killea, by way of Castle-Dawson, Bellaghy, and Portlone; the Newtownlimavaddy and Dungiven; the Dublin and Londonderry, by way of Carrickmacross, Castle-Blaney, Monaghan, Ennyvale, Aghnacloy, Ballygawley, Omagh, Newtown-Stewart, and Strabane; the Carrickmacross and Kingscourt; the Castle-Blaney and Newry, by way of Newtown-Hamilton; the Castle-Blaney and Armagh, by way of Keedy; the Monaghan and Ballybay; the Monaghan and Armagh; the Monaghan and Caledon, by way of Glasslough; the Monaghan and Swanlinbar, by way of Clones, Belurbet, and Ballyconnel; the Aghnacloy and Armagh, by way of Caledon; the Aghnacloy and Clogher; the Omagh and Fintona; the Newtown-Stewart and Castle-Derg; the Strabane and Dunmaganagh; the Dublin and Enniskillen, by way of Virginia, Ballinagh, Cavan, and Lisnaskea; the Virginia and Granard, by way of Mount-Nugent; the Virginia and Bailieborough; the Virginia and Ballyjamesduff; the Ballinagh and Coochill, by way of Stradone; the Cavan and Granard, by way of Crossdoney, Arvagh, and Serabby; the Crossdoney and Killeshandra; the Lisnaskea and Five-mile-town, by way of Brookborough; the Enniskillen and Sligo, by way of Florence-Court and Manor-Hamilton; the Enniskillen and Ballyshannon, by way of Churchhill; the Enniskillen and Tempo; the Enniskillen and Kesh, by way of Irvinestown; the Sligo and Londonderry, by way of Ballyshannon, Donegal, Stranorlar, Castle-Finn, and Lifford; the Donegal and Rutland, by way of Killybegs, Ardara, and Narin; the Stranorlar and Raphoe; the Lifford and Duflanaghy, by way of Letterkenny; the Letterkenny and Ramelton; the Londonderry and Bunrana; the Londonderry and Moville, by way of Muff; and the Londonderry and Carndonagh, by way of Muff.

Divisions.—Ulster is divided into the nine counties of Donegal in the north-west, Londonderry in the north, Antrim in the north-east, Down in the south-east, Armagh in the east of the south, Monaghan in the west of the south, Cavan in the south-west, Fermanagh in the west, and Tyrone in the centre. Donegal is divided into the baronies of Bannagh, Boyleagh, Innishowen, Kilmacrenan, Raphoe, and Tyrhugh; Londonderry, into the baronies of Coleraine, Kenaught, Londonderry, Loughisholin, Liberties of Coleraine, and Tyrkeeran; Antrim, into the baronies of Lower Antrim, Upper Antrim, Lower Belfast, Upper Belfast, Carey, Lower Dunluce, Upper Dunluce, Lower Glenarm, Upper Glenarm, Kileonway, Lower Massarene, Upper Massarene, Lower Toome, and Upper Toome; Down, into the baronies of Ardes, Lower Castle-reagh, Upper Castle-reagh, Dufferin, Lower Iveagh, Upper Iveagh, Kinnelearty, Lecale, Newry, and Mourne; Armagh, into the baronies of Armagh, Lower Fews, Upper Fews, East O'Neilland, West O'Neilland, Lower Orier, Upper Orier, and Turaway; Monaghan, into the baronies of Cremonroe, Dарты, Farney, Monaghan, and Trough; Cavan, into the baronies of Castleraghan, Clonchee, Clonmahon, Lower Loughtee, Upper Loughtee, Tullaghgarvey, Tullaghagh, and Tullaghonoboy; Fermanagh, into the baronies of Glenawley, Clonkelly, Coole, Knocknunny, Lurg, Magheraboy, Magherastephana, and Tyrkenney; and Tyrone, into the baronies of Clogher, Lower Dungannon, Middle Dungannon, Upper Dungannon, East Omagh, West Omagh, Lower Strabane, and Upper Strabane.—Ulster, in its ecclesiastical distribution, contains the whole of the dioceses of Dromore, Down, Connor, Derry, and Raphoe, all the diocese of Clogher, excepting part of two parishes, about three-fourths of the diocese of Kilmore, about one-twelfth of the diocese of Ardagh, one parish of the diocese of Meath, and about three-fifths of the diocese of Armagh.

School Statistics.—In 1834, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools within the province was 3,449, of scholars 141,882, of male scholars 80,977, of female scholars 57,242, of scholars whose sex was not specified 3,663, of scholars connected with the Established church 35,977, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 44,383, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 2,476, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 57,023, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 2,023; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 3,449, of scholars 141,959, of male scholars 83,653, of female scholars 54,556, of scholars whose sex was not specified 3,750, of scholars connected with the Established church 34,972, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 43,667, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 2,625, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 58,164, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 2,531.—At the close of 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the province 1,252 schools, conducted by 1,080 male and 244 female teachers, attended by 69,115 male and 50,700 female teachers, and aided during the year with £13,349 Gs. 8d. in salaries, £1,108 12s. 6d. in free stock, and £1,465 12s. 4d. in school-requisites at half-price; and, at the same period, 25 other schools had not come into operation, toward which the Board had granted £1,597 Gs. 8d. for building, and £184 18s. 6d. for fitting up, and which were expected to be attended, when opened, by about 1,395 male and 1,051 female scholars. On Jan. 1, 1840, the Sunday School Society of Ireland had within the province of Ulster 2,012 Sunday schools, conducted by 16,006 gratuitous teachers, and attended by 167,000 scholars.

Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 205,945; who could read but not write, 382,127; who could neither read nor write, 489,038. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 72,756; attending superior schools, 6,503. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 639; attending superior schools, 6,215. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 42; married, 53; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 39; married, 49; widowed, 12.

History, &c.—The supposed origin of the name of Ulster, and the alleged high antiquity of one of its quondam principalities, are noticed in the article ULACH; which see. The tribes whom the Roman geographer represents as inhabitants of Ulster in the second century were the Voluntii, the Venenii, the Robagdi, the Darnii, and the Eriinii. Some portion of the ancient history of the province is glanced at in the articles DALRIADA and AILEACH; and the principal passages of its history during the middle ages down to the overthrow and expulsion of its native septs and chieftains are noticed in the articles TYRONE, DONEGAL, LONDONDERRY, DOWN, CLANENY, and BELFAST; see these articles. In consequence of the rebellions which broke out in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and which were headed by the Earl of Tyrone, the Earls of Tyrconnel, and other chiefs of Ulster, the province was reduced to anarchy in political condition, to ruin in manufactures and trade, and to extreme poverty and wretchedness in the social and moral circumstances of its people. At the accession of James I., measures were adopted for pacificating and civilizing Ireland; and, during his reign, the project was formed and executed of—what is known in history as the Plantation of Ulster—completely breaking the power of native chiefs throughout this province, colonizing with British Protestants the vast extent of lands forfeited by the recent rebellions, expelling to Connaught, or at least from the north of Ireland, the native Irish resident on these lands, the creation of a large number of parliamentary boroughs, with an exclusively Protestant franchise, and the reduction of the civil government of the several counties into a form accordant with that of the counties of England. A chief agent in achieving this great change was Sir Arthur Chichester, ancestor of the Marquis of Donegal, and appointed Lord-deputy in 1605; and other leading agents were the families of Hill and Clotworthy from England, and the families of Balfour, Hamilton, Stewart, Montgomery, and Macdonnell, from Scotland. In consequence of a very large proportion of the colonists at "the Plantation" being immigrants from Scotland, the Presbyterian form of church government became extensively diffused in the province, an extensive engraftment of the Scottish dialect was made upon the native Hibernico-English, and so marked a Scottish tone was given to the entire social character that in other parts of Ireland, particularly in Connaught, the modern inhabitants of Ulster continue till the present day to be popularly called Scotsmen. The prevalence of these Scottish peculiarities is particularly remarkable, and instantly arrests the attention of a stranger, throughout the counties of Antrim, Down, Armagh, and Tyrone, most of Londonderry, the eastern part of Donegal, and the northern part of Monaghan; and a corresponding prevalence of English peculiarities, though not in so prominent a degree, is observable in the county of Fermanagh, and in portions of the counties of Cavan and Londonderry; yet the expelled native Irish have gradually returned in so great numbers, and have imperceptibly wielded an influence upon society, in so many forms and to so large an extent, that the modern peculiarities of the province have very considerably lowered their altitudes, and softened their most characteristic features. The province is known to statistics, and all but universally admitted in popular opinion, to possess, in the aggregate, a much larger amount of prosperity than any of the other three provinces of Ireland; but whether this prosperity has arisen in any degree from "the Plantation," or is to be traced to other causes, a mere topographer is not called upon to say. In the latter part of last century, however, the province was much disturbed by secret armed associations, assuming the name of Hearts of Steel, and other outré designations; and, during the present century, it has been the principal seat of the political associations well known over the three kingdoms under the name of Orange Societies.

In 1615, contemporaneously with the meeting of a parliament for sanctioning the events of the Plantation of Ulster, a convocation of the clergy was held to adjust the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom, and attempt the creation of uniformity in the north. A confession of faith was drawn up by order of this convocation, and was intrusted to Dr. James Usher, then professor of divinity in Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards the celebrated archbishop of Armagh; and this document, among other matters, aimed to compromise the differences between the Established Church and the non-conformists; but, like most confessions of its class, from the famous creed of Nice, and ecclesiastical edicts of Christian Roman Emperors, down to the numerous manifestoes, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, which followed the Lutheran era, it proved a signal failure. In 1609, the Rev. Edward Brice, who had been minister of Drymen in Scotland, settled at Broad-Island in the south-east of the county of Antrim; immediately afterwards, Mr. Hubbard, a Puritan minister from England, settled at Carrickfergus.—Mr. John Ridge, from England, settled at Antrim.—Mr. Robert Cunningham, from Scotland, settled at Hollywood.—Mr. Robert Blair, also from Scotland, settled at Bangor.—and Mr. James Hamilton, nephew of Lord Clanaboy, settled at Ballywalter; and soon after, these ministers, who formed the nucleus of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, received accessions from England and Scotland, in the persons of various preachers and ministers,—among others, Josias Welsh, said to have been a grandson of the celebrated John Knox, Andrew Stewart, George Dunbar, John Livingstone, and Henry Colwart. Some of these ministers were supported wholly or partially from the tithes of the parishes in which they laboured, and others from an endowment by the patron; and their successors, as well as the numerous additional ministers who from time to time joined their standard, received aid from the government allowance, known as regium donum. The principal body of the Presbyterians were understood to be in communion with the Established Church of Scotland, and constituted what was called the Synod of Ulster; and another body which eventually arose and made rapid advances in bulk and importance toward a rivalry with the former, was understood to be in communion with the United Secession Church of Scotland, and bore the name of the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland; but on July 10, 1840, these two Synods, which then jointly constituted 35 presbyteries, and 433 congregations, were constituted one body under the designation of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. An Unitarian community, who separated from the Synod of Ulster in May 1830, bears the designation of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster; and at the close of 1843, it comprised 3 presbyteries, and had 30 ordained ministers, and 4 preachers or licentiates. The larger of two bodies of Cameronians or Reformed Presbyterians, wears the name of the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ulster; and at the close of 1843, it comprised 3 presbyteries and 6 mission congregations, and had 29 ordained ministers.

Sir John De Courcy, who first subjected the north of Ireland to the English authority in the reign of Henry II., was created Earl of Ulster. The family of De Lacy, lords of Meath, supplanted De Courcy in his honours, and next wore the title of Earls of Ulster. Walter De Burgh, lord of Connaught, and son-in-law of Hugh De Lacy, became Earl of Ulster at his father-in-law's decease. Richard, the son and heir of Walter De Burgh, and the second Earl of Ulster of the De Burgh family, was educated at the court of Henry III., and was regarded as the most extensive landed proprietor, and the most powerful subject in Ireland. William, the third Earl of Ulster of the De Burgh family, and grandson of the second, married Maud, daughter of Henry Plantagenet, Earl of Lancaster, grandson of Henry III.; but, in 1333, when only 21 years of age, he was murdered near Carrickfergus by Robert Fitz-Richard Mandeville and his followers. Lionel of Antwerp, Duke of Clarence, and third son of Edward III., married Lady Elizabeth De Burgh, the only child, and the heiress of this third De Burgh Earl of Ulster; and he became fourth Earl of Ulster, and was appointed to the lord-licutenancy of Ireland. Edmund Mortimer, third Earl of March, married Philippa, the only child, and the heiress of the Duke of Clarence; and he, in consequence, became the fifth Earl of Ulster. The lineal descendants of the last Earl are the Marquises of Clanricarde. In 1784, His Royal Highness, Frederic, Duke of York, was created Earl of Ulster; and this title, so long in use, and so various in possession, is now restricted to princes of the royal family.

ULSTER CANAL, an artificial navigation of the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Fermanagh, Ulster. It was projected in 1832, and has been quite recently completed. It measures 24 statute miles in length; and connects the navigations of Lough Neagh with those of the Loughs Erne. It commences at the river Blackwater, immediately below Charlemont; passes up the right bank of that river, and of its affluent the Mountain river, along the western margin of the county of Armagh to a point 1½ mile south-west of the village of Middleton; it approaches, during this long sweep, the towns and villages of Blackwater, Benburb, Caledon, Tynan, and Middleton; it proceeds south-westward across the county of Monaghan, and past the southern outskirts of the towns of Monaghan, Smithborough, and Clones; and it then crosses the south-eastern district of the county of Fermanagh, to the head of Lough Erne, at a point about 14 mile north of Castle-Saunderson. This great and valuable work opens a water communication eastward to Lough Neagh, Coal-Island, Belfast, Newry, and all intermediate places, from the whole of the extensive basin of the Erne, situated between Belturbet on the course of the Upper river Erne to the vicinity of Belleek below the efflux of the superfluous waters of Lower Lough Erne; and a project exists to extend the navigation westward from the vicinity of Belturbet to some point on the Upper Shannon, and thus to connect with the north-east of Ireland, through the Ulster canal, the countries drained by the Shannon and its affluents so far west as the vicinity of the town of Boyle. See BELTURBET, BOYLE, and SHANNON AND ERNE NAVIGATION.

ULSTER RAILWAY, a railway of the counties of Antrim, Down, and Armagh, Ulster. It originated at a meeting of gentlemen held in Belfast, by public notice, in the latter end of 1835. Though designed to connect the east with the west of Ulster, or rather the town of Belfast with the basin of the Erne, it was originally projected only to the town of Portadown, whence canal communication existed on the one hand with Newry, and on the other with Lough Neagh, the Blackwater, and Upper Lough Erne; but it has since been extended to Armagh; and it so agreeably answers expectation that it may not improbably be extended, at an early period, to Monaghan, Clones, and Enniskillen. In 1839, a part of it toward the east end was opened for traffic; and at speedy subsequent periods, it was opened to successively Seagoe, Portadown, and Armagh. The original capital was £800,000; the expenditure upon it up to August 1842, amounted to £314,302 11s. 9d.; the cost of its construction, on to a point 24 statute miles from Belfast,—including act of parliament, purchase of ground, buildings at the terminus, depots at the stations, carriages, engines, and trucks —was about £12,000 per mile for a single line; and the passenger traffic, upon it between Belfast and Portadown, during the 6 months ending in Aug. 31, 1842, was as shown in the following table:—

The line is 36 statute miles in length. It commences in the vicinity of Durham-street in Belfast; it runs along the margin of the county of Antrim, or ascends the left side of the valley of the Lagan, to a point in the northern vicinity of Moira, passing between Dunmurry and Malone, and touching the northern outskirts of Lisburn; it crosses the Lagan, in the northern vicinity of Moira; it traverses a narrow wing of the county of Down to a point nearly midway between the Lagan and Lurgan; and it thence traverses the county of Armagh to the city, passing the northern outskirts of Lurgan and Portadown, and making a subsequent detour so as to pass about midway between Richhill and Loughgall. "Besides opening the communication with the west of Ireland, and affording the means of speedy transit for the produce of the western districts to the rapidly increasing shipping-port of Belfast, from whence there is almost daily steam communication with Glasgow and Greenock, Carlisle, Liverpool, London, and Dublin, this railway passes through an important linen manufacturing district in the counties of Antrim and Armagh, and bordering on the county of Down." Lines of proposed railway to connect the Ulster line with Dundalk, Drogheda, Dublin, and Coleraine, are noticed in the section "Communications," of our Article on the province of ULSTER: which see.

UMGALL, a grange in the barony of Upper Belfast, 5½ miles north-west of the town of Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 7 furlongs; area, 753 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches. Pop., in 1841, 188. Houses 33. The surface is crossed by the road from Belfast to Connor, or direct road from Belfast to Ballymena; and lies a little north-east of the road from Belfast to Antrim.—This grange lies within the dio. of Connor, but is very generally treated as part of the parish of TEMPLEPATRICK: which see.

UMMA. See OMEY.

UMMERUS, a bog in the parish of Lackagh, barony of West Ophaly, 2 miles north by east of Monastereven, co. Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and north-west, by the Little Barrow river; on the south, by the high grounds of Queensborough, Ummerus Island, and the Grand Canal; on the east, by the gravel ridge of Clonbrin; and on the west, by the ridge of Pollygarten and Clogheen. Its area is 1,272 acres. Its greatest altitude above the Little Barrow at its northern skirt is 37 feet; and its average depth is 28 feet. It contains no quagmires. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,559 19s. 2d.

UMOND. See OMEY.

UNCION. See ARROW.

UNION-HALL, a village in the parish of Myross, eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on an isthmus between the head of Castle-Haven, and a westward creek of Glandore Harbour, 2 miles north-north-east of Castletownsend, 3¼ east by north of Skibbereen, and 5½ west-south-west of Roscarbery. Adjacent to it is an excellent quay for vessels drawing 10 feet of water; in the vicinity are several neat residences; and in the village itself are an elegant church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and some schools. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 336. Houses 56.

UPPERCHURCH. See TEMPLEOUTRACH.

UPPERCOURT, the charming seat of W. D. Montmorency, Esq., in the parish of Freshford, 5 furlongs south-south-west of the town of Freshford, barony of Cranagh, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The demesne attached to it forms a beautiful portion of the valley of Freshford; and its plantations cover some finely varied rising grounds, and contribute a prominent and most pleasing feature to the general landscape.

UPPERCROSS, a barony of the southern district of the county of Dublin, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Castleknock; on the north-east, by the city of Dublin; on the east, by the baronies of Dublin and Rathdown; on the south, by the county of Wicklow; and on the west, by the barony of Newcastle. Its length, in the direction of north by west, from the summit of Kippure mountain to the river Liffey, is 10 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 7 miles; and its area is 39,013 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches,—of which 37 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches are in the river Liffey. The territorial identity of the barony was, in a great measure, subverted by recent changes. The old barony comprised three detached districts of the county, lying far south between the counties of Wicklow and Kildare; but the present barony consists wholly of one compact district, extending from the river Liffey in the north to the mutual boundary-line between the counties of Dublin and Wicklow in the south. The surface comprises a beautiful, embellished, and fertile portion of the right side of the valley of the Liffey, all the middle and upper parts of the vale of the Dodder, a rich section of the ornate and villa-sprinkled environs of the metropolis, and a powerfully featured and most imposing portion of the Dublin mountains. The principal summits in the mountainous district, together with their respective altitude above sea-level, are Kippure mountain, on the southern boundary, 2,473 feet; Slieve-Bane, in the southern boundary, 3 miles north-west of Kippure, 2,128 feet; a height on the western border, 1,049 feet; a height 1½ mile north of Slieve-Bane, 1,203 feet; a height on the northern frontier of the uplands, 4½ miles north of Kippure, 1,271 feet; and a height on the south-eastern border, 1,540 feet. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the whole of the parish of Tipperkevin, with a pop. of 744, the whole of the parish of Ballymore-Eustace, with a pop. of 2,129, and the whole of the parish of Ballybought, with a pop. of 265, from the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, to the barony of South Naas, co. Kildare; the townlands of Lower Dunlavin, Knocknagall, Knockardart, Lagatryna, Lower Loughmogue, Upper Loughmogue, Milltown, Rathbawn, Upper Tornant, and Lower Tornant, in the parish of Dunlavin, with a pop. of 711, the townlands of Ballycora and Rathtoole, in the parish of Rathtoole, with a pop. of 170, and the townlands of Tobber demesne and Lower Tobber, in the parish of Tobber, with a pop. of 97, from the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, to the barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow;—and the Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96, transferred the whole of the parish of Palmers-town, with a pop. of 1,411, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the townlands of Coldeut and Rollagh, in the parish of Esker, with a pop. of 19, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the whole of the parish of Ballyfermot, with a pop. of 346, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the townlands of Butcher's Arms, part of Dolphin's Barn, East Inchicore, West Inchicore, parts of East Golden-Bridge and West Golden-Bridge, Kilmanham, and part of the village of Island-Bridge, in the parish of St. James, with a pop. of 3,133, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the whole of the parish of Crumlin, with a pop. of 1,024, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the whole of the parish of Cruagh, with a pop. of 979, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the townland of Scholarstown, in the parish of Rathfarnham, with a pop. of 73, from the barony of Newcastle to that of Uppercross; the whole of the parishes of Kilmahudrick, Kilbride, and Rathcoole, with a pop. of 1,596, from the barony of Uppercross to that of Newcastle; the townland of Blundelstown, in the parish of Clondalkin, with a pop. of 15, from the barony of Uppercross to that of Newcastle; a portion of the parish of St. Catherine, with a pop. of 879, from the quondam barony of Donore to the barony of Uppercross; a portion of the parish of St.

Nicholas-Without, with a pop. of 244, from the barony of Upperross to the city of Dublin; a portion of the parish of St. Peter, with a pop. of 2,934, from the barony of Upperross to the city of Dublin; the whole of the parish of Dalkey, with a pop. of 1,449, from the barony of Uppercross to that of Rathdown; and the townlands of Rathmichael and Shankhill, in the parish of Rathmichael, with a pop. of 778, from the barony of Uppercross to that of Rathdown. Pop. of the old or quoniam barony of Uppercross, in 1831, 23,146. Houses 3,492. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,703; in manufactures and trade, 874; in other pursuits, 1,372. This barony—the old one, or rather the scattered territory which constituted it—is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Baltinglass, Celbridge, South Dublin, Naas, and Rathdrum. The total number of tenements valued is 4,349; and of these, 1,728 are valued under £5,—627, under £10,—354, under £15,—203, under £20,—248, under £25,—158, under £30,—377, under £40,—185, under £50,—and 469, at and above £50.—The new or present barony of Uppercross contains part of the parishes of Clondalkin, Donnybrook, Esker, Rathfarnham, St. Catherine's, St. James', St. Nicholas-Without, and St. Peter's; and the whole of the parishes of Ballyfermot, Cruagh, Crumlin, Drimmagh, Palmerstown, and Tullaght. The towns and chief villages are Clondalkin, Crumlin, Palmerstown, Kilmasham, Golden-Bridge, West Baginbrough, Kilswood, Milltown, Portobello, North Ranelagh, South Ranelagh, East Rathmines, West Rathmines, South Rathmines, Greenhills, Tallaght, West Haroldscross, East Haroldscross, part of Haroldscross, part of Chapel-Isod, and part of Island-Bridge. Pop., in 1841, 24,415. Houses 3,755. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,066; in manufactures and trade, 1,196; in other pursuits, 1,429. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 472; on the directing of labour, 1,810; on their own manual labour, 2,035; on means not specified, 374. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,169; who could read but not write, 1,669; who could neither read nor write, 3,066. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,134; who could read but not write, 2,569; who could neither read nor write, 3,866.

UPPERTHIRD, a barony of the county of Waterford, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Tipperary; on the north-east, by the county of Kilkenny; on the east, by the barony of Middlethird; on the south, by the barony of Decies-Without-Drum; and on the west, by the barony of Glenahiry. Its length, in the direction of east by south, is 15 miles; its greatest breadth is $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 77,089 acres, 17 perches,—of which 418 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches are tideway of the river Suir, and 506 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are water. The river Suir traces the whole of the boundary with the counties of Tipperary and Kilkenny. Various small lakes lie among the Cummeragh mountains, several of them at a great elevation; and the chief of them, together with their respective superficial altitude above sea-level, are Cummeragh Lough, 1,650 feet,—Crotty's Lough, 396 feet,—and Cronshingane Lough, 1,254 feet. A large portion of the great range of the Cummeragh mountains occupies most of the western and the southern districts, and winds down spurs far into the interior; a large proportion of the remainder of the surface is picturesquely diversified with hills of considerable altitude; and the immediate valley of the Suir is replete with natural beauty, and displays an absolute profusion of sylvan decoration. The principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Clonmel, 1,081 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clonmel, 1,404 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Clonmel, 1,710 feet; a height 4 miles south-east of Clonmel, 1,751 feet; a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clonmel, 2,181 feet; a height 3 miles east by south of Clonmel, 1,225 feet; a height 3 miles east-south-east of Clonmel, 875 feet; a height 4 miles east-south-east of Clonmel, 1,071 feet; Knockanaffrin, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clonmel, 2,478 feet; a height nearly 1 mile south-south-east of Knockanaffrin, 2,028 feet; a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Mothel, 2,504 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Mothel, 908 feet; a height 2 miles south of Carrick-on-Suir, 423 feet; a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Carrick-on-Suir, 614 feet; a height 3 miles west by south of Carrick-on-Suir, 640 feet; a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Carrick-on-Suir, 861 feet; a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Carrick-on-Suir, 818 feet; and a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Carrick-on-Suir, 788 feet. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the whole of the parishes of Monksland and Kilbarrymeal, the townland of Lissahane in the parish of Newcastle, the townlands of Killelton and Breunin in the parish of Stradally, the townlands of Kilmacthomas, Kilmoylan, Scrahan, Shanakill, and Whitestown, in the parish of Rosmere, the townlands of Aughanaglogh, Ballinashilla, East Ballydowane, West Ballydowane, Ballylaneen, North Ballinabanoge, South Ballinabanoge, Ballinarrid, Carrowntassona, Carrig-castle, East Cooltubred, West Cooltubred, East Currahaha, West Currahaha, Fahafelagh, Graiguehouseen, Lissard, Lisnageragh, Seafield, and Templeyoric, in the parish of Ballylaneen, with a pop. of 11,696, from the barony of Upperrthird to that of Decies-Without-Drum.—Pop. of the old barony, in 1831, 27,596. Houses 4,039. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,936; in manufactures and trade, 832; in other pursuits, 930. This barony—or the territory which constituted the old barony—is distributed among the poor-law unions of Carrick-on-Suir, Clonmel, Dunganvan, and Waterford. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of a small portion of the borough of Clonmel, is 3,114; and of these, 1,816 are valued under £5,—337, under £10,—132, under £15,—116, under £20,—78, under £25,—74, under £30,—129, under £40,—89, under £50,—and 343, at and above £50.—The barony of Upperrthird, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Killaloe, Kilmeaden, Kilsheelan, Rosmere, and St. Mary's of Clonmel, and the whole of the parishes of Clonegan, Dysert, Fenagh, Guilcagh, Kilmolraun, Mothel, and Rathgormack. The towns and chief villages are Portlaw, Carrickbeg, Rathgormack, Scronthea, Mothel, and part of Clonmel. Pop., in 1841, 21,970. Houses 3,154. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,502; in manufactures and trade, 852; in other pursuits, 311. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 45; on the directing of labour, 1,171; on their own manual labour, 2,346; on means not specified, 103. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,568; who could read but not write, 1,246; who could neither read nor write, 5,558. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,040; who could read but not write, 1,318; who could neither read nor write, 7,566.

UPPERWOODS, one of the three cantreds into which the large old barony of Upper Ossory was recently divided, in Queen's county, Leinster. See OSSORY (UPPER). It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the barony of Timinehinch; on the east, by the barony of West Maryborough; on the south, by the cantreds or baronies of Clarnmallagh and Claudonagh; and, on the west, by King's county. It is strictly identical in territory with the parish of OFFERLANE: which see. Area, 48,926 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1841, 10,491. Houses 1,670. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,551; in manufactures and trade, 151; in other pursuits, 86. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 34; on the directing of labour, 332; on their own manual labour, 1,407; on means not specified, 15. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,917; who could read but not write, 881; who could neither read nor write, 1,808. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,169; who could read but not write, 1,382; who could neither read nor write, 2,081.—Upperwoods lies partly within the Poor-law union of Abbeyleix, and partly within that of Monntuelliack. The total number of tenements valued is 1,657; and of these, 1,044 are valued under £5,—228, under £10,—104, under £15,—57, under £20,—55, under £25,—28, under £30,—47, under £40,—21, under £50,—and 73, at and above £50.

URÉGARE. See OWREGARE.

URGLIN, or RUTLAND, a parish in the barony of Carlow, 2½ miles east-north-east of the town of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, south by eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,149 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 970; in 1841, 1,004. Houses 158. The surface consists of good land, possesses a large aggregate of embellishment, and is traversed by the road from Carlow to Hacketstown. A stream upon the northern boundary separates the parish from co. Kildare, and flows there upon an elevation of 218 feet above sea-level. One height at the church has an altitude above sea-level of 334 feet; one in the south-eastern district has an altitude of 357 feet; and Knockard, in the northern district, has an altitude of 387 feet. The principal residences are Johnstown-house, Rutland-lodge, Rutland-house, Knockard-house, Thornville-house, Viewmount, Ballinakill-house, and Siou-cottage; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of Graigue-castle, and the site of another castle. A constabulary station is situated at Palatine, adjacent to Knockard. A portion of the extensive demesne of Burton-hall is within the north-east district.—This parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £250. The rectories of Urglin and GRANGEFORTH, and the impropriate curacy of KILLERICK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Urglin. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 3,164. Gross income, £529 15s.; nett, £499 14s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1820, by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 110; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel of Urglin is situated at Benekerry, and has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, it is united to the chapel of Grangeforth, which has also an attendance of 700. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish of Urglin amounted to 172, and the Roman Catholics to 898; the Protestants of the union to 276, and the Roman Catholics to 2,997; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 95 boys and 34 girls; and there was also a daily school in Grangeforth.

URIEL. See LOURH (COUNTY OF).

URLARE, the site of an old abbey, and possibly of an ancient town, in the barony of Costello, co.

Mayo, Connaught. "One of the family of Nangle," says Archiball, "founded a monastery here for Dominican friars, and dedicated it to St. Thomas. This family afterwards took the name of Costello, and became lords of the barony; the followers of St. Dominic seated themselves here in the year 1430, without a license from the Pope; but they obtained one from Eugene IV., who made a grant of the same, by a bull bearing date the 18th March, 1434. Urlare, or, in Irish, Orlare, which signifies an area, is in a retired situation, and was therefore appointed for the general reception of Novices throughout the province of Connaught. We are told, that in ancient times, there was a town here; but at present there is not a vestige of one to be seen, and the ruins of the abbey alone preserve this place from total oblivion. On the dissolution of monasteries, this friary was granted to Lord Dillon."

URLINGFORD, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, on the western border of the barony of Galmoy, and county of Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 1½; area, 3,497 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,492; in 1841, 2,830. Houses 492. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,126; in 1841, 1,088. Houses 196. A large proportion of the surface is boggy and waste land. The highest ground occurs 1 mile north-west of the town, and has an altitude above sea-level of 453 feet. The mail-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Thurles and Cashel, passes across the interior. The principal country residence is Springview-house.—This parish is a rectory, and also part of the perpetual curacy of CLOMANTAGH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The rectory is part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Kilkenny. See KILKENNY (COUNTY OF THE CITY OF). Rectorial title composition, £150 1s. 2d. Proportion of stipend paid to the incumbent of Clomantagh, £25. The church is in ruins. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 42, and the Roman Catholics to 2,502; and 3 daily schools—two of which were salaried with jointly £15 a-year from local contributions—had on their books 126 boys and 99 girls. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at the town was salaried with respectively £20 and £19 from the National Board, and had on their books 161 boys and 142 girls.

URLINGFORD, a small market and post town in the parish of Urlingford, barony of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Cashel, ½ a mile from the boundary with Munster, 1½ south-south-west of Johnstown, 7 north-east by north of Littleton, 7½ west by south of Freshford, 8½ north-east by east of Thurles, 9½ south-west of Castle-Durrow, 12½ west-north-west of Kilkenny, 17 north-east by north of Cashel, and 63½ south-west by half-south of Dublin. It consists of one street, and several diverging lanes, and contains a Roman Catholic chapel, two National schools, a dispensary, a bride-well, and a small inn and posting establishment; and adjacent to it are an old castle, a graveyard, and the ruins of the parish-church. The dispensary is within the Kilkenny Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,722; and, in 1830, it expended £129 8s., and administered to 2,000 patients. The bride-well is furnished and kept clean; but it is of small capacity, and fit only for the detention of a drunkard or a rioter, till further examination by the magistrates, or previous to committal to the county gaol. During 1843, the cost of maintaining the bride-well amounted to £9 4s. 7d. for salary to the keeper, and £8 13s. 11d. for subsistence, fuel, and incidents. Fairs are held on July 20, Aug. 15, Sept. 13, Oct. 12, Nov. 14, and Dec. 3 and 22. Courts of quarter-sessions are held in the town. A practicable point of the Dublin and Kilkenny line of railway, as proposed by the Public Commissioners, occurs 13 statute miles distant, at Branna Gate. Area of the town, 67 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,366; in 1841, 1,742. Houses 206. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 154; in manufactures and trade, 132; in other pursuits, 83. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 155; on their own manual labour, 161; on means not specified, 38.

URNEY, a parish partly in the barony of Lower Loughree, but chiefly in that of Upper Loughree, co. Cavan, Ulster. The Upper Loughree section contains the town of CAVAN: which see. The Lower Loughree lies detached from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of the Upper Loughree section, and approaches within $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile of the town of Belturbet. Length of the Upper Loughree section, north-north-westward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,493 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches,—of which 530 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches are in small lakes, and 452 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches are in Lough Oughter. Length of the Lower Loughree section, west-north-westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 440 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches,—of which 72 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,050; in 1841, 6,464. Houses 951. Pop. of the Lower Loughree section, in 1841, 175. Houses 32. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Loughree section, in 1841, 2,540. Houses 397. The surface is exceedingly various in both appearance and quality; and has already been somewhat minutely noticed in our articles upon the town of Cavan, the demesne of Farnham, and Lough Oughter. See CAVAN, FARNHAM, OUGHTER, and KILMORE. Lough Oughter extends along the western boundary of the Upper Loughree section; the river Erne describes all the south-western boundary of the Lower Loughree section; the noble demesne of Farnham, with its superb profusion of wood, water, and park scenery, lies immediately east and south-east of Lough Oughter; the island of Inismurk, in Lough Oughter, lies wholly within the north-western district of the Upper Loughree section; Loughs Swellan, Swan, Luchin, and Carrowfin, contribute their aggregately good features to that section; and the country residences of Swellan-cottage, Fort-lodge, and St. Swithin's-cottage, contribute to extend the luxuries of the Farnham demesne. The road from Cavan to Belturbet, and the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen, pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilmore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £111 3s. 3½d., and the rectorial for £44 12s. 5d.; and the larger portion of the latter, compounded for £38 15s. 4d., is appropriated to the deanery of Kilmore, while the smaller portion, compounded for £6 7s. 1d., is inappropriate in the vicars choral of the cathedrals of Dublin. The vicarages of Urney and ANNAGELIFFE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Urney. Gross income, £509 0s. 2½d.; nett, £522 18s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Belturbet, in the dio. of Kilmore; the sinecure precentorship of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin; and the sinecure precentorship of the cathedral of Elphin; and he is non-resident in Urney. One curate has a salary of £90; and another curate has a salary of £75. Nine townlands are included in the perpetual curacy of DERRYHEEN: which see. Proportion of salary from Urney to the incumbent of Derryheen, £40. The church is situated in Cavan, and was built in 1816, by means of private donations, and of loans from the late Board of First Fruits, the latter amounting to £3,692 6s. 1½d. Sittings 700; attendance 375. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 95; the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by 55; and the Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by 175. The Roman Catholic chapels at Cavan, Coolboyogne, and Stragolla—the last in the parish of Annageliffe—have an attendance of respectively 1,570, 406, and 620; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the district, included within the perpetual curacy of Derryheen, consisted of 202 Churchmen, 3 Presbyterians, and 573 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the remainder of the parish of Urney consisted of 1,690 Churchmen, 97 Presbyterians, 6 Protestant dissenters, and 3,741 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the benefice of Urney, exclusive of the Derryheen district, consisted of 2,183 Churchmen, 101 Presbyterians, 6 Protestant dissenters, and 7,816 Roman Catholics;—2 daily schools at Dredris and Inismore, in the Derryheen district, had on their books 105 boys and 60 girls; a Sunday school at Farnham was supported by Lord Farnham, and had on its books 53 boys and 53 girls; 14 daily schools in the parish of Urney, exclusive of the Derryheen district, had on their books 389 boys and 260 girls; and 21 daily schools in the union of Urney had on their books 672 boys and 401 girls. The school at Dredris was salaried with £10 a-year and other advantages from Lord Farnham; that at Inismore was connected with the Kildare Place Society; one at Cavan was a royal endowed school, supported by £300 a-year from the Board of Education, and fees of from £8 8s. to £35 14s. from the pupils; another at Cavan was a school for girls, supported by fees of from £12 12s. to £35 14s. from the pupils; another was salaried with £50 a-year and other advantages from Lord Farnham; one at Farnham, with £36 18s. 6d. and other advantages from Lord Farnham; one at Coolboyogne, with £14 from the National Board; one in Cavangool, with £20 Irish, from the county; and three in Annageliffe were partially supported by endowment or subscription.

URNEY, a parish, partly in the barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, but chiefly in the barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. The Tyrone section contains the village of CLADY, and a small part of the town of STRABANE: see these articles. Length of the Donegal section, northward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,204 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches,—of which, 32 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches are water. Length of the Tyrone section, in the direction of north by east, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 9,284 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches,—of which 99 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 7,190, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 7,277; in 1841, 7,662. Houses 1,263. Pop. of the Donegal section, in 1831, 2,630; in 1841, 2,102. Houses 373. Pop. of the rural districts of the Strabane section, in 1831, 4,289; in 1841, 4,751. Houses 760. The surface consists variously of meadow, arable, demesne, pasture, and mountainous land; and, in an aggregate view, it presents a very diversified appearance, possesses great beauty, and makes a large contribution to the brilliant scenery which environs the town of Strabane. The Donegal section approaches to within a few perches of the town of Castle-Finn; it is partly traversed across its north-east wing, and partly bounded on both the north and the east, by the river Finn; and it possesses a charming portion of the valley of that river, and has in the south an eminence of the name of Fearn, whose summit rises to the height of 753 feet above the level of the sea. The Tyrone section is partly bounded, on the west, by the river Finn, and bounded along most of the east and the north by the river Mourne; it boasts the possession of a superb portion of the exquisitely scenic valley of the latter river: it contains the rich and charming peninsula between the Finn and the Mourne down to the immediate vicinity of Lifford bridge, where they unite to constitute the Foyle; and it is embellished with numerous mansions and villas, — among others, Urney-park, Melmount, Beechmount, Castletown-house, Glenquinan-hill, and Gallaun-house. The valley of the Finn along the mutual border of the two sections, and across the head of the Donegal section, is popularly designated the vale of Urney, displays a beautiful, fertile, and highly cultivated appearance, and is traversed by the road from Strabane to Stranorlar. Castle-Finn, and Glenties. A feature of great interest in the eastern verge of the parish is the large manufacturing establishment of STON-MILLS: which see.— This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £700; glebe, £369. Gross income, £1,069; nett, £1,020 10s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. Each of two curates receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 290; attendance, from 250 to 320. The Presbyterian meeting-house which formerly belonged to the Synod of Ulster has an attendance of 230. The Presbyterian meeting-house which formerly belonged to the Secession Synod has an attendance of from 100 to 150. The Roman Catholic chapels at Donaloope and Ballycoleman have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and from 480 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Derg. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 1,136 Churchmen, 1,670 Presbyterians, and 4,060 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools at Urney, and 3 at Sion, Tullywhisker, and Highalt, were usually attended by about 233 scholars; and 3 daily schools at Urney, and 5 at Sion, Tullywhisker, Highalt, Clady, and Ballycoleman, had on their books 344 boys and 271 girls. One of the daily schools at Urney was supported wholly by the rector's family; another at Urney with £15 a-year from the rector; the third at Urney was in connection with the Kildare Place Society; that at Sion was salaried with £5 a-year from the Marquis of Abercorn and £1 from the rector; that at Tullywhisker, with £10 Irish from the Marquis of Abercorn; and that at Ballycoleman was held in the Roman Catholic chapel. In 1843, one National school at Highalt was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 75 boys and 66 girls; another at Highalt, with £12 10s. from the Board, and had 82 boys and 68 girls; and one at Rahstown, with £15, and had 93 boys and 70 girls.

URRAN (THE), a rivulet of the western district of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It rises among the south-eastern skirts of Mount-Leinster, receives various early affluents from the Blackstairs, and flows about 11 miles south-eastward, chiefly through the large parish of Templeshambo, and on the boundary between the baronies of Scarawalsh and Bantry, to a confluence with the Slaney at a point about 4 or 5 furlongs below Enniscorthy. The middle and the lower portions of the rivulet's valley display considerable beauty, and possess the wood of Killoughrim, the village of Forge, the distillery and flour-mills of Fairfield, and the mansions of Killoughrim-house, I Daphne-house, Verona-house, Monart-house, Urrin-fort-house, Kiltrea-house, Woodbrook, Duffry-hall, Coolycarney-cottage, and Willmount-house.

URRISBEG. See ROUNDSTONE.

USE MOUNTAINS, a small mountainous range on the northern border of the barony of Dubhallow, and county of Cork, Munster. It extends about 4½ miles in length, approaches within about 1½ mile of the town of Newmarket, and flanks the west side of the vale or glen of the rivulet Allua; but, in a large sense, it is only a compartment of the vast congeries of uplands lying around the junction-point of the counties of Cork, Limerick, and Kerry, and it is prolonged east-south-eastward by connecting hills to the vicinity of Mallow.

USHNAGH, a hill in the parish of Conry, barony of Rathconrath, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is situated 3¼ miles east of the village of Ballymore, and 5 miles west of Lough Ennel; it forms a remarkable feature in the midst of a great tract of flat and fertile country; and its summit has an altitude of 602 feet above the level of the sea, and commands an extensive panoramic view of the rich plain of Westmeath. At the base of the hill is Charleville-house, the seat of Mr. Kelly.

USKE, a parish, 3½ miles north-east by north of Ballytore, and on the eastern border of the barony of East Narragh and Rheban and of the county of Kildare, Leinster. Length, westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,763 acres, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 914; in 1841, 1,035. Houses 181. The surface comprises some bog, and consists, in a general view, of middle-rate land. One height in the north has an altitude above sea-level of 489 feet; and one in the west has an altitude of 726 feet. The northern district contains a graveyard and the ruins of a castle. The western wing is traversed by the road from Ballytore to Kileullen-Bridge.— This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNLAVERN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £77 1s. 7d.; glebe, £11. In 1831, all the parishioners excepting 2 were Roman Catholics; and, in 1834, a pay daily school had on its books 36 boys and 27 girls.

USKEANE, a parish in the barony of Lower Ormond, 2 miles north-east of Borris-o'-kane, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 7,656 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 9 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,459; in 1841, 1,875. Houses 332. The surface is a rich and ornate portion of the gorgeous plain of Ormond; and is traversed by the roads from Borris-o'-kane to Birr, from Nenagh to Ferbane, and from Nenagh and Borris-o'-kane to Portlanna, and impinged upon in the east by the road from Limerick and Nenagh to Birr. The principal residences are Uskeane-house, Sopwell-hall, Castle-Sheppard-house, Ballylina-house, Killavalla-house, and Coorevine-house; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of a church and of Drumanagh-castle.— This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINGARRY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £103 17s. 6d., and the rectorial for £162 5s.; and the latter are inappropriate in Marmion Thompson, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 72, and the Roman Catholics to 1,463; a National school had on its books 100 boys and 47 girls; and a hedge-school had 11 boys and 3 girls.

USNAGH. See USHAGH.

VALENCIA, VALENTIA, or KILMORE, an insular parish in the barony of Iveragh, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, in the direction of south-west by west, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 6,371 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,614; in 1841, 2,920. Houses 524. The island is washed on only the south-west side by the Atlantic, and is bounded, on the ends and along the south-east side, by a strait of from $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile to $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in width; and in consequence of its peculiar position, and of the loftiness and great diversity of the land both on its own surface and round the shores of its surrounding strait, it looks to the eye, except on a close view, to be part of the mainland, and, in a general estimate of the coast-line of the county, cannot without difficulty be treated as an island. The strait which bounds its ends and its south-east side is widest on the north and north-east, makes a brief expansion about the middle of the east, and contracts to its minimum width at a point about 3 furlongs before bursting upon the ocean on the south. This great land-locked natural harbour is the most westerly port in Europe. Its geographical position, according to the Admiralty chart, is $51^{\circ} 55' 25''$ N. lat.; and $10^{\circ} 16' 34''$ W. long. Its distance from London, by Bristol and Cork, is 472 miles; from Bristol, 352; from Liverpool, by Dublin, 345; from Glasgow, by Belfast and Dublin, 441; from Dublin, 207; from Fayal, 1,111; from Halifax, by Cape Race, 2,470. It now attracts public attention as a proposed chief rendezvous for ships sailing between Great Britain and America, and terminus of a line of railway to connect that rendezvous with Dublin, Liverpool and other ports, and as the terminus of a proposed railway to Waterford and Wexford, to connect the Welsh railways with the south of Ireland, and to open a direct communication from London, by way of Bristol and Fishguard, to the nearest and most convenient port for all traffic across the Atlantic ocean. Valentia Harbour appears to have been preferred by most speculators to Berehaven, Galway bay, Broadhaven, or any of the other proposed places of rendezvous and terminus; yet Berehaven was preferred, and alone surveyed for, by the Public Railway Commissioners. The route of the line of railway now (in 1845) proposed to be made to Valentia, defects from the projected Waterford, Wexford, Limerick, and Cork railway at Charleville, and proceeds through Drumcolliher, Newmarket, Castle-Island, Killarney, Castlemain, Milltown, and Killorglin, to Cahirciveen. The north or mainland side of the northern and chief entrance of Valentia Harbour is screened by the bold cape of Doulus Head, immediately overhung by Kilkaue mountain; and the north or mainland shore of the harbour, a little east of Doulus Head, consists first of bluff ground, and next of softly-featured land, both overlooked by hill-summits which command a most imposing view of the neighbouring alpine coasts, the stern, savage, and stupendous sea-rocks of the Skelligs, and the tremendous surges and mountain-billows of the Atlantic. The comparatively broad part of the strait on the north, continues about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the east of Doulus Head, bears the name of Lough Kay, and possesses an island of rather more than a mile in length, called Innisbeg, and an islet called Church

Island. The division of the strait between Innisbeg and Valentia Island forms the principal entrance to the inner harbour; the landmark for commanding it is the church of Valentia, south half east, midway between Cromwell's fort on the north end of Valentia Island and Innisbeg; and the mark for clearing a rock which encumbers the channel is Doulus Head shut behind Innisbeg. The northern Cromwell's fort—for there is one also on the south end of the island—is situated on a tiny headland of Valentia, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south by half west of Doulus Head; and here was opened on Feb. 1, 1841, a lighthouse, with a beacon fixed and white. The cost of maintaining the lighthouse during the year 1843 was £604 14s. 2d. The soundings in Lough Kay vary from 2 to 20 fathoms; but the minimum depths occur only near the eastern part of the north shore. A cove or small bay indents the coast of Valentia Island immediately east of the promontory of Cromwell's fort and opposite the middle of Innisbeg; and on the shore of this cove is a coast-guard station. The estuary of the Fartin or Cahirciveen rivulet, often here called the Valentia river, comes down south-westward upon the east end of Lough Kay, with a length of about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and a mean breadth of nearly 3 furlongs; but it is partly dry at low water, and has a mean depth at even the lower part of only about 2 fathoms. Opposite the mouth of this estuary, and behind the south-east shore of Innisbeg, with good depth, and in an entirely land-locked position, occurs one of the best anchoring-grounds of Valentia Harbour. Immediately south-east of this, and at the commencement of the southward sweep of the strait which bounds Valentia Island, occurs a comparative strait, scarcely $\frac{1}{2}$ mile across, with Rinard Point and the ferry-house on its mainland side, and the pier of Valentia on its insular side. The pier was constructed at the cost of £960 5s., of which £705 were granted by government, £114 by the Dublin Committee, and £141 5s. by the Knight of Kerry; it was preceded by a small fishery pier, and has, since its construction, been extended into deeper water; and it is of great service at once for the shipment of the slate produce of the island, the encouragement of the fisheries, the accommodation of vessels bringing imports from Liverpool, and the protection of ships running for shelter from the violence of the Atlantic. A boat-slip on the mainland shore opposite the pier, is very desirable both as a landing-place for the ferry-boats and as a place of resort for the venders and carriers of fish, and might be constructed at the cost of about £200. An expansion of the strait occurs south-east and south of the pier to the width of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; and forms a noble anchoring-ground in a depth of about $3\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms. South of this expansion is Ringlass Point; and thence to the ocean, the sound curves from south round to west, without any remarkable feature, and with nearly a uniform depth. The southern entrance is overhung on both sides by stupendous and towering ranges of acclivitous heights, whose seaward bases are pierced with caverns, formed by the powerful working of the billows; and the precipices and steep escarpments are tenanted by myriads of cormorants, gannets, gulls, and other sea-fowl.

The south-western coasts of Valentia Island, or those which confront the Atlantic, are of stern and imposing character; and they possess, as very noble vantage-grounds for viewing the sublime storm-scenes of the Atlantic, the summits of Bray Head, Fohilly-Cliffs, Corrabeg Hill, and Corramore Hill. Bray Head forms the south-western extremity of the island, projects about a mile beyond the south screen of the southern entrance of the harbour, flings sheer down to the ocean cliffs of 628 feet in altitude, and is one of the boldest and most striking of the many sublime pronatories of Kerry. The cliffs of Fohilly screen nearly the north-western extremity of the island, are separated from the entrance of Lough Kay by Rinnadrolan Point, and soar vertically aloft to the imposing elevation of 886 feet. A noble cave, 70 feet high, and of great depth, occurs on the shore of Lough Kay. "Several days," remarks Mr. Fraser, "may be passed in the island with great interest by the tourist in search of wild coast scenery. At Valentia too, the Atlantic may be seen in all its grandeur; the waves are of a size and volume almost incredible to those who have not witnessed the ocean in such favourable situations. A walk round Douglas Head to Cunnenna bay, combines the grandest features of ocean and mountain scenery, with the most beautiful detail of picturesque rocks, ferns, &c. The northern or principal entrance to Valentia Harbour, between Beg-Innis and Cromwell's Fort, is very fine. Valentia is the best point of departure for visiting the Skellig Rocks. You hire a boat and row down to the south-western entrance, between Bray Head and Port Magee,—six miles from the inn,—from this point it is ten miles to the Great Skellig; on opening the bay, Puffin Head, a large mass of cliffy rock, several hundred feet high, displays its grotesque form." See SKELLIGS.

Valentia was pronounced by Dr. Smith "a fertile tract, and esteemed the granary of the country;" and, though no such paradise as this description would seem to indicate, and even encumbered with a considerable extent of waste or merely pastoral upland, it comprises a large aggregate of arable land, fertile in soil, improved in character, and tolerably creditable in cultivation. "A great part of it," says Mr. Inglis, "is under tillage; and there is a considerable range of pasture. The houses of the tenants I found of a superior description; but their internal comforts scarcely corresponded, for land is high let. Nearly all, if not all the island, belongs to the Knight of Kerry, who is much respected in this neighbourhood, and who has done considerable service to the place—not so much by outlay of money as by example, in various modes of improvement. The slate quarry on the island is extensive and valuable, and is at present in the Knight of Kerry's own hands, and is worked for export. It is used for flagging, for fish-slabs, and for many purposes to which marble has been usually applied, and finds a ready market in England. Several good houses are scattered over Valentia Island, besides those of the farmers. The house of the Knight is situated near to the sea, on an eminence, on the east side of the island, and near to a little glen and small rivulet." The produce of the Valentia quarry is roofing slate and flagging,—the latter of a superior description, not only as regards size and appearance, but particularly as regards strength; and the estimated annual value of this produce amounted, about 7 years ago, to £1,800 for flags, and £350 for slates. "This quarry," says an official report in 1838, "has been worked a little, and the marble has turned out very good. The working of this quarry has been carried on for the last 5 years by the Knight of Kerry. It has been open as a slate quarry for the last 20 years, but it is only within the last three or four years that it has combined the manufacturing of roofing slate for the home market, with the production of flagging for export to London. The flagging is bought at Valentia by a London stone merchant, who conveys it thither at a freight of 15s. per ton of round tonnage; and it is expected that its consumption will be limited only by the power of production. The slate is conveyed away, as fast as it can be manufactured, by small coasters, to Dingle, Castlemaine, Tralee, Kenmare, Ballylongford, Kilrush, Askerton, &c., at freights of 4s., 5s., 6s., 7s., to 9s. respectively. It is stated that the demand for slate has very much increased within a short period, and that the sale of this article would be six times greater if the production increased." The hamlet of Valentia is situated near the north-eastern extremity of the island, in the vicinity of the pier; and at this hamlet or in its neighbourhood, are the church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a schoolhouse, a glebe-house, and a neat and very comfortable small inn. The principal residences upon the island are Glanleem, the lodge of the Knight of Kerry; Coarhubeg, the seat of Mr. Spotswood; and Ballymanagh. The chief trade of the island, additional to the quarrying and export of its slates and flags, consists in the conducting of somewhat extensive fisheries, in the exporting of corn and butter, and in the importing, chiefly from Liverpool, of iron, coals, and timber. The fishing craft belonging to the island, in 1836, consisted of 4 half-decked vessels, worked by 24 men, and 40 open sail-boats, worked by 240 men.

The Spaniards occupied the island and harbour of Valentia up to the period of the English Commonwealth; but the lieutenants of Oliver Cromwell expelled them, and erected two forts at respectively the north entrance and the south entrance of the harbour, to put an end to the privateering enterprises for which it had been used. "The island of Valentia," says Dr. Smith, "forms one side of a fine harbour, the sea running between it and the main, like a river, which is in most places about half-a-mile broad, and of a sufficient depth for vessels to sail through at any time of the tide. Oliver Cromwell had forts erected upon both ends of this island, which have been neglected since his time. Vessels may enter into the harbour at either end, and sail quite round the island. It was in Queen Anne's wars much frequented by French privateers, who, by keeping a watch on the island, lay very secure, for if any ship of war came to this place, the sentinel gave notice to what end of the harbour she directed her course, and then the privateer sailed directly out at the other, and thereby escaped; for which reason a small fort or block-house seems to be as necessary here at present, as in the Protector's days. This island is a fertile tract, and esteemed the granary of the country. It belonged mostly to the family of Amesley, but was lately purchased by the present Earl of Shelburne, and gives title of Viscount to the Right Honourable Richard, Earl of Anglesey, whose ancestor, Sir Francis Amesley, was created Viscount Valentia, March 11, 1621-2, the 19th of James I., in reversion after the decease of Sir Henry Power of Bersham, in Denbighshire, constable of the castle of Maryborough, Knight-marshal of Ireland, governor of Leix, and privy counsellor, who was created Viscount Valentia, March 1, 1620, the 18th of James I., of whom some account may be seen in Morison's History of Ireland. It also gave title of Viscount to Donahil Mac-Carty-More."

Valentia parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfer and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £150; glebe, £50. Gross income, £200; nett, £181 8s. 9d. Patron, the Crown. The church is of unknown date and cost; and was repaired in 1815, by means of the loan of £184 12s. 3d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60; attendance, from 30 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 93, and the Roman Catholics to 2,703; and 2 daily schools—one of which was supported by the rector and by the Knight of Kerry—had on their books 188 boys and 63 girls. In 1843, there were in the island two National schools,—the one for males, and the other for females.

VALLEY-OF-THE-WINDS, a wild and imposing ravine, on the southern margin of the barony of Trughenackmy, 5 miles south-west of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated between the mountains of Mangerton and Croghane; extends in the direction of north by west, to the shore of Lough Kittane or Guttane; and is traversed by the rivulet which furnishes that lake's principal supply.

VALLIS-SALUTIS, the part of the valley of the Slaney, which adjoins the town of Balinglass, parish of Balinglass, barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. An old castle, situated in this rich section of valley, on the northern outskirts of the town, is supposed to have been the meeting-place of several parliaments which are recorded to have assembled at Balinglass. An old abbey, some vestiges of which remain in the vicinity of the castle, probably gave rise in monkish times to the name of Vallis Salutis; and yet, in ecclesiastical record, it takes that name as its own descriptive designation. "The abbey of the Vallis Salutis," says the author of the Guide to Wicklow, on the authority of Lenigan and Ware, "was founded, according to the annals of Mary's Abbey, in 1151, for Monks of the Cistercian order, by Diarmid MacMurrough O'Cavanagh, King of Leinster, who was buried here."

VARTREY (THE), a rivulet of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It rises on the south side of Douce mountain, at an elevation of upwards of 1,630 feet above sea-level; and flows about 3 miles south-eastward, through the parish of Calary,—5 south-eastward along the boundary between the baronies of Newcastle and North Ballinacor,—and 5 east-south-eastward, through the parishes of Killiskey and Rathnew, to the head of the long estuarial belt of water which bounds the west side of the low peninsulated tract of land called the Murrough. Its current, over the earlier parts of its course, is rapid; and its whole volume, near the point of its leaving the boundary between Newcastle and North Ballinacor, is precipitated over a lofty mass of rock so as to form a waterfall of about 100 feet in descent. The path of the stream, for some distance below the waterfall, is through the wildly picturesque defile called the DEVIL'S GLEN [which see]; and its course, after emerging from that defile, passes along one of the most delightful and most richly ornamented vales in the county. On or near the stream, below the foot of the Devil's Glen, are Glenmore-castle, Montalto-house, Inchanappa-house, Rosanna-house, Tinakelly-house, and the charmingly situated inn of Nevraeth-bridge. The Vartrey is an excellent trout stream; and, after passing Nevraeth-bridge, it takes the name of the Leitrim river. See ROANNA, NEVRATH, and LEITRIM.

VEAGH, or BEAGH, a glen and a lake in the parish of Gartan, barony of Kilmacrenan, about 10 miles north-west by west of Letterkeeny, co. Donegal, Ulster. The glen is usually called Glenveagh; and forms a continuation of Glendowan on the south, while it itself is continued by the mountain-vale called emphatically the Glen on the north. The mountain of Dooish, one of the most remarkable summits of the Derryneagh chain of mountains, rises steeply up from the middle of the west side of the glen and the lake, and attains an altitude of 2,143 feet above the level of the sea; and a low range of moorland hills, forming part of the Glendowan range of mountains, screens the glen and the lake along the east. The lake is both the wildest and the most picturesque of the lakes of Donegal; and can bear comparison with various mountain lakes of much celebrity in other countries. It extends 3 miles north-eastward, with a mean width of between 2 and 3 furlongs; it has a surface-elevation of 140 feet above the level of the sea; and, notwithstanding its very limited width, it occupies the entire breadth of the lower part of the glen. "We proceeded to Glen-veagh," said the Rev. Cesar Otway, "and at length reached it after a very deep descent. We were delighted with the beautiful water, winding far between immense mountains, and apparently without end, losing itself in gloom and solitariness amidst the distant gorges and defiles of the hills. On the right hand side of the lake, the mountain rises like a steep wall out of the water, lofty and precipitous, for a thousand feet; and this cliff is the secure eyrie of the eagle and jervalcon. On the other side, the shore was lofty also and mountainous, but still there was room for the oak and the birch, the rowan and alder, to strike their roots amidst the rocks, and clothe the ravines and hollows with ornamental copse-wood. The lake was studded with wet woody islands, out of which rose perpendicular columns of smoke, which told full well, that in this solitary secluded spot, the illicit distiller was at his tempting and hazardous work." In Ballinagore Wood, on the east side of the glen, a considerable quantity of yew, the remnant of a natural forest, is still growing. Mr. Foster of Ballinure, near Clones, has built a small lodge in Glen-veagh, made a road hither from Glendowan, planted part of the shores of the lake, and stocked the green hill-screens of the glen with flocks of sheep and cattle of the Argyleshire breeds.

VEAGH, or BEAGH (SOUTH). See GARTAN.

VENTRY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Corkaguiney, 3½ miles west-south-west of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 4,439 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,596; in 1841, 2,426. Houses 397. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,236. Houses 368. The surface lies on the south side of the Corkaguiney peninsula, between the parishes of Dingle and Douquin; it comprises part of Mount-Eagle, which overhangs the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay; its shore is deeply and sweepingly indented with Ventry Harbour; and its interior contains some tillage land of a fair quality, but consists, for the most part, of dismal bogs and wild mountains. Ventry Harbour opens 4 miles east by north of the south-westward spur of Mount-Eagle, at the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay; it has a width across the entrance of 1½ mile; it penetrates the land 2 miles north-north-westward, with a mean width of about 1½ mile; it possesses no sunken rocks or other dangers to navigation; and it offers good anchoring-ground to vessels, and fair shelter from all winds except those from the east and the south-east. "The harbour of Ventry," writes Dr. Smith, "is divided from that of Dingle by a narrow isthmus. The western point is called Cahir Traut, where there is an old Danish intrenchment, and another at Rathnane, a ruined castle belonging to the Knight of Kerry. The Irish have a tradition that this isthmus was the last ground in Ireland that was possessed by the Danes, which might have easily been defended by a handful of men, who were also masters at sea, against a multitude. There is another isthmus between the bottoms of Smerwick harbour and Ventry, as may be seen by the map; but this hath a greater breadth than that between Ventry and Dingle,—this last being two miles over, and that not one; but a great part of it being bog and mountain, might be easily defended, especially by a chain of forts within call of each other, which the Danes had between Rathanaue and Gallerus, of which the remains may still be seen.”—“It is not improbable,” continues he, “that this tradition was founded on the account given by Hammer (in his Chronicle, pp. 24, 25, for which he cites the book of Hoath), of a great battle fought at Ventry between the Irish and Danes about the time of Constantine the Great; the occasion of which battle, according to the said author, was as follows:—‘There were at this period several persons kept in pay not only to defend the kingdom, but also, it seems, to travel into distant countries, where they fought several combats, and brought a yearly tribute to their country; which latter part, the excursions of the Irish, then called Scots, into Britain, in some sort reconciles. These champions, he says, were so much envied for their exploits, that several foreigners joined to invade Ireland in different places at once; some landed in the north part of the kingdom, and were repulsed with great slaughter by Conkedagh, one of the petty kings of Ulster. A second party that landed at Skerries, was defeated at a place called Knocknegan—that is, the hill of dead men’s heads—by Dermot, King of Leinster. The third company of these invaders came to Ventry (Hammer calls it Fintry), that is, the White strand, where the Irish, being assembled from all parts, prevented their landing for seven days, which occasioned the slaughter of so many people, that the sea-shore was coloured red with the blood of the slain. At length one Gillymore, prince of Thomond, being disgusted, because he was ordered from the front of the battle to the rear, revolted to the enemy, and gave them notice of a proper place that was left unguarded, to land their forces, which they did accordingly, and set fire to their fleet. The place where they landed was easily defended, being an isthmus, where they refreshed their men for ten days, without the Irish being able to annoy them; during which time Gillymore headed them in several attacks against his own countrymen. One day (says the legend), Gillymore having washed his hands in some water, which he had discoloured with the blood of the natives, and soon after calling for a cup of wine, he was answered that there stood a bowl of that liquor upon the table. He having, it seems, mistaken the bowl he had washed in for that of the wine, drank it up; upon which a foreigner asked what kind of fellow he was, who like a brute had drank up his own blood. Gillymore, upon hearing this, took it so much to heart, that the next night he departed secretly, submitted to his father, and gave him a particular account of the weakness of the invaders; which turned out so much to their disadvantage, in several succeeding skirmishes, that they were all at last overthrown with great slaughter.’ According to the same author, the Irish were assisted in this affair by the Danes, who were long settled in Ireland, and by the sept or clan of Fin Mac-Coyle and Fin Erin. Saxo-Grannaticus, who wrote the history of the Danes, says, that Fin and the Finni were a great people in that country, hardy, tall, and given to plunder, and the name of Erin was of the royal blood amongst them, and that Fin Erin was a great commander, who brought many Danes into Ireland; from whence, Hammer conjectures, this kingdom might have formerly received the name of Erin.” The village of Ventry stands at the head of Ventry Harbour. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 190.

Houses 29. In the vicinity of the village are several bathing lodges. Ventry has a coast-guard station; and, in 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within the district of this station, 33 row-boats and 231 men. Thomas Moleyns, Esq., who is said to have a common ancestry with the family of Molyneux, Earls of Sefton, was created a baronet in 1797, and afterwards elevated to the peerage by the title of Baron Ventry. The present Lord Ventry was born in 1786, and succeeded to the title in 1827. The family mansion is Burnham-house, a tall square house on the peninsula between the harbours of Ventry and Dingle, without a single tree on its lawn to relieve the bleakness of the landscape.—Ventry parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardferit and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £120; glebe, £1 10s. Gross income, £121 10s.; nett, £114 18s. 6d. Patron, the representatives of the Rev. John Crosbie. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Mungret, in the dio. of Limerick, and is non-resident in Ventry. A curate receives a salary of £11 1s. 6d. There is no church; but a room at the coast-guard station is used as a sort of parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dingle. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 2,748; and a hedge-school had on its books 17 boys and 6 girls.

VICAR’S CAIRN, a mountain on the western border of the parish of Killooney, barony of Lower Fews, 3 miles west of Markethill, co. Armagh, Ulster. It is a conspicuous and remarkable object; and its summit has an altitude of 814 feet above sea-level, and commands a brilliant and extensive view of the beautifully undulated surrounding country.

VICARSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Moyanna, barony of Stradbally, Queen’s county, Leinster. It stands on the Athy branch of the Grand Canal, 3½ miles north-east of the town of Stradbally. It contains a constabulary barrack; and in its vicinity are Vicarstown-house, a graveyard, and the site of Kyleneahoe church. Pop., in 1831, 77. Houses 14.

VIEWMOUNT, a demesne on the mutual border of the parishes of Carlow, Clonmelsh, and Urglin, barony of Carlow, 2 miles east of the town of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. The mansion, as is indicated by its name, commands a noble prospect of the surrounding country. Sir Edward Crosbie, Bart., who fell a victim to suspicion and misconstruction during the rebellion of 1798, and whose fate subsequently became a matter of lamentation to all parties, resided amid general respect at Viewmount; and during the attack of the rebels upon Carlow, a column of their army assembled in the demesne of Viewmount, and were the most resolute party in conducting the assault upon that town. “After the defeat,” says Gordon, “executions commenced, as elsewhere, in this calamitous period, and about 200 were in a short time put to death by martial law. Among the earliest victims was Sir Edward Crosbie, a gentleman highly accomplished, and sincerely beloved and esteemed by men of cultivated minds for his humanity and other amiable qualities; but offensive to some by frequently expressing his pity for the poor peasantry of Ireland, oppressed by enormous rents. As his sentiments were in favour of a reform in parliament, he had been on no other grounds denounced by his enemies as a republican. His misfortune, in the present case, consisted in his having been surrounded by the rebels before he had notice of the insurrection, and thereby prevented from escaping to Carlow. Yet even such escape might not have served him in this perturbed state of things, as he might have been denounced to a licentious soldiery and assassinated, or have undergone the same kind of trial and execution which he afterwards suffered. In the trial of this baronet, Protestant loyalists, witnesses in favour of the accused, were forcibly prevented by the bayonets of the military from entering the court. Catholic prisoners had been tortured by repeated doggings to force them to give evidence against him, and appeared to have been promised their lives upon no other condition than that of his condemnation. Notwithstanding these and other violent measures, no charge was proved; of which the members of the court-martial, who sentenced him to death, were so sensible, that, in defiance of an act of parliament, the register of the proceedings was withheld as a secret from his wife and family. The court was irregularly constituted and illegal, destitute of a judge-advocate. The execution of the sentence was precipitate, at an unusual hour, and attended with atrocious circumstances not warranted even by the sentence. After he was hanged, his body was abused, his head severed from it, and exposed on a spike. These proceedings, which reflect indelible disgrace on the persons concerned, are detailed in a pamphlet styled 'A Narrative of the Apprehension, Trial, and Execution of Sir Edward William Crosbie, Baronet.' The president of the court was an illiterate man, unable to write the most common words of English without mis-spelling." One of the largest cromlechs to be seen in Ireland stands in the vicinity of Viewmount, and is described as follows by Mr. Beauford in Grose's Antiquities:—"It consists of an immense rock-stone raised on an edge from its native bed, and supported on the east by three pillars. At a distance is another pillar by itself, nearly round, and five feet high. The dimensions of the supporters and covering stones are as follow: Height of the three supporters, 5 feet 8 inches; thickness of the upper end of the covering stone, 4 feet 6 inches; breadth of the same, 18 feet 9 inches; length of the slope inside, 19 feet; length of the outside, 22 feet 10 inches."

VILLIERSTOWN, a chapelry, containing a village of the same name, in the parish of Aghish, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. The chapel is situated in the village, and was built in 1760, at the sole expense of John, Earl of Grandison. Sittings 400. Salary from patron, £54; glebe, £37 10s. Gross income, £91 10s.; nett, £91 10s. Patron, Henry Villiers Stewart, Esq. of Drogheda. The village stands in the north-east corner of the barony, on the road from Cappoquin to Ardmore, 3 furlongs east of the Blackwater, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south of Cappoquin, and $\frac{9}{16}$ north of Youghal. It is pleasantly situated at the southern skirt of the magnificent demesne of DROMANA [which see]; it has itself an agreeable appearance; it contains the church of the chapelry, a school, a constabulary barrack, and a graveyard; and in its vicinity are Villierstown-house, South Ballingowan-house, Ballinaparka-house, and North Ballingowan-house. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 263; in 1841, 328. Houses 51.

VINEGAR-HILL, a hill of far-spread and most sanguinary fame, in the parish of Templeshannon, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. It rises immediately east of the town of Enniscorthy, and its summit is situated $4\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs east of the Slaney, and has an altitude above sea-level of 389 feet. It consists of quartz; but, unlike the great majority of hills and mountains of that formation, which are remarkable for their nakedness or sterility, it possesses up to the very summit a deep, rich soil, and presents a verdant and fertile appearance. It constitutes a remarkable feature in the district, marks the site of Enniscorthy for many miles around, and commands most interesting views of the town at its base, the broad and luscious valley of the Slaney, the vales of the Urrin, the Boro, and other streams, and the great sweep of diversified champaign country away to the Forth mountains on the south, the vicinity of the sea on the east, the Gorey hills on the north, and the imposing range of the Mount-Leinster and the Blackstairs mountains on the west. The whole of the hill was occupied by a vast body of rebels during about three weeks in 1798; it was the scene of many cold-blooded murders, equalled in atrocity only by the horrors which occurred at Scullabogue and the bridge of Wexford; a windmill, whose ruined walls still exist upon its summit, was kept crowded with prisoners, numbers of whom were led out for occasional massacre; and, during the period of the hill being occupied, it served as both the head-quarters of the rebel army, and the great central scene of the awful tragedy which they performed. The rebels took post on Vinegar-Hill, on the 28th of May, immediately after the sanguinary capture and the burning of ENNISCORTHY [see that article]; and they continued upon it till attacked by the royal army under General Lake, on the 21st of June. "During all that time," says Gordon, "the face of affairs had been hideous beyond description. From the first moment of disturbance, the common people on both sides in this county had rendered the commotion a religious quarrel. But at Enniscorthy, where men of rancorous bigotry and murderous dispositions had gained influence, or acted unrestrained, the spirit of intolerance was chiefly manifested, and was felt on all sides through a space of several miles. Horrors and incessant apprehensions of death attended the hapless Protestants who had not escaped from the devoted ground. They were everywhere seized. A few were assassinated on the spot where they were caught, but most of them dragged to Vinegar-Hill, where, after a sham trial, often without any form of trial, they were shot or transfixed with pikes, many lashed, or otherwise barbarously treated, before the final execution. To state with indubitable accuracy the number butchered in this fatal spot, I cannot pretend. It is believed, on good grounds, to have fallen little, if at all, short of 400. Much greater still would it have been if individual humanity or friendship had not, in many instances, interposed to arrest the hand of murder. Philip Roche saved the lives of many. Even in his distant post at Lachan, he rescued some by sending for them under pretence of accusation and trial, and then dismissing them with protections."

"On the 21st of June, at seven in the morning, a royal force, of at least 13,000 effective men, with a formidable train of artillery, was to commence an attack from all quarters at once, on the great station of Vinegar-Hill, where probably were posted 20,000 of the rebels; but these were almost destitute of ammunition. An onset with pikes, in the night, on one of the surrounding armies, had been strenuously but in vain advised by some chiefs in this multitude, who chose rather to await without a plan the fortune of the day. The town of Enniscorthy was attacked at the stated time by the army from Ross, while showers of bullets and shells were poured against the hill from the artillery. After the expenditure of their scanty ammunition, in a contest of an hour and a half, the insurgents fled toward Wexford, through the space which had been destined for the station of Needham's army. This general, from causes not satisfactorily explained, arrived not at his post till about two hours after the appointed time, when the routed bands had effected their escape. The commonly entertained opinion is, that the chief commander had designedly so managed as to leave this gap for the enemy's retreat. The full execution of the original or ostensible plan might have urged their despair to a dangerous effort. They might have forced their way on some side with slaughter, or sustained a tremendous havoc in the attempt. To oblige the whole multitude to surrender, and thus put an end to the rebellion, was supposed to have been Lake's design; and this would have been certainly far the wisest measure if it had been practicable; but the general might have been with reason apprehensive that his disorderly troops could not be restrained from the massacre of the unfortunate people, when they should once have thrown down their arms. Except in Johnson's army, in which, by the attack of Enniscorthy, the number of killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to 93, the loss of the royal forces was quite inconsiderable; nor was that of the rebels much greater; for though some hundreds were killed who were found straggling from the main body after the battle, these were mostly men who had been reluctantly compelled to follow the rebel host, and had now taken the opportunity of escape; among them were many Protestants, who had been detained in captivity.

VIRGINIA, a small market and post town in the parish of Lurgan, barony of Castleraghan, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the north-east shore of Lough Ramor, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by east of Ballyjuncduff, $5\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Oldcastle, 6 south-west by south of Ballicorough, 7 north-west by west of Moynalty, 9 north-west of Kells, 15 south-east of Cavan, 18 north-west of Navan, and 40 north-west of Dublin. The site of the town is part of the large estate of the Marquis of Headfort, and boasts not a little natural beauty in connexion with Lough Ramor, and a large amount of artificial embellishment in connexion with extensive plantations along the margin of the lake, and in the northern vicinity. The town itself has been the object of much care and liberal encouragement on the part of its noble owner, aided by his agent, the Rev. Robert Sargent; and it, in consequence, presents a comparatively neat, orderly, and cheerful appearance. The church of Lurgan is situated in the town, and is a beautiful small structure, in such an advantageous position, and so beautifully grouped with the enclosed ground which surrounds it, and with the other buildings of the town, as to make a most pleasing contribution to the general character of the landscape. The inn of the town has a posting establishment, is regarded as the best inn on the whole line of the Dublin and Enniskillen mail-road, and draws numerous visitors during summer. A large weekly market is held, and is the scene of very considerable business. Fairs are held on Jan. 24, March 6, May 11, July 9, Aug. 22, Sept. 23, Nov. 21, and Dec. 21; but they are greatly inferior in business importance to the weekly markets. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. The town is touched by the route of the proposed line of railway from Dublin to Enniskillen. The Virginia dispensary is within the Oldcastle Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 29,259 acres, with a pop. of 15,532; and, in 1839-40, it expended £106 11s. 6d., and administered to 1,702 patients. In 1843, the Virginia Loan Fund had a capital of £1,666, circulated £8,172 in 2,337 loans, realized a nett profit of £90 15s., expended £191 1s. 7d. for charitable purposes, and belonged to 23 proprietors. Area of the town, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 930; in 1841, 965. Houses 132. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 54; in manufactures and trade, 80; in other pursuits, 43. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 92; on their own manual labour, 67; on means not specified, 10.

VOGHER, a lake in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It is a small and gloomy sheet of water, situated among the boggy mountains on the south-eastern border of the barony; and, in common with Lough Gara, a lake of kindred character in its vicinity, it sends off its superfluous waters about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward to Lough Curran.

VOWFERRY, a hamlet in the parish of Aghadowey, barony of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It is situated on the eastern verge of the county, and on the left bank of the river Bann, 3 miles north of Kileara; and it derives its name from a ferry across the Bann. Pop. not specially returned.

W

WADDISTOWN, a quondam parish in the barony of Middlethird, 5 miles south-south-east of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. It was a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel.

WALLSCOURT, a ruined old castle or mansion in the parish of Kilrickill, barony of Leitrim, 4 miles north-east by east of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. In 1800, John Henry Blake, Esq., the descendant of a gentleman who, as a soldier of fortune, followed Prince John, afterwards King John, to Ireland, was created Baron Wallscourt of Ardfry, in the peerage of Ireland, with remainder to the heirs-male of his deceased father. The present Baron was born in 1797, and succeeded in 1816. The family-seat is Ardfry-house, in the vicinity of Orammore.

WALLSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, 3 miles east by south of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,056 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,021; in 1841, 950. Houses 148. The surface consists, in a general view, of excellent land; comprises a beautiful and rich portion of the picturesque vale of the river Awbeg; and is traversed by the road from Doneraile to Castletownroche, and by the route of the proposed railway from Dublin to Cork. The principal antiquity is the ruin of Wallstown-castle. The parish of Wallstown, as we have defined it, includes a district ecclesiastically known as Ballygriggan paritice.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £446 18s. 6d.; glebe, £40. Gross income, £486 18s. 6d.; nett, £418 10s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The glebe-house is used as the parochial place of worship, and is capable of accommodating 60 hearers. Attendance, about 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 1,038.

WALSHTOWN, a village in the parish of Templenacarriga, barony of Barrymore, about 5 miles north-north-west of Middleton, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 252. Houses 46.

WALTERSTOWN, a parish in the barony of West Ophaly, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,501 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 238; in 1841, 376. Houses 54. The surface consists, in general, of light soil; and comprises, on the north-east, a part of Maddenstown bog. The road from Kildare to Athy passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NARNEY [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £65 5s. 1d. The church contains 100 sittings, and was quite recently built, by means of a contribution of £792 7s. from the Board of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 290; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

WALTERSTOWN, co. Westmeath. See DRUM-RANEY.

WALWORTH, a demesne in the western vicinity of the village of Ballykelly, and in the parishes of Faughanvale and Tamlaghtfinlagan, and baronies of Tyrkeeran and Kenought, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It is part of the estate of the Fishmongers' Company, and contains the remains of a castle erected by that Company in 1619; but it is at present in the occupation of the Rev. G. V. Sampson.

WARD, a rivulet of the western border of the county of Dublin, Leinster. It flows along the northern boundary of the parish of Ward, and is an affluent of the Swords or Broadmeadow river.

WARD, a parish in the barony of Castleknock, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Finglass, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, north-eastward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,349 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 251; in 1841, 175. Houses 28. The surface lies on the western margin of the county, and is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry. The land is of very good quality. The Ward rivulet, when about the middle of the northern boundary, flows at an elevation of 233 feet above sea-level. The seats are Ward-house, Irishtown-house, Six-mile-house, and Newpark-house; and the chief antiquity is the ruin of the church.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of FINGLASS [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. All the ecclesiastical statistics are returned in cumulo with those of the other chapelries of the benefice.

WARD (HILL or), a ridgy height, in the parish of Athboy, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of the town of Athboy, barony of Lunc, co. Meath, Leinster. It forms a conspicuous feature in the midst of a great extent of flat country; and its summit has an altitude of 390 feet above sea-level, and commands an extensive panoramic view of the surrounding plain.

WARDLESTOWN, a district or denomination of the benefice of Kill, in the county and diocese of Kildare, Leinster. See KILL.

WAR HILL, a mountain in the north-eastern border of the barony of North Ballinacor, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Douce mountain, co. Wicklow, Leinster.

WARINGSTOWN, a small manufacturing and market town, in the parish of Donaghcloney, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Portadown to Dromore with that from Lurgan to Banbridge, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Magheralin, $2\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Lurgan, 4 south-south-west of Moira, 5 north by west of Banbridge, $5\frac{1}{2}$ east of Portadown, $5\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Dromore, and 7 north-north-east of Tanderagee. "This interesting village," said Mr. Atkinson, in 1823, "is known in the western plains of Downshire by its rural beauty, and distinguished in the commercial history of the county, by the respectable and long established cambric manufactory of Messrs. George M'Murray & Son.—Here 70 looms, furnishing employment to 300 hands, are engaged in the production of cambrics, which sell in the brown state (in the English and Irish markets), from two shillings to one guinea per yard, or from £2 10s. to 25 guineas per piece.—The admission of French cambrics into the English market, under a very light duty, is said to have materially injured this trade; and, in fact, to have almost jolted the Irish cambrics out of the English market." The linen manufacture of the town and its vicinity has continued to experience various success; but, in a general view, has figured with comparative prominence in the general linen trade of Down and Armagh. The foundation of the manufacturing prosperity of the district was laid during the reign of Queen Anne, by the ancestor of the Rev. H. Waring, the present proprietor of the town. "In this town and the neighbourhood of it," said the chorographist of Down in 1744, "the linen manufacture is carried on to great advantage, where it was introduced and cherished by the late Samuel Waring, Esq.; well known for the great services he has done his country in this trade; which has spread so considerably here since that time, that a colony of fine diaper weavers were transplanted lately from hence to Dundalk. Several gentlemen have houses and pleasant seats in and near this town, which are too numerous to be mentioned particularly; and a greater number of well built farm-houses, with plantations round them, appear within half-a-mile of it, than perhaps in any part of the kingdom of the same compass, all inhabited by industrious Protestants, most of whom are engaged in the linen business; which is all owing to the encouragement of long tenures, and kind landlords, living on their estates among their tenants. The elegant seat of this family is at Waringstown; and their house, built on a rising ground, commands the prospect of a pleasant well-improved country. A small walk from the house is a well-finished church, roofed with Irish oak, and remarkable for the workmanship of it. William Waring, Esq., who first settled here, gave the ground for this use, and obtained an act of parliament for changing the site of the old parish-church from Donaghcloney bridge; after which, in the year 1681, he built this church at his own expense, which encouraged Protestants to settle in the village, at that time thin of inhabitants, and overgrown with woods." At the town are the church, a school, and a brewery; and within a mile of it are Waringstown-house, Milltown, Harrymount, Perrymount, Holdens-valley, and Castledoe. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. Area of the town, 37 acres. Pop., in 1841, 825. Houses 131. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 102; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 82; on their own manual labour, 64; on means not specified, 2.

WARREN, a sandy beach, partly in the parish of Malahide, but chiefly in that of Portmarnock, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It extends about 3½ miles south-south-eastward from the village of Malahide to the entrance of Portmarnock bay. About a mile of the seaward edge is rocky; and at two points, respectively about a mile and about two miles from Malahide, are the ruins of Robertswall's castle, and the ruins of a small church; and in the vicinity of the latter is Carrickbill, which commands an extensive and interesting view along the coast, including Lambay Island, Ireland's Eye, Howth Head, and the Dublin and Wicklow mountains.

WARRENPOINT, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Length, south-eastward, 2 miles; breadth, from 5 to 7 furlongs; area, 1,178 acres, 1 road, 34 perches,—of which 68 acres, 1 road, 21 perches are tideway in Narrow Water. Pop., in 1831, 1,573; in 1841, 2,045. Houses 334. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 505. Houses 90. The land is, in general, of good quality. The Narrow Water stream bounds the whole of the south-west; Narrow Water house and Narrow Water castle are situated in the interior; and part of Narrow Water demesne occupies the north-western district. See NARROW WATER. The principal country residence, additional to Narrow Water house, is Moygannan-cottage.—This parish was formerly part of the benefice of CLONALLON [which see]; but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Salary payable by the vicar of Clonallon, £50; augmentation allowance from Boulter's fund, £23 2s. Gross income, £73 2s.; nett, £52 2s. Patron, the incumbent of Clonallon. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 190. The Presbyterian meeting-house in connection with the General Assembly has an attendance of 200. The Remonstrant Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 60. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 18. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 678 Churchmen, 372 Presbyterians, and 877 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was supported by Mrs. Hall of Narrow Water house, one salaried with £15 from that lady, and one with £20 from Mr. Hall—had on their books 137 boys and 187 girls.

WARRENPOINT, a small market, post, and sea-port town, in the parish of Warrenpoint, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the embouchure of the Narrow or Newry river into the head of Lough Carlingford, and on the road from Newry to Kilkeel, 2 miles west of Rostrevor, 4½ north-north-west of Carlingford, 5 south-south-east of Newry, 9½ west-north-west of Kilkeel, 35 south-south-west of Belfast, and 55 north of Dublin. The ride from Newry to Carlingford, whether along the left or the right bank of the river, is excelled in beauty by few in Ireland; and the ride thence to Kilkeel, along the north shore of Lough Carlingford, through Rostrevor, is almost peerless in picturesque character. The site of Warrenpoint itself is immediately environed with brilliant and noble scenery; and, in particular, commands a superb view eastward of Rostrevor and the Mourne mountains, and south-eastward of the lough and mountains of Carlingford. The town consists of a square and several radiating streets; but appears from vantage-grounds in front to extend simply along the edge of the water. It has been almost wholly built since 1780; it is clean, tidy, and of pretending appearance; and it owes its prosperity, partly to the beauty of its situation, partly to its numerous attractions for seabathers and occasional visitors, and partly to its facilities for serving as a sub-port to Newry. It contains the places of worship and the schools noticed in the preceding article, a good quay, a windmill, a large distillery, a dispensary, a savings' bank, and a loan fund. The windmill is large, stands nearly in the centre of the town, and adds considerably to the picturesque effect of the town's appearance. The dispensary is within the Newry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 20,000 acres, with a pop. of 13,304; and, in 1839, it expended £163 11s., and administered to 1,131 patients. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £600, circulated £2,112 in 523 loans, realized a nett profit of 1s. 7d., and belonged to 20 proprietors. Warrenpoint is the port of Newry for all vessels of large burden; and is the scene of an extensive export trade in agricultural produce, and a large import trade in flax, colonial produce, and British manufactures. See NEWRY. A salt manufactory formerly existed, but is now extinct. Fairs are held on the last Friday of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. The local fishery is of considerable value. The resort of families for sea-bathing is comparatively great. A number of handsome villas and cottages ornées occur toward the east; yet they belong more properly to the village of Rostrevor. A rabbit-warren of considerable extent formerly existed on the shore, and seems to have originated the name of Warrenpoint. Area of the town, 60 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,856; in 1841, 1,540. Houses 244. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 60; in manufactures and trade, 1,333; in other pursuits, 120. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 39; on the directing of labour, 126; on their own manual labour, 113; on means not specified, 35.

WARRENTOWN, a small barony in the north-east corner of King's county, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Westmeath; on the north-east, by the county of Meath; on the east, by the counties of Meath and Kildare; on the south, by the barony of Coolestown; and on the west, by the barony of Lower Philipstown. Its length, west-south-westward, is 5½ miles; its extreme breadth is 5½; and its area is 21,402 acres, 1 road, 35 perches,—of which 11 acres, 6 perches are in Lough Nashade. Though the smallest barony of the county, it is far from being the least considerable. Some of the surface is morassy and boggy; yet very nearly all is profitable; and the greater part has a richer soil than almost any other district in the county. Most of the land is disposed in pasture; and is capable of fattening bullocks of any weight. The two highest grounds are situated in respectively the east and the north-west, and have altitudes above sea-level of 268 and 319 feet. The Yellow river runs across the interior, and describes part of the eastern boundary. The Grand Canal passes along part of the southern border. The portions of the barony which adjoin Westmeath were formerly called Hy-Macdonogh or the district of the Malonies, Magh-Colieghan or the district of the MacCoghilans, and Magh-Oll-Leigh or the district of the MacCullagh's; and these districts branched into Westmeath, and formed part of South Hy-Falgia, which was the country of an union of powerful septs, and comprehended the counties of Meath, Dublin, Westmeath, and part of Kildare and King's county. Ballybrittain or Warrenstown-castle, whence the barony has its name, stands in the parish of Ballymacwilliam, about ¾ of a mile north of the Grand Canal, and was the ancient seat of the once famous family of Warren. "Sir Henry Warren," says Brewer, "garrisoned this fortress, and 1600, for Queen Elizabeth. On the 13th of February 1691, a party of the adherents of James II., headed by Lieutenant-colonel O'Connor, took the castle of Ballybrittain, which they sacked and burnt, extending their ravages on the same day to the neighbouring town of Edenderry. On the decease of Sir Peter Warren, K.B., who died in the command of the naval station off Dublin, in the year 1752, leaving no male issue, the estate passed to the heirs female. A branch, however, of this family still exists, as we believe, in Ireland.—"This barony contains the whole of the parish of Ballymacwilliam, and part of the parishes of Ballyburley and Castle-Jordan. Pop., in 1831, 4,091; in 1841, 4,213. Houses 659. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 545; in manufactures and trade, 122; in other pursuits, 55. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 188; on their own manual labour, 489; on means not specified, 34. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 588; who could read but not write, 354; who could neither read nor write, 937. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 281; who could read but not write, 421; who could neither read nor write, 1,112.—Warrenstown barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Edenderry. The total number of valued tenements is 674; and of these, 483 are valued under £5,—36, under £10,—19, under £15,—20, under £20,—11, under £25,—15, under £30,—10, under £40,—10, under £50,—and 70, at and above £50.

WARRENTOWN, a village in the parish of Knockmark, barony of Lower Deece, 23 miles west-north-west of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. In its vicinity is Warrenstown-house, the seat of John Johnson, Esq. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 95. Houses 12.

WATERFALL (THE), the name par excellence of the cascade on the rivulet GLANISORLEAN (which see), in co. Wicklow, Leinster. The other chief waterfalls in co. Wicklow are those of the ESS, of GLEMACANASS, of the DEVIL'S GLEN, of GLENMALURE, of LUGDUFF, of POL-A-PHUCA, of POWERS-COURT, and of the river YARTREY [see these articles]; and the principal amidst the celebrated scenery around the lakes of Killarney are those of DERRYUNEHY, ESKNAMUSKY, TURK, and O'SULLIVAN: which see.

WATERFOOT, a romantically situated hamlet in the vicinity of Cushendall, parish of Layd, barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster.

WATERFORD.

A maritime county in the south-east of the province of Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the counties of Tipperary and Kilkenny; on the east, by the county of Wexford; on the south, by the Atlantic ocean; and on the west, by the county of Cork. The boundary, over the western part of the north, is nearly coincident with the summit-line of the Knockmeledown mountains; the boundary, over most of the middle and the eastern parts of the north, is traced by the river Suir; the boundary, over all the east, passes down the middle of Waterford Harbour or the estuary of the rivers Suir and Barrow; and the boundary, over the southern or terminating portion of the west, to the extent of about 2½ miles, is formed by Youghal Harbour or the estuary of the river Blackwater. The greatest length of the county, in a line due west, from Croden Head in Waterford Harbour, to a point near that at which the river Blackwater enters Waterford from Cork, is 39½ miles; its greatest breadth, from a point on the Suir, 2½ miles above Clommel, southward to

Ram Head, is 22½ miles; its least breadth, at each of two places, respectively near the east and near the west end of the county, is 4½ miles; its breadth over 10½ miles at its east end nowhere exceeds 8½ miles; and its area comprises 325,345 acres of arable land, 105,496 of uncultivated land, 23,408 of continuous woods, 1,525 of towns, and 5,779 of water,—in all, 461,553 acres. The unimproved pasture-land is situated chiefly on the summits and declivities of the Cummeragh and Knockmeledown mountains. Mr. Griffiths is of opinion that 20,000 acres are reclaimable, and that 30,000 might be drained for pasture.

Coasts.—The coast of Waterford Harbour will be noticed in the article WATERFORD HARBOUR: which see. The small headlands of Red Point and Swiny Head, screen, 1½ mile asunder, the west side of the entrance of Waterford Harbour. An open and slight marine indentation of the land, with a bluff line of coast, and bearing the name of Aland's bay, intervenes between Swiny Head and Brownstown Head; and the latter headland is 3 miles distant from the former, and bears west by south. A line from Brownstown Head to Newtown Head, measures 2½ miles in length, extends in the direction of west-north-west, and passes across the entrance of the imminently perilous bay of Tramore. A line from Newtown Head to Bonmahon Head measures 7½ miles, extends in a direction nearly due west, and very nearly coincides with the intermediate coast, most of which is bluff, inhospitable, and very slightly indented by the sea, but the portion of which in the vicinity of Bonmahon Head is marked by the embouchure of the Bonmahon river, boasts an adjacent sea-board of singularly great mineral wealth, and possesses a sort of open roadstead for the precarious accommodation of vessels trading with the mines. A line from Bonmahon Head to Ballyvoil Head measures 4 miles; and extends in the direction of south-west by west; but the coast curvingly retires to a little distance within this line, is slightly diversified by indentations called Ballydowan bay and Blind cove, and everywhere presents to the ocean a low menacing brow of rock. A line from Ballyvoil Head to Helwick Head, measures 3½ miles, extends in the direction of south-south-west, and passes across the entrance of Clonea bay and Dungan Harbour; and a headlead projects between that open bay and this shallow and beachy harbour to within 1½ mile of the line, and has in front of it a comparatively large group of rocks, which completes the separation between the harbour and the bay. A line drawn from Helwick Head to Mine Head measures 3½ miles in length, extends in the direction of south-south-west, and falls seaward of the greater portion of the intermediate coast, which is bluff and rocky, and describes the segment of a circle, and is slightly indented toward the north-north-east by an open sweep of sea called Muggort's bay. A line from Mine Head to Ballymacart Head measures 2½ miles in length, extends in the direction of south-west by west, and nearly coincides with the intermediate line of rocky coast. A line drawn from Ballymacart Head to Ardmore Head measures 2½ miles in length, extends south-westward, and passes across the entrance of Ardmore bay; and though this bay is completely open to the south and the south-east, and has to some extent a rocky and impracticable shore, yet it is useful to the fisheries, and contains an anchoring-ground on the west side a little within Ardmore Head. The coast ¾ of a mile south-south-west from Ardmore Head to Ram Head, and thence 1½ mile westward past Ardigna Head to the east side of the entrance of Whiting bay, is all a face of bluff rock. Whiting bay measures about 2 miles across the entrance, lies completely exposed to the south, and has a very limited area, and an inconsiderable economical value. The peninsula between Whiting bay and Youghal Harbour has a breadth of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and is faced round with a bluff coast, terminating in a small headland called the East Point.—Excepting Little Island, in the river Suir, a little below the city of Waterford, all the islets belonging to the county are very inconsiderable;—and the chief of them are Fyles Skyrth, between Swiny Head and Brownstown Head; Icaene Islands between Newtown Head and Bonmahon Head; Gull's Island, between Blind Cove and Clonea bay; Carrickapane and the Gainers, on the south side of Dungarvan Harbour; Carrigbrean, on the south side of Maggart's bay; Illaunbuce, off Mine Head; Black Rock, on the west side of Ardmore bay; and Goat Island, on the east side of Whiting bay.

Surface.—A small district, comprising the parish of Kilcultheen, lies on the left bank of the Suir, opposite the city of Waterford, and exhibits a beautiful diversity of surface, finely blending the characters of valley, swell, and hill. A band of country, considerably various in breadth, and forming most of the northern border of the county from a point several miles above Clonmel to a point opposite the influx of the river Barrow, and all the eastern border thence to the ocean, is strictly identical with the right side of the rich and beautiful valley of the Suir; but this great and exquisitely picturesque district is often very narrow in its alluvial or strictly low grounds, and both displays many undulating and hilly features within itself, and suffers invasions down almost to the edge of the river from comparatively high grounds which give character and strength to the interior districts. A broad, stern, lofty, and boldly featured range of mountains, called the Cumeragh or Monavoulagh mountains, rises suddenly up from the valley in the vicinity of Clonmel, and extends southward very nearly quite across the county to within about 2 miles of the town and harbour of Dungarvan. The whole of the great district eastward from the lofty bisecting mountain range to the vicinity of Waterford Harbour, and southward from the valley of the Suir to the shore of the Atlantic, exhibits, in a general view, a tumulated surface, or a series of undulations, hills, and low ridges, intersected and portioned off into groups by vales, dingles, and hollows. A district, about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles or 5 miles in mean breadth, and extending west-north-westward from Dungarvan Harbour and the south end of the Cumeragh mountains to the vicinity of Cappoquin, consists of a system of valley so fused into a kind of plain as to constitute a wide and undulated dingle, rich and beautiful in its own features, and rendered not a little picturesque by the high grounds and mountains which form its screens and its perspective. Some spurs go off from about the middle of the Cumeragh mountains, and very nearly unite with the commencement or east end of the Knockmeledown mountains; and the latter mountains, westward thence to the boundary with co. Cork, constitute all the northern border, with a breadth of from about $2\frac{1}{2}$ to nearly 5 miles. The brilliant, opulent, and exquisitely featured valley of the Blackwater, with a comparatively small breadth of low ground, extends eastward along the base of the Knockmeledown mountains from the boundary with co. Cork, to the vicinity of Cappoquin, and southward thence to the ocean at Youghal Harbour. The district south and west of the Blackwater forms nearly a triangle of respectively $7\frac{1}{2}$, 10, and 11 miles along its sides; and displays an aggregately beautiful surface, diversified with several hills, and intersected eastward by the valley of the Bride, and a romantic and thoroughly wooded glen. A broad based range of mountain-summits, so compact as to be very generally pronounced one mountain, under the name of the Drum, rises on the east side of the valley of the Blackwater immediately south of the broad dingle which extends from the south end of the Cumeragh mountains to the vicinity of Cappoquin; and this range flanks the whole of the south side of that dingle, extends westward to the immediate south-west shore of Dungarvan Harbour, leaves but a narrow belt of low ground on the seaboard between Youghal Harbour and Dungarvan, and renders communication thence with the rest of the county either very circuitous or very difficult.

The principal heights in the districts between Waterford Harbour in the east and the base of the Cumeragh mountains on the west, together with their respective altitudes above the level of the sea, are a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Waterford, 434 feet; Knockavelish, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Waterford, 417 feet; Foulakippen Hill, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Knockavelish, 205 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, west by north of Foulakippen Hill, 221 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of Knockavelish, 363 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Waterford, 457 feet; a height 2 miles west-north-west of Tramore, 436 feet; a height 2 miles east of Kill, 259 feet; Newtown Head, on the coast at the west side of the entrance of Tramore bay, 147 feet; a height 2 miles west-south-west of Annewstown, 191 feet; a height $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east-south-east of Annewstown, 218 feet; a height 2 miles north-west of Kill, 430 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Kill, 541 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Kill, 474 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Kilmacthomas, 540 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Kilmacthomas, 474 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Carrick-on-Suir, 423 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Portlaw, 354 feet; a height 4 miles east-south-east of Portlaw, 493 feet; and a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Carrick-on-Suir, 788 feet. The principal summits of the Cumeragh or Monavoulagh mountains, are a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Clonmel, 1,081 feet; a height 3 miles east-south-east of Clonmel, 875 feet; a height 3 miles south-east of Clonmel, 1,225 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Clonmel, 1,404 feet; a height 4 miles south-east of Clonmel, 1,751 feet; a height 5 miles south-east of Clonmel, 2,181 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clonmel, 1,710 feet; a height 4 miles east by south of Clonmel, 1,071 feet; a height 5 miles west of Carrick-on-Suir, 861 feet; a height 3 miles south-south-west of Clonmel, 1,071 feet; a height 4 miles south-west by south of Clonmel, 721 feet; a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Clonmel, 864 feet; a height 5 miles south-south-east of Clonmel, 867 feet; Knockanaffin, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clonmel, 2,478 feet; a height 2 miles south-south-east of Knockanaffin, 2,504 feet; a height 3 miles south-south-east of Knockanaffin, 2,597 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Kilmacthomas, 1,285 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south by east of Kilmacthomas, 540 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Kilmacthomas, 400 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Kilmacthomas, 1,248 feet; a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Kilmacthomas, 2,180 feet; Seefin, 6 miles west of Kilmacthomas, 2,387 feet; a height 2 miles south of Seefin, 1,952 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Seefin, 1,321 feet; a height 3 miles north-north-east of Dungarvan, 1,039 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Dungarvan, 333 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Dungarvan, 475 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Dungarvan, 608 feet; and a height 4 miles west by north of Seefin, 864 feet. The principal summits of the Knockmeledown mountains belonging to Waterford are a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Cappoquin, 1,417 feet; Knocknassak, 4 miles north by east of Cappoquin, 1,591 feet; Crow-Hill, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Knocknassak, 1,003 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of Crow-Hill, 689 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Crow-Hill, 1,096 feet; Knocknafallia, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Knocknassak, 2,199 feet; Dyrick, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Knocknafallia, 1,297 feet; Knockanare, 1 mile west-north-west of Knocknafallia, 2,149 feet; a height 1 mile west of Knockanare, 2,009 feet; a height 2 miles north-north-east of Lisnmore, 653 feet; Knocknasterkin, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Knockanare, 2,084 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Knocknasterkin, 1,668 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Knocknasterkin, 2,069 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Knocknasterkin, 1,068 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by north of Lisnmore, 732 feet; a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Lisnmore, 1,031 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Ballyduff, 1,164 feet; Knocknalough, 3 miles north-west of Ballyduff, 1,026 feet; a height 1 mile east of Knocknalough, 1,066 feet; and a height 2 miles south by west of Knocknalough, 777 feet. The principal heights in the triangular district south and west of the Blackwater are a height 3 miles north-west of Youghal, 457 feet; Knocknapoeragh, 4 miles north by west of Youghal, 360 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Knocknapoeragh, 648 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Knocknapoeragh, 672 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of Tallow, 689 feet; and a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Tallow, 673 feet. The principal summits in the Drum range of mountains are a height 1 mile north of Ardmore, 256 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Ardmore, 362 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Ardmore, 625 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Ardmore, 239 feet; a height 4 miles north of Ardmore, 995 feet; a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Ardmore, 728 feet; a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ardmore, 782 feet; a height 4 miles west-south-west of Dungarvan, 867 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Dungarvan, 709 feet; a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Dungarvan, 251 feet; a height 6 miles south-south-west of Dungarvan, 292 feet; a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Dungarvan, 500 feet; and a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Dungarvan, 380 feet.

Waters.—The principal lakes of the county of Waterford are several loughlets and alpine ponds of very great superficial elevation and grandly romantic character, among the Cumeragh mountains; and Lough Bally, 106 feet of surface-elevation above sea-level, and 52 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches in area, in the barony of Gualtier. The river Suir, over the first $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of its contact with Waterford, flows in a northerly direction; over all the run thence to Cheek Point, 4 miles below the city of Waterford, in a prevailing eastward direction; and from Cheek Point to the ocean, in a southerly direction. The Nier rises nearly in the centre of the Cumeragh mountains, and runs westward to the Suir at nearly the point of that river's first contact with the county. The Clodagh rises on the east side of the Cumeragh mountains, and runs eastward to the Suir, at a point about 6 miles below Carrick-on-Suir. The Mahon rises in the south-eastern part of the Cumeragh mountains, and flows south-south-eastward to the ocean a little east of Bonmahon Head. The Tay rises also in the south-eastern portion of the Cumeragh mountains, and flows south-south-eastward to the ocean at Blind Cove. The Colligan rises in the southern part of the central district of the Cumeragh mountains, and runs southward to the head of Dungarvan Harbour. The Brickey rises west of the middle of the dingle between the Cumeragh and the Drum mountains, and runs east-south-eastward to the west side of Dungarvan Harbour. The Blackwater comes in from co. Cork with majestic volume, and flows eastward past Lisnmore to Cappoquin, and thence southward to the head of Youghal Harbour. The Bride also comes in from co. Cork, and flows eastward past Tallow, parallel to the easterly part of the Blackwater's course to a confluence with that river at a point 4 miles below Cappoquin. The Phineas rises in the south-western portion of the Cumeragh mountains, and flows southward and westward to the Blackwater at a point about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Cappoquin. The Goish rises in the north-west portion of the Drum mountains, and flows west-north-westward to the Blackwater at a point a little above the influx of the Bride. And the Greggagh and the Lickey rise west of the middle of the Drum mountains, and run westward to the Blackwater at the head of Youghal Harbour. The only navigations within the county, or upon its boundaries, are the Suir to Clonmel, the Blackwater for small craft to a point above Cappoquin, and the Bride for small craft to the vicinity of Tallow.

Minerals.—Transition rocks, consisting principally of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate, constitute the greater portion of the eastern half of the county. Rocks of old conglomerate, and of purple, red, green, and grey clay slate, constitute the greater portion of the western half of the county, and also a belt along most of the valley of the Suir, and the sea-board of Waterford Harbour. Rocks of fossiliferous slate constitute a tiny patch of country on the sea-board of the Atlantic, around the mouth of the rivulet Mahon. Rocks of yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate, form a narrow belt along the edges of the greater portion of the districts of old conglomerate and purple clay slate. Rocks of the flinty limestone formation, similar to those which occur throughout the great carboniferous limestone plain of Ireland, constitute a considerable portion of the low grounds immediately upon the river Blackwater, most of the low grounds of the river Bride, the whole of the dingle from Cappoquin to Dungarvan, and thence east-south-eastward to the ocean, and considerable patches and mimic districts of the low grounds in the valley of the Suir.—Slate quarries occur at Whitfield and in the vicinity of Lisnmore. Silver ores are found in the vicinity of Waterford, at Don-Isle, and at Bonmahon. Lead ores occur in the vicinity of Waterford, at Annes-town, at Bonmahon, at Kilkenny, and in the vicinity of Lisnmore. Iron ores are found in the Cumeragh mountains, at Ardmore, and in the vicinity of Lisnmore. Copper ores are found at Bonmahon, at Annes-town, at Dromana, and in the vicinity of Lisnmore. The mineral district at Bonmahon and its vicinity, round the mouth of the rivulet Mahon, is exceedingly productive, and ranks as the most valuable in Ireland.—"The prevailing rock in the vicinity of Waterford, and indeed throughout the entire county, except where limestone is found," says the Rev. H. Ryland, "is argillaceous schistus (clay slate), varying in hardness and colour, and in many places combined with a portion of siliceous. The summits of the hills are composed of siliceous breccia, over which red sandstone frequently occurs. On the sea coast near the harbour of Waterford, the siliceous conglomerate and sandstone are found interstratifying each other, the thickness of the beds, sometimes eight or ten in number, varying from two to twelve feet. In the immediate neighbourhood of Waterford, the following rocks occur in considerable abundance: sienite and hornblende at Kilronan; talco-e slate, near Knockhouse; lydian stone, on the road to Annetown; hornstone and jasper are found alternating with flinty slate in the same neighbourhood; serpentine may be seen resting on a bluish black quartzose rock at Knockhouse; clay iron ore appears in a small bed at Knockaveelish strand." A section of Bilberry Rock, as laid open by the course of the river Suir, affords a concise illustration of the mineralogy of the district;—and this section exhibits pure clay slate; clay slate, veined with quartz, scaly graphite, and jaspery iron ore; bituminous shale and black slate, with breccia and red slate; transition talcose slate; bituminous shale, coloured red by oxide of iron; indurated and variegated talcose slate; a vein of yellow ochre; indurated green earth, spotted with arsenuriet of iron; metalliferous slate; porphyritic slate; a vein of red ochre; hornstone porphyry; jaspery hornstone slate; porphyritic hornstone; and quartzose porphyry. "There are several veins of quartz in the clay slate of Bilberry, in which there is a considerable quantity of micaceous iron ore and scaly graphite, both passing into oxide of iron and jaspery iron ore. These ores are, in some places of these veins, so intimately blended with quartz as to form jaspery ironstone, which is extremely beautiful when polished. Beautiful specimens of brown crystallized quartz may be collected in small trusses in the clay slate, some of which are intermixed with minute crystals of chlorite. Red ochre is abundant; this is formed by the decomposition of carburet of iron, and acts so forcibly through the several strata of the hill as to give them a spotted and variegated texture. A small portion of sulphate of barytes is mixed with the micaceous iron ore in several parts of the quartz. Oxide of titanium is also found alternating with the jaspery iron ore; this appears of a blood red colour. The bituminous shale contains 25 per cent. of carbon, its fracture is obliquely fibrous and iridescent, in consequence of the metallic matter which passes through it. The variegated texture of the talcose slate depends on the same principle. Round a metallic vein in the centre of the Rock's section, the talcose slate and indurated green earth are intermixed with arsenuriet of iron, which is gradually decomposing the action of the atmosphere."—A stiff, yellow, potter's clay abounds in all the immediate vicinity of Dungarvan; a white kind occurs at Ballintaylor, in the parish of Whitechurch; a milk-white clay, resembling pipe-clay, and not unlike chalk, occurs in a ravine in the parish of Rineogangah; a vein of white clay, formerly used and mistaken for marl, occurs between Lismore and the eminence called Round-Hill; a good potters' clay, of which earthenware has been formed, occurs at Mogeely, in the parish of Whitechurch; and potters' clay of various qualities may be found, more or less abundant, in almost every considerable district of the county. A vein of good pipe-clay, variegated in some places with a red earth or bole, occurs at Ballyduff, on the frontier toward the county of Cork; a good pipe-clay, similar to the preceding, is found near Dromana; and an excellent pipe-clay occurs near Ballintaylor, in the parish of Whitechurch. Excellent ochre, of a deeper yellow than the French kinds formerly in use, is found at Ballintaylor; an excellent kind very suitable for the painter, occurs within the quondam county of the city of Waterford; and ochres in smaller quantities and of inferior quality, occur in various other localities. A red earth, possessing all the properties of Armenian bole, occurs at Ballyduff. Sandstone of qualities very suitable for building, is found in comparative abundance; beautiful and durable kinds of it occur in various localities; a fine white kind, similar to Portland stone, is found in the vicinity of Dromana; and a singular sort, displaying a white ground, clouded and veined with red tints, well adapted to building, and comparatively durable, occurs in the vicinity of Carraghmore. Black building stones, such as in the county of Dublin are called rag-stones, are very abundant, and serve for the construction of fence-walls. A good kind of grinding-stone of a fine grit, and fit for the uses of the carpenter and the cutler, is found at Ballylemon, in the parish of Whitechurch. Marl is comparatively little known, yet might probably be found in most bogs in the vicinity of limestone ground. A marl or rotten limestone, well suited to manuring of land, is found at New Affane, on the banks of the Blackwater; a white friable stone, resembling burnt lime, abounds near the quondam Ferry-slip at Lismore; a rotten limestone or marl is somewhat abundant along the banks of the Blackwater in the vicinity of Lismore; a stone of a mixed nature and partly metallic, but resembling a grey rotten limestone, occurs in the local mine, in the vicinity of Lismore; a friable spar occurs in some rocks on the coast of Dungarvan Harbour. Limestone itself, of qualities fitted to be burned for manure, is comparatively scarce; and the paucity of it, combined with its very partial diffusion, compels the farmers to practise very discrepant or miscellaneous manuring. A fine variegated marble, capable of a good polish, and displaying several colours, as brown, chocolate, white, blue, and yellow, blended into various shades and figures, occurs at Tooreen; a black and white marble, also susceptible of a good polish, occurs at New Affane; a black marble, without any mixture of white, occurs in the vicinity of Kilerump, in the parish of Whitechurch; and a grey marble, beautifully clouded with white, and spotted like some kinds of shagreen, occurs near Ballinacourty, in the same parish.

Agriculture.—A minute official report lies before us of the agricultural condition of the barony of Middlethird in 1836; and as that barony may be regarded as a fair average specimen of the county, we cannot do better, on the subject of agriculture, than give a digest of this report. The parish of Drinnacannon, estimated to comprise an area of 5,275 plantation acres, contains about 300 acres of unimprovable waste land, and about 1,320 of bog; the parish of Island-Icane, estimated to comprise 2,600 plantation acres, contains 350 of waste land, and from 150 to 250 of bog; the parish of Kilmeaden, estimated to comprise 5,500 plantation acres, contains no waste land, and 1,400 acres of bog; the parish of Kilbourne and Butlerstown, estimated to comprise 4,000 plantation acres, contains 75 of waste land, and 300 of bog; the parish of Reiske, estimated to comprise 2,700 plantation acres, contains 64 of waste land, and 250 of bog; the parish of Newcastle, estimated to comprise 2,700 plantation acres, contains 150 of waste land, and 500 of bog; the parish of Linnalk, estimated to comprise 1,600 plantation acres, contains 75 of waste land, and 350 of bog; and the parish of Dunhill, estimated to comprise 3,565 plantation acres, contains no waste land, and 200 acres of bog. A large proportion of the land capable of cultivation is in tillage. No considerable tract of wet ground is kept in pasture, because it cannot profitably be ploughed; and no land whatever is held for the fattening of cattle. Every farm, with only one exception, is of a mixed nature; and one of 50 acres has from 10 to 20 acres in tillage. The proportion of the entire area of the barony in tillage is more than at a former period; yet the amount of its produce is less. The soil in the eastern district of the barony has undergone deterioration, and is in the course of exhaustion, from constant cropping; but that in the western district is better laid down and better cleaned, and is experiencing improvement. "The common course of tillage in the barony is this:—potatoes, wheat, oats, and again potatoes, &c., whilst the land will produce them. The larger and better farmers only grow one corn crop in succession, and one considerable proprietor insists on all his tenants following that system. The first crop of potatoes on ploughed ley ground is limed, or sometimes manured with dung, and the seed covered with earth thrown out of the furrows with a shovel. The seed wheat is ploughed in on the ground that had been well dug, and loosened in taking out the potato crop. When oats or barley follow wheat, many of the farmers cross-plough the land; but there is a large number who are content with giving it one ploughing. When a second series is begun, and potatoes set on stubble ground, the former mode of culture and system is pursued. A large portion of the potatoes grown belong to labourers and others, who take half an acre or more, under the name of dairy ground, from the farmer, who has ploughed and brought manure to the land, and then gives it over to them to plant; if the land is to be limed, that is not laid on till the potato sprouts are well above the ground. Labourers pay from £6 to £8 an acre for dairy ground. A few potatoes are set on manure which the labourers have collected and laid on the farmer's land, paying a rent of about £2 an acre. The frequent potato crops keep the tillage grounds moderately clean, and of apparent fine mould, notwithstanding the barrows used are single and very clumsy, and the crop imperfectly used. From the appearance of the stubble in October, the latter must be the case, and the general crops would be supposed to have been of an average moderate bulk. The quality of all sorts of grain is good, but the more strong and sharp soils are better suited to barley than wheat. Black oats have latterly been much sown, in consequence of failures for several successive years of the Poland and potato oats. The straw of the black oats is considered to be very good fodder. The Tartary oats are also sown to some extent, and much approved. Grass seeds collected from their hay are sown by all farmers with the last crop of corn, and there is a fine pasture on the field the next year. Clover is also getting into general use, and from the rapidity with which it has spread in the last few years, may be expected to be soon universally sown as a green crop. At present it is commonly made into hay, or cut for soiling, but a few farmers have begun to pasture it. Turnips are only grown in small quantities by gentlemen, and there is no appearance that they will soon be sown to any extent by farmers generally. Potatoes are now given to cattle for all purposes in their place; raw potatoes are in great esteem among all farmers for milking cows, and boiled ones are considered by them to be excellent food for feeding beasts. The soil is peculiarly well suited to turnips, and very much of it is sufficiently dry to allow them to be eaten off the land in winter by sheep. Vetches are sown both as a spring and winter crop, but only in small quantities by any class of farmers. The system of growing potatoes every second or third crop, and always manuring or liming them, and after a series of cropping, allowing the land to lie in grass for several years, prevents the soil becoming much impoverished, though there is no regular use of the green crops that are alternately sown in Great Britain to keep land in proper heart. Where any considerable part of a farm is constantly in grass, and much stock kept, the remainder is seldom in an exhausted state. In Great Britain this species of soil would be cropped when broken up, with oats, turnips, barley, or wheat, and laid down with clover and grass seed. It would not there be thought advisable to grow a green crop on ley ground. The turnips would be chiefly fed off such land with sheep. Two corn crops would never follow one another, and clover would be more universally sown. The corn and green crops would be also more thoroughly weeded, and a larger produce of corn might be expected if it was sown on the ley ground, and also after turnips. The turnip or potato crop would be heavier if set in land that had been well ploughed and loosened, and thus prepared for roots that require a fine and lightened mould, than if planted on the roots of a hard sod. That practice must have arisen from the wish to make the nourishment of the rotting grass sod available to a crop of potatoes, and it is one among the many bad customs which the necessity of growing frequent crops of potatoes has introduced among the farmers in this district, if not generally throughout Ireland. A considerable quantity of farm-yard dung is made use of by the dairy farmers of the barony, who also plough to some extent, and a farmer of 50 acres probably has from 10 to 20 constantly under the plough. Great pains are taken to create manure by collecting weeds, and throwing them under the cattle's feet in the farm-yard. Sea-sand is not unfrequently spread under the cattle, and also to receive the drainings from the dung heaps. Old useless fences are dug down, and all the soil and bog-earth that a farmer can bring are made into composts with lime, and used principally to manure potatoes. Limestone is brought by water into the barony, and burnt with English culm, but lime is still sold at the moderate rate of 8s. to 10s. per ton. It is of fair quality and extensively used, but the poorer landholders lay much less per acre on their ground than would content a farmer in Great Britain. The quantity they put on varies from 2 to 6 tons per statute acre, and is determined principally by their means. The sea-sand does not contain much calcareous matter, and is not in great esteem as a manure. Sea-weed can only be procured in a few places on the coast, but is there collected in some quantity, and especially in the autumn, and then spread on stubble ground to be ploughed in for a crop of potatoes. It is not considered to be of any service to the corn that follows. The fences are generally single and double ditches, and very indifferent of the kind. Where stone is plentiful, the earthen banks are faced with it, and thus improved, but not made nearly equal as fences to the dry stone walls, that would in such situations be built in both England and Scotland. The common banks and ditches are made lower, and kept in worse repair than in many other parts of the south of Ireland. Furze is planted on the tops of the banks, but there are constantly large intervals between the bushes, where it has failed or been destroyed, which render it not a very important guard. On the low grounds the fences are better, and kept in good order; and the farmers do not appear to suffer much inconvenience from their condition. The population is so thick, and the cattle, by constant tending, learn their bounds so well, that no complaints of serious damage to corn-fields are made. From the shallow stony nature of the soil, in a large part of the barony, it is impossible to form high substantial banks. An Agricultural Society for this and two adjoining baronies, was established five years ago, and has distributed premiums for the best cattle, sheep, and pigs, shown at the annual meeting, and for the best managed farm; it has excited considerable interest among the farmers of the district, and they attend in numbers when the cattle are shown. The Agricultural Society has also been the means of introducing Scotch ploughs, carts, and other improved agricultural implements, into this barony. Those ploughs are now in the common use of all the farmers. Their harrows are still principally single, but the soil is of so loose a texture, that the consequent loss is rather in the increase of draught and trouble than in the way of inferior tillage of the land. Rollers are only in the hands of the large farmers, but latterly their use has been spreading. One of the principal landowners has given rollers to some of his tenants, and they perceive their beneficial effects. The carts are of a cheap, light construction, with boarded bodies, and narrow, well-mule, low wheels on iron axles; they appear well suited to the roads of this hilly barony, but the small narrow wheels must be inconvenient in drawing manure on to imperfectly drained ground in wet seasons. There are a few winnowing machines among the principal farmers, but corn is commonly winnowed by women in the open air. A very large proportion of this barony is held under lease, and many of the proprietors still grant new leases when the old ones expire. It might be expected the general cultivation and state of the land would be superior to those districts that are held principally by tenants at will; there is, however, no apparent difference in the quality of the stock; the buildings and the state of the fences are much the same as in the other baronies in the south of Ireland, held at will by farmers of the same class, and it would be difficult to point any particular kind of improvements to the land that have been generally made and caused by leases. There are large patches of wet ground reclaimable, but no draining has been attempted, except very imperfectly by open ditches. Rents have not been reduced to the same extent in late years as has been done in England. Landlords have not received their full rents for the last three years, but a nominal reduction has not generally taken place."

In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, 3,190 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres in area, 3,024 of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,179 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 2,336 of upwards of 30 acres; within the liberties of the city of Waterford, 56 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 21 of from 5 to 15 acres, 8 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 1 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the other civic districts of the county, 55 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 31 of from 5 to 15 acres, 10 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 6 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year, there were within all districts of the county, excepting the liberties of the city, 7,071 male farmers, 352 female farmers, 29,711 male servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 2,065 male servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 9,349 female servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 936 female servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 99 ploughmen, 167 gardeners, 316 male herds above 15 years of age, 305 male herds below 15 years of age, 9 female herds, 50 caretakers, 1 land-agent, 171 land-stewards, 19 gamekeepers, 25 male dairy-keepers, and 95 female dairy-keepers; and within the liberties of the city, 18 male farmers, 2 female farmers, 379 male servants and labourers, 89 female servants and labourers, 28 gardeners, 5 caretakers, 1 land-agent, 14 land-stewards, 1 gamekeeper, 1 male dairy-keeper, and 15 female dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—The common Irish cow is the general dairy stock; yet though believed to give a large quantity of butter, it is acknowledged to be inferior for feeding, and neither to fatten easily, nor to get to a heavy weight. Several of the best English breeds have been introduced by gentlemen and large farmers; and English or half-bred bulls are now kept by most of the principal dairymen, and are likely to be very soon common among farmers of all classes.

Most of the sheep are of a large coarse breed; but some, especially upon the low grounds, are a cross of the Leicester breed, and both get to a good weight at an early age, and yield a large fleece of wool. The pigs are of a thick improved kind, and nearly equal to the kinds generally fed as bacon hogs in Great Britain. The horses are light-boned, active animals, not deficient in strength for the work they have to perform, and very fit for one-horse carts, and for use in double ploughs.—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 960 horses and mules, 981 asses, 601 cattle, 3,479 sheep, 11,751 pigs, and 55,376 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,286 horses and mules, 340 asses, 1,008 cattle, 3,142 sheep, 4,704 pigs, and 19,487 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 3,020 horses and mules, 148 asses, 4,338 cattle, 7,585 sheep, 8,113 pigs, and 28,729 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 3,062 horses and mules, 191 asses, 8,813 cattle, 8,745 sheep, 12,234 pigs, and 29,797 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 6,974 horses and mules, 747 asses, 28,220 cattle, 23,560 sheep, 30,745 pigs, and 52,098 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 15,902 horses and mules, £127,216; 2,407 asses, £2,407; 42,980 cattle, £279,370; 46,511 sheep, £51,162; 67,547 pigs, £84,434; and 185,487 poultry, £4,637. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts of the county, £549,226. In the same year, there were within the liberties of the city of Waterford, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 522 horses and mules, 16 asses, 43 cattle, 1,189 pigs, and 1,848 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 24 horses and mules, 13 asses, 73 cattle, 2 sheep, 52 pigs, and 321 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 26 horses and mules, 11 asses, 87 cattle, 46 sheep, 65 pigs, and 212 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 5 horses and mules, 2 asses, 60 cattle, 5 sheep, 13 pigs, and 38 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 7 horses and mules, 1 ass, 6 cattle, 7 sheep, 4 pigs, and 8 poultry. The total of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 584 horses and mules, £4,672; 43 asses, £43; 209 cattle, £1,749; 60 sheep, £66; 1,323 pigs, £1,034; and 2,427 poultry, £61. Grand total of estimated value of live stock within the liberties of the city, £8,245. In the same year, there were within the other civic districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 371 horses and mules, 175 asses, 88 cattle, 62 sheep, 2,078 pigs, and 3,367 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 28 horses and mules, 1 ass, 28 cattle, 9 sheep, 51 pigs, and 161 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 29 horses and mules, 3 asses, 69 cattle, 34 sheep, 56 pigs, and 196 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 22 horses and mules, 2 asses, 38 cattle, 35 sheep, 20 pigs, and 89 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 22 horses and mules, 1 ass, 66 cattle, 64 sheep, 35 pigs, and 127 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 472 horses and mules, £3,776; 182 asses, £182; 309 cattle, £2,008; 204 sheep, £224; 2,240 pigs, £2,800; and 3,940 poultry, £99. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts of the county, exclusive of the city of Waterford, £9,089.

Vegetables.—Dr. Smith gives a catalogue of such native plants of the county of Waterford as are nearly peculiar to the county, of such as are not commonly found elsewhere, and of such as, though less rare, are the most useful; and though this catalogue is of rather old date, and very antiquated botanical nomenclature, yet it was drawn up with so much care as still to be well worthy of condensed transcription:—Adiantum, foliis longioribus, common black maiden hair, plentiful on the hill above Cushean, 2 miles north-east of Dungarvan; Trichomanes sive Polytrichum officinarum, English black maiden hair, plentiful at the entrance of the cave of Oon-a-glour, in the parish of Whitechurch; Peucedanum germanicum, hogs' fennel, sulphurwort, or harestrang, plentiful near the water side, south-east of Passage; Lupathum aquaticum, great water dock, also at the water's edge, south-east of Passage; Alcea vulgaris major, vervain in mallow, near the high road, in the parish of Kilmeaden; Chamomelum odoratissimum, sweet-scented creeping chamomile, near Ballycarogue, in the parish of Kilrossinta; Osmunda regalis seu Filix florida, water fern, or flowering fern, or osmund royal, plentiful in a bog near Ballycarogue; Ros solis, long-leaved sundew, in the same place as the preceding; Virga Aurea, golden rod, on the hill of Cushean, near Dungarvan; Verbena vulgaris, vervain, between Tallow and Lismore, and in the fields near Cappoquin; Lepidium latifolium, peppervort, near the east side of Youghal Harbour, in the parish of Kinsalebeg, and in great quantities at Corkbeg, in the barony of Imokilly, where it bears the name of quick-delivery, and is given to women to expedite parturition; Eryngium vulgare, sea-holly, plentiful in the sand near Youghal Harbour, and used by confectioners to make a candied sweetmeat; Cochlearia marina, sea scurvy-wass, plentiful on the islands of Icaue, the little island of Stradbally, and many other places on the coast; Althæa sive Bismalva, marshmallow, abundant on the islands of Icaue; Allium montanum, purple-flowered mountain garlic, in most of the pasture-lands of the county, and gives a strong taste in spring to both the milk and the butter of cows which feed in the pastures; Trifolium palustre, buckbean, in many parts of the county, but particularly in Bonmahon bog, in the parish of Monksland, and is an excellent antiscorbutic; Hyacinthus anglicus, harebell or English hyacinth, abundant in the same habitat as the preceding; Prunella, self-heal, or, in Irish, canavanbeg, commonly used with great confidence by the peasantry as a febrifuge; Centaurium minus flore albo, lesser centaury, with a white flower, plentiful, with the more common kind of centaury, on most of the hills; Filipendula minor, dropwort, occasionally among the rocks on the Cummeragh mountains; Glastrum, wood, cultivated near Waterford; Sedum seratum latifolium montanum guttato flore, London pride, on the summit of the Knockmeledown mountains; Lychnis viscaria flore muscoso, Spanish catchfly, or star of the earth, plentiful near Lismore on the banks of the Blackwater, and alleged by Sir Hans Sloane to cure the bite of mad dogs in either men or brutes; Enula campana, elecampane, on the side of a hill between Lismore and Tallow; Gladiolus sive Xiphium, sword-grass, plentiful at the upper end of the Congearry at Dungarvan; Helleborus niger hortensis flore viridi, wild black hellebore or bear's-foot, near the church of Kilcockan, 3 miles east of Tallow; Matricaria vulgaris, feverfew, plentiful near Mogehy, in the parish of Whitechurch; Lilium convallium vulgo, lily of the valley, rather plentiful in a wood by the side of the river Colligan; Valeriana cærulea, Greek valerian, or Jacob's ladder, on the north bank of the Blackwater between Lismore and Cappoquin; Scordium verum, near a brook between Lismore and Tallow; Laureola sempervirens, spurge laurel, in a wood near Mogehy, in the parish of Whitechurch; Carni officinarum, caraway, near Woodhouse in the parish of Stradbally; Bistorta major radice minus intorta, bistort, on the hill of Slatwood near Lismore and Tallow; Imperatoria, masterwort, near the same habitat as the preceding; Thlaspi arvanse siliquis latis, treacle mustard or penny cross, plentiful in the fields near Cappoquin; Betonica purpurea, wood betony, in a wood on the north side of the Blackwater, between Lismore and Cappoquin; Fumaria alba, latifolia claviculata, climbing fumitory, in the same habitat as the preceding; Raphanus aquaticus, water horse-radish, in the Blackwater near Lismore; Nymphaea alba major, white water-lily, in the same place as the preceding; Nymphaea major lutea, water-lily with a yellow flower, in the same place as the preceding, and in most marshy grounds; Absinthium vulgare, common wormwood, very plentiful in most parts of the coast, and particularly in the parish of Rineogonah; Asparagus maritimus, asparagus, differing little from the cultivated sort, in the sand on the isthmus of Tramore; Ceanothe aquatica, henlock water dropwort, plentiful in a marshy ground near Bandon in the parish of Dungarvan; Veronica vulgarior, male speedwell, plentiful in Colligan wood; Tormentilla, tormentil, very common; Crithmum maritimum, samphire, on most of the sea-cliffs; Corallina reticulata, sea-fan or sea-feather, a half-petried sea-plant, on the shore between Tramore and Dungarvan; and ten or twelve rather rare species of algae and fuci, found of course upon the shore.

The plantations within the county, in 1841, consisted of 4,898 continuous acres and 29,607 detached trees of oak, 66 continuous acres and 124,151 detached trees of ash, 23 continuous acres and 26,572 detached trees of elm, 43 continuous acres and 32,205 detached trees of beech, 1,780 continuous acres and 79,763 detached trees of fir, 15,216 continuous acres and 185,521 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 1,376 continuous acres and 2,654 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 23,408 continuous acres and 500,473 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 3,128 acres, and making a grand total of 26,536 acres of plantations. Of the woods or continuous acres, 4,286 acres of oak, 30 of ash, 13 of elm, 14 of beech, 12 of fir, 2,075 of mixed plantations, and 581 of orchards, were planted previous to 1791; 18 acres of oak, 4 of ash, 2 of elm, 3 of fir, 914 of mixed plantations, and 84 of orchards, were planted between 1791 and 1800; 49 acres of oak, 4 of ash, 7 of beech, 114 of fir, 1,465 of mixed plantations, and 82 of orchards, were planted between 1801 and 1810; 302 acres of oak, 4 of ash, 513 of fir, 2,981 of mixed plantations, and 165 of orchards, were planted between 1811 and 1820; 37 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 7 of elm, 18 of beech, 630 of fir, 3,957 of mixed plantations, and 249 of orchards, were planted between 1821 and 1830; and 206 acres of oak, 14 of ash, 1 of elm, 4 of beech, 512 of fir, 3,824 of mixed plantations, and 215 of orchards, were planted between 1831 and 1840.—The principal masses or great sheets of wood occur in the demesne of Curraghmore, parishes of Clonegan, Guilcagh, Mottell, and Kilmeaden; in Coolnamuck demesne, parishes of Dysart and Kilmoleran; in Mount-Bolton Wood, parish of Fenagh; in the demesne of Gurteen, parishes of Dysart, Killaloe, and Kilsheelan; in the demesne of Kilmannahan, parishes of Innislonaght and Kilmoran; in the demesne of Ballysaggartmore, parish of Lismore and Macollop; in the demesne of Lismore, parish of Lismore and Macollop; in the demesne of Dromona, parishes of Lismore and Macollop, Affane, Aghish, and Kilmolash; in the demesne of Straucally, parishes of Kilcockan and Kilwatermoy; and in the demesne of Ballinatr, parish of Templemichael. The principal second class, or inferior but still considerable sheets of wood, occur at Woodstown, Ballinamona, Faithleg, Woodland, Ballyconvan, and around the city of Waterford, in the barony of Gualtier; at Mount-Congreve, Whitfield, Knock, and Knockaderry, in the barony of Middlethird; at Mount-Bolton, Mayfield, Shanakill, Knockalishen, Ballyma-keel, and Russelstown, in the barony of Uppertthird; at Garden-Morris, Sarahville, Woodhouse, Colligan, and Cappagh, in the barony of Decies-without-Drum; at Clashmore, Ballinamultina, and Villierstown, in the barony of Decies-within-Drum; and at Janeville, Moorhill, Ballylaspeen, Cherry-mountain, Headborough, Lisfinny, and Glensbelan, in the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride.

Manufactures and Trade.—The principal seats of manufacture and productive industry are the city of Waterford and the towns of Portlaw, Dungarvan, Bonmahon, Lismore, and Cappoquin; and the leading facts respecting the most prominent departments of manufacture and productive industry are stated in the articles on these towns and those of Clonmel and Carrick-on-Suir. As the best means of making a proximately minute and correct estimate of the kinds and classes of productive industry, we shall here give a digest of the statistics of occupations, in all departments except those of agriculture and the professions, as exhibited in the Census of 1841:—Fishermen, 726; millers, 72; maltsters, 2; brewers, 8; bakers, 119; confectioners, 14; saltsters, 70; tobacco-twisters, 10; fishmonger, 1; egg-dealers, 3; fruiterers, 8; cattle-dealers, 42; horse-dealers, 2; pig-jobbers, 31; corn-dealers, 11; huxters and provision dealers, 168; butchers, 90; poulterers, 1; victuallers, 83; grocers, 16; tobaccoconists, 8; wine-merchant, 1; flax-dressers, 22; carders, 64; spinners of flax, 341; spinners of cotton, 114; spinners of wool, 978; spinners of unspecified classes, 567; winders and warpers, 53; wool-dressers, 14; weavers of cotton, 350; weavers of linen, 89; weavers of woollen, 107; weavers of unspecified classes, 362; assistants in factories, 102; manufacturer of woollen, 1; manufacturer of lace, 1; bleachers, 19; dyers, 12; clothiers, 2; cloth-finishers, 3; calico-printers, 2; skimmers, 5; curriers, 8; tanners, 8; brogue-makers, 137; boot and shoe makers, 822; tailors, 822; sempstresses, 317; dress-makers, 738; milliners, 17; lace-workers, 307; stay-makers, 4; knitters, 323; hatters, 18; straw-hatters, 12; bonnet-makers, 38; straw-workers, 5; gloves, 3; hair-dressers and barbers, 4; leather-dealer, 1; hosiers, 7; haberdashers, 8; drapers, 8; linen-drappers, 3; woollen-drappers, 9; vendors of soft goods, 27; rag and bone dealers, 26; architects, 3; builders, 6; brick-makers, 4; stone-cutters, 28; lime-burners, 23; bricklayers, 4; stone-masons, 371; slaters, 82; thatchers, 23; plasterers, 15; paviors, 5; quarrymen, 6; sawyers, 61; carpenters, 1,148; cart-makers, 2; cabinet-makers, 11; wood-polishers, 3; coopers, 193; turners, 21; mill-wrights, 20; wheel-wrights, 22; ship-wrights, 75; block-maker, 1; lath-splitters, 7; brush-makers, 4; basket-makers, 13; broom-makers, 4; miners, 385; iron-founders, 6; blacksmiths, 637; whitesmiths, 9; nailers, 125; entler, 1; gunsmiths, 4; braziers and copper-smiths, 13; bell-hanger, 1; gas-fitter, 1; plumber, 1; tin-plate workers, 6; tinkers, 8; machine-makers, 10; watchmakers, 2; goldsmiths, silversmiths, and jewellers, 2; coach and car makers, 8; saddlers, 40; harness-makers, 8; rope-makers, 46; paper-makers, 3; letter-press printers, 6; book-binder, 1; chandeliers and soap boilers, 14; painters and glaziers, 61; net-makers, 3; sail-makers, 8; sieve-makers, 4; draughtsmen, 3; civil engineers, 19; land-surveyors, 50; road contractors and makers, 12; manufacturers of sundries, 10; furniture broker, 1; upholsterer, 1; glass and delf dealer, 1; book-sellers and stationers, 3; timber-merchant, 1; coal-merchants, 2; ironmongers, 5; merchants of unspecified classes, 57; dealers of unspecified classes, 238; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 288; shop-assistants, 117; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 22; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 17.

Fairs.—The following are the principal fairs held within the county of Waterford:—Affane, May 14, Aug. 12, and Nov. 22; Ballyduff, Jan. 6, March 12, June 29, and Sept. 8; Ballinamutina, April 17, Sept. 8, and Nov. 14; Ballykeerogue, Oct. 2 and 20; Cappoquin, March 17, July 5, and Sept. 29; Clashmore, near Dungarvan, Feb. 10, May 20, Aug. 20, and Dec. 16; Clashmore, near Waterford, Feb. 10, May 20, Aug. 20, and Dec. 16; Dromana, June 5, and Sept. 4 and 19; Dungarvan, June 22, Aug. 27, and Nov. 8; New fairs second Wednesday in every month; Kilgobinet, Feb. 11 and Dec. 21; Kilmac-thomas, Feb. 2, March 17, May 12, Aug. 12, Sept. 29, and Dec. 6 and 21; Knockboy, Sept. 8 and Dec. 14; Lismore, Feb. 14, May 25, Sept. 25, and Nov. 12; Mountain-Castle, May 1; Newton, Jan. 6, May 1, June 29, and Nov. 11 and 22; Portlaw, May 28, Aug. 26, and Easter Monday; Stradbally, June 1 and Sept. 14; Tallow, March 1, Oct. 10, Dec. 8, and Trinity Monday; Waterford, May 4, June 24, and Oct. 25; Windy Gap, Corpus Christi and Aug. 21; and Whitechurch, Aug. 5.

Fisheries.—The marine waters at and off the entrance of Youghal bay, from Cable Island in co. Cork to Ardigna Head, contain the following fishing-grounds:—Whiting bay and Channel-way in 11 fathoms, Crassick in 8 fathoms, the Pool in 6 fathoms, the Guilen in 6 fathoms, and Scolbert, in 11 fathoms;—all these are within a league of the harbour's mouth; and, when bait full in, they abound in hake and other fish. About 2 leagues south-south-east of Cable Island lies Harold in 20 or 27 fathoms; and between Harold and Channel-way lies Haking-Ground in 16 fathoms. Ardmore bay is a fishing-ground in from 8 to 10 fathoms. About a league south-south-east of Ardmore Head is a fishing-ground in from 20 to 27 fathoms. The Mead of Dungarvan, the best fishing-ground on the coast of Waterford, extends from Mine Head to the vicinity of Hlook Tower on the Wexford side of the entrance of Waterford Harbour, bears about south-east, has soundings along shore of from 7 to 12 fathoms, and off to sea 40 fathoms, and is remarkable for hake, and yields fish close in-shore. The Nymph Bank, distant about 11 leagues south-east and south-west, abounds with fish, but is seldom visited by any fishermen from the Waterford coast. Fishing-grounds between the Mead of Dungarvan and the Nymph Bank have abundance of cod and ling in 42 fathoms of water; but, like the Nymph Bank itself, they are hardly ever visited. A ledge which stretches westward across Trainore bay, nearly a league in length, is remarkable for cod, ling, and hake. Berthnaringe, a bank about 2 miles in length, in the vicinity of the Islands of Icanne, abounds in all sorts of fish usual on the coast. The Veagh, extending about $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile east-south-eastward from a point about a league west-south-west of Great Newtown Head, is remarkable for almost all kinds of fish.—The boats and fishermen employed in the Waterford fisheries in 1830, were all classified under the district of Dungarvan, and consisted of 69 decked vessels, of aggregate 1,239 tons, worked by 383 men, 64 half-decked vessels, of 960 tons, worked by 320 men, 40 open sail-boats worked by 280 men, and 270 row-boats worked by 1,080 men,—in all, 1,983 fishermen; and those of 1836 were classified under the coast-guard districts of Knockadown, Ardmore, Helwick Head, Bonmahon, Island-Icane, Ballymacaw, and Dunmore, and consisted of 101 half-decked vessels, of 1,678 tons, worked by 593 men, 52 open sail-boats worked by 301 men, and 265 row-boats worked by 1,260 men.

—in all, 2,156 fishermen,—of whom 130 belonged to the district of Knockadoon, or Yonghal bay, 252 to that of Ardmore, 999 to that of Helwick Head or Dunganvan, 220 to that of Bonmahon, 72 to that of Island-Icane, 264 to that of Ballymacaw, and 219 to that of Dunmore or Waterford Harbour.

Communications.—The route of the line of railway from Waterford to Limerick, and to the Dublin and Cork line of railway, traverses part of the small section of the county lying on the left bank of the Suir. The projected Waterford, Wexford, Wicklow, and Dublin railway, 150 miles in length, will not intersect the county. The recently proposed Wexford, Waterford, and Valentia railway, to connect with the Waterford, Limerick, and Cork railways, and to form the most rapid and direct communication between the nearest available port to South Wales, and the nearest packet-station to America, is designed to make use of the portion of the Waterford and Dublin railway between the city of Waterford and the town of New Ross, and will greatly add to the projected facilities of communication affecting the lower valley of the Suir. The principal roads which traverse any part of the county are the Waterford and Cork mail-road, by way of Kilmacthomas, Dunganvan, Cappoquin, Lismore, and Tallow; the mail-roads from Waterford to Limerick, to Dublin, and to Wexford, through parts of the small district on the left bank of the Suir; and the brief lines of mail-road from Waterford to respectively Portlaw, Tramore, Passage, and Dunmore,—the last in connection with the mail packet station to England. The inland navigations were noticed in the section headed 'Waters.' The principal harbours are those of Waterford, Dunganvan, and Yonghal; and the first of these is the scene of great hustle and traffic in the communication of the city of Waterford, the towns of Carrick-on-Suir and Clonmel, and the whole of the extensive inland navigation of the Barrow, with the various ports of the south and the east of Ireland, with the western ports of England and Wales, and with various ports of the British colonies and of several foreign countries.

Divisions and Towns.—The county is divided into the liberties of the city of Waterford, on the river Suir, near the north-east; the baronies of Gualtier, in the east; Middlethird, immediately west of Gualtier and the city; Upperthird, north-west of Middlethird; Glenahiry on the Suir, immediately west of the northern part of Upperthird; Decies-without-Drum, west of Middlethird, and south-west of Upperthird and of Glenahiry; Decies-within-Drum, on the coast, south-west and south of Decies-without-Drum, and in the southernmost part of the county; and Coshmore and Coshbride, west of Decies-without-Drum, and in the westernmost part of the county. The Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108 and 109, transferred the parish of Kilbarry and parts of the parishes of Killeurreehan, St. John's-Without, Kill-St.-Nicholas, and St. Stephen-Without, from the quondam county of the city of Waterford to the barony of Gualtier,—pop., 3,673; and the parish of Kilsternan and part of the parish of Trinity-Without, from the quondam county of the city of Waterford to the barony of Middlethird,—pop. 2,683; and the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the parishes of Monksland and Kilbarrymeaden, one townland of the parish of Newcastle, two townlands of the parish of Stradbally, five townlands of the parish of Rosmire, and 21 townlands of the parish of Ballylneauen, from the barony of Upperthird to that of Decies-without-Drum,—pop. 11,696; and one townland of the parish of Drumeamonn from the barony of Middle-third to that of Gualtier,—pop. 18. The liberties of the city contain 7 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; the barony of Gualtier contains 17 whole parishes, and part of four other parishes; the barony of Middlethird contains 8 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; the barony of Upperthird contains 7 whole parishes and part of 5 other parishes, the barony of Glenahiry contains 1 whole parish and part of another parish, the barony of Decies-without-Drum contains 16 whole parishes and part of 3 other parishes, the barony of Decies-within-Drum contains 6 whole parishes, and part of another parish; and the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride contains 4 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes. The towns and principal villages are Dunmore, Cheekpoint, and Passage, in Gualtier; Tramore and Amestown, in Middlethird; Portlaw, Carrickbeg, Rathgormack, Scronthea, and part of Clonmel, in Upperthird; Bonmahon, Dunganvan, Kilmacthomas, Kill, Knockmahon, and Stradbally, in Decies-without-Drum; Aglish, Villierstown, Ardmore, Clashmore, and Ringville, in Decies-within-Drum; and Lismore, Cappoquin, Tallow, Tallow-bridge, and Ballyduff, in Coshmore and Coshbride.—The county of Waterford is ecclesiastically divided into the diocese of Waterford and the larger part of the diocese of Lismore. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the number of parishes and churches at respectively 74 and 21, assigns 34 parishes and 8 churches to the dio. of Waterford, and 40 parishes and 13 churches to the dio. of Lismore.

Social Condition.—The character and circumstances of the peasantry have undergone little change since they were described as follows by the Rev. H. Ryland in the year 1824:—"No considerable distinction is perceptible in the condition of all those personally engaged in the cultivation of the soil. The holder of land varying from ten to fifty acres may be more plentifully and more constantly supplied with food than the cottier whom he employs; he may exhibit a more respectable appearance at a funeral, or at his place of worship, but this difference does not sufficiently distinguish them to enable us to arrange them in two classes; comparing their general habits, we shall find them in their enjoyments, their conveniences and manner of living, very nearly resembling each other. The privations and wretchedness of the Irish peasantry have been depicted even to loathing, and yet the picture has not been overcharged. In their habitations, furniture, diet, clothing, in the education and in the provision for their children, they are not superior to the Russian boot. Comparing their physical condition with that of the same class in other countries, and taking into account the relative intelligence of the parties, it may be safely asserted that the lowest class in Ireland is the most miserable in the world. Nothing can appear more disgusting or more repugnant to every idea of neatness than the interior of an Irish cabin. There is no exaggeration in the multiplied statements on this head; their hovels are, literally speaking, shared with their pigs and poultry; and, as it has been well remarked, when the intruder is occasionally repulsed, the perseverance of the animals attests the frequency of their visits. The food of the peasantry is universally potatoes and skimmed milk; and in the many cases where a cow is not kept, salt becomes a substitute for milk during a considerable portion of the year. Throughout extensive tracts of country, animal food is never tasted, even by the better class of farmers, except perhaps at a festival or a wedding. The condition of the females has fortunately engaged the attention of those who can best appreciate what their sex and condition require, and who will learn with regret that their strength and constitution yield at an early age to the destructive and unsuitable employments imposed upon them. The clothing of the peasantry is that in which they are least deficient, I mean the out-of-door dress, for the furniture of their beds is but too often a very small addition to their ordinary apparel. In the article of clothing, the condition of the peasantry has been improved. It is in the recollection of persons still living, that the dress of farmers who brought their goods to a market at Waterford, formerly consisted of a loose greatcoat tied round the body with a band of hay, without shoes or stockings, shirt, or hat. It would be tedious to dwell on this part of the subject; a deficiency of food and clothing implies a want of the other necessities of life. When these habitual privations are rendered more acute by a year of scarcity, and when they are attended, as they generally are, with mental anxiety, the intensity of suffering may be estimated by the inevitable result, disease assuming a slow but a fatal character, and already well known by the name of typhus fever, the consequence and the remedy of the vices and improvidence of man. For the origin of this misery and degradation, we are to look into circumstances over which the peasant has no control. It is not choice which makes him abstain from animal food; he does not prefer from choice the association with filthy animals; if he endures the unwholesomeness of a crowded, dark, and smoky hovel, it is because its imperfect construction and the want of clothes and fuel enforce him to recur to such expedients to procure the necessary temperature; in a word, necessity is the cause of the peasant's wretchedness, and the consequence of his wretchedness is indolence and filth, and ultimately discontent and insurrection. The cultivators of the soil in England and in this country are differently estimated. In England, the third part of the produce of a farm is usually allotted to the occupier; here the entire produce, deducting tithes and taxes, and the potatoes and milk consumed, are exacted by the landlord. Supposing that the occupier's portion is, in both cases, barely a subsistence, the portion appropriated in England exceeds that in this country as much as the mode of living of the English farmer exceeds that of the Irish. It is said that an Irish farm, if properly cultivated, might produce much more than it now does, leaving the landlord the same rent, and giving to the occupier a more suitable remuneration. This cannot be denied. But where is the skill, and capital, and energy, without which this increased production cannot be effected. Procure for the Irish peasant these requisites, and then the rents now exacted will not be exorbitant; but until this can be accomplished, let the portion allotted to him be more commensurate with his reasonable wants. Rent should be the surplus of the nett produce, after deducting the taxes and a fair remuneration to the occupier. A great source of the misery of Ireland is the food of the lowest classes. I do not mean to adopt all the reasonings of some who have written on this subject; but it cannot be denied, that the simplicity and cheapness of the food consumed, affords to the avaricious landlord a mean of estimating the minimum of produce which must be deducted for the use of the occupant, or when the proprietor is excusable, enables the farmer to carry competition to the greatest length. When we attempt to discover the source to which we are to look for an explanation of the misery and degradation of the Irish peasantry, it is too much the custom to fasten upon some one particular circumstance as the origin from which the entire evil results. Still, amidst all these gloomy and disheartening appearances, there are some faint indications of more cheering days. Amidst all the depravity of the times, there are not a few redeeming virtues hovering about the Irish peasant, which encourage the hope that he may again assume the proud rank in the scale of humanity which anciently belonged to his character and nation. The hospitality of the country flourishes in all its pristine vigour; the traveller, even the wailing wretched beggar, enters without hesitation, and seats himself freely at the fireside of the most perfect stranger. If, on some occasions, a portion of the frugal meal is not pressed on the superior visitor, it is because they esteem it unworthy his acceptance, and dread even the semblance of presumption. The recklessness and total absence of selfishness, which are constantly exhibited, are almost incredible. When a prospect of temporary enjoyment is held out, as a hurling-match or a horse-race, sports of which he is passionately fond, the Irish peasant has been known to rush from the calmity of a legal process, and to riot in unrestrained pleasure, not knowing whether at his return at midnight he should have a farm to support, or a roof to shelter him. He is much attached to his devotions, and most regular in his attendance at chapel. The lower orders are susceptible of singular attachment to the persons of their superiors, an attachment partly derived from the custom of fosterage, which in former times connected the different ranks in this country in the same way as patron and client united the corresponding classes in ancient Rome. Those qualities, which are now converted into vices, may again be restored to their true tone and healthfulness. The Irish peasant is already free from selfishness; he is generous by habit and by nature, and kindness may again induce him to be attached and grateful."

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools within the county of Waterford was 284, of scholars 15,182, of male scholars 9,476, of female scholars 5,524, of scholars whose sex was not specified 182, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,373, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 5, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 96, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 13,062, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 46; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 284, of scholars 15,453, of male scholars 9,356, of female scholars 5,735, of scholars whose sex was not specified 362, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,407, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 7, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 98, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 13,871, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 70. In 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 52 schools, conducted by 42 male and 17 female teachers, attended by 4,153 male and 3,340 female scholars, and assisted during the year with £638 11s. 8d. in salaries, £73 10s. 6d. in free stock, and £82 19s. 7d. in school-requisites at half-price. The statistics of schools and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834 are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be estimated by reference to the articles LISMORE and WATERFORD (CITY OF). In 1843, the number of persons committed on charges of felony within the county, exclusive of the city, was 500; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 83; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 17. Of the 500 committed on charges of felony, 136 were charged with offences against the person, 37 with offences against property committed with violence, 120 with offences against property committed without violence, 1 with a malicious offence against property, 2 with offences against the currency, and 204 with offences not included in the above categories; 7 were sentenced to transportation, 131 were sentenced to imprisonment, 5 were sentenced to whipping, 45 were sentenced to pay fines, 9 were not sentenced or were discharged on sureties, 180 were found not guilty on trial, 101 had no bill found against them, and 12 were not prosecuted. On Jan. 1, 1844, the constabulary force of the county, exclusive of that of the city, consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 5 second-rate head-constables, 25 constables, 92 first-rate sub-constables, 8 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining that force during 1843 was £8,963 3s. The head-quarters of the constabulary are at Dungarvan; and the head-quarters of their five districts, comprising 33 stations, are at Dungarvan, Cappoquin, Kilmacthomas, Ballinacult, and Tramore. The staff of the county militia is stationed in the city of Waterford. Stipendiary magistrates are resident at Waterford and Dungarvan. The county gaol is at Waterford; bridewells are at Waterford, Dungarvan, Lismore, and Carrickbeg; and the district lunatic asylum, to which the county is entitled to send 73 patients, is in Waterford. The assizes are held at Waterford; courts of quarter-sessions, at Dungarvan, Lismore, Waterford, and Carrickbeg; and courts of petty-sessions, at Ardmore, Calahane, Cappoquin, Carrickbeg, Clashmore, Clommel, Dungarvan, Kilmacthomas, Lismore, Portlaw, Stradbally, Tallow, Tramore, Villiers-town, and Waterford. A savings' bank is at Waterford; and loan funds are at Bonmahon, Dungarvan, Gualtier, Kilmacthomas, Lismore, Newtown, Tramore, Villiers-town, and Waterford. Workhouses are at Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore; fever hospitals are at Dungarvan, Lismore, and Tallow; and dispensaries are at Ard, Ardmore, Ballyduff, Bonmahon, Cappoquin, Dungarvan, Dunmore, Kilmacthomas, Lismore, Mayfield, Portlaw, Ringagona, Tallow, Tramore, and Waterford. The amount of grand jury presentments, in 1842, was £25,100; the annual value of property valued for the poor-rate is £289,124. The number of tenements valued for the poor-rate in the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride is 3,203,—in Decies-within-Drum, 2,633,—in Decies-without-Drum, 2,668,—in Gualtier, 1,174,—in Glenahiry, 814,—in Middlethird, 1,345,—in Upperthird, 3,114,—in the entire county, 15,271; and of this total, 7,067 are valued under £5,—2,330, under £10,—1,302, under £15,—848, under £20,—659, under £25,—430, under £30,—743, under £40,—495, under £50,—and 1,397, at and above £50. The county sent 10 members to the Irish parliament, or 2 from the county at large, 2 from the city of Waterford, and 2 from each of the boroughs of Dungarvan, Lismore, and Tallow; but—irrespective of its small portion of the borough of Clommel—it sends only 5 to the imperial parliament, or 2 from the county at large, 2 from the city of Waterford, and 1 from the borough of Dungarvan. Constituency of the county at large, in 1844, 880; of whom 182 were in Decies-without-Drum, 148 in Decies-within-Drum, 166 in Upperthird, 99 in Middlethird, 144 in Coshmore and Coshbride, 118 in Gualtier, and 23 in Glenahiry.

Pop., in 1831, exclusive of the county of the city, 148,233. Houses 21,234. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 15,202; in manufactures and trade, 3,535; in other pursuits, 5,627. Pop., in 1841, exclusive of the liberties or municipal district of the city, 172,971. Males, 85,349; females, 87,622; families, 28,531. Inhabited houses, 25,367; uninhabited complete houses, 778; houses in the course of erection, 100. First-class inhabited houses, 610; second-class, 6,225; third-class, 11,116; fourth-class, 7,416. Families residing in first-class houses, 716; in second-class houses, 7,348; in third-class houses, 12,386; in fourth-class houses, 8,081. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 20,499; in manufactures and trade, 5,159; in other pursuits, 2,873. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 529; on the directing of labour, 8,831; on their own manual labour, 18,279; on means not specified, 892. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 39,135; to clothing, 2,479; to lodging, 3,628; to health, 41; to charity, 8; to justice, 346; to education, 203; to religion, 192; unclassified, 3,127; without any specified occupations, 4,598. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 10,011; to clothing, 4,081; to lodging, 15; to health, 67; to charity, 15; to justice, 1; to education, 102; to religion, 98; unclassified, 7,306; without any specified occupations, 35,311. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 20,087; who could read but not write, 7,438; who could neither read nor write, 47,157. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 9,277; who could read but not write, 7,935; who could neither read nor write, 60,046. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 6,471; attending superior schools, 511. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 5,193; attending superior school,—81. Percentage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 47; married, 48; widowed, 5. Percentage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 41; married, 46; widowed, 13. Physicians, 15; surgeons, 14; apothecaries, 10; druggists, 2; midwives, 19; nurse-tenders, 48; coroners, 2; barristers, 4; attorneys, 13; city constables, 4; law clerk, 1; excise officers, 92; bailiffs, 32; gaol-keepers, 6; inspector of weights, 1; school-teachers, 125 males and 50 females; ushers and tutors, 75 males and 12 females; governesses, 40; dancing-masters, 2; librarian, 1; clergymen of the Establishment, 24; Roman Catholic clergymen, 62; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 24; monks, 80; nuns, 97; sextons, 3.

Antiquities.—Cromlechs occur in the liberties of Waterford; at Mount Druid, 3 miles from Waterford; at Kilmacombe hill; at Sugar-loaf hill; at Dnnhill; at Gurtreen; and in the vicinity of Stradbally. Pillar-towers occur at Ardmore and Clonagan; and a curious old tower is situated in Waterford. The chief of numerous old castles, in various states of conservation, are the castle of Lismore; the castle of Little Island; vestiges of about 20 castles and towers in Waterford; the castle of Crook; the castle of Cullen; the castle of Carrickbeg; a castle in the vicinity of Churchtown; the castle of Ballyclough; the castle of Darinlar; the castle of Foddens; the castle of Clonagan; the castle of Kilmacthomas; a castle in the vicinity of Stradbally; the castle of Dungarvan; the castles of Modelligo and Whitechurch; the castle of Kilbree; the castle of Strancally; the castle of Clough; the castle of Dnnhill; and the castles of Conagh and Castlereagh. The principal old monastic structures, whether existing or extinct, conspicuous or obscure, well-known or doubtful, were an abbey of regular canons of the order of St. Augustine at Dungarvan, alleged to have been founded in the 7th century by St. Garvan; another of the same order, at Darinis, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Molanside, and granted at the dissolution to Sir Walter Raleigh; a third of the same order, at Mothel, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Brogan, and granted at the dissolution to Sir Walter Raleigh; a fourth of the same order, at Lismore, alleged to have been founded, in 630 by St. Carthage, and to have been made the seat of the bishopric of Lismore; a fifth of the same order, at Glasmore, alleged to have been founded in the 7th century by St. Cronan, and granted at the dissolution to Sir Walter Raleigh; a sixth of the same order, at Ardmore, alleged to have been founded in the 5th century by St. Declan, and to have been made the seat of a bishopric; a seventh of the same order, at Dyserth-Nairbre, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Maidoe of Ferns; an abbey of Victorine canons, in the parish of St. Catherine, and vicinity of Waterford, alleged to have been founded by the Osmen, endowed in 1210 by Elias Fitz-Norman, and granted at the dissolution to the Earl of Ormond; an establishment of Knights Hospitallers, at Kilbarry, founded in the 12th century, and granted at the dissolution to the Earl of Ormond; a second establishment of Knights Hospitallers, at Killure, originally belonging to the Knights Templars, and granted at the dissolution to Francis Goffen; a third establishment of Knights Hospitallers, at Crook, originally belonging to the Knights Templars, and granted at the dissolution to Sir John Davis; a fourth establishment of Knights Hospitallers, at Ringcurran or Templemichael, granted at the dissolution to Sir Walter Raleigh; a Benedictine abbey, in the parish of St. John, and vicinity of Waterford, founded in the 12th century by John, Earl of Morton, and granted at the dissolution to William Wyse; a Dominican friary, at Waterford, founded in 1235 by the citizens, and granted at the dissolution to James White; a monastery of Friars Minors, at Waterford, founded about 1240 by Sir Hugh Purcell, erected into an hospital in 1544, and afterwards granted to James Walsh; a second monastery of Friars Minors, at Carrickbeg, founded in 1336 by the first Earl of Ormond, and granted at the dissolution to the then Earl of Ormond; and an Augustinian friary, at Dungarvan, patronized in the 13th century by the Earls of Desmond, and possessed subsequent to the dissolution by the Earl of Cork.

History.—In the time of the geographer Strabo, near the middle of the second century, a people called the Menapii, whose origin and character are matter of much dispute among antiquaries, inhabited the territories which now constitute the counties of Waterford and Wexford. "The next people we meet with in this country," says Dr. Smith, "were a powerful clan, called the Desii, from whom the barony of Desies (Decies) is denominated; for they subsisted here till the time of the English invasion. The history of this clan has something singular in it. They were originally planted in Meath, and possessed a large tract of country near Tara, called Desie-Temragh. From the remains of this family, the barony of Desie (Deere), in the county of Meath, took its name. They drew their descent from Fiachadh Suidhe, eldest son to Fedlimid the lawgiver, who was supreme monarch of Ireland from the year of Christ 164 to the year 174. But Fiachadh died in the lifetime of his father, and though he left issue, yet the crown descended in the line of his younger brother, in the person of Cormac MacArt, who began his reign in the year 254. Aongus or Æneas, grandson to Fiachadh Suidhe, a prince of an high spirit, resented his exclusion, and, under pretext of some injury offered him by the reigning monarch, raised a body of forces, broke into the palace of Tarah, and not only slew Kellach, the king's son, by his father's side, but thrust out the king's eye with his spear.

This event happened in 278. King Cormac quelled the rebellion in seven successful battles, and drove Ængus, with two of his brothers, and others of the Desii adhering to him, into Munster, where, either by force of arms or concession, (for the story is told both ways,) they settled themselves and became inhabitants of that tract of country which extended from the river Suir to the sea, and from Lismore to Credan Head, comprehending, in a manner, all that territory since called the county of Waterford; and they gave it the name of Desii, in memory of their former settlements of the same name in Meath. From this time, Desie in Meath, and Desie in Munster, came to be called North and South Desie, and the latter also bore the name, in Irish, of Nan-Desie. Long after this period, Ængus MacNacragh, king of Munster, who was converted to the Christian faith by the ministry of St. Patrick, enlarged the territory of the Desii, by annexing to it the lands of Magh-femin, which extended north of the river Suir as far as Corca-Eathrach, comprehending the country about Clommel, the barony of Middlethird, and the large extended plains near Cashel, called Gowlin Vale, from which time the name of North Desii, that is, those of Meath, became antiquated. The lands comprised in this grant of King Ængus were distinguished by the name of Desii - Thunseart or North Desii, and the former territories in this county retained the name of Desii-Deisgeart or South Desii. St. Declan, one of the precursors of St. Patrick, was descended from the family of these Desii; was the first who preached to them the Christian religion, and converted numbers of them in the year 402, thirty years before St. Patrick came to Ireland on the like mission. A manuscript life of St. Declan, out of which Archbishop Usher has published some extracts, gives a catalogue of the chieftains of the Desii, not down from prince Ængus, but from Cogan, one of his brothers;—thus, Eogan, Carbery, Righ Ruadh, Conry-Bellovoir, Cuan-Cain-Brethach, Mesfore, Mosegra, Moscorb, Artoorb, Eogan II., Brian, Niath, Ludhoich, Trene, Erc, St. Declan. These were the chieftains of the Desii from the time they were driven out of Desie-Temragh to the birth of St. Declan. Libanus succeeded Erc in the chieftainry of the Desii; and because he continued an obstinate Pagan, and could by no means be prevailed upon to embrace Christianity, St. Declan persuaded the subjects of Libanus who had received baptism to forsake him, and follow himself; for that, in consideration of his descent, he had as good a right to rule them as the other; upon which the multitude followed him, were blessed by St. Patrick, and then asked St. Declan who should be their new chieftain? He gave the government to Fergall MacCormac, who was of the tribe of the Desii, and of the same line with St. Declan; and they were all pleased with the change. In other ancient writings we meet with more chieftains of the Desii, viz., Cobthaig Moeltreide, from whom St. Carthage, who died in 637, obtained the territories about Lismore, as an endowment for a cathedral there to be established; and Branfinius, son to Moeltreide, and prince of the Desii of Munster, who is said, in the Annals of the Four Masters, to have died in the year 666, from which time no other chieftain of this territory occurs till Cormac MacCulenan, who was bishop of Lismore and prince of the Desii in Munster, and died, according to the above-mentioned annals, in 918. This person must be distinguished from another of the same name and surname, who was king of Munster and archbishop of Cashel, and died ten years earlier than our Cormac. Among other lay princes who appeared in the synod of Athboy in 1167, Dunchad O'Feulain, chieftain of the Desii, was one; but whether he was chieftain of the Desii of Munster, or those of the same tribe who remained in Meath after Angus and his faction were driven out of it as aforesaid, is uncertain. In 1169, Melaghlín O'Feolain, prince of the Desii, was taken prisoner by Earl Strongbow when the city of Waterford was stormed, but was saved from death by the mediation of Dermot Mac-Murrough, king of Leinster. In him ended the chieftainry of the Desii, and no traces of consequence remain of this territory, except in the large extended barony of Desies in this county, which was soon after established. * * Besides the territories of the Desii, we read in our ancient historians of two other small tracts, one called Coscradía, and the other Hy-Lyathain, on the south, about Ardmore, and opposite to Youghal. But as these were narrow tracts, and the inhabitants of no great figure, they were probably early swallowed up by the encroachments of their more powerful neighbours, the Desii; for we read nothing of them after the seventh century. The names of the principal inhabitants of this county in the reign of Queen Elizabeth were these, viz., the Aylwads, the Browns, O'Briens, Bracks, Bourkes, Condons, Creghs, O'Connerys, Daltons, Dobbins, Everards, Fitzgarrets or Fitzgeralds, O'Feolains, Fitz-Theobalds, Leas or Lenthams, Maddens, Manlevilles, Merryfields, Morgans, O'Maghers, MacHenricks, Nugents, Osbornes, Poers, Prendergasts, Rochfords, Sherlocks, Tobins, Walls, Walshes, Waddings, Wyases, Whites, &c."

WATERFORD,

A quondam district of peculiar civil jurisdiction, usually called the Liberties of Waterford, or the County of the City of Waterford, near the south-eastern extremity of Munster. It was bounded, on the north-west and north, by the county of Kilkenny; on the east, by the county of Kilkenny and the barony of Gualtier; and on the south and west, by the barony of Middlethird. Its length, eastward, was 4½ miles; its greatest breadth, southward, was 4 miles. But a small detached district not included in these definitions lies at East Passage, nearly 6 miles from the city. Area of the whole district, 10,050 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches,—of which 614 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are tideway.

The County of the City.—The county of the city of Waterford was constituted by charter of 16 Elizabeth, and was defined by charter of 2 Charles I. to comprise the parish of Kilculleheen on the left bank of the Suir, all the lands of Ballinakill, Killure, Kilbarry, and Killoteran on the right bank of the Suir, and also all the water of Waterford Harbour and the river Suir, from the entrance between Rodybanke and Rindoeane up to Carrick. The territories of the county thus consist of the site of the city, and two beautiful districts mutually separated by the Suir, the larger lying around the city on the right bank of the river, and the smaller lying opposite the city on the left bank. We reserve a general view of the surface, as to its outlines and its picturesqueness, for the section on the 'Environs' of the city; and we refer to the section on the 'Minerals' of the county, for a notice of the substrata.—The county of the city contained part of the parish of Kill-St.-Nicholas, and the whole of the parishes of Kilbarry, Kilculleheen, Killoteran, St. John's-Within, St. John's-Without, St. Michael, St. Olave, St. Patrick, St. Peter, St. Stephen-Within, St. Stephen-Without, Trinity-Within, and Trinity-Without. The Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108 and 100, dissolved the county of the city, erected the civic and central portion, to be noticed in next section, into the municipal and urban district of Waterford, and transferred the parish of Kilbarry, and parts of the parishes of Kilculleheen, St. John's-Without, Kill-St.-Nicholas, and St. Stephen-Without, containing a pop. of 3,673, to the barony of Gualtier, and the parish of Killoteran, and part of the parish of Trinity-Without, containing a pop. of 2,683, to the barony of Middlethird. Pop. of the county of the city, in 1831, 28,821. Houses 3,614. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 270; in manufactures and trade, 2,323; in other pursuits, 3,234.

The Municipal District.—The district which now constitutes the Liberties of the City of Waterford comprises a pendicle of country around the small suburb of Ferrybank on the left bank of the river, and a series of pendicles of country among the outskirts of the city on the right bank of the river; yet, in a general view, it is almost strictly urban. Its length and breadth, eastward and southward, are each about 2,000 yards; and its area is 668 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches,—of which 136 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches are tideway of the river Suir. It contains part of the parishes of Kilculleheen, St. John's-Without, St. Stephen's-Without, and Trinity-Without, and the whole of the parishes of St. John's-Within, St. Michael, St. Olave, St. Patrick, St. Peter, St. Stephen's-Within, and Trinity-Within. The first of these parishes—that of KILCULLEHEEN [which see]—is noticed in its own alphabetical place; and the others will form the subjects of successive sections of the present article. Pop. of the municipal district of the city of Waterford, in 1841, 23,216.† Males, 10,227; females, 12,989; families, 5,347. Inhabited houses, 2,978; uninhabited complete houses, 153; houses in the course of erection, 19. First-class inhabited houses, 657; second-class, 1,584; third-class, 650; fourth-class, 87. Families residing in first-class houses, 1,492; in second-class houses, 2,910; in third-class houses, 806; in fourth-class houses, 96. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,136; in manufactures and trade, 2,832; in other pursuits, 1,379. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 227; on the directing of labour, 2,886; on their own manual labour, 1,656; on means not specified, 578. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 1,051; to clothing, 845; to lodging, 1,413; to health, 42; to charity, 1; to justice, 142; to education, 33; to religion, 35; unclassified, 2,378; without any specified occupations, 770. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 297; to clothing, 978; to lodging, 37; to health, 14; to charity, 2; to justice, 3; to education, 54; to religion, 55; unclassified, 2,203; without any specified occupations, 5,870. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,288; who could read but not write, 1,156; who could neither read nor write, 2,441. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,005; who could read but not write, 2,636; who could neither read nor write, 5,010. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 777; attending superior schools, 86. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 494; attending superior schools, 111. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 43; married, 51; widowed, 6. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 46; married, 38; widowed, 16. wholly within the municipal borough of Waterford; and is distributed among the South, the Tower, and the Custom-House wards. Length, eastward, 17 chains; extreme breadth, $12\frac{1}{2}$ chains; area, 13 acres, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,146; in 1841, 3,166. Houses 326.—St. John's-Within and St. John's.—Without are ecclesiastically treated as jointly one parish, constituting a rectory and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's, in the dio. of Waterford. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £34 16s. 9d., is inappropriate. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 300 or 400 at one service, and about 700 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Trinity. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 1,002 Churchmen, 135 Protestant dissenters, and 4,379 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools had on their books 91 boys and 59 girls. One of the schools was the Trinitarian Orphan School, supported by public subscription, and affording lodging and food to 27 boys and 30 girls; another was the Protestant Orphan School, supported by voluntary contributions; and a third was Newtown Boarding School, called Munster Provincial School, and supported by subscription. The workhouse of the Waterford Poor-law union is situated in St. John's parish, and has within its walls a National school.

Parish of St. John's-Without.—This parish is partly in the municipal borough of Waterford, and partly in the barony of Gualtier. Length, north-north-eastward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the borough section, 187 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches; of the Gualtier section, 732 acres, 15 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,078; in 1841, 3,313. Houses 486. Pop. of the borough section, in 1841, 1,781. Houses 288. The borough section lies partly in South ward, and partly in Tower ward; and the Gualtier section extends from the south-eastern extremity of the city to the Suir, is traversed by the roads from the city to Cheek-Point, Passage, Dunmore, Ballymacane, and Tramore, and contains the Ursuline Convent, the Orphan House, and the residences of Suirville, John's-hill, Suirview, Newtown-lodge, and Belview.—St. John's-Without is ecclesiastically treated as constituting one parish with St. John's-Within, noticed in the preceding paragraph.

Parish of St. Michael.—This parish lies wholly in the municipal borough of Waterford, partly in the South ward and partly in the Custom-House ward, and in the southern portion of the centre of the city. Length, northward, 10 chains; extreme breadth, 7 chains; area, 5 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,167; in 1841, 1,383. Houses 124.—St. Michael's is a curacy, and part of the benefice of TRINITY [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Minister's money, £36 18s. In 1831, the parishioners consisted of 126 Churchmen, 10 Protestant dissenters, and 1,081 Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 38 boys and 16 girls.

Parish of St. Olave.—This parish lies wholly in Custom-House ward, in the municipal borough of Waterford, and in the eastern portion of the city. Length, northward, $7\frac{1}{2}$ chains; extreme breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$ chains; area, 3 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 796; in 1841, 748. Houses 74.—St. Olave's is a curacy, and part of the benefice of TRINITY [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Minister's money, £16 4s. 7d. The church was built about 108 years ago, by means of funds provided by the Incorporated Society, but at what precise cost is unknown. Sittings 800; attendance 500. The Presbyterian meeting-house within the benefice of Trinity is attended by about 100; the Independent meeting-house, by 250; the Quakers' meeting-house, by 300; and the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by from 250 to 600. In 1834, the inhabitants of St. Olave's consisted of 356 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 505 Roman Catholics; an infant school was supported by voluntary contributions, and usually attended by about 90 scholars; and a daily school for girls was also supported by voluntary contributions, and had on its books 44 girls.

Parish of St. Patrick.—This parish lies wholly within the municipal borough of Waterford, in the north-western portion of the city, and partly in Custom-House ward, but chiefly in Centre ward. Length, northward, 10½ chains; extreme breadth, 10½ chains; area, 8 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,549; in 1841, 2,103. Houses 234.—St. Patrick's is a rectory, in the dio. of Waterford. The rectories of St. Patrick, St. Peter, St. Stephen, and St. John, constitute the benefice of St. Patrick, and the corps of the archdeaconry of Waterford. Length, north-north-westward, 61 chains; extreme breadth, 58 chains. Pop., in 1831, 10,297. Gross income, £384 12s. 10d.; nett, £293 5s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is an old building, of unknown date, but in good repair. Sittings 530; attendance not reported. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 300 to 400 at one service, and 700 at another. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 102 Churchmen, 34 Presbyterians, and 2,459 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,597 Churchmen, 36 Presbyterians, 147 other Protestant dissenters, and 8,918 Roman Catholics; 4 daily schools in the parish—each of two of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 177 boys and 115 girls; and 16 daily schools in the union had on their books 490 boys and 326 girls.

Parish of St. Peter.—This parish lies wholly within the municipal borough of Waterford, in the Custom-house ward, and in the eastern portion of the central district of the city. Length, northward, 6 chains; extreme breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$ chains; area, 3 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 922; in 1841, 781. Houses 61.—St. Peter's is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's, in the dio. of Waterford. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 200. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 349 Churchmen, 2 Presbyterians, 3 other Protestant dissenters, and 561 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 500 scholars; and 3 daily schools had on their books 98 boys and 129 girls. One of the daily schools was supported chiefly by subscriptions from the dean, the archdeacon, the clergy, and other parties; and another was the Female Blue-coat school, supported by an annual payment out of a bequest of £900 vested in the corporation of the city, and affording food, education, and apprentice-fees to 30 girls.

Parish of St. Stephen's-Within.—This parish lies wholly within the municipal borough of Waterford, in the South ward, and in the south-western portion of the city. Length, northward, 10½ chains; extreme breadth, $7\frac{1}{2}$ chains; area, 5 acres, 33 perches. The population of 1831 is given jointly with that of St. Stephen's-Without; and is returned, for the two parishes, at 1,702 by the Census, and 1,656 by the Ecclesiastical Authorities. Pop., in 1841, 1,073. Houses 108.—St. Stephen's-Within and St. Stephen's-Without are ecclesiastically treated as one parish, constituting a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick, in the dio. of Waterford. The Baptist meeting-house has an attendance of from 20 to 30. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 144 Churchmen, 6 Protestant dissenters, and 1,519 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £50 a-year from the corporation—had on their books 124 boys and 23 girls.

Parish of St. Stephen's-Without.—This parish lies partly at the south-western extremity of the municipal borough of Waterford, and partly within the barony of Gualtier. Length, northward, 28 chains; extreme breadth, 14 chains. Area of the Borough section, 17 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches; of the Gualtier section, 12 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the Borough section, 361; of the Gualtier section, 116. Houses in the Borough section, 54; in the Gualtier section, 27.—St. Stephen's-Without is ecclesiastically treated as forming one parish with St. Stephen's-Within, noticed in the preceding paragraph.

Parish of Trinity-Within.—This parish lies wholly in the municipal borough of Waterford, in Custom-house ward, and in the north-eastern portion of the city; and it extends some distance along the Suir, and is deeply intersected from the south by the parish of St. Olave. Length, eastward, 21 chains; extreme breadth, 12 chains; area, 14 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,895; in 1841, 1,401. Houses 174.—Trinity-Within and Trinity-Without are ecclesiastically treated as one parish, constituting a curacy, and part of the benefice of TRINITY [which see], in the dioc. of Waterford. Pop., in 1831, 13,485. Minister's money, £365 15s. 9d. The parochial church is the cathedral of the diocese; it was built about the year 1771, at a cost now unknown, out of funds provided by subscription, parochial assessments, and a donation from the impropriate tithes of Cahir parish, which were bequeathed for the repair, &c. of churches in the dioceses of Waterford and Lismore; and, having become materially damaged in 1815 by an accidental fire, it was repaired at the cost of £2,307 13s. 10½d., of which £1,846 3s. 1d. was a grant from the late Board of First Fruits, and £461 10s. 9½d. was a donation from the tithes of Cahir parish. Sittings 1,500; attendance, from 600 to 800. The Roman Catholic chapel of Trinity-Within has an attendance in summer of from 16,000 to 17,000 at eight services in the course of the day, and from 3,000 to 3,500 at evening service; and it is under the care of 14 clergymen, two of whom officiate also in the chapel of St. John's, and four in private chapels. There are also two Roman Catholic chapels in Trinity-Without; and the Protestant dissenting meeting-houses within the benefice, are noticed in the section on the parish of St. Olave. In 1831, the inhabitants of Trinity-Within and Trinity-Without consisted of 1,557 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, 210 other Protestant dissenters, and 11,701 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, held in the schoolhouse of the National school, was usually attended by about 450 scholars; and 13 daily schools—one of which was salaried with an unreported sum from the National Board, and one partially supported by voluntary contribution—had on their books 813 boys and 152 girls.

Parish of Trinity-Without.—This parish lies partly in the municipal borough of Waterford, and partly in the barony of Middlethird. Length, north-north-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the Borough section, 171 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches,—of which 35 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches, lie detached; of the Middlethird section, 806 acres, 23 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,770; in 1841, 11,505. Houses 1,777. Pop. of the Borough section, in 1841, 9,484. Houses 1,413. The detached district of the Borough section is not included in our statement of the length and breadth of the entire parish; it is situated in the extreme east of the city, partly in Custom-house ward, but chiefly in Tower ward; and it is washed, over a distance of 8 chains on the north, by the Suir. The main body of the Borough section is contiguous with the Middlethird section; and lies in the north-west of the city, partly in South ward, partly in Centre ward, and partly in West ward. The Middlethird section extends along the Suir, contains the residences of Rockview, Prospect-lodge, Summerland, and Rosamore, and is traversed by the roads from Waterford to Killoteran, Portlaw, Kilmacthomas, Kill, Bonmahon, and Annewstown.—Trinity-Without is ecclesiastically treated as constituting one parish with Trinity-Within; noticed in the preceding paragraph.

WATERFORD,

A post and market town, a sea-port, a borough, a city, and the capital of the county of Waterford, near the south-east extremity of co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the river Suir, 6 miles north-north-east of Tramore, 6 west-north-west of Passage, 9 north-west by north of Dummore, 11 south-south-west of New Ross, 12 east-north-east of Kilmacthomas, 12½ south-east by east of Carrick-on-Suir, 13½ south by east of Knocktopher, 17 south of Thomastown, 22 north-east by east of Dungarvan, 23 east-south-east of Clonmel, 23½ south by east of Kilkenny, 30½ west-south-west of Wexford, 41 north-east by east of Youghal, 64½ east-north-east of Cork, and 75½ south-south-west of Dublin.

Enviours.—“The entrance to Waterford,” from the north, says Mr. Inglis, “is extremely imposing: the river Suir is crossed by a very long wooden bridge; and the first part of the town one enters is the quay, which, whether in its extent, or in the breadth of the river, or in the beauty of the opposite banks, is unquestionably one of the finest quays I recollect to have seen. At full tide the views are indeed beautiful. The quay is little less than a mile in length; and the river is not much less than ½ of a mile wide. The opposite banks gently slope into green hills, well clothed with wood, and adorned with villas; and the church, called Christendom church, with its fine surrounding trees standing close to the water, adds greatly to the beauty of the prospect. The quay of Waterford reminded me of the Soane at Lyons.” “There is nothing in Ireland,” says Mr. Fraser, “to compare with the quay of Waterford. It is a mile in length, and generally about 900 feet in breadth, with sufficient depth of water to allow vessels of 800 tons burden to discharge their cargoes. Parallel to the quay is the wide street which takes its name, and in which the principal commercial business of the city is carried on. On the northern side of the river, the suburb of Ferrybank, in which are the principal ship-building yards, extends for a considerable distance; and the bank, which rises to a considerable elevation behind this suburb, is adorned with handsome villas and other accompanying plantations. All these, as seen from the bridge—the river, the shipping, the old town on the one hand, and the highly adorned banks on the other—constitute a scene of no ordinary description. Above the bridge, the quay has also been built for a considerable distance along the base of the hills, which rise boldly from the water's edge, and the ample river, which is navigable to Clonmel—a distance by water of about 34 miles—is seen winding between the softly-rounded headlands. To obtain a general view of Waterford, the river, and the adjacent country, let the traveller ascend the hill which rises abruptly to a considerable height on the north side of the river, and above the suburbs of Ferrybank. From various parts of the ridge, the city, with its steeple and towers, is seen, rising along the heights in all that picturesque irregularity for which the older towns are remarkable—the quay and the bridge are presented in their most pictorial points of view—the windings of the Suir for a considerable distance, above and below the town, can be traced—as also a great extent of the rich plain through which it flows; and a long range of country lying to the west, and terminated by Slievenaman and the mountains of Cummeragh, is subjected to the view. From the right bank of the river above the town, which also rises abruptly from the water's edge, and likewise attains to a considerable elevation, extensive views are also obtained of the upper reaches of the Suir, of those parts of the counties of Kilkenny and Waterford lying along, and, generally, of that part of the rich valley of the Suir, and of the hills which limit it." The immediate banks of the river, to the mean breadth of about a mile, and along a considerable distance eastward from both Ferrybank and the city, are singularly brilliant in their combinations of beautiful natural features with lusciously rich artificial decoration, and with the most thrilling views of great stretches of the river and of the surrounding country. "The various windings of the river," remarks the Rev. R. H. Ryland, "open new scenes as you advance: from one point, Waterford appears as if rising out of the river; as you proceed, the towers and steeples of the city are almost concealed by the green and gently sloping hills. The view from the hill of Faithleg is magnificent. In the direction of Waterford, the Suir is descending its winding channel, deeply sunk between cultivated hills; at a little distance from the town, the river, dividing into a double stream, encloses the Little Island, and uniting again, proceeds to receive its tributary waters; further on, as if stretched out immediately beneath, may be seen the confluence of the rivers Suir, Nore, and Barrow, which here unite their waters with a fulness and rapidity that might be taken for the violence of the ocean; the breadth at this place is nearly three miles. To the north, the background is terminated by Mount Leinster: Tory-hill, Slieve-hielta, and the Wexford mountains, complete the outline, until the view is bounded by the ocean towards the south." The drives toward the two favourite watering-places of Tramore and Dunmore lead almost immediately out to an uninteresting country, and disclose no scene or feature worth a tourist's notice; and even the drive westward, in the direction of the Marquis of Waterford's superb and extensive demesne of Curraghmore, though eventually enlivening and diversified, is prevailingly dull in the vicinity of the town. The principal of the numerous residences on the north bank of the river, and within about 3 miles of the city, are Greenville-park, Greenville-house, Bishop's-hall, Ballincarra-house, Fraser's-hall, Snow-hill-house, Glass-house, Belview-house, Snowhaven-house, Springfield-house, Larkfield-house, Killaspy-house, Dunkitt-house, Mullanbro-house, Sion-hill-house, Rockshire-house, Riverview, Mount-Misery-lodge, Newrath-house, Rockingham-house, Laurel-hill-house, Belmont-house, Abbey-house, Rockland-house, Rathcullihen-house, Christendom-house, Annemount-house, Mountain view, and Newtown-house; and the principal on the south bank of the river, without about 3 miles of the city, are Glenville, Moy-park, Belvidere-lodge, Newtown-house, John's-hill-house, Bellmount-house, Ballinakill-house, Grandstown, Mount-Pleasant, Faithleg-house, Springhill, Woodland-house, Ballycanvan-house, Blenheim-house, Ballygunnor-castle, Ballinamena-house, Williamstown-house, Evergreen-cottage, Pastime-Knock-house, Roanmore, Summerland, Rockview, Prospect-lodge, Oldcourt, Killoran, and Knock-house. "Taking a circle of 10 or 12 miles round Waterford," says Mr. Inglis, "the large properties are not so much overlaid as the smaller. The estates of the Waterford, the Duncannon, and the Devonshire families are not understood to be rack-rented; and are all under good management. The property in the worst condition is that of Mr. Lane Fox, who grants no leases, and whose tenantry are mostly in arrear. While at Waterford, I made frequent excursions into the surrounding country; and sufficiently verified the fact, that the smaller properties were very much overlaid. I found £5, £4 10s. and even £7 per acre paid for small farms; and in all these cases, potatoes formed the sole diet of the farmer, with occasionally the backbone of a pig. There is no possibility of living and paying such rents as I have mentioned. Many acknowledged that their arrears never could be paid; and that they had taken the land at such rents, merely as a refuge against starvation. This is universally the case where land is let by competition. Men who are unable to turn to any business but agriculture, will agree to pay any rent so long as want of employment prevails to so enormous an extent."

Interior of the Town.—A rivulet called St. John's Pill, runs in a serpentine course along the east side of the city to the Suir; but it cuts off only small outskirts of the streets, and, in its boldest and longest sweep, passes completely away from the edified portion of the town. The river Suir, while passing the town, has a breadth of from 230 to 350 yards; and it pursues an east-south-easterly direction to the termination of the street called the Mall, and then slowly curves to the commencement of a south-easterly direction at the mouth of St. John's Pill. The northern facade and chief thoroughfare of the city, which assumes the name of the Quay, and which has already been noticed as presenting so picturesque and noble an appearance to all points of observation on the north side of the river, measures almost to a yard one statute mile in length; but over the 320 yards of its extent above the bridge, it consists of a series of buildings pressing down to the water's edge, and bisected by three or four narrow lanes,—over the 260 yards of its extent, from the termination of the Mall to the mouth of St. John's Pill, it consists of a comparatively narrow terrace or one-sided street,—and only over the intermediate 1,180 yards of its extent, from the bridge to the Mall, does it consist of the broad esplanade, and the imposing line of public edifices, ancient structures, spacious shops, and respectable dwellings which give so powerful a character to all the river-views of the city. "Between the houses and the river, there is a flag-way for foot-passengers, and a road for carriages, the whole length of the quay. The part immediately adjoining the river is divided off from the road, and forms a delightful promenade. The carriage-way is now, and has been for many years, formed on what is called the M'Adam principle. For the advantages of this noble quay, we are indebted in a great measure to David Lewis, Esq., in whose mayoralty, in the year 1705, the quay was greatly enlarged, by throwing down the town walls. He also threw down Baron-strand-gate; filled the great ditch which then joined that gate and the town wall; and made a communication between the old quay and the new. The present quay, and several of the fine buildings on it, including the Exchange, were commenced in his time."—The Mall extends 300 yards south-westward from the Quay, and is the most spacious street in the interior of the city; Beresford-street extends 320 yards south-westward, in continuation of the Mall, and is a spacious, straight, and good street; and another street less spacious and less considerable than Beresford-street, extends 400 yards south-south-westward from the end of that street to the vicinity of the municipal boundaries. A crooked line of thoroughfare, called over its northern half Henrietta-street, and over its southern half Colebeck-street, goes off from the Quay at a point 230 yards above the lower end of the Mall, extends 200 yards southward to the junction of the Mall and Beresford-street, and is continued by a narrow but straight street, 200 yards south-south-eastward, to the vicinity of one of the bridges across St. John's Pill; and this line of thoroughfare is remarkable chiefly for having on its east side the small open area containing the cathedral of Waterford. A principal line of thoroughfare, bearing in successive portions the names of Barron-strand-street, Broad-street, Michael-street, and John-street, goes off from the Quay at a point 290 yards above the north end of Henrietta-street, and extends 560 yards southward to the south-west end of Beresford-street, and thence 120 yards in the direction of south-east by east to St. John's bridge across John's Pill, whence it is continued beyond the line of the compact portion of the city, by a street of about 320 yards in extent along the road to Johnstown. Patrick-street goes off from the west side of Broad-street at a point 260 yards south of the Quay, and extends 250 yards westward to an irregular, open area, called Ballybricken-Green; the county buildings occupy a comparatively large space on the north side, partly of Patrick-street and partly of Ballybricken-Green; this 'Green' extends 280 yards westward with a gradually increasing width of from about 40 to about 120 yards; Morgan-street goes off from the north-west corner of Ballybricken-Green, about 300 yards to the west-north-west, and is thence continued about 320 yards in the same direction by a street called Gallows-road; and another street of three successive stretches, goes off from the south-west corner of Ballybricken-Green, and extends about 750 yards in the direction of west by south,—the latter half of this street, as well as the whole of Gallows-road, straggling away beyond the municipal boundaries, and only a small part of its east end being within the limits of the compact portion of the city. A principal line of thoroughfare, called in the north part Hanover-street, and in the south part Henry-street, goes off from the Quay at a point 280 yards above the north end of Barron-strand-street, and extends 200 yards to the south-south-west; and thence it is continued about 130 yards southward by Gaol-street, past the west side of the county buildings, to Ballybricken-Green. Some other principal or at least comparatively important lines of thoroughfare might be named; but, in general, the streets in the interior of the city additional to those we have noticed, are exceedingly numerous, orientally contracted, singularly disagreeable, and, in many instances, scarcely worthy to be designated mere lanes or alleys. A sinuous and but partially edified line of thoroughfare along the south-western portion of the outskirts of the city, is called successively the Military-road, Morrison's-road, and Barrack-street; and a proposed continuation of it along the south and south-east, away to the extremity of the south-eastern suburbs, bears in its successive portions, the names of Manor-hill, College-street, Bath-street, and Poleberry-street. The compact portion of the city is nearly limited within a line of a statute mile in length drawn along the Quay, a line of 780 yards in length drawn south-westward from the mouth of St. John's Pill, to a point a little above John's-bridge, a line 800 yards in length drawn west-north-westward from the end of the preceding line to a point 100 yards west of the south-west corner of Ballybricken-Green, and a line 750 yards in length drawn from the end of the preceding to the Suir at the upper extremity of the Quay.—The principal streets in the vicinity of the Quay and the Mall, and particularly the Quay and the Mall themselves, at once present the most modern appearance, possess the best houses, and are the scene of the chief trade and the principal attractions of the city. The older streets, whether intermixed with the airier ones toward the north, or huddled into groups and masses by themselves in the centre and the south, are in general very irregular, and not a little squalid. Yet the public markets are situated in the higher and older parts of the city, and form the centre of no inconsiderable a scene of retail trade; and several of the public buildings—as the artillery barrack, the infantry barrack, the Poor-law workhouse, the leper hospital, and one or two of the convents—are beautifully situated on the higher grounds at the western and southern outskirts of the city, and powerfully assist to relieve those districts from appearances of repulsiveness and poverty.

Military Works.—The original city or walled town of Waterford, stood within a triangular space, having strong castles at the angles. One of these castles, alleged to be the oldest structure of its class, is still standing; it bears the name of Reginald's Tower, from the name of its founder, but is called in some ancient documents Dundory, Reynold's Tower, and the Ring Tower; it is a circular structure, perfectly plain in appearance, and in good preservation; it has served the purposes of successively a fortification, a prison, a royal mint, a depository of public stores, and a municipal watch-house; and, in 1003, it was built by Reginald the Dane,—in 1171, held as a fortress by Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke,—in 1463, made a mint-house of Edward III.,—and in 1819, restored in its original form, and appropriated to the police establishment of the city. Another of the castles, which bore the name of St. Martin's, and stood at the western angle of the city walls, is partly preserved in consolidation with a private dwelling-house which has long been designated the Castle. The third of the castles, which bore the name of Tergesius's castle, and stood near the end of Barron-strand-street, has long been so completely erased that its precise site is now unknown. Other castles and towers, to the supposed number of at least twenty, stood either at the gates to protect the entrances to the city, or in other situations to perpetuate the names of private families or persons; but many of these have, in all respects, become not only extinct, but completely forgotten. Two castles stood in Peter's-street, and were named after their founders, Tor and Magnus, sons of Tergesius. Arundel's castle stood in the square now called Arundel's; and beside it stood a Jesuits' college, some vestiges of which survived long after the castle became utterly extinct. Several Danish semilunar towers stood not very long ago on the city walls; but the one called the Ranparts was the only one remaining in 1824. The old gate of St. John's was also Danish. A castle which bore the name of Colbeck, stood at the entrance into the churchyard of the cathedral from what is now called Colbeck-street; and the gate connected with this castle served as a private way to the cathedral and to the bishop's residence, and, in consequence of its vicinity to the abbey of St. Catherine, was sometimes called St. Catherine's gate.

Monasteries.—The abbey or priory of St. Catherine stood in the south-east of the city, adjacent to Lumbard's marsh, on ground which appears to have been an island; and though a large portion of the building was not very long ago in existence, most of this was destroyed to open a way to a new bridge over John's Pill, and all that remained in 1824 were a vaulted room and a small part of the foundation. This monastic establishment belonged to Augustinian canons of the congregation of St. Victor; it is alleged to have been built by Osmán, previous to the year 1000; it was endowed, in 1210, by Elias Fitz-Norman; and, at the general dissolution, it was, with its extensive and valuable estates, together with its tithes and its advowsons, granted, for a term of 21 years, to Elizabeth Butler or Sherlock.—The priory of St. John the Evangelist was occupied by Benedictine monks, and stood somewhere in the suburbs, but on what precise site is now unknown. This establishment was founded in 1185 by John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King John; it was constituted by its founder a cell to the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul in Bath; it received many grants and charters from the English monarchs, and, toward the close of the 15th century, was in possession of vast estates; it was not suppressed at the general dissolution of monasteries, but survived till the 19th year of Queen Elizabeth; it retained, towards the close of its existence, one regular monk, with three brethren and four sisters, commonly called the Brethren and Sisters of St. Leonard; and, with its lands of Krydaue, Ballymabin, and Lyssent, its rectories of Rathmoylan and Killea, and its advowsons and presentations of the vicarages and the tithes of Kilcock, Ballygarrou, Ballytruckle, and Lumbard's-land, together with various other possessions, it was eventually granted, at the annual rent of a knight's fee, to William Wyse, Esq., and his heirs-male.—The Dominican friary, called the Friary of St. Saviour, stood adjacent to Arundel's-castle, and was of great architectural extent and much monastic celebrity. At the date of its suppression in 1541, it possessed within its precincts a church, a chancel and belfry, a Lady's chapel, a cemetery, a close, a dormitory, a chapter-house, a library and hall, a kitchen, a store and bakehouse, a little hall, a doctor's hall, a baron's hall, two other chambers, eight cellars, and three small gardens. But "nothing now remains," said the Rev. R. H. Ryland in 1824, "except the chancel and the belfry. The former is only in part preserved; the entrance is through an arched doorway, highly ornamented with cut stone rope mouldings, over which is a spacious window. The interior apartments, two in number, are low and gloomy, each having a vaulted roof, formed by groined arches, terminating in acute angles. The bases of the arches spring from large unornamented stones, which project from the wall. The belfry is a lofty square tower, having a flight of steps within the many walls leading to the summit, where four bells were formerly suspended. The view from this place is commanding, and gives a good idea of the ancient portion of the town." This establishment was founded, in 1226, by the citizens of Waterford; it received a portion of an annual allowance granted to the Dominican friars in all the principal towns; it acquired sanction and an endowment from Henry IV.; and, at the general dissolution, it was granted, in capite, for ever, at the annual rent of 4s. Irish, to James White.—The Franciscan friary was founded in 1240 by Sir Hugh Purcell; it was endowed by Henry III. with £20 sterling a-year, for the purchase of tunics to its own inmates, and to those of the Franciscan friaries of Dublin, Cork, Kilkenny, and Athlone; it was variously encouraged and endowed also by succeeding monarchs, particularly by Edward I.; and, at the general dissolution, it was found to possess within its precincts a church and steeple, a cemetery, a hall, six chambers, a kitchen, two stables, a bakehouse, and four cellars. The church and steeple continued, till quite a modern period, to be used as a French church; and over the cemetery was erected the pile called the Holy Ghost Hospital. "The exterior of this building," says the Rev. R. H. Ryland, respecting the extant portion of the old monastic pile as it stood in 1824, "is disfigured by a shabby modern front, built against the ancient wall, which entirely destroys the antique appearance, and gives the idea of a wretched dwelling-house. On passing a ruinous gateway, the ancient entrance appears,—a low Gothic archway, of cut stone, without any particular ornament. Within appears the church, built in the shape of a cross, and having over the intersection a lofty square tower, raised upon beautifully-turned groined arches; the ogives of the arches, which are accurately cut and highly ornamented, spring from projecting stones at about 20 feet from the ground, and unite together in the crown of the arch, at very acute angles. Near the entrance is the body of the church; beyond the tower is the chancel; the transepts were appropriated to apartments for the officiating priests. The chancel, for some time used as the French church, is now unroofed. The eastern window, neatly ornamented with carved stone moulding, is composed of three Gothic openings; underneath was the high altar. The body of the church,—anciently a spacious building, the roof supported by transverse arches of hewn stone, and terminated by a magnificent Gothic arch, over which the tower or steeple was built,—is now deprived of all its beauty by the clumsy contrivance of comparatively modern architects, who have thrown a floor across the entire building, at about 14 or 15 feet above the ground, by which the upper part of the church and cemetery are cut off and converted into apartments for the use of the poor of the Holy Ghost Hospital. The antiquary and the gravedigger will now alone venture into this gloomy place; where, however, there are some monuments which deserve examination." The modern monastic institutions within the city are a Dominican friary, a Franciscan friary, a convent of the Sisters of Charity, an Ursuline convent, a Presentation convent, and an establishment of the Brothers of the Christian Schools; and the latter three of these make a very prominent figure in the education of the children of Roman Catholics.—See subsequent section headed 'Public Schools.'

The Cathedral.—The old cathedral of Waterford, or that which was in use previous to the erection of the present comparatively modern pile, consisted of a confused mass of buildings heaped, at various periods, and without any regard to either symmetry or consistency, around an original or comparatively ancient nucleus. "The church consisted of a large nave, 45 feet long and 66 feet in breadth, the choir, 66 feet long, and two lateral isles. The roof was supported by large Gothic columns and arches. Besides this, which was the original building, there was at the back of the altar Trinity parish-church; on the side of the church was the vestry or chapel of St. Nicholas. On the south side of the nave was the bishop's consistory court, or St. Saviour's chapel, and, on the north side, a chapel twenty-two feet square, was erected in the year 1482, by James Rice, a citizen of Waterford, and was dedicated to St. James the elder, and the virgin St. Catherine. In the manuscript papers of the cathedral, this chapel is called St. James's, but it was more generally named Rice's chapel." The oldest part of this cathedral was built, in 1096, by the Osméens, on their conversion from paganism; about the year 1200, it was endowed by King John, and is supposed to have acquired its first dean; in 1210, the possessions of its

dean and canons were confirmed by Pope Innocent III.; in 1551, on the introduction of the doctrines of the Reformation, its altars were thrown down; during the rebellion of 1641, its moveable property and its estates were entirely plundered; in the wars of the revolution, grave-stones and altars, the brazen ornaments of the tombs, the great standing pelican to support the Bible, two great standing candlesticks above the height of man's stature, various gold and silver gilt vessels, and the great brazen font which was ascended by three stairs, or gradations of massive brass, were carried away; and, in 1773, the dean and chapter pronounced the whole pile so much decayed as to be unsafe for the purposes of public worship, and resolved that it should be taken down, and replaced by a new edifice. The demolition of the old edifice was effected with difficulty; it is supposed to have had no such plea of necessity as the dean and chapter urged; and has been regarded by many persons, down to the present times, as a matter of great regret.—The present cathedral was, in a great degree, constructed out of the materials of the old; it presents no resemblance to its predecessor, but exhibits the light and vivid beauties of modern architecture in lieu of the gloomy aisles, the Gothic arches, and the pointed windows of the old; "it is a light and beautiful building, entirely in the modern style; the aisles are divided by a double row of columns, which support the galleries on each side; the length of the body of the church is 90 feet, the height 40,—total length, 170 feet,—breadth, 58 feet; a portion of the western extremity of the building is appropriated to the grand entrance, on each side of which are the vestry and the consistorial court; over these are apartments for a library, and from this part of the building rises a steeple of considerable elevation, neatly formed and decorated, but extremely faulty in its proportions; between the western end and the body of the church, is a lofty and spacious porch, in which are preserved some of the monuments of the old cathedral." In 1815, an accidental fire broke out in the organ-loft, and destroyed the beautiful ceiling of the church, much of the wood work, and the whole of a magnificent organ which, only 35 years before, had cost £1,200; and had not the weather been calm, and the hour favourable for exertion, the fire would have reduced the entire pile to ruin. Between Oct. 1815 and May 1818, the cathedral was restored to its original beauty.

Other Ecclesiastical Edifices.—The church of St. Olave stands in the immediate vicinity of the cathedral, and probably was designed to be subservient to it as a parish-church. The original edifice was of remote but now unknown date, and is said to have become ruinous at the commencement of last century; and the present pile was almost an entirely new building, erected shortly after that date at the private expense of the bishop. This church exhibits no very noticeable feature; yet contains a pulpit and an episcopal throne of very fine black oak, handsomely and chastely carved.—The church of St. Patrick stands on elevated ground to the west of the city; it is a plain building, with a single roof unsupported by pillars; and though more modern in appearance than the church of St. Olave, it is known to have existed at the commencement of the 17th century.—The French church, as already noticed in a previous paragraph, was part of the ancient Franciscan monastery; it was granted by government, and endowed with an annual stipend of £60, in the early part of last century, for the use of the French Protestants who were driven to this country by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, but, in consequence of the naturalization of the immigrants, and the gradual melting-away of the congregation, the church ceased to be required, and its endowment was withdrawn.—The church of St. Thomas stood on St. Thomas's-hill, and is supposed to have been erected by King Henry II. or his son John, as a testimony of regret for the murder of Thomas-a-Beckett; and part of its entrance, which has survived the general ruin, shows it to have been a beautiful specimen of Saxon architecture.—All the other parish-churches of the city have completely disappeared.—The Presbyterian, Independent, Baptist, Quaker, and Methodist meeting-houses do not present any remarkable feature.

The largest of the Roman Catholic chapels of Waterford, and that which serves as the cathedral of the diocese, stands in Barron-strand-street, is capable of accommodating 11,000 persons, and is said to be one of the largest buildings in Ireland. It was erected, though not completed, in 1793, at the cost of £20,000, most of which was raised in collections of halfpence at the door. It displays a beautiful architectural front of hewn stone, in the Ionic order, but long stood with only a few of the columns of its designed magnificent portico; its interior remarkably combines lightness, simplicity, and grandeur; its vast roof is supported by Corinthian columns; and its furnishings comprise a multitude of objects, both costly in material, and opulent in decoration.—The Roman Catholics of the city, soon after being dispossessed of the old cathedral at the Reformation, were permitted to meet in an old building opposite the present great cathedral-chapel. "In 1683, they petitioned the corporation, setting forth their great want of accommodation, and praying that they might be allowed to build a large chapel at the back of the houses in Bailly's-lane, which was an obscure passage, not much frequented by the inhabitants; by way of strengthening their application, they promised, that if permitted to erect a suitable building, it should be hid from the view of the corporation so as not to be offensive to them. Their request being complied with, they built the late great chapel, the entrance to which was from Bailly's-lane. In 1790, the Roman Catholics applied a second time to the corporation, who very liberally bestowed on them all the ground in front of Barron-strand-street, from Bailly's-lane to Mr. Charles Clarke's house, for 999 years, at the yearly rent of 2s. 6d. The old chapel, which had stood nearly one hundred years, was then taken down, and the new one commenced."—The Roman Catholic chapel at Ballybricken can accommodate about 3,000 persons; but the other Roman Catholic chapels are comparatively very small.

Charitable Institutions.—The Holy Ghost Hospital assists 38 poor females resident within its walls, and 12 resident without, affords an allowance of £12 a-year to a clergyman who acts as overseer, and had an annual income, in 1833, of £311 3s. 10½d. Irish. Henry Walsh purchased the house and property of the old Franciscan monastery, and gave them over as an endowment to this charity; and the hospital was instituted in 1546, and placed under the care of an incorporation of a master, brethren, and poor inmates. The exterior of the edifice presents a shabby, modern front, built against the ancient monastery; the apartments are situated over the old cemetery, and are reached by two flights of steep stone stairs from the two sides of the entrance; the one wing contains a long narrow room lighted from above, and having beds partitioned off the sides, an inner chamber raised a few feet above the preceding, and two curious Gothic arches which give to the place a singular appearance; and the other wing consists of one long room, also partitioned off with beds, and a small chapel, at the further end, in which Roman Catholic religious service is regularly performed in compliance with the directions of the founder. The property of this hospital is in the hands of 19 leaseholders; and the management of its affairs is now intrusted to the master, who is appointed by the corporation of the city, and is controlled to a certain extent by their advice.—A House of Industry was erected in 1779, at an expense of £1,500; it was designed for the relief of the poor, and for punishing vagabonds and able-bodied beggars; it admitted deserted children, vagrants, prostitutes, lunatics, or idiots, and infirm poor, nearly in the proportions of respectively 1, 11, 10, 40, and 100; and it was placed under the management of the mayors, sheriffs, recorder, and other justices of the county of the city, the bishop of the diocese, the representatives of the county in parliament, the county justices, and persons contributing a donation of £20, or annual subscription of £3, to the funds.—A workhouse has been erected under the Poor-law act, on the high grounds of the city's southern outskirts; but it will be more suitably noticed in the section on the Poor-law union of Waterford.—A fever hospital was erected in Waterford in 1799, and was the first institution of its class in Ireland, and the second in the empire; the original building was a small house on St. John's Hill; when the funds increased, the present edifice, capable of accommodating 200 patients, was erected on the site of the old; during the prevalence of fever in 1816 and 1817, so many as 500 patients were frequently packed simultaneously within its walls; the institution is admirably conducted, and possesses every appliance which the ingenuity of man can devise for promoting the comfort and recovery of patients; it is placed under the management of the mayor, sheriffs, recorder, and justices of the city; it serves nominally for the city and for the county at large, but really receives few patients from the western half of the county; and, in 1839-40, it received £87 17s. 8d., expended £673 8s., and admitted 493 patients.—The Leper Hospital, now and for a long period past, practically serving as the county infirmary of Waterford, was founded and endowed in the early part of the 13th century, for lepers, by King John; a particular ward of it, set apart for incurable lepers, was subsequently founded and endowed by the Le Poer or Waterford family; it received, in particular from King John, an endowment of the lands of Leperstown, in the barony of Gualtier, the lands of Poleberry without St. John's gate, and various property in the parish of St. Stephen's; in the middle of the last century, the corporation of the city, alleging that the funds were designed only for lepers, and that no lepers any longer existed, shut up the house; a legal decree was eventually obtained requiring the corporation to employ the funds in relieving the sick and maimed poor; during some time, an annual allowance was made for the relief of 50 indigent persons, but afterwards an infirmary was established for the reception of the sick and the maimed, and finally the present magnificent, commodious, and useful hospital was erected in the suburbs. "This," says the official report of 1841, "is a noble institution, capable of containing 180 beds. Its funds are altogether derived from estates which are vested in trustees elected by the corporation of Waterford. The annual rental is about £1,000. This sum is at present nearly all expended in the support of such patients as are usually admitted into infirmaries. The management is in a master who receives no salary. The hospital is intended for the benefit of fit objects residing in the city or liberties of Waterford. Severe casualties are always admitted by the surgeons; all other cases on the order of the master, to whom a petition is sent, signed by any two respectable householders, stating that the patient resides in the city; to this a medical certificate must be annexed. All thus admitted are free of expense, but the master admits at his discretion patients from any part of the county of Waterford, or strangers, on being guaranteed a payment of 1s. 2d. per day, whilst each remains in the house. The number so accommodated is very limited. In the year 1840, 515 patients were received; of these, 498 were residents of the city and liberties; only 17 were admitted on payment."—The district lunatic asylum in Waterford serves only for Waterford city and county; it was originally built for the accommodation of 100 patients, and was afterwards enlarged for the additional accommodation of 23; it cost, during the year 1843, £2,108 8s. 2d.; it contained, on Jan. 1, 1843, 52 male patients and 63 female patients, and admitted, during 1843, 28 male patients and 21 female patients,—of whom, previous to Jan. 1, 1844, 17 males and 18 females were dismissed cured, 1 male was dismissed incurable, 7 males and 2 females died; and it contained, on Jan. 1, 1844, 65 male and 54 female patients,—of whom 16 males and 10 females were idiots, 1 male was epileptic, 36 males and 23 females suffered under curable mania, and 12 males and 21 females suffered under incurable mania.—The Lying-in Charity was instituted for the relief of poor women at their own houses, and for supplying them with medicine, medical advice, and such articles as their peculiar situation might require; but, during several years preceding 1824, its funds were inadequate for the relief of one-fourth of the persons who applied for assistance.—The Fanning Institution was established in 1843, for the protection and maintenance of industrious inhabitants, who, in consequence of infirmities in body or disappointments in trade, are rendered unable to support themselves.—The Stranger's Friend Society was established upwards of 20 years ago, to relieve persons labouring under temporary distress, and to advance money to carry them to their respective homes.—Some alms-houses exist for the relief of Roman Catholics.—A mendicist society was established in the city in 1800, expended upwards of £1,000 during the first year of its operations, afforded relief to 1,300 persons during that year and the two following years, and greatly abated the nuisance which previously prevailed of the infesting of the streets with beggars,—principally strangers; but this institution has, of course, become completely superseded by the provisions of the Poor-law.—An annual sum of about £320 Irish, arising from a perpetual rent-charge, was bequeathed for charitable purposes, by the late Dr. Downes, in trust to the bishop, dean, and chapter of Waterford; an additional sum of £100 a-year was bequeathed for similar purposes, and in the same manner, by Dr. Downes; and also two sums amounting to about £80 Irish a-year, were bequeathed for charitable purposes, by either Dr. or Mrs. Downes, or by both.—A sum of £2,600 Irish was bequeathed for various charitable purposes by Bishop Chonevix; and interest is paid on this sum, at the rate of 6 per cent., by the corporation of the city to the bishop of Waterford.—A sum of £1,200 Irish was bequeathed by Alderman Myles, to be distributed in bread to the poor; and the interest upon it is paid by the corporation of the city, and managed for behoof of the poor by a descendant of the donor.—The sum of £500 Irish was left by Col. William Alcock for preaching sermons; and the interest upon it is paid by the corporation at the rate of 6 per cent., and was received, in 1833, by the Rev. Alexander Alcock.—The sum of £100 Irish was left by Minard Christian for clothing 6 poor persons; and the interest upon it, at the rate of 6 per cent., is received and applied by the mayor.—Mrs. Burchill's Hospital is a private foundation and endowment, under the management of trustees, one of whom is the mayor.

—The Waterford Branch of the Cork Total Abstinence Society, was established, as its name implies, for checking and abolishing the evils of intemperance.

—A charitable loan fund was originally established in Waterford, by Archdeacon Fleury and Mr. Hobbs, in January, 1768; and from that date till the year 1824, it lent free of interest, from a capital of a few hundred pounds which arose from the produce of a small Harmonic Society—the sum of £32,609 15s. 1d. to 14,173 persons. In 1843, the present loan fund possessed a capital of £2,890, and belonged to 37 proprietors; and, during that year, it circulated £13,467 in 2,924 loans, realized a nett profit of £154 4s. 3d., and expended for charitable purposes £40.

—A dispensary was established in Waterford in the year 1786; and it served, for some time, also as a small fever-hospital. The present dispensary supplies medicine and medical advice to a district containing a pop. of 28,821; and, in 1839-40, it expended £144 16s., and administered to 8,500 patients.

—The Convent of the Sisters of Charity is situated in Lady's Lane, and was established in 1841, for the relief of the destitute and infirm poor of the city, and is supported principally by voluntary contribution.

Public Schools.—Dr. Graham's school, usually called the Waterford school, is under the patronage of the corporation, and educates free of charge 4 boys whom they nominate; and the master receives a salary of £100 Irish a-year, partly out of a bequest of Bishop Milles, and partly out of the corporation's funds,—and he must be a clergyman of the Established Church, and has the appointment of lecturer of St. Olave's.—Bishop Foy's School, usually called the Blue School, was founded, in 1707, for the education for trades of boys belonging to the Established Church; an Act of 1 George II. sanctioned the original purposes of the bequest, and an Act of the year 1808, authorized the bishop, the dean, and the mayor of Waterford, as trustees of the charity, to further the spirit of the testator's intentions by lodging and boarding boys, as well as by educating them; and the income of the institution now amounts to about £1,300 a-year, or, after paying the head-rents, about £1,200. The original school was situated in the city; but this being totally inadequate to embrace the new purposes of a boarding-house sanctioned by the Act of 1808, a new and spacious structure was purchased at Grantstown, amidst attached grounds of 16 or 17 acres in area, about 1½ mile from the city, at the cost of about £3,100; and large and important additions were made previous to 1833, at the cost probably of upwards of £3,000. The building, or rather group of buildings, as it now stands, is very large and commodious, but makes no claim to architectural beauty, and even presents a clumsy and unsightly appearance. The bishop possesses the sole ultimate power of admitting boys to the institution; but the mayor, the sheriffs, and any three aldermen, exercise a very influential power of recommendation. Between 50 and 60 boys are usually boarded and educated simultaneously in the school; they receive good and sufficient food, decent and comfortable clothing, and sound and efficient instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic; and between 12 and 20 are apprenticed in the course of every year,—and an apprentice fee is given with each of £8.—The Girls' Blue School is situated in Lady Lane, and was built in 1740, at the cost of £750; and, though plain and rather gloomy, it sufficiently suits the purpose for which it was intended. It was built at the private cost of Mrs. Mary Mason, and endowed with £900 from Sir John Mason, John Mason, Esq., and Sarah Mason; and, in 1784, it received a further endowment of £1,000 from a bequest of Counsellor Alecock. When first established, it clothed and instructed 30 girls till they were able to go to service; and now it gratuitously educates about the same number, affords annual premiums of clothing to the most deserving, and furnishes apprentice fees to the best conducted on their leaving the institution.—The Charter School at Killoteran was built in 1744, and endowed by the corporation of Waterford with 26 acres of land. The principal building includes a school-room of 30 feet by 21, two lofty and well-ventilated dormitories of the same extent as the school-room, and apartments for the master and the usher. A small and well-ventilated infirmary, with a room of recovery, stands detached from the main building. The establishment is situated on a rising ground, and is approached by a long avenue, shaded with trees. The number of pupils is about 50; and the annual expenditure varies from £700 to £800.—“In the schools established by Edmund Rice, Esq., for the education of poor Roman Catholic children,” said the Rev. R. H. Ryland, in 1824, “we have a splendid instance of the most exalted generosity. This gentleman having, at an early period of life, acquired an independent fortune by commercial pursuits, withdrew himself from public engagements; and being strongly impressed with the necessity of giving to the lower orders a religious education, he devoted his time, his talents, and his fortune, to erect and endow schools for their use. Amongst a distressed and unemployed population, whose religious opinions militate against the system of education offered them by their Protestant brethren, these schools have been of incalculable benefit; they have already impressed upon the lower classes a character which hitherto was unknown to them; and in the number of intelligent and respectable tradesmen, clerks, and servants, which they have sent forth, bear the most unquestionable testimony to the public services of Edmund Rice. In the schools under the superintendence of Mr. Rice, there are nearly nine hundred boys. The teachers are young men, who, from religious motives, have devoted themselves to the instruction of the poor, and who act without reward. The principal female school is conducted by the nuns of the Presentation Convent, who instruct gratuitously four hundred girls. There is also a boarding-school at the Ursuline Convent on the Newtown road—a short distance from which a school has recently been established for the gratuitous education of poor females.” Mr. Rice was a monk; and, though unquestionably conscientious as well as munificent, in the founding of his schools, he unhappily rendered their ecclesiastical character so very prominent that they are in the broadest manner, in both spirit and design, Roman Catholic. His schools for boys were founded in 1803, bear the name of Mount Sion schools, and are under the care of the monastic community called “the Brothers of the Christian schools.”—The Protestant Orphan House, for the lodging, clothing, educating, and apprenticing of Protestant orphan children of both sexes, was established in 1818; and its buildings were subsequently erected at Gaul's Rock, within a mile of the city, and fitted up for the reception of 50 orphans.—The Catholic Orphan House, for the protection, support, education, and apprenticing of the orphan children of Roman Catholics, is situated in John-street.—An infant school is situated in Lady's Lane, and is under the management of a committee.—The Waterford Commercial school was established in 1833, for the education of every class of Protestants, and is supported principally by voluntary contributions.—The Mechanics' Institute meets in the room of the Court of Conscience in the Town Hall, and has occasional lectures delivered there during winter.—St. John's College is one of the nine or ten seminaries which exist in Ireland for training young men to become Roman Catholic clergymen; it is under the patronage of the Roman Catholic bishop of Waterford and Lismore; and its affairs are conducted by a president and professor of dogmatic theology, a professor of moral theology, a professor of natural and moral philosophy, a professor of humanity, a professor of Greek and Latin, a professor of mathematics, and a professor of Irish.

Bridges.—A wooden bridge is conjectured, but on no good authority, to have been anciently constructed at Waterford by the Danes; and if it ever existed, it must have soon been swept away, and is unknown to record. In 1770, an estimate was made by Mr. Thomas Covey, for building a stone-bridge across the Suir at Waterford for £36,745 18s. 6d.; but he is believed to have greatly under-estimated the cost, and perhaps even the practicability of the work. He proposed to erect his bridge at the upper end of the new quay, upon an artificial bank raised to within 5 feet of low water, and to construct it with 9 arches, and to the total length of 601 feet. The present great timber-bridge, so prominent and singular a feature in all the river views of the city, was commenced in April 1793, and opened for carriages in January 1794; it was constructed of American oak, by Mr. Lemuel Cox, a native of Boston, in America; it measures 832 feet in length, and 42 feet in breadth; it has 40 sets of piers, each of seven pieces, besides cut-waters; the longest pile driven was 70 feet; the depth at low water 37 feet,—and at high water of the highest spring tide, 54 feet; the foot-passage has a width of 9 feet, and is sashed; and a draw-bridge exists at the south end of the bridge, to permit the transit of river-craft to Carrick-on-Suir and Clonmel. The cost of the structure was £30,000, including £1,050 to the architect, and £13,000 for the ferry. The company who contributed the cost were incorporated by act of parliament, and were to raise the capital in shares of £100 each; but the actual cost fell so far below the estimated cost, that they required to pay only £90 on each debenture; and the proceeds of the pontage became so highly remunerating, that, in a few years, the market value of each debenture was £170. In the year 1800, the tolls produced upwards of £2,800; in 1824, they let for £4,200; and, during the years preceding 1833, they averaged about £4,000.—Three bridges span St. John's-Pill within the outskirts of the city; two of these, called John's-bridge and William-street-bridge, are old; and the other, called Catherine's-bridge, and situated near the old abbey of St. Catherine, is modern.

Other Public Buildings.—The bishop's palace presents one front to the Mall, and another to the churchyard, in the south side of the open space around the cathedral; it is a magnificent building of hewn stone, adorned with a handsome cornice; its front toward the Mall has an elegant portico, with pillars of the Doric order; and its front toward the cathedral has the doors, window-cases, and cognate stones of plain rustic work.—The deanery house, and a building for the accommodation of clergymen's widows, are also situated in the open area around the cathedral. The latter of these—the widows' house—occupies the site of the palace in which King John resided during his stay in Waterford; and consists of a neat range of buildings, with two returns, facing the grand entrance of the cathedral. This structure was erected in 1702, by Sir John Mason, as executor of Dr. Hugh Gore, who became bishop of Waterford and Lismore in 1666; and the establishment was founded by a bequest of £1,200 from that prelate, for building an asylum for ten poor ministers' widows, and for giving to each an annuity of £10.—The Custom-house is a conspicuous building, situated on the quay. The old Custom-house and the Exchange were very old structures, situated nearly in the middle of the quay, and continued to be in use till after the commencement of the present century, when they became ruinous, and were taken down.—The Town-hall stands on the Mall, adjacent to the bishop's palace, commands a view of the Suir, contains a public hall or exchange, and a ball-room, and possesses a facade which has been admired for the symmetry of its proportions, and the simplicity of its style.—The principal entrance opens into the public hall, or exchange, which was formerly the resort of merchants, who assembled here to make contracts and transact other commercial business; a curious looking antique, somewhat resembling a nail in form, and about 4 feet high, stood in the old exchange; bargains were concluded by laying the stipulated money upon this stand or nail, hence the origin of the saying, 'to pay down upon the nail.'—The market-house was built about 25 years ago, upon a site immediately adjoining the river; and, though commodious, well-arranged, and in all respects suitable for trade, it so breaks the line of the quay, and obstructs the continuity of home-views of the Suir, as to be a decided nuisance in the estimation of every person of taste.—The fish-house was built on the same principle of sacrificing taste and beauty to convenience as the market-house; and, though a neat enough building, was no sooner erected than it was felt to be a nuisance.—The Chamber of Commerce was incorporated by charter in 1815, and is situated in King-street; its building is large and commodious; and, under the same roof with it, are the office of the Harbour Commissioners, the pilot-office, the public news-room, the library belonging to the Waterford Institution, and the savings' bank.—The Waterford Institution was established near the close of 1820; it has a reading-room, a news-room, a small museum, and a well-selected library; its affairs are managed by a committee, consisting of a president, vice-president, a treasurer, and seven members; and its constituency are proprietors who have paid at entrance £10 10s., and pay annually £1 1s., and subscribers who pay annually £2 2s.—The court-house, and the city and county gaols, occupy a considerable area, facing Gaol-street on the west, and Patrick-street and Ballybricken-Green on the south, and immediately adjoining the spot on which St. Patrick's gate formerly stood. The court-house was designed and erected by James Gandon, Esq., at the recommendation of the celebrated philanthropist, Howard; it occupies the centre of the whole range of county buildings, and, in common with the rest of the range, has a handsome front, faced with granite; and its entrance opens into a hall, whence are seen the interiors of the county and the city courts, well-lighted, and tolerably well-arranged, but too contracted to afford suitable accommodation for the public.—The county gaol, though erected only about 25 years ago, is by no means sufficiently commodious; yet it is conducted under highly creditable management, and is prevented from the adoption of the most modern improvements in prison discipline, by a more minute classification, or by total separation, only from the want of adequate accommodation. The grand jury, however, are understood to have all but resolved, if the separate system shall prove as excellent as expected, to erect a new gaol in order to its complete adoption; and the general prison-inspector, in his official report published in 1844, says, "I venture to suggest to the Board of Superintendents a great improvement at a very moderate expenditure, which will bring the separation principle as nearly into operation as possible, without a new gaol. I have already recommended it in the county of Limerick and county Kerry gaols, and it is now commenced in each with advantage, viz.:—erecting sheds in each of the large yards, divided into large stalls for separate work of individuals, and heated by a pipe from an Arnott stove at the end of the shed. In this way can almost every prisoner be employed separately all day, and receive instruction under perfect inspection, and at night proceed to his separate cell, as there are sufficient in this gaol." The number of cells in the gaol is 83; and there are six other dormitories, containing 12 beds. In 1843, the average number of prisoners was 75; the maximum number was 94; the total number, including debtors, was 349; the number of recommitments was 31; and the total expenditure was £1,387 15s. 1d.—The city gaol, though a comparatively modern structure, is also quite destitute of sufficient capacity for the separation system, yet might be fully invested with that capacity at an expense of from £1,000 to £2,000; but, so far as its accommodation permits, it is a well-managed establishment, and the city authorities were officially reported, in 1844, to be contemplating the consolidation of it with the county gaol,—a measure which, on the assumption of a new gaol for the county being built, or even of the two existing gaols being fused into each other and jointly enlarged, would be a very great improvement. The city gaol contains 14 cells, 4 day-rooms, 4 yards, a chapel, a kitchen, and an hospital. This gaol is used only for male prisoners, the house of correction being used for all female prisoners; and, in 1843, the average number of prisoners in the gaol and in the house of correction was 35; the maximum number was 62; the total number, including debtors, was 756; the number of recommitments was 17; and the total expenditure was £754 14s. 1d.—The house of correction or penitentiary is situated in the suburbs, and was built in 1820, at the cost of £4,900. "It seems to have been erected on the plan of the Bury gaol. An exterior wall surrounds a quadrangular space of considerable extent, at one extremity of which is placed the governor's house, having the cells ranged in a semicircle round it. At the rear of the cells, and within the walls, are gardens and ground where the prisoners are employed in labour." This prison, as already noticed, is now used only for female prisoners of the city; it contains 41 small cells and under cells, 4 day-rooms, 4 yards, a kitchen, and a tread-wheel; but it is altogether unsuited to modern prison discipline; and, unless it could be made occasionally available for some class of prisoners in the event of the union of the county and the city gaols, it ought to be abolished.—The only other noticeable public buildings are the artillery and the infantry barracks,—the latter capable of accommodating a regiment.

The Harbour.—We reserve a topographical view of the estuary of the Suir, usually called Waterford Harbour, as the subject of a brief separate article; and restrict ourselves, in the present section, to a notice of the mere navigable capacities of that estuary up to Waterford bridge. The north side of most of the esplanade or terrace called the Quay, is literally a quay or series of wharves, and admits vessels of nearly 800 tons burden,—so that military stores, cavalry, and large cargoes of live stock, can, with the utmost facility, be embarked. The depth of the Suir directly in front of the quay, varies from 20 to 65 feet at low water, and from 37 to 82 feet at high water, of the greatest spring-tides. "It was long a source of regret," said the Rev. R. H. Ryland in 1824, "that no steps had been taken for the removal of the fords or banks which had almost blocked up the entrance to the quay of Waterford, to the great prejudice of the trade of the city; of late years this business has been attended to with a success which is highly creditable to all the parties concerned. On the 20th June, 1816, the royal assent was given to an Act of parliament for 'deepening, cleansing, and improving such parts of the river Suir as constitute the port and harbour of Waterford, between Bilberry Rock and Hook Tower, including St. Catherine's, commonly called St. John's Pill, and the appointment of a pilot-office and ballast-office in the said city of Waterford.' The grand object of the Commissioners appointed under this Act was to take measures for enlarging the channel, which had already been commenced through the fords, so as to make it 210 feet wide, and 7 feet deep. This great undertaking is now nearly completed: when finished, the expense will be about £22,000, of which government has already granted £14,588. The depth of water now in the channel, at the fords, is 21 feet at high spring-tides, and 17 at neap-tides. Vessels drawing 18 feet can clear the fords at four hours flood-tide. In addition to the enlargement of the channel, through the upper and lower fords, the Harbour Commissioners have materially improved that most difficult and dangerous navigation called the King's Channel, by placing therein and along its verge mooring and warping buoys, perches, rings, chains, and posts. This improvement of the King's Channel, where vessels of the largest class can now, at all times of tide, have a superabundance of water, added to the cut of 210 feet through the fords, has removed all those impediments to the trade up to the city of Waterford so frequently complained of by navigators. We are also indebted to the Commissioners, and to the indefatigable exertions of their Secretary, Mr. Brownrigg, for a considerable reduction in the rates of tonnage-duty, ballast, and pilotage, as well as for the improved rules and regulations which they have adopted, with the view of preventing the possibility of frauds being practised upon masters of vessels frequenting the port of Waterford—practices which prevailed to an alarming extent previous to the introduction of the Act into this port. The Commissioners have likewise been instrumental in the erection of beacon-towers at Brownstown Head and Newtown Heads; and after repeated solicitations, have at length succeeded in procuring the establishment of a floating light near the Saltees, by which two objects, the hitherto frequent loss of lives and property, will at once be prevented." The Commissioners consist of 7 members of the corporation of Waterford, 12 members of the Waterford Chamber of Commerce, and 5 gentlemen of Clonmel. Their income, during three years ending in 1833, averaged about £6,000 a-year; and it is expended judiciously, and greatly to the public advantage. So large an item of the income as about £3,000 or £3,800 is derived from pilotage; and the whole of this is expended in the pilot establishment. The Board meet monthly, and a committee of them weekly, in the Chamber of Commerce.

Shipping and Commerce.—The vessels registered at the port on Dec. 31, 1843, comprised 52 sailing-vessels, each under 50 tons, and aggregately of 1,276 tons; 118 sailing-vessels, each upwards of 50 tons, and aggregately of 18,292 tons; and 4 steam-vessels, each upwards of 50 tons, and aggregately of 950 tons. During the year 1843, the number and tonnage of vessels which cleared coastwise were 1,059 sailing-vessels, of 82,818 tons, and 210 steam-vessels, of 47,061 tons; those which entered coastwise were 1,210 sailing-vessels, of 101,187 tons, and 204 steam-vessels, of 46,470 tons; those which cleared for the colonies were 39 sailing-vessels, of 9,729 tons; those which entered from the colonies were 47 sailing-vessels, of 10,625 tons; those which cleared for foreign ports were 4 British vessels, of 556 tons, and 3 foreign vessels of 479 tons; and those which entered from foreign ports, were 11 British vessels, of 1,193 tons, and 4 foreign vessels, of 708 tons. The amount of custom-house duties in 1836 was £137,126. The exports in 1835 amounted in estimated value to £1,821,245; and their principal items were corn, meal, and flour, £776,627,—provisions, £712,617,—wine, £132,469,—miscellaneous goods, £77,700,—cows and oxen, £52,910,—copper ore, £21,200,—beer, £16,969,—sheep, 8,991,—horses, £3,472,—feathers, £6,240,—cotton manufactures, £4,505,—and potatoes, £2,000. The imports in 1835 amounted in estimated value to £1,274,154; and their principal items were cotton manufactures, £380,600,—wool, £266,980,—tobacco, £102,900,—foreign sugar, £76,071,—miscellaneous goods, £74,500,—coals, culm, and cinders, £64,630,—Irish spirits, £49,560,—British refined sugar, £42,000,—tallow, £33,000,—British spirits, £23,850,—hides, £26,110,—tea, £33,466,—herrings and other fish, £14,000,—woollen manufactures, £14,820,—unwrought iron, £4,700,—lead, £3,200,—slates and stones, £2,000,—hops, £9,400,—cotton yarn, £2,712,—salt, £1,266,—flax seed, £5,600,—wines, £5,750,—rum and other foreign spirits, £3,000,—leather, £1,055,—haberdashery and apparel, £7,280,—wrought iron and hardware, £8,582,—machinery and mill-work, £5,500,—and glass and earthenware, £3,822. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town consists of 110,000 tons for exportation, 21,750 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 1,700 tons of agricultural produce for the local use of breweries and distilleries, 600 tons of excreable goods not received by direct importation, and 21,750 tons of stone, lime, turf, and other heavy and bulky articles; and the estimated amount of inland carriage to the town consists of 28,300 tons of imported goods, 3,000 tons of produce of breweries and distilleries, and 48,700 tons of coals, manure, and other heavy and bulky articles. The principal traffic from the port is carried on in steamers of a superior class, sailing several times a-week to Liverpool and Bristol, and in a daily government steam-packet from Dunmore to Milford-Haven. "We are indebted," says the Rev. Mr. Ryland, "to two of our chief magistrates for a considerable improvement in the trade of Waterford. According to an ancient MS., 'In 1695, when Richard Christmas, Esq., was mayor, he exerted himself very much, in conjunction with John Mason, Esq., in advancing the interests of the citizens. One measure was resorted to which had a very beneficial effect,—admitting traders of all descriptions, and from all parts, to the freedom of the city. This was determined on in two separate Acts of Council, dated the 11th September, 1704, and 26th February, 1705. In consequence of this encouragement, several merchants from Italy, Spain, France, Portugal, Holland, and elsewhere, came and settled in Waterford; houses were repaired, ships built, trade began to flourish.' These exertions were followed up by Mr. Mason on his succeeding to the mayoralty in 1696. To use the words of the same manuscript,—'the houses were in ruins, the streets uneven, full of rubbish and dunghills. He caused those nuisances to be removed, the high roads leading to the city to be levelled and new paved, and bridges made in many places of the said roads, to carry off the sloughs and superfluous waters, inso-much' (the writer continues) 'that they were a pattern for the whole kingdom.'"

Manufactures and Trade.—A brisk trade in cattle and hutter was, at an early period, carried on with the English colonies and with Spain; but it was eventually destroyed, in consequence chiefly of the establishment of close commercial relations between the West Indies and America. Cheese, made from skimmed milk, and called Mullahawn, was formerly an article of export from Waterford; but it was so hard that a hatchet was required to cut it, and it could scarcely keep in favour during the advance of the age of luxury. Salt was formerly made in considerable quantities; but it has been superseded by the rock salt of England. A manufacture of wood, for the use of dyers, formerly made some figure; but has long been discontinued. The manufacture of a narrow woollen stuff was so considerable that the article circulated over most of Ireland, and was exported to other countries, and was sold in a hall specially set apart for itself, in Michael-street, opposite New-street; but this, too, has almost totally disappeared. The craftsmen called hammermen had also a special hall; and they sold their plate only about 30 years ago. A manufacture of various articles of cutlery and japan-ware was established, probably about half a century ago, by a gentleman of the name of Wyse, who was also the proprietor of a windmill and a fine corn-mill; but it appears to have died with its founder. The linen manufacture was introduced by a family of the name of Smith, who established a factory and two bleaching-works in the neighbourhood of the city, and brought weavers from the north of Ireland; yet, in spite of its so far succeeding that the thread produced by it was celebrated all over Ireland, it eventually proved a failure, and became totally extinct. A bottle manufactory was erected nearly opposite Ballycarret, but failed, and went to decay. A glass manufactory was established in 1783; it employed, about 20 years ago, 70 persons weekly; and it continues to the present day to make a prominent figure in the city's productive industry. Two ordinary distilleries were erected, and went to decay; and a small rectifying distillery was afterwards established in Thomas-street. The making of beer and porter was, a considerable period ago, brought to such perfection as to supersede the importation of malt liquors from England. A manufacture of glue was so successful as to export large quantities to England; but it eventually failed. A starch and blue manufactory was established by the Messrs. White, and also two foundries, and they continue to prosper. Several flour-mills are at work in the vicinity of the city. A large and excellent ship-yard, with a patent ship, has, for a considerable period, been established on the Ferrybank side of the Suir; and it possesses considerable celebrity, both for the facility with which old ships are repaired, and for the soundness and beauty with which new ships are built. The steam-engines at work within the city, or in its immediate neighbourhood, in 1838, were one of 10 horse-power, established in 1817, for pumping and grinding,—one of 6 horse-power, in 1823, for starch and blue manufactory,—one of 6 horse-power, in 1825, for the glass manufactory,—one of 8 horse-power, in 1828, for pumping and grinding,—one of 6 horse-power, in 1832, for starch and blue manufactory,—one of 4 horse-power, in 1834, for blowing furnaces,—and one of 50 horse-power, in 1835, for grinding wheat.—Markets are held on Monday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday; and fairs are held on May 4, June 24, and Aug. 25. The banking offices are branches of the National Bank of Ireland, the Bank of Ireland, and the Provincial Bank. The principal inns are Dobbin's Commercial Hotel, on the Mall; and Cummin's Commercial Hotel, on the Quay. A savings' bank held, in 1841, £99,619 from 3,509 depositors. The news-rooms are the Chamber of Commerce Reading-room; the Repeal Rooms, on the Quay; the Conservative Rooms, in Cathedral-square; and the county and City Club-rooms, in Adelphi-terrace. The newspapers are the Waterford Chronicle, published on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays; the Waterford Mail, published on Wednesdays and Saturdays; and the Waterford News-Letter,—a mere account of imports and exports. The public conveyances in 1843 were a coach to Wexford, a coach and a mail-coach to Dublin, a coach and a car to Cork, a coach to Limerick, 4 cars to 'Lommel, a car to Dungarvan, a car to Enniscorthy, 3 cars to Kilkenny, a car to Lismore, a car to Tramore, a car to Dunmore, a steam-boat to New Ross, a steam-boat to Duncannon, 3 steam-packets to Bristol, 3 steam-packets to Liverpool, and a mail-packet to Hobb's Point.

Occupations.—As a means of exhibiting the classification of productive industry within the liberties of the city, we shall here give a digest of the occupations of the inhabitants, as ascertained in the Census of 1841:—Farmers, 20; servants and labourers, 468; gardeners, 28; care-takers, 5; land-agent, 1; land-stewards, 14; game-keeper, 1; dairy-keepers, 16; millers, 8; maltsters, 4; brewers, 6; bakers, 111; confectioners, 22; saltsters, 71; salt-manufacturer, 1; tobacco-twisters, 29; egg-dealers, 3; cattle-dealers, 11; pig-jobbers, 65; corn-dealer, 1; hacon-factors, 7; huxters and provision dealers, 164; butchers, 66; poultryers, 16; victuallers, 51; grocers, 45; tobacconists, 7; wine-merchants, 6; tavern-keepers and vintners, 96; hotel and inn keepers, 10; lodging-house keepers, 14; water-carriers, 2; hotel and tavern waiters, 5; flax-dressers, 2; spinners of flax, 7; spinners of wool, 7; spinners of unspecified classes, 33; winders and warpers, 6; wool-dressers, 3; weavers of cotton, 15; weavers of linen, 9; weavers of woollen, 7; weavers of lace, 2; weavers of unspecified classes, 78; assistants in factories, 38; manufacturer of thread, 1; manufacturer of woollen, 1; dyers, 6; clothier, 1; skimmers, 3; curriers, 12; tanners, 19; brogue-makers, 64; boot and shoe makers, 533; tailors, 197; sempstresses, 145; dress-makers, 435; milliners, 26; stay-makers, 19; knitters, 47; hatters, 12; bonnet-makers, 63; gloves, 10; hair-dressers and barbers, 18; umbrella-makers, 3; blacking-maker, 1; leather-dealers, 5; hosiers, 3; haberdashers, 4; draper, 1; linen-drapers, 13; woollen-drapers, 14; silk-mercier, 1; venders of soft goods, 20; furrier, 1; architects, 6; builders, 4; brick-maker, 1; potter, 1; stone-cutters, 26; lime-burners, 8; bricklayers, 6; stone-masons, 53; marble-polishers, 3; slaters, 62; plasterers, 15; sawyers, 59; carpenters, 182; cabinet-makers, 46; wood-polishers, 3; coopers, 132; turners, 10; millwrights, 6; wheel-wrights, 3; ship-wrights, 51; block-makers, 5; pump-borers, 6; cork-cutters, 18; latb-splitters, 3; brush-makers, 12; basket-makers, 17; iron-founders, 22; blacksmiths, 125; whitesmiths, 13; nailers, 56; cutlers, 5; gunsmiths, 5; braziers and coppersmiths, 14; wireworker, 1; bell-hanger, 1; plumbers, 6; tinplate-workers, 15; tinker, 1; machine-makers, 21; watch-makers, 16; musical-instrument-makers, 3; goldsmiths, silversmiths, and jewellers, 3; coach and car makers, 21; carvers and gilders, 5; saddlers, 30; harness-makers, 5; whip-maker, 1; rope-makers, 23; letter-press printers, 41; bookbinders, 6; paper-stainers, 2; chandlers and soap-boilers, 34; starch-manufacturers, 3;

Social Condition.—“During the last 15 years,” said Mr. Inglis in 1834, “Waterford has been an improving town; though that improvement has not been at all equal to what might have been expected from its trade; and at the time I visited it, the retail trade of the place was suffering from the low prices of farm produce, and consequent depression of the agriculturists. During the last nine years, the exports of Waterford have nearly doubled; and at present exceed two millions. But an export trade is not the most lucrative; in Waterford there are but few capitalists; the merchants, therefore, carry on their trade under very disadvantageous circumstances; and it is said, that not one-twentieth per cent. of the value of the exports remains to Waterford. Although there are very many unemployed persons in Waterford; and although the number of infirm poor has made a Mendicity Society necessary; and although, as the reader will presently be informed by my personal observation, scenes of the utmost misery and destitution are constantly brought under the notice of any one who walks into the bye streets; yet, taking the circle of country round Waterford, I believe I am entitled from mine inquiries to say, that there has been some improvement among the people. In female clothing, the introduction of cotton has had the effect of improving cleanliness. Waterford stuff used to be the common material; and a gown made of this would last six or seven years; and during all that time, the pin that fastened it up behind was never taken out. This dress has been superseded by cotton, and there is therefore an improvement in cleanliness. In houses, the premiums offered by the agricultural society have produced some improvement, and the abolition of the duty on coal, which is now pretty generally used in and about Waterford, has led to some improvement in the construction of farm-houses, by creating a necessity for grates and for chimneys of a better quality. In food, there has been no improvement among the labouring classes; the wages of labour will not admit of any; but in the town and among the small farmers, potatoes have, in some degree, yielded to wheaten bread. The wife of almost every small farmer carries a wheaten loaf back with her from market; and bread of a second quality is cheap—the large export of the fine qualities leaving the inferior qualities for home consumption.

Before leaving Waterford, I visited some of the worst quarters of the town, and was introduced to scenes of most appalling misery. I found three and four families in hovels, lying on straw in different corners, and not a bit of furniture visible; the hovels themselves, situated in the midst of the most horrid and disgusting filth. The heads of the families were out begging potatoes round the country. I noticed among the inferior classes in Waterford—I do not mean the mendicant or destitute poor—too many evidences of idle, slovenly habits; ragged clothes, which might have been mended; uncombed hair, which might have been in order; and even in the farm-houses, I observed amongst a class who in England would have been neat and tidy, dirty caps and faces, ragged children, and an untidy and slatternly look about things, not warranted by the circumstances of the inmates.

The Poor-law Union.—The Poor-law union of Waterford ranks as the 32d, and was declared on April 20, 1839. It lies partly in co. Waterford, and partly in co. Kilkenny; and comprehends an area of 146,467 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 79,437. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are in co. Kilkenny, Rathpatrick, 1,627; Kilcollum, 2,159; Dunkit, 2,741; Kilkenny, 2,419; Kilbeacon, 2,477; Kilbride, 1,964; Killahy, 1,336; Kilmacow, 2,011; Aglish, 1,836; and Rathkeeran, 2,357;—and in co. Waterford, Waterford, 28,821; Faithleg, 1,919; Crook, 1,971; Ballinakill, 1,762; Kilmaclean, 3,452; Rathmoyle, 1,074; Kilburn, 1,316; Drumeannon, 4,573; Island-Icane, 1,284; Reisk, 1,638; Kilmeaden, 2,133; Newcastle, 1,124; Dunhill, 1,871; Rosmire, 2,387; and Kilbarrymeaden, 3,440. The number of elected and of ex-officio guardians is respectively 34 and 11; and of the former, 10 are elected by the division of Waterford, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The division of Waterford lies chiefly in the municipal borough of Waterford, and partly in the portion of the parliamentary borough or quondam county of the city outside of the municipal borough; the division of Faithleg lies partly within the parliamentary boundaries of the city, and partly in the barony of Gualtier; the divisions of Crook, Kilmaclean, and Rathmoyle, lie in the barony of Gualtier; the division of Ballinakill lies partly in the barony of Gualtier, and partly in that of Middlethird; the divisions of Kilburn, Drumeannon, Island-Icane, Reisk, Kilmeaden, and Dunhill, lie in the barony of Middlethird; the division of Newcastle lies partly in the barony of Middlethird, and partly in that of Upperthird; the division of Kilbarrymeaden lies in the barony of Upperthird; the division of Rosmire lies partly in the barony of Upperthird, and partly in that of Decies-without-Drum; the divisions of Rathpatrick, Kilcollum, Dunkit, and Kilbride, lie in the barony of Ida; the division of Kilbeacon lies partly in the barony of Ida, and partly in that of Knocktopher; the division of Kilkenny lies in the barony of Knocktopher; the division of Killahy lies partly in the barony of Knocktopher, and partly in that of Iverk; and the divisions of Kilmacow, Aglish, and Rathkeeran lie in the barony of Iverk. The number of valued tenements in the district of the municipal borough of Waterford is 3,982,—in the districts of the quondam county of the city beyond the limits of the municipal borough, 725; in the district of Decies-without-Drum, 53,—in the districts of Gualtier, 1,174,—in the districts of Middlethird, 1,345,—in the districts of Upperthird, 447,—in the districts of Ida, 1,038,—in the districts of Knocktopher, 597,—in the districts of Iverk, 741,—in the entire union, 10,102; and of this total, 3,890 are valued under £5,—1,425, under £10,—1,230, under £15,—714, under £20,—509, under £25,—376, under £30,—638, under £40,—388, under £50,—and 932, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £130,695 13s.; the total number of persons rated is 5,449; and of these, 193 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—504, not exceeding £2,—457, not exceeding £3,—279, not exceeding £4,—and 242, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Oct. 10, 1839,—to be completed in Feb. 1841,—to cost £7,850 for building and completion, and £1,577 9s. 2d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, 25½ perches, purchased for £1,222 10s. 10d.,—and to contain accommodation for 900 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was April 20, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £9,765 18s. 6d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,701 7s. 3d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 609. The medical charities within the union are the leper hospital and the fever hospital in Waterford, and dispensaries in Waterford, Gualtier, Kilmacow, Kilmacthomas, and Tramore; and, in 1839–40, they received £451 10s. 10d. from subscription, £829 8s. 9d. from public grants, and £1,449 8s. from other sources,—in all, £2,730 3s., and expended £765 10s. in salaries to medical officers, £296 1s. for medicines, and £1,355 10s. 4d. for contingencies,—in all, £2,417 1s. 4d.,—and the dispensaries of Waterford, Gualtier, and Tramore, administered to 11,544 patients.

The Diocese.—The diocese of Waterford is alleged to have been founded in the 11th century, by the Ostmen, and to have had, as its first bishop, Malchus, who, in 1096, was consecrated in England. "In the life of Malchus," says an historical document of not very high credit, "it appears, from Eadmerus, that the usage in Ireland being for the bishops to be consecrated by the archbishops of Canterbury, at an election made in the year 1096, of Malchus, the King of Ireland, Muriertach O'Brien assisted at the council convened for that purpose. The archbishop of Cashel likewise, the bishops of Meath, of Leinster or Kildare, and Samuel, bishop of Down, in Ulster, with many more, did all of them, together with the King himself, subscribe the letter to Anselm, 'to appoint Malchus their bishop, in regard to the supremacy he had over them.'" Tuistius or Tostius, an Ostman, and the alleged next in succession but one after Malchus, was bishop in 1152, and assisted at the synod held by Cardinal Paparo. Augustine became bishop in 1175; he was witness, in 1177, to the charter by which King Henry II. granted to Robert Fitzstephens and Milo de Cogan the kingdom of Cork; and, in 1179, he was still in the see of Waterford, and assisted at the council of Lateran. "At Windsor, in council," says Hoveden, "King Henry II. gave to Augustine the bishopric of Waterford, then vacant, and sent him over in company with Laurence, bishop of Dublin, in order to be consecrated by Donat, archbishop of Cashel." In 1200, a person of the name of Robert was bishop of Waterford. David became bishop in 1204, and was murdered by Phelan, toparch of Decies, in 1209. Another person of the name of

Robert—who, from accounts still extant of his contest with the bishop of Lismore, is supposed to have been a mere ruffian, and an assassin—became bishop in 1210, and died in 1222. William Wace, dean of Waterford, became bishop in 1223. Walter I., a Benedictine monk, and prior of the abbey of St. John in Waterford, became bishop in 1227. Stephen I. was in the see from 1233 to 1246. Henry was in the see in 1249. Philip, dean of Waterford, became bishop in 1252. Walter II. became bishop in 1255, and died in 1272. Stephen of Fulburn, an Hospitaller, became bishop in 1273; he was, in 1274, made lord-treasurer of Ireland, and had assigned to him in that office a salary of £40 per annum; he became, in 1279, lord-justice of Ireland during the absence of De Ufford; he was, in 1282, reinstated in the lord-justiceship, which he held thence till his death; he enjoyed great and munificent tokens of the royal favour; and, in 1286, he was translated to the see of Tuam. Walter De Fulburn, a Franciscan friar, and chancellor of Ireland, became bishop in 1286, and died in 1307. Matthew, chancellor of Waterford cathedral, became bishop in 1307, and died in 1323. Nicholas Welified, dean of Waterford, became bishop in 1323, and died in 1337. Richard Francis became bishop in 1338, and died in 1348. Robert Elyot was made bishop in 1349, and deprived by Pope Clement VI. in 1350. Roger Cradock, a Franciscan friar, became bishop in 1350, and resigned in 1362; and he was afterwards translated to the see of Llandaff. The sees of Waterford and Lismore were united immediately after the removal of Roger Cradock; and they have ever since been mutually consolidated,—so that every subsequent bishop of Waterford must be understood as having also been bishop of Lismore. Thomas Le Reve, canon of Lismore, became bishop in 1363, and died in 1393. Robert Read, a Dominican friar, became bishop in 1394, resigned in 1396, and was afterwards translated successively to the sees of Carlisle and Chichester. Thomas Sparkford became bishop in 1396, and died in 1397. John Deping or De-Ping, became bishop by papal provision in 1397, and died in 1399. Thomas Snell, archdeacon of Glendalough, became bishop in 1399, resigned in 1403, and was afterwards translated to the see of Ossory. Roger became bishop in 1405, and died in 1409. John Geese, a Carmelite friar, and a doctor of divinity in the university of Oxford, became bishop in 1409, wrote several tracts, acquired much celebrity as a scholar, impeached his metropolitan, Richard O'Hedian, before a parliament held in 1421, and died in 1425. Richard, archdeacon of Lismore, became bishop by papal provision in 1426, and died in 1448. Robert Poer, dean of Limerick, became bishop in 1446, and died in 1471. Richard Martin, a Franciscan friar, became bishop by papal provision in 1472. John Bolcomp became bishop in 1475, and died in 1479. Nicholas O'Henisa, a Cistercian monk, and abbot of St. Mary's of Fermoy, became bishop by papal provision in 1480. John became bishop in 1482. Thomas Pursell became bishop in 1486, and died in 1517. Nicholas Comin, bishop of Ferns, was translated to the see of Waterford and Lismore in 1519, and resigned in 1551. Patrick Walsh, dean of Waterford, became bishop in 1551, held the deanery of Waterford and the rectory of Aghar conjointly with the see, and died in 1578. Marmaduke Middleton, vicar of Coolock and Dunboyne, and rector of Killure, became bishop in 1579, and resigned in 1582. A historian says, "he was degraded and deprived at Lambeth; which sentence was executed before the high commissioners by the formally divesting him of the episcopal robes and priestly vestments. It appears from Rushworth, that the charge against him was the contriving and publishing a forged will; for which he was first fined in the Star Chamber, and then turned over to the High Commission Court for degradation." He did not survive his disgrace many months." Miller Magrath, archbishop of Cashel, received the see of Waterford and Lismore in commendam, to be held during pleasure, and resigned it in 1589,—received it again in commendam in 1592, and resigned in 1607. Some time before his second resignation, Magrath, with the consent of his dean and chapter, granted in fee the manor of Lismore, and other lands, to Sir Walter Raleigh, at the rent of £18 6s. 8d. Thomas Weatherhead, archdeacon of Cork and Cloyne, was made bishop of Waterford and Lismore in 1589, and died in 1592. John Lancaster, chaplain to James I., became bishop in 1607, and died in 1619. Michael Boyle, dean of Lismore, brother to the archbishop of Tuam, and uncle to the archbishop of Dublin, became bishop of Waterford and Lismore in 1619, held in commendam all his previously held benefices except the deanery of Lismore, received also in commendam the chancellorship of Cashel, and died in 1635. John Atherton, a native of Somersetshire, a great proficient in the canon law, an adept in ecclesiastical affairs, prebendary of St. John's, chancellor of Christ-church, Dublin, and rector of Killaben and Fontstown, became bishop in 1636, and died in 1640. Archibald Adare, dean of Raphoe, who had, for some seditious words, been deprived of the bishopric of Killalla and Achonry, was made bishop of Waterford and Lismore in 1641, and died in 1647. George Baker became bishop in 1660, and died in 1665. Hugh Gore, dean of Lismore, became bishop in 1666, and died in 1690-91. Nathaniel Foy became bishop in 1691, distinguished himself and greatly endangered his life in preaching against the doctrines of Roman Catholicity, and died in 1707-8. Thomas Mills became bishop in 1707. Dr. Charles Este, bishop of Ossory, was translated to the see of Waterford and Lismore in 1740. Dr. Richard Chenevix, bishop of Killaloe, was translated to Waterford and Lismore, also in 1740. Dr. William Newcome, bishop of Ossory, was translated to Waterford and Lismore in 1779. Dr. Richard Marlay, bishop of Clonfert, was translated to Waterford and Lismore in 1795. The Hon. Power French was made bishop of Waterford and Lismore in 1802. Joseph Stock, bishop of Killalla, was translated to Waterford and Lismore in 1810. The Hon. Richard Bourke, dean of Ardagh, and second son of Joseph Deane Bourke, archbishop of Tuam, and third Earl of Mayo, was made bishop of Waterford and Lismore in 1813. Toward the close of bishop Bourke's period, the see of Waterford and Lismore became united, in terms of the Church Reform bill, to the sees of Cashel and Emly; and in consequence, the present amiable prelate, Dr. Robert Daly, previously rector of Powerscourt, has the style of bishop of Cashel, Emly, Waterford, and Lismore, yet is resident in the episcopal palace of Waterford.

The episcopal incomes of Waterford and Lismore had been so long united, that, in the official returns recently made of them, they could not be distinguished from each other; and during the three years ending on Dec. 31, 1831, they amounted, in annual average, to £4,323 7s. 1d. gross, and £3,933 12s. 4½d. nett. The dean receives a gross income of £899 4s. 7d. from the benefices which constitute his corps, and holds also the united benefices of Dunhill, Newcastle, and Guilcagh, in the dio. of Lismore. The precentor receives a gross income of £345 17s. 3d. from his corps, and holds also the deanery of St. Canice cathedral, and the benefice of Offerlane, in the dio. of Ossory. The chancellor receives a gross income of £379 12s. 4d. from his corps, and the treasurer receives a gross income of £330 16s. from his corps. There are no prebendaries.—The diocese of Waterford is, in territorial extent, the smallest diocese in Ireland, and lies wholly in the eastern portion of the county of Waterford. Its length is 13 statute miles; its breadth is 9 statute miles; and its area is 513,239 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 45,730. Number of parishes, 29; of benefices, 11; of resident incumbents, 10. Tithe compositions connected with the benefices, £2,319 19s. 4d.; glebes, £171 0s. 11d. Gross income of the benefices, £3,293 14s. 6d.; nett, £2,743 10s. 5d. Patron of 4 benefices, the Crown; of 7, the diocesan. Amount of appropriate tithes, £705 16s. 2d.; of inappropriate tithes, £385 11s. 1d. Number of stipendiary curates, 5; gross amount of their salaries, £319 4s. 7d. Number of benefices with churches, 7; total number of churches, 9; sittings, 3,980; cost of building 3, and repairing 1 of the churches, £4,273 10s. 9d.; of which £3,507 13s. 10d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £304 6s. 2d. was lent by that Board, £461 10s. 9d. was raised by private contribution. Number of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 1; of meeting-houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters, 6; of Roman Catholic chapels, 13. In 1834, the population consisted of 5,301 Churchmen, 110 Presbyterians, 433 other Protestant dissenters, and 43,371 Roman Catholics; each of 4 benefices contained no member of the Established church,* each of 4 contained not more than 20 members of the Established church, each of 4 between 100 and 200, one between 200 and 500, one between 1,000 and 2,000, and one between 2,000 and 5,000. In the same year, 56 daily schools, which made returns of their attendance, had on their books 2,245 boys, 968 girls, and 100 children whose sex was not specified, and 3 daily schools, which made no returns of their attendance, were computed to be attended by 177 scholars; 33 of the total number of daily schools were supported wholly by fees; and, of the 26 which were supported wholly or partially by endowment or subscription, 10 were in connection with the National Board, 3 with the Association for Discouraging Vice, and one with the Kildare Place Society.

The Roman Catholic Diocese.—The Roman Catholic dioceses of Waterford and Lismore remain mutually consolidated as before the Reformation; but, in other respects, they continue unannexed, and are regarded as constituting one diocese. This united diocese is distributed into 37 parishes, and served by 36 parochial clergymen, and 70 curatorial or adjunct clergymen. The bishop's parishes are those of Trinity-within and St. John's, in the city of Waterford. The names of the parishes, together with the sites of their respective chapels, are, 1. Trinity-within and St. John's,—Waterford; 2. St. Mary's and the Abbey,—Clonmel; 3. St. Peter and St. Paul,—Clonmel; 4. Ballyporeen,—Ballyporeen; 5. Tramore,—Tramore and Carberry; 6. Municipal Affairs.—The old borough of Waterford is co-extensive with the quondam county of the city, noticed in the article preceding the present; and it continues also to be the parliamentary borough, and has an area of 10,059 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches,—of which 614 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are tideway. The present municipal borough, or existing district of the liberties of the city, includes little more than the actual town, and comprises an area of only 608 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches,—of which 136 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches are tideway. Waterford was, at a very early period, a place of considerable importance; and it has, from time to time, received numerous charters granting it various liberties and privileges. The principal extant charters or kindred documents are one of Richard I., two of John, eight of Henry III., three of Edward I., eight of Edward III., five of Richard II., three of Henry IV., two of Henry V., five of Henry VI., three of Edward IV., five of Henry VII., one of Henry VIII., one of Edward VI., one of Philip and Mary, four of Elizabeth, two of James I., two of Charles I., one of James II., and one of Anne. A privilege was granted and confirmed to Waterford of obliging all vessels which entered the common estuary of the Suir and the Barrow, to load and unload at the quay of Waterford; and this was zealously and perseveringly resisted by the people of New-Ross, and formed a chief topic of many of the charters granted to Waterford; but it was at length abolished, in 1377, by a writ of 1 Richard II. One of the charters of Elizabeth, granted in the 16th year of her reign, erected the county of the city of Waterford, or gave the original borough a peculiar and county jurisdiction; and the charter of 2 Charles I. gave to the authorities of the county of the city jurisdiction over all the great harbour of Waterford, or all the navigable portion of the estuary and fluviatile volume of the Suir. The borough was placed under the "New Rules" of Charles II.; so that the Lord-lieutenant and the Council of State acquired a vote upon the appointment of the chief magistrate, the recorder, the sheriffs, and the town clerk. The corporation, according to the governing charter, which was that of 2 Charles I., was styled "The Mayor, Sheriff, and Citizens of the County of the City of Waterford, in the kingdom of Ireland;" and had, as its officers, the mayor, two sheriffs, the recorder, the town clerk, and clerk of the peace, the chamberlain, the president of the court of conscience, the coroner, the water bailiff, the sword-bearer, 4 sergeants-at-mace, the high constable, the second constable, 10 petty constables, 4 market constables, a potato-weigher, a fish-house porter, a beadle, an assay-master, an inspector of markets, a porter of the town-hall, a housekeeper, a sessions' crier, and a mayor's clerk. The council, or ruling body of the corporation in the old borough, consisted of the mayor, 18 other aldermen, the sheriffs, and assistants,—amounting in all to 40 persons; and that, in the new borough, or present municipal borough, consists of ten aldermen and 30 councillors, elected from the five wards into which the borough is divided, and which are designated Tower, Custom-house, Centre, West, and South. In the old borough, the mayor was elected from among the aldermen, the aldermen from among the assistants, the assistants from among the freemen; and the freemen, though entitled to freedom in right of birth, of apprenticeship, or of marriage, were elected by the council upon special petition, and often grounds so capricious, partisan, or political, that claims otherwise sufficiently valid were liable to be rejected simply for want of desired political subserviency in the views or creed of the candidates to those of the council. A freeman had a vote for the members of parliament, enjoyed exemption from certain local tolls which have for a considerable period ceased to be collected, and possesses the singular privilege of exemption from some tolls of comparative consequence in Liverpool and Bridgewater. "In the salt trade," says the official report of 1833, "the want of freedom amounts to a prohibition. Several merchants residing in Waterford have, notwithstanding this, been refused the freedom of the city; and one merchant informed us that he calculated he had paid, in the way of dues in Liverpool, for the last 27 years, from £25 to £30 a-year, which he would not have been liable to if he had been a freeman of the city of Waterford. This gentleman applied for his freedom more than once, but had been refused." In 1833, the number of resident freemen was between 600 and 700; of registered freemen, about 596; and of non-resident freemen, less than 200. The courts held within the city are the assizes for the county at large by the judges, courts of quarter-sessions by the assistant barrister, courts of petty-sessions by the county magistrates, a court for suits of wages by the mayor, a court of pleas for debts of from £2 to £10 by the corporation, and a court of conscience for debts under £2 by the corporation. The local police force of the county of the city consisted, in 1833, of a high constable, a second constable, 10 petty constables, and 2 supernumeraries; and, though this force might have seemed to be utterly incompetent, the peace and good order of the city appeared to be as well preserved as those of most other large towns. The constabulary force more recently employed will be noticed in the next section, entitled "Statistics." A local act, obtained in the 24th year of George III., authorized the ministers, churchwardens, and parishioners of the several parishes, at their vestries in July, to appoint watchmen and order their equipments; it provided for the costs by a poundage on dwelling-houses and other tenements, recoverable by the churchwardens as parish-rates; and it exempted from this poundage all houses of less annual value than £5, and excluded the occupiers of such houses from voting at the vestries. The powers conveyed by this act, however, have been wholly employed in lighting the city,—no provision being made for watching it; yet the quays are both lighted and watched at the cost, and under the superintendence, of the Harbour Commissioners. The cleaning and the repairing of the streets, within certain limits, which embrace almost all the interior of the town, are effected by contract,—the corporation paying the contractor £320 a-year; and beyond these limits, they are performed in the same manner, and from the same resources, as the cleaning and repairing of any part of the public roads of the county. "The city," says the official report of 1833, "is supplied with water by the corporation, who have gone to considerable expense for that purpose; and a treaty is at present going forward for the purpose of bringing a large stream of water as an additional supply to the city. The citizens pay for the water for their houses; but the public are supplied with water by fountains and pumps in several parts of the town free of expense. This pipe-water is demised by the corporation at a rent of £200 a-year." The council of the city, together with certain other parties, including the bishop and the members of parliament, are "Commissioners for the making wide and convenient streets, ways, and passages, in the city of Waterford, and the suburbs thereof;" and they possess similar powers to the homogeneous body in the city of Dublin. The rental of the corporation, including every species of property which produces an annual profit, amounts to about £7,426 11s. 3d.; and the expenditure, in 1833, amounted to £6,181 4s. 11d., and had as its chief items £3,155 7s. 6d. of interest on city seals, and £2,123 18s. 4½d. of salaries to officers and servants. "The corporation," says the report of 1833, "is indebted in the sum of £63,107 12s. 4½d. on city seals or bonds on which interest is paid at five per cent., and in the sum of £5,424 12s. 4d. for money lodged with them for charitable purposes, and on which interest is paid at various rates. This debt appears to have been contracted gradually and at different periods; a good deal of it was incurred since 1807. The city seals or bonds, due on the 7th of February, 1818, amounted to £34,000; and, in 1821, the debt for each and charity money amounted to £58,356 18s. 6d. British. The increase of debt since that time is £10,175 6s. 2d. present currency. The entire of the debt due by the corporation has been contracted in and since 1724; and it would appear that it was in 1724 that the citizens or freemen took a part in the corporation transactions for the last time, and the affairs of the corporation have ever since been managed by the mayor and council. It seems that a good deal of money was expended in law expenses; a much larger portion expended in improvements on the town; a very large sum was expended in rebuilding the town-hall, and several sums have been expended since in repairing it; and a sum of £6,600 was expended in the purchase of property, situate in the city, from Lord Enniskillen." A large amount of tithes belongs to the corporation; and, previous to 1833, was leased, during periods of from 3 to 99 years, at an aggregate annual rent of £766 18s. 10d., and on renewal fines of £2,443 15s. 4½d. The denominations of the tithes, together with the amount of their respective yearly rent in 1833, are Polorone, £70; Desertmore, £73 16s. 10d.; Newcastle and Guilcagh, £49 4s. 8d.; Dunhill, £37 10s. 8d.; Rathpatrick, £88 12s. 4d.; Shanbough, £28; Knockmoran, £163 13s. 10d.; Ballygowran, £44 6s. 2d.; Kilculliheen, £65; Clonmore, £13 16s. 11d.; Kilmackevogue, £70; Roshercon, £11 1s. 6d.; Illud, part of monastery of Kilculliheen, £18 9s. 3d.; Portnascully, part of Kilculliheen, £32 12s. 2d.; and Macully, 4s. 7½d. The corporation have the patronage of the ecclesiastical benefices of Dunhill, Newcastle, and Guilcagh, in the county of Waterford; Kilculliheen, partly in the liberties of Waterford, and partly in the county of Kilkenny; and Macully, Polorone, Portnascully, and Illud, in the county of Kilkenny. They hold also the patronage of the valuable benefice of Roshercon; and they sold for £1,300 the next presentation to that benefice after the year 1833.

Statistics.—In 1843, the number of committals on charges of felony was 70; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 240; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 396,—and of the 10 persons committed on charges of felony, 7 were convicted, and 3 were discharged. The constabulary force, on Jan. 1, 1844, consisted of 1 second-rate sub-inspector, 1 second-rate head-constable, 9 constables, 39 first-rate sub-constables, 2 second-rate constables, and 2 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1843 was £1,946 14s. 6½d. The constabulary are distributed into the three stations of Cross, Barrack-street, and Ferrybank. The amount of grand-jury presentment for 1842 was £5,227. The number of houses valued for the poor-rate within the municipal borough is 3,982; and of these, 1,931 are valued under £5,—489, under £10,—500, under £15,—248, under £20,—176, under £25,—112, under £30,—135, under £40,—103, under £50,—and 228, at and above £50. The number of houses valued for the poor-rate within the parliamentary borough or quondam county of the city, is 4,707; and of these, 2,344 are valued under £5,—562 under £10,—602, under £15,—275, under £20,—198, under £25,—126, under £30,—165, under £40,—128, under £50,—and 307, at and above £50. The parliamentary borough sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 1,490; of whom 621 were registered under the old qualification, and 879 under the new. Of those registered under the old qualification, previous to the Reform Act, 31 were £50 freeholders, 19 were £20 freeholders, 18 were 40s. freeholders, 1 was a £50 rent-charger, and 551 were freemen; and of those registered under the new qualification by the Reform Act, 5 were £10 freeholders, 17 were £20 leaseholders, 4 were £10 leaseholders, and 853 were £10 leaseholders. The population, education, and miscellaneous statistics, are given in the article on the county of the city.

History.—Waterford is alleged by some writers to have been founded in the year 155; but it is not credibly known to record, and probably did not exist, till 853; and it appears to have been then founded by Sitricus, one of three brothers, noble Danes, who had recently arrived in Ireland. Its original name was Cuan-na-Grioth, 'the harbour of the sun;' and is believed to have arisen from the fact of its pristine inhabitants being pagans and sun-worshippers. See TORY-HILL. Another ancient name of the town was Portlargo, 'the harbour of the thigh,' or the 'thigh-harbour;' and is supposed to have been suggested by a fancied resemblance between the outline of the Suir from Waterford downward to the shape of the human thigh. The modern name, Waterford, seems to bear the simple meaning of a ford upon a stream; and may have been suggested either by the existence of a ford or shallow in John's Pill, or the near vicinity of a ford or ferry-station on the Suir. Yet a combination of learning and ingenuity has, with no small plausibility, assigned it to a very different and a considerably expressive origin. "According to this explication, the name is derived from Vader-fjord, which, in the Norse language, signifies a haven dedicated to Vader, a Scandinavian deity. In the death-song of Regner Fadrayr, in the original Norse, the word Vader-fjord is mentioned. This ode was translated by Orlaus Vermius, in Latin verse. His Latin for the word is Vadrasinus, which is Vader's-haven. Part of this ode is quoted in Mallett's Northern Antiquities; it may be seen at length in Blair's Dissertation, prefixed to Ossian's Poems." The Ostmen or Danes appear to have had, on the east coast of Ireland, four stations for their fleets, to which they gave Norse names, still retained in a corrupted form; and these four fiords or havens were Vader-fjord, now called corruptly Waterford,—Wessford, now called corruptly Wexford,—Carlingfiord, now called with little alteration Carlingford,—and Strangfiord, now called with little alteration Strangford. Both Dublin bay and the mouth of the Boyne, indeed, are known to have been among their chief resorts,—the former in a very eminent degree; but Dublin bay was too wide and open, and the Boyne was too strictly fluvial, to be properly designated fiords,—a word which designates estuaries or sea-loughs, and is almost strictly identical in meaning with the Scottish word friths or firths.

In 803, Patrick, son of Ivorus, then king of the Danes of Waterford, was slain. In 937, the Danes of Waterford overran and wasted Meath. In 1000, Ivorus, then king of the Danes of Waterford, died in the city. In 1003, Reginald, king of the Danes of Waterford, and son of Ivorus, built the tower which still bears his name. In 1014, Sitricus, king of the Danes of Waterford, fought, in the vicinity of Dublin, the celebrated battle of Clontarf with Brian Boromh. See CLONTARF. In 1036, Sitricus was killed by the king of Ossory; and, in the same year, Reginald O'Hiver, the successor of Sitricus, was killed by Sitricus II. In 1038, Cumana O'Rahan, king of the Danes of Waterford, was slain, either by the people of Ossory, or by the treachery of his own men; and in the same year, the city of Waterford was plundered and burnt by Dermot Mac-Mel-Nembo, king of Leinster. In 1087, the city was captured and burnt by the people of Dublin. In 1096, the Danes of Waterford, having embraced Christianity, elected Malchus to be their bishop. [See section 'The Diocese.'] In May 1170, the Danes of Waterford having received intelligence of the disembarkation in their near vicinity of the small invading force of Anglo-Normans under Raymond Le Gros and Henry de Monte Marisco [see BAGENBON], "resolved to attack them before their strength increased, and with the assistance of Malachy O'Feolin, prince of the Decies, and O'Ryne of Idroge, got together an army of 3,000 horse and foot, with which they fell upon the English, who valiantly received them, and though few in number, under the conduct of Harvey de Montmoriscoe, after some hours' dispute, put them to flight. In this battle fell about 1,000 Danes and Irish, and 70 of the principal citizens were made prisoners, who were all put to death by Raymond, to revenge the loss of his friend, De Bevin, slain in the battle." In the following August, the Earl of Pembroke, usually called Earl Strongbow, arrived with a large invading force of Anglo-Normans, in Waterford Harbour; and having been immediately joined by the previous invaders Raymond Le Gros, Fitz-Stephens, and Henry de Monte Marisco, and by their ally the king of Leinster, he proceeded next day to the town of Waterford, and assaulted it both by land and by water. "After two repulses, Raymond perceived a cabin on the wall propped with timber on the outside. Immediately he caused the prop to be cut, so that the house fell, and with it part of the wall, at which breach the English entered the city, plundered it, and put all the inhabitants found in arms to the sword. Among other prisoners, Reginald, prince of the Danes of Waterford, and Malachy O'Feolin, prince of Decies, were taken; whom they imprisoned in Reginald's Tower. These being afterwards condemned to death, were saved by the intercession of Dermot, king of Leinster." Speedily after the capture of the city, Earl Strongbow was married here to Eva, the king of Leinster's daughter, and was proclaimed heir-apparent to that prince's dominions; not long after, Dermot and the Earl, leaving a garrison in Waterford, marched to the north, and besieged and captured Dublin; and, at the setting in of winter, Dermot returned to Ferns, and the Earl to Waterford. In October 1171, Henry II., at the head of about 500 knights, and 4,000 soldiers, landed in person at Waterford. A Danish lord, it is said, drew chains across the harbour, and endeavoured to impede the disembarkation; but Henry saw the obstacle easily and speedily removed; and he entered Waterford, not as a conqueror, but as an acknowledged sovereign. While he remained here, he received the formal renunciation of the conquered districts from Earl Strongbow, obtained the acknowledged submission of the people of Wexford and Cork, appointed governors over the fortified towns, and granted to the citizens of Waterford many privileges which were afterwards confirmed to them by succeeding monarchs. At the end of about six months—during which he proceeded to Lismore, and received the submission of the nobles and other chief men of Munster—he prepared to return to England; and previous to his departure, he assigned the government of the city to three of his most zealous partisans, set apart lands in the vicinity for the maintenance of knights and soldiers, and adopted other such precautionary measures as he thought desirable for the preservation and consolidation of his interests. Yet historians have remarked, that he probably did not acquire one true subject by means of any of his measures, or during the whole period of his stay.

The wall which enclosed the triangular site of the city at the period of the Anglo-Norman invasion, ran in a westerly direction from Reginald's Tower, "and was terminated by Turgess's Tower, which formerly stood at the corner of Barron-strand-street. From this tower, the wall forming the second side of the triangle proceeded in a southwardly direction, enclosing the Black friary, skirting, but not including, what was formerly the Boys' Blue School; from thence it crossed Peter-street, and ran to the castle, then called St. Martin's castle, situated at the rear of the Girls' Blue School. The third side of the triangle united St. Martin's castle with Reginald's Tower." But about the time of Henry II.'s visit to the city, or of his departure from it to England, very considerable additions were made to both the city itself and its fortifications. "New walls were erected, the fortifications repaired, and gates and towers were superadded to the former defences. The new part comprehended the church, abbey, and street of St. John, New-street, St. Stephen's-street, St. Patrick's-street, and the churches of St. Stephen, St. Michael, and St. Patrick. On the west side of the city there were two gates, St. Patrick's and New-gate; to the south, Bowling-green-gate, called also Close-gate, and St. John's gate; to the south-east, St. Catherine's or Colbeck-gate; and to the north, there were several gates communicating with the quay and the river."

In April 1185, John, Earl of Morton, a favourite son of Henry II., to whom the latter wished to commit the superintendence of the affairs of Ireland, arrived at Waterford, attended by many nobles of England, and by a considerable force of knights and archers; and immediately after his arrival, he was waited on by many of the Irish chiefs, and regaled with demonstrations of a readiness on the part of a turbulent people, to submit to his authority. But John was then only 19 years of age, and was far from being distinguished by either constitutional strength of mind or acquired soundness of judgment; and in spite of being assisted by Giraldus Cambrensis and other learned men, he was utterly incompetent to assuage the tempest of conspiracy and bloodshed which had been desolating the kingdom, or to impart to the Anglo-Norman government of the conquered portions of Ireland a tolerable degree of consolidation and influence. "He despoiled some of the Irish of their lands, and parcelled them among his followers; the revenues appropriated to the defence of the country he bestowed upon his courtiers, who wasted them in riot and extravagance; he thus disgusted his friends, and weakened his own resources; and the example of indolence and debauchery being followed by the army, everything seemed to portend the ruin of the English interests." Henry II., informed of these disorders, recalled John before the close of the year, and committed the government to the active and experienced soldier, John de Courcey. In 1211, after he had sat upwards of 11 years upon the throne, and had specially directed his attention to the condition of Waterford in particular, and to that of Ireland in general, John arrived again at Waterford, with the intention of settling the disturbances which had arisen during his absence; and, while here, he made personal visits to many parts of the country, attended by a large body of knights and soldiers,—and, in particular, he made repeated journeys to Cork, and had a large building erected near Clashmore, at which his cavalcade on these journeys might halt, and the ruins of which still exist. See CLOUGH. His place of residence in Waterford stood on the site now occupied by the Widows' Apartments in Cathedral-square; and some of its vaults and foundations were dug up by the workmen while preparing the ground for the present edifice. During his stay, he founded the priory of St. John, and made a large addition to the city; and some of the walls which surrounded this addition are still, or were quite recently, in existence. In 1252, and again about 30 years later, Waterford was destroyed by fire. In October 1394, Richard II. landed at Waterford, at the head of an army of 4,000 men-at-arms, and 30,000 archers, and attended by the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Nottingham, and other distinguished noblemen; but he does not seem to have contemplated any object worthy of so great an expedition; and, after a stay of nine months, during which he received many flattering submissions from the natives, he returned to England. In May 1399, the same monarch again landed at Waterford, and was welcomed with every demonstration of joy; and he spent six days apparently in no other public occupation than receiving hollow professions of loyalty from the people. "The citizens," we are told, "were, at this time, mean and slovenly in their appearance, and exhibited in this respect, as well as in their dwellings, a degree of poverty and wretchedness which we should not have expected to find in so considerable a city." Yet Waterford appears not to have been a jot worse than Dublin and the other large towns. In 1461, a hostile encounter occurred between the citizens of Waterford and the sept of the O'Hedriscolls and Powers. These septs, who were hereditary enemies of Waterford, "having landed at Tramore, the mayor and citizens advanced in warlike manner, to give them battle. The contending parties met at Ballymacdane, when the invaders were entirely overthrown, 160 of them slain, and many of them taken prisoners. Among the captives was O'Hedriscoll-Oge, and six of his sons, who, with three of their galleys, were carried in triumph into Waterford. It is probably in memory of this victory, that three galleys are quartered in the arms of the city."

In 1487, when the impostor, Lambert Simnel, had been proclaimed king at Dublin, the citizens of Waterford peremptorily and strenuously opposed his usurpation and his purposes; during the general insurrection which followed, they remained steadily loyal; and when a great force of the usurper, headed by the Earl of Kildare, appeared against the city, and sent a menacing communication to the mayor, the citizens replied in defiance, and were prepared to make manful resistance to violence; but they had the happiness to see their enemy withdrawing without making assault or offering battle, and to know that he was compelled to prosecute his adventure into England, where it received a speedy and appropriate termination. Soon after this event, Sir Richard Edgecombe, who was sent at the head of 500 men to oblige the people of Ireland to renew their oaths of allegiance to England, and who lauded in prosecution of his mission at Kinsale, proceeded thence in a coasting voyage to Waterford to commend and confirm the loyalty of the citizens, and was received and entertained with the most distinguished demonstrations of welcome. "In the year 1497, it was again the good fortune of the citizens of Waterford to manifest their loyalty to the king; for which, among other honours, they received the following motto:—'Intacta manet Waterfordia.' On this occasion, they communicated to his majesty the intelligence of the arrival of Perkin Warbeck at Cork, and assured him of their loyalty and affection. An opportunity was now afforded them to prove the sincerity of their professions and the extent of their devotion, for immediately on his landing, the whole strength of the rebel force was directed against Waterford. Perkin Warbeck and Maurice Earl of Desmond, with an army of 2,400 men, advanced to the city, and on the 23d of July prepared to invest it; this force was intended to assault the western division, while a fleet of eleven ships, which arrived at Passage, was ordered to engage from the river; there was also a body of troops landed from the fleet, who were to proceed in the direction of Lumbard's marsh and co-operate with the land forces. To prevent the junction of these two divisions, the ponds of Kilbarry were kept full, the besieged having raised a large mound of earth to stop the course of the river which flows from Kilbarry into the Suir. The necessary preparations being completed, the siege was vigorously commenced, and carried on for eleven days with great zeal and activity. In the many skirmishes and sorties which took place, the citizens were generally victorious, and routed or captured their opponents. In the field, the citizens covered themselves with glory; but it is to be regretted that after the fight their valiant hearts had no touch of pity; on one occasion, when, after a successful sortie in which they committed great slaughter, they returned to the city with a numerous band of prisoners, they carried them to the market-place, chopped off their heads, and fastened them on stakes, as trophies of their victory. Their valour and the dread of their cruelty could no longer be resisted; the besieged became the assailants; the enemy were repulsed in every direction; and what served to insure the victory of the citizens, the cannon planted on Reginald's Tower, after many days hard firing, beat in the side of one of the ships, when the entire crew perished. The enemy disheartened by all these untoward occurrences, and fearing to awake the vengeance of the enraged citizens, raised the siege, and on the night of the 3d of August, retreated to Ballycasheen; from thence they proceeded to Passage, where Perkin Warbeck embarked and fled to Cork. The citizens pursued him with four ships, and, after an eager chase, followed him to Cornwall, where he landed. When this intelligence reached the king, who was then at Exeter, he ordered the pursuit to be continued, and Perkin was at length apprehended. The loyalty and courage of the citizens of Waterford were duly appreciated by the monarch, who, in addition to other marks of favour, was pleased to honour them with two highly flattering letters,"—and who also, in compliance with a petition from the citizens, confirmed and enlarged the privileges of the city.

In 1520, the Earls of Ormond and Desmond were, by the interposition of the Earl of Surrey, reconciled at Waterford. In 1536, Henry VIII., in acknowledgment of the distinguished loyalty of the citizens, sent by a special messenger, a gilt sword and a cap of maintenance, to be always carried before the mayor. "The city of Waterford," remarks the Rev. R. H. Ryland, in reference to this period, "was now a place of trade and consequence, enjoying a regular government, and advancing every day in the improvements and decencies of civilized society. We can now look back with complacency upon the manners of those from whom many of the citizens of the present day are descended, and from whom the general character of the people may be faintly traced; we have an interest in their courage and loyalty, and are proud or humbled as we read of their good fortunes, or dwell upon the reverses, which it was the lot of their city to experience. The following description of the then citizens of Waterford, written about 250 years since, may serve to show whether the present generation have improved upon the manners of those who preceded them:—'The aire of Waterford is not verie subtill, yea nathelesse the sharpnesse of their wittes seemeth to be nothing rebated or duld by reason of the grossenesse of the aire. For in good sooth the townemen, and nameilie students are pregnant in conceiving, quicke in taking, and sure in keeping. The citizens are verie heddie and warie in all their publike affaires, slow in the determining of matters of weight, loving to looke yer they leape. In choosing their magistrate, they respect not onlie his riches, but also they weigh his experience. And therefore they elect for their maior neither a rich man that is younge, nor an old man that is poore. They are cheerfull in the intertainment of strangers, hartie one to another, nothing given to factions. They loue no idle bench-whistlers, nor lurkish factiors: for younge and old are wholie addicted to thriuing, the men commonlie to traffike, the women to spinning and carding. As they distill the best aqua vitæ, so they spin the choicest rug in Ireland.'"

In 1569, while the Lord-deputy Sidney lay encamped at Clonmel, and expected to be attacked by a body of insurgents who had recently ravaged the country and besieged Kilkenny, he requested the citizens of Waterford to assist him with a few soldiers during three days; but they instantly refused to comply with his request, and excused themselves on the ground of the privileges enjoyed by their city. In 1575, the Lord-deputy Sidney, when on a progress at the head of about 600 horsemen and footmen to quell the disturbances which arose out of the disputes of the Earls of Ormond and Desmond, made a visit to Waterford, and was elaborously welcomed and magnificently entertained; yet, when expressing his satisfaction at the present demonstration of loyalty, smartly twitted the citizens upon their deficiency in that commodity when he requested their aid at Clonmel. In 1579, the Lord-deputy Drury, who had succeeded Sir Henry Sidney, sought repose in Waterford for the recovery of his health, conferred the honour of knighthood on the mayor, and died in the city before the close of the year. Early in 1580, Sir William Pelham, who had been appointed Lord-justice on the death of Sir William Drury, came southward from Dublin to visit the cities of Munster, and was met at Ballyhack by the mayor of Waterford, and conducted with much parade and pageantry to the city; and when here, he learned from the Earl of Ormond that the Earl of Desmond was making a hostile advance, and had arrived at Dungarvan. A detachment of 400 foot and 100 horse was immediately despatched from Waterford to the Lord-justice, to oppose the foe; "but the force of the insurgents continuing to increase, a special commission was directed to Sir Warham St. Leger, authorizing him to proceed according to the course of martial law against all offenders, as the nature of their crimes might deserve; provided the parties were not worth forty shillings yearly in land or annuity, or ten pounds in goods. He was also empowered to enter into terms with the rebels, and to grant them protection for ten days; to apprehend and execute all idle persons taken by night; to live at free quarters wherever he went; and, by way of check upon this monstrous power, he was required every month to certify the number and the offences of persons whom he should order to be put to death. The Lord-justice, after he had rested about three weeks at Waterford, removed to Clonmel, and from thence to Limerick." In May 1603, the Lord-deputy Mountjoy, believing that the turbulent condition of Munster required his presence, and probably some chastisement, came southward from Dublin at the head of a numerous army, arrived at Grace-Dieu, within the liberties of Waterford, and there summoned the mayor to receive him and his army into the city; he received for answer, that the citizens were exempted, by a charter of King John, from giving quarter to soldiers, and therefore would not open their gates to his army; he then threatened that if the gates were not speedily opened, he would beat them down, cut King John's charter to pieces, and level the city with the ground; and he was immediately obeyed, and, passing into the city, received the submission of the citizens, imposed on them an oath of renewed allegiance, and stationed a garrison within their walls to enforce their fidelity. After the accession of James I., Waterford, though deeply sharing the silent insubordination which had become general in the kingdom, was one of the first cities in Ireland to pay the taxes which James arbitrarily imposed. In 1617, in consequence of the refusal of the mayor to take the oath of supremacy, the liberties and public revenues of Waterford were seized by the Earl of Thomond and Sir William Jones, Lord-chief-justice of Ireland, as commissioners; and, the civic magistrates persisting in their opposition, the city lost its charters, was destitute of regular government for many years, and did not recover possession of its privileges till 1626. In September 1633, the Duke of Ormond left London on a Saturday at 4 o'clock, arrived at Bristol the same night, sailed thence on Sunday morning at 9 o'clock, and arrived at Waterford on Monday morning at 9 o'clock; and he thus performed a feat in travelling which the eulogists of modern steam achievements might be disposed to pronounce incredible.

"From the year 1640, until the arrival of Cromwell," remarks the Rev. Mr. Ryland, "the great rebellion and the circumstances preceding it, entirely engross the local as well as the general history of Ireland. These important events, the exciting causes of the insurrection, and its unfortunate results, are unsuitable to the present sketch; they demand the serious and dispassionate investigation of the historian, and do not admit of a hasty or superficial notice. Suffice it to observe, that the county and city of Waterford shared in the crimes and miseries of this unfortunate period; and, whatever be the cause in which the evil originated, the native Irish were uniformly the sufferers or the victims. It would seem that the native Irish had for a time recovered the possession of the greater part of Munster; which, after an obstinate struggle with the overwhelming power of England, they were again obliged to relinquish. The city of Waterford and the towns of Dungarvan and Lismore, were nominally in the interest of the government of the country, but their loyalty was merely enforced; there was no reciprocity of interest, and therefore no common feeling existed between them—as plainly appeared on the occasion of the cessation of hostilities (for it does not deserve the name of peace) which was agreed on in 1646. This measure was violently opposed by the citizens of Waterford, who imagined that the interests of their religion would be compromised by their adoption of the treaty. The heralds sent from Dublin to proclaim the peace, were treated with every indignity; they were unable to discover the mayor's house, until they prevailed on a little boy, by a bribe of sixpence, to show it to them; and after a fruitless delay of ten days, they were obliged to retire from Waterford without accomplishing their errand."

In the latter part of 1649, Cromwell, after personally or by his generals taking Dublin, Drogheda, Wexford, New-Ross, and Carrick-on-Suir, and after overawing other towns and the country at large by the terror of his name, and the vigour of his career, proceeded to attack or to invest Waterford. His army, on disembarking in Ireland, had amounted to 8,000 foot and 4,000 horse, but it had since been so seriously reduced by both warfare and the climate that it now amounted to only 5,000 foot and 2,500 horse; yet so profound was the dread which their very name inspired, that the citizens of Waterford, though well prepared to offer resistance, and though strengthened by a reinforcement of 1,500 sent under General Ferral from the Marquis of Ormond, were disposed to submit without waiting the assault, and actually sent to Ormond to consult as to the terms which they should ask as the price of a surrender. The Marquis, however, remonstrated with them on their poltroonery, encouraged them to offer a vigorous resistance, predicted the high probability of their compelling Cromwell to retire, assured them of a fair amount of assistance from without, and succeeded in stimulating them to firmness and courage. "Waterford was a walled and fortified town; and though badly situated in case of a siege according to the improved practice of modern warfare, yet at the time of Cromwell's approach, it was sufficiently protected by the batteries and works with which it was almost surrounded. The siege commenced on the 3d of October, 1649; Cromwell, in person, commanded the besieging army. After crossing the Suir, at Carrick, the enemy marched along the southern bank of the river, and approached the town on the north-west, but were deterred by the fort on Thomas's hill from occupying the heights of Bilberry Rock, a commanding situation then at a considerable distance from the city walls. The strength of the defences and the numerous batteries protected the town from assault, and compelled the parliamentary forces to have recourse to the tedious process of investment. The Marquis of Ormond, though deficient in money and military stores, and having lost many men by desertion, endeavoured to defend Waterford; and for this purpose, kept a body of troops on the opposite side of the river, prepared to co-operate with the citizens, and to take advantage of any favourable circumstances which might occur." Though several acts of a serious hy-play, particularly the capture of the town and fort of Passage, occurred in connection with the struggle at Waterford, yet the siege of the city suffered no relaxation, but was conducted, on the one hand, with the zeal and bravery of experienced warfare, and, on the other, with the resolution and pertinacity of a stern hatred of invasion and a desperate attachment to existing institutions. After the loss of Passage, Ferral, the governor of Waterford, marched out from the city with a body of troops to attempt the recapture of it, expecting to be joined and assisted by Colonel Wogan from Duncannon Fort. "Previous to the advance of the Governor's force, the Marquis of Ormond, attended by 50 horse, had crossed the river, with the intention of animating the garrison, and of making arrangements for their support; and, understanding that an attack on Passage was meditated, he waited to know the result. On the Governor's troops leaving the city, Cromwell despatched a strong force to attack them, and their danger being immediately perceived, Ormond requested permission to bring over a body of horse to their assistance; but the citizens refused the offer, and preferred leaving the soldiers to their fate. Thus repulsed, the gallant Marquis advanced at the head of his 50 horse, and met the Governor's foot soldiers in full retreat, closely followed by Cromwell's dragoons. He posted himself in an advantageous position, and by his courage and a judicious arrangement of his force checked the farther advance of the enemy, and covered the retreat into the town. The necessity of retaking Passage, and the importance attached to it by the enemy, being thus evident, the Marquis of Ormond proposed to transport his troops over the river, and undertook to quarter them in huts under the walls, that they might not be burdensome to the city; this proposal was also rejected, and it was even in agitation to seize his person and treat his followers as enemies. Irritated at their obstinacy and ingratitude, the Marquis withdrew his army, leaving the citizens to protect themselves. Thus left to their own resources, and vigorously assailed by the impatient Cromwell, the courage of the citizens was now beginning to yield; they declared, that unless they received a reinforcement of troops and a supply of provisions, they could make no further resistance; the assault of the besiegers was hourly expected, and the most fatal results anticipated, when, fortunately, the Marquis of Ormond again arrived on the north of the Suir, immediately opposite the city, and by his appearance changed the aspect of affairs. Disheartened by the duration of the siege, in the course of which he had lost many men by sickness as well as by the chances of war, and discouraged by the difficulties of a winter campaign, Cromwell prepared to retire from the contest, and to seek winter quarters for his harassed army in some more secure situation. At this critical moment Ormond proposed to pass some of his troops across the river and attack the rear of the retreating enemy, but the obstinacy of the citizens returned with their hopes of safety, and they refused to supply boats or to admit his soldiers into the city, until the favourable opportunity was lost. Being thus obliged to raise the siege of Waterford, Cromwell resolved to direct his course to the towns of Munster which had revolted to the English parliament, and which now offered a secure asylum to his harassed and disheartened forces." On retiring from Waterford, he assaulted the castles of Butlerstown, Kilmeaden, and Dunhill, marched through Kilmacothomas to the western extremity of the county, besieged and captured Dunganran, and then retired into winter quarters.

In February of next year, 1650, after his army had been quickly recruited, from the revolted Irish troops, with men inured to the climate, Cromwell commenced his second Irish campaign; and early in June, after he had withdrawn in person, and had devolved the chief command upon General Ireton, Waterford was again besieged. "On the approach of General Ireton, Preston, the governor of the city, sent to inform the Lord-lieutenant that if supplies were not immediately forwarded to him, he should be compelled to surrender. The siege was not of long continuance; the garrison were soon reduced to the greatest distress, and must have readily yielded had they been attacked with vigour; but General Ireton did not summon them to capitulate until the 25th of July, and after a treaty, protracted for a considerable time, the city was surrendered to him by General Preston on the 10th of August, 1650. The terms granted to the citizens were favourable; their persons and private property were preserved. The violence of the parliamentary army was chiefly directed against the churches, works of art, and remnants of antiquity; even the tombs of the dead were plundered or mutilated by their savage hands, and in cases where they could not plunder, they were contented to destroy." From this date till the year 1656, officers appointed by Cromwell governed the city according to their own judgment, to the total suppression of the constitutional mode of government by mayor and sheriffs; yet, in spite of their incurring imputations of despotism and cruelty, they appear to have performed various public acts of admitted wisdom and utility. The quay, the public buildings, the streets, and the roads, were maintained in good repair; and most matters affecting the civic well-being were managed with a minuteness of care which has been pronounced not a little remarkable. Yet various great public measures of the most reprehensible character were adopted,—particularly the trying and executing of persons concerned in the scenes of 1641,—the 'transplantation of natives,' or depriving them of their property, and expelling them from their homes,—the prohibiting of every "Papist from trading in the city of Waterford, within or without doors,"—and the issuing of an order, "that the governor Colonel Leigh, and the justices of the peace at Waterford, do apprehend forthwith all persons who resort there under the name of Quakers, that they be shipped away from Waterford or Passage to Bristol, thence to be conveyed to their respective places of abode."

James II. dissolved the corporation at Waterford, and remodelled its constitution with a subserviency to his own views, in the same manner in which he dissolved and remodelled the corporation of Dublin; but the new charter which he gave to the city in March 1687, remained in force only till the Revolution,—when the charter granted by Charles I. was resumed, and became once more, what it continues still to be, the governing charter of the borough. On the day following the battle of the Boyne, the dethroned and vanquished James rode from Dublin to Waterford; and in the vicinity, he embarked for France, for ever and in disgrace, relinquishing the dominions of his ancestors. "Waterford continued faithful to James, even after he had abandoned all claim to the allegiance of the citizens, and when there appeared scarcely a chance of his success. But serious opposition to the arms of the victorious party was fruitless; and therefore, on the approach of a part of King William's troops, which marched from Carrick to Waterford, the citizens agreed to surrender, on the condition that they should be allowed to enjoy their estates, and the liberty of their religion, and that their forces, with their arms and ammunition, should be safely conveyed to the nearest garrison. These terms were refused, and orders given to bring down some heavy cannon and additional troops. The garrison then asked liberty to march out with their arms, and to have a safe convoy, which was granted them; and they were conducted, with their arms and baggage, to the town of Mallow. After the surrender of Waterford, King William went to visit it; and having left directions not to permit any unnecessary severity towards the inhabitants, embarked for England on the 5th of September, 1690." About the close of the 17th century, and the commencement of the 18th, a large number of Protestant tradesmen,—who had formed themselves into a regular body, and who, from the manner in which they levied their contributions, were familiarly designated Hammermen,—exacted from resident Roman Catholic tradesmen and artisans the payment of what they called quartage, for permission to prosecute their avocations; and, during the assizes, they paraded through the whole town, making peremptory demands of the illegal payment, and nailing up the doors and windows of every Roman Catholic tradesman or artisan who refused it. In 1732, and again in 1744, serious riots occurred to prevent the exportation of corn, and were attended with the calling out of the military and the loss of life. About the middle of the 18th century, the Catholic Committee, which held its first meeting at Dublin in 1757, and which made a conspicuous figure in history till the eve of the rebellion of 1798, is said to have originated with a Dr. Curry and a Mr. Wyse of Waterford. The conspiracy which immediately preceded the rebellion seems, in its Waterford section, to have been both secret and formidable; but it was discovered in the city just when on the point of being matured; and it was followed by no worse effects than the conviction and banishment of two of its principal agents.

Waterford gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Talbot, who hold also the title of Earl of Shrewsbury, in the peerage of Great Britain. In 1446, Sir John Talbot, 6th Baron Talbot, and a distinguished warrior, was appointed to the Lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, and created Earl of Waterford and Wexford. He, at the same time, received a grant of the castles, honours, lands, and barony of Dungarvan, because, as the patent states, that country is waste, "et non ad proficuum, sed ad peritum nostrum redundat." In 1429, his lordship was routed, at Patoy, by the celebrated Joan of Arc, commonly called the Maid of Orleans; and in 1453, when he was 80 years of age, he received a mortal wound in the course of his progress to the relief of Chatillon. He is said to have been victorious in 40 skirmishes and battles. The present Earl of Shrewsbury and Earl of Waterford and Wexford, was born in 1791, and succeeded to the peerages in 1827. The family-seats are Heythorpe-house in Oxfordshire, Grafton-hall in Worcestershire, Alton-Towers in Derbyshire, and Great Stanhope-street in London.—Waterford gives, at present, the title of Marquis, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of De La Poer Beresford, the descendants of a very ancient family, who came to Ireland from Staffordshire. In 1720, Sir Marcus Beresford was created Baron Beresford and Viscount Tyrone, and in 1746, he was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Tyrone. In 1786, George, the second Earl, was created Baron Tyrone of Haverfordwest, in the peerage of Great Britain; and in 1789, he was advanced to the dignity of Marquis of Waterford, in the peerage of Ireland. The present Marquis is the grandson of the first Marquis, and the son of the second; and he was born in 1811, and succeeded to the titles in 1826. The family-seats are Curraghmore in the county of Waterford, Walworth in the county of Londonderry, and Ford-castle in Northumberland.

WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY. See LIMERICK RAILWAYS.

WATERFORD HARBOUR, either the joint estuary of the rivers Suir and Barrow, between co. Waterford, Munster, and co. Wexford, Leinster, or likewise the portion of the river Suir downward from the city of Waterford, partly through the county of Waterford, Munster, and partly between that county and the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. The estuary is entered from the ocean between Hook Head on the east and Swiney Head on the west,—the latter headland situated 3 miles west by north of the former. Hook Head has an altitude of 51 feet above sea-level, and is crowned by a curious old tower, now converted to the purposes of a lighthouse, with a fixed light. The entrance to the harbour is open, sufficiently facile, and comparatively very safe; but Tramore bay, situated a short distance to the west of it, has frequently been mistaken for it, and, if approached in southerly winds, menaces almost any vessel with certain destruction. See TRAMORE. The east shore of Waterford Harbour trends 2½ miles north-north-eastward to the head of the little open cove, called Oldtown bay,—3½ miles north by westward thence to Duncannon-Fort,—2½ miles, in the direction of north-west by north, thence to a point about a mile above Ballyhack,—and 2¼ miles northward thence to a point about 1½ mile north of Cheek Point, and at the extremity of a small ramified lagoon, formed to the north and the north-east of Cheek Point. Most of the shore is rocky, yet interspersed with sandy beach, and belted at low water with a portion of strand; and it nowhere offers any serious perils to navigation. Its principal features are Door-noge bay, and Loftus-Hall bay, between Hook Head and Oldtown bay; Harrylock bay, Templetown bay, Stonewall bay, Broomhill bay, Broomhill Point, Dollar bay, Black Point, Booley bay, and Duncannon Strand, between Oldtown bay and Duncannon-Fort; Duncannon Quay, a martello tower, a lighthouse, Glenwater bay, King's bay, and a coast-guard station, between Duncannon-Fort and Ballyhack; and Ballyhack Quay, Catherine's bay, and Nook bay, between Ballyhack and the terminating lagoon. The lower part of the east shore, from Hook Head up to Oldtown bay, or beyond it, is the east side of the parish and narrow peninsula of Hook [which see]; and the portions higher up belong to the parishes of TEMPLETOWN, ST. JAMES, and DUNBRODY: see these articles,—and also the articles DUNCANNON, BALLYHACK, and ARTHURSTOWN. The west coast of the Harbour trends nearly 1½ mile north-eastward from Swiney Head to Black Knob; is bluff and rocky; and has, about mid distance, the headland of Red Point, or Portally Head, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 137 feet. Black Knob, at the south side of Dunmore bay, is surmounted by a lighthouse with a fixed light; and is the place at which the conveyances from the city of Waterford communicate with the daily mail steam-packets to England. Dunmore bay measures about ½ a mile across; and is overlooked on the north side by Foulakippen Hill, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 205 feet. The coast from Dunmore bay to the south side of the isthmus of Creden Head, trends about 1½ mile in the direction of north-east by north, and is a line of low rock, slightly diversified with Ardnamult Head, and overlooking an anchoring ground, called Creden bay, to the north of that small headland. Creden Head is a narrow peninsula of upwards of ½ of a mile in length, extending in the direction of east by north, and terminating in a promontory whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 202 feet. The coast from the north side of the isthmus of Creden extends 3½ miles northward, with some curvatures, to the town of Passage, opposite Arthurstown; and its principal features, over this stretch, are Knockavish Head, Woodstown Strand, a coast-guard station, a headland called Newtown Head, and having an altitude of 79 feet, and Passage Strand. The shore from Passage to Cheek Point makes a sweeping curvature, yet may be described as trending first 1½ mile north-westward, and next about the same distance in the direction of north by east. The parishes upon the east shore, named from south to north, are Rathmoylan, Killea, Kill-St.-Nicholas, Kilmacomb, Crook, and Faithleg; and the general character and scenic features of the shores,—often rich, and aggregately very beautiful,—will be found noticed in the articles on these parishes, and on the villages of DUNMORE and PASSAGE; which see. The width of the harbour varies from 3 miles to 1½ mile between the entrance and Woodstown Strand, the minimum being at Creden Head; it gradually diminishes from 2½ miles to ¾ mile, between Woodstown Strand and Passage; and it generally varies from 5 to 3 furlongs between Passage and Cheek Point. The portion of the harbour above Cheek Point is much more fluvial than estuarial; is ascended 2 miles south-westward to Little Island, and about 2½ miles chiefly westward to the city; and has a breadth varying between about 3 furlongs and 200 yards. A little above Cheek Point occurs the confluence of the Barrow and the Suir, the two monarch streams of the south-east of Ireland, amid scenery of surpassing brilliance and beauty. The general character of the upper sweep of the Harbour from Cheek Point to Waterford, is noticed in the section "Environs" of the article on the city; and the navigable capacities of the entire Harbour, from the ocean upwards, are noticed in the section "Harbour" of that article.

WATERGRASSHILL, a small market and post town in the parish of Ardnageehy, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the mail-road from Cork to Dublin, 4½ miles south-south-west of Rathcormack, 6¼ north-north-east of Glanmire, 8 south by west of Fermoy, 9½ north-east by north of Cork, and 11½ south-west of Dublin. It stands on the summit-level of the lofty tract of country which separates the valley of the Lee from the valley of the Blackwater,—or on a point of the line of watershed of the broad-based and the exceedingly prolonged range of mountain which extends eastward across the greater portion of the county; and it is, in consequence, one of the most loftily situated towns in the three kingdoms, and is currently regarded as standing amidst the highest cultivated land in Ireland. But the churlishness of the surrounding soil, the backward condition of the agriculture, the absence of quickset enclosures, the broad-basedness of the vast spreading mass of mountain, and the total want of strength, intricacy, or expressiveness in the surface of the country, combine to render the appearance of the town and its environs not a little desolate. A little east-south-east of the town rises the summit called the hill of Knockacamacree; and about 1½ mile to the south-west, on the road to Cork, is Mitchell's Fort, the seat of H. B. Brazier, Esq. The descent from Watergrasshill to Rathcormack traverses a lofty and bleak region, and then drops rather declivously down toward Fermoy; but the descent to the valley of the Lee passes at an easy and pleasant gradient into the beautiful vale of Glanmire, and commands interesting and even superb views, both of the great valley in front, and of the lateral vales among the mountains. "The ascent from Cork to Watergrasshill," remarks Mr. Brewer, "is so gradual that the traveller is by no means aware of the great altitude he has attained, until he deliberately views the nearest mountains, and compares their degrees of elevation with that of the eminence on which he is placed. The prospects from this lofty hill are equally comprehensive and grand." Mr. Townsend, referring to the same ascent, and to the view obtained from the summit, says, "A singular visual deception attends this prospect. To the traveller who has lately quitted the level of the sea at Cork, and imperceptibly gained an unexpected elevation, the flats about Fermoy appear vastly lower than those he has just left behind. He finds it difficult to conceive even an equality of horizontal level, and feels prepared to pronounce a decided opinion upon the much greater depression of the north vale. A little reflection, however, convinces him that the contrary is the true fact, and that he has been deceived by the graduality of ascent on one side, and the suddenness of the fall on the other. Fermoy stands high above the level of Cork; and from Mitchelstown, situate nearly in the same plain with the former, there is a regular descent to the city of Waterford on the east side of the island." The town contains a small chapel-of-ease, a large Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, and one or two schools. The dispensary is within the Fermoy Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it received and expended £140. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cork takes name from Watergrasshill; and has chapels here and at Glenville. Area of the town, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 533; in 1841, 801. Houses 119. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 60; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 47. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 35; on the directing of labour, 56; on their own manual labour, 59; on means not specified, 9.

WATERPARK, the seat of Lord Waterpark, in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the south side of the Blackwater, ¾ of a mile from the boundary with co. Waterford, and 6½ miles east of Fermoy. Dr. Smith's excellent work on the county of Cork contains the following notice of it: "On the south side of the river, towards the bounds of Waterford county, is Waterpark, formerly a seat of the Lord-chief-justice Pine, with a pleasant park, now demolished, good orchards, and other improvements. Some years ago, the cider made here, by Mr. Drew, lost the premium given by the Dublin society (being so excellent in its kind, that the gentlemen who were judges, imagined it to be mixed with foreign wine), who, the following year, being undeceived, they granted the premium to a hoghead of cider made here. Waterpark is at present the estate of Sir Henry Cavendish, Bart." The wife of Sir Henry Cavendish was Sarah, the only daughter and the heiress of Richard Bradshaw, Esq., the lineal descendant of Lord-president Bradshaw, who passed sentence of death on Charles I.; and, in 1792, she was created Baroness Waterpark, with remainder to her male issue, the sons of Sir Henry Cavendish. Her eldest son succeeded as first baron, at her death in 1807; and the present baron was born in 1793, and succeeded in 1830. His lordship has also the seat of Doveridge Hall, in Derbyshire, and is Colonel of the Derbyshire militia.

WATER-ROCK, a rock at the entrance of Kilmough Harbour, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It is covered at half flood; but may, with care, be easily avoided; for secure passages to the interior of the bay occur on both sides of the rock.

WATERSIDE, a small town in the parish of Clondermot, barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the river Foyle, directly opposite the city of Londonderry, and is strictly a suburb of that city. The principal portion of it extends about 280 yards along the river, partly above and partly below Londonderry bridge, and is included within the municipal borough of Londonderry; and a lesser portion of it lies slightly detached from the main portion, at the mean distance of about 320 yards south-east of the end of Londonderry bridge, and is situated beyond the boundaries of the municipal borough. In the centre of the latter portion is a tannery; and at various distances from the town, varying between two or three perches and about 2 miles, are a church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the seats of Prehen, Hollymount, Lisaghmore, Ashbrook, the Belt, Lisnagelvin, and Salem. Area of the town, 91 acres. Pop., in 1841, 666. Houses 105. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 30; in manufactures and trade, 73; in other pursuits, 15. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 68; on their own manual labour, 41; on means not specified, 4. See LONDONDERRY.

WATERVILLE, a village in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the brief stream which flows from Lough Currane to Ballinskelligs bay, and on the coast-road from Cahirciveen to Kenmare, 4 miles north-west of Derrynane-abbey, and 8½ south of Cahirciveen. The surrounding scenery is so varied and superb, and the facilities for 'wild sports' and angling are so many and diversified, that tourists and sportsmen are attracted to the village in spite of both the remoteness of its situation and the excessive ruggedness of its approaches. A small inn at the village affords accommodation to tourists, and is used as a central point by anglers. Waterville-house, the seat of James Butler, Esq., adjoins the village at the end of a strand upwards of a mile in length, and amidst grounds which command noble views, on the one hand, of Lough Currane, surrounded by its stern and lofty mountains, and, on the other, of Ballinskelligs bay, overhung by grand heights, and lashed into fury by the tempestuous winds, the tremendous onsets, and the stupendous billows of the Atlantic. The new line of road from Cahirciveen to Kenmare gradually winds up the mountain south of Waterville for upwards of 3 miles toward Derrynane-abbey; and, on attaining the lofty summit, it commands a most imposing view of the adjacent coast, and its sublimely featured sea-board. The author of "The Sportsman in Ireland," speaking of successively Lough Currane, the village of Waterville, and the stream from the lake to Ballinskelligs bay, says: "At first the stranger is impressed with an idea that the lake is nothing more than an arm of the sea; the fall is only ten or twelve feet from it to the bay, but sufficient to protect it from the influence of the tide, and affording for the whole tribe of the genus salmo an easy transition from the salt to the fresh water. A small cluster of cottages which forms the newly arisen village of Waterville, and situated at the very edge of the fall, covers from the view the mansion of Mr. Butler, whose property the short but productive river is, and whose house is almost attached to the profitable fishery. I walked down to the weirs, the produce of which, I am informed, amounts to £700 or £800 per annum. In four traps it is not uncommon to take from 500 to 600 fish nightly in the full salmon season, and perhaps a more astonishing sight could not be presented than the shoal of these creatures, one over the other, constituting, in their confined cells, almost a solid mass; the boiling stream which rushes through the base of their prison-house, keeping them not only alive, but perfectly well till the arrival of the higglers, who take them alive upon the mountains, and to the towns many miles distant." At Waterville is a branch of the West-Cove dispensary, within the Poor-law union of Kenmare. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

WATTLE-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Drummully, barony of Coole, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the southern verge of the county, on the river Finn, and on the mail-road from Enniskillen to Dublin, 3½ miles south of Newtown-Butler. In its vicinity are the church of Drummully, the seat of Lakeview, a Druidical altar, and the ruins of St. Mary's chapel. Pop. not specially returned.

WEIR'S SNOOT. See GIANT'S CAUSEWAY.

WELLS, the beautiful, well-wooded, and extensive demesne of Robert Doyne, Esq., in the parish of Killincooly, barony of Ballaghkeen, 2½ miles north-east of Oulart, co. Wexford, Leinster. The mansion was originally a plain square edifice, but has been recently altered into a pleasing structure in the early Tudor style of architecture; and the grounds around it have been elaborated into appearances of decoration somewhat in keeping with the new style of the mansion. Adjoining the demesne are the residence of Ballinahound, and the parish-church of Killincooly.

WELLS, a parish, partly in the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, but chiefly in the barony of West Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. The Kilkenny section lies ½ mile south-west of the nearest part of the Carlow section, and extends thence to within about 1½ mile of the village of Gowran. The Kilkenny section consists of a main body, containing the hamlet of Wells; and a detached district, lying 1½ mile north of the nearest part of the preceding, and containing part of the town of LEIGHLIN-BRIDGE: which see. Length of the Kilkenny section, south-south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ½ of a mile; area, 253 acres, 38 perches. Length of the main body of the Carlow section, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½ mile; area, 1,781 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches, and its proportion of 45 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches of water in the river Barrow. Length of the detached district of the Carlow section, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ½ of a mile; area, 691 acres, 24 perches, and its proportion of 45 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches of water area in the river Barrow,—both the main body and the detached district being situated upon the right bank of the Barrow, and the two jointly comprising this extent of water area. Pop. of the whole parish, in 1831, 1,354; in 1841, 1,601. Houses 299. Pop. of the Kilkenny section, in 1831, 34; in 1841, 44. Houses 4. Pop. of the rural districts of the Carlow section, in 1831, 430; in 1841, 639. Houses 104. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and that of both districts of the Carlow section is low ground, extending immediately along the Barrow. The main body of the Carlow section contains the ruins of two churches, and is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Kilkenny. The detached district of the Carlow section contains the present parish-church, and the seats of Rathvinden-house, Rathvinden-lodge, and Burgence-house, and is crossed by the road from Leighlin-bridge to Old Leighlin. The river Barrow, while in contact with the detached district, has a mean surface-elevation above sea-level of about 132½ feet; and, while in contact with the main body, has Slygufflock upon its navigation, at an altitude above sea-level of 105 feet. The site of the church has an altitude above sea-level of 189 feet. The hamlet of Wells is situated upon the Dublin and Kilkenny mail-road, at a point 1½ mile west-south-west of Baginbstown. A tradition exists that it was formerly a borough, and the assize town of the county. It contains one of the stone manorial crosses of the 17th century, and considerable vestiges of an old monastic pile, the history of which appears to be lost. Fairs are held on Ascension-Thursdays and Dec. 11.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the deanery of Leighlin cathedral, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £392 6s. 2d.; glebe, £50. Gross income, £442 6s. 2d.; nett, £383 3s. 7d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of St. Kill, in the dio. of Leighlin; but is resident in Wells. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d., and a loan of £184 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 160. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Killinane, Old Leighlin, Tullowcrine, and Augha. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 149, and the Roman Catholics to 1,421; and 4 daily schools—one of which was supported by subscription, and another salaried with an unreported sum from subscription, and £8 a-year from the Association for Discourteaning Vice—had on their books 136 boys and 78 girls.

WELSH MOUNTAINS, a range of cultivated hills, in the baronies of Ida and Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It extends west-south-westward from the valley of the Barrow, in the vicinity of New Ross, to the vale of the Blackwater, in the vicinity of Mullinavat. It sometimes gives its name to the whole of the Boley or Bualy mountains, which extend far and broadly westward from the vale of the Blackwater, and in the baronies of Knocktopher and Iverk; and it may, without much looseness of idea, be regarded as a long eastward wing of these mountains. A principal feature in the range is the remarkable conical summit of Tory-hill. See TORY-HILL; and see also the section 'Surface' in the article on co. KILKENNY.

WEST-ASTON, the seat of Col. Aston, in the parish of Dunganstown, barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated 3 miles east of Rathdrum, on the south side of the road thence to Wicklow, and occupies comparatively high ground at the north-east base of a hill, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 894 feet. The mansion is a plain, substantial, commodious structure; and the demesne is extensive and well-wooded, and commands good views of the circumjacent hilly country. About ½ of a mile north-east of the mansion, the Rathdrum and Wicklow road is joined from the west-north-west by a cross-road, which traverses a narrow but well-defined ravine, and bears the name of the Deputy's Pass, from the circumstance that a detachment of the army under the Lord-deputy, Sir William Fitzwilliam, marched through it in 1595.

WEST-CENE, a seat in the barony of Dunkerrin, 7½ miles south-west of Sneem, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated on the sea-board of the Kenmare estuary, about a mile south-west of the pretty little bay of White Strand; and is the residence of Mr. O'Sullivan. "The family of Jermyn," says Mr. Fraser, "have contributed much to the appearance of the neighbourhood, by the substantial houses and cottages which they have erected on the side of the mountain. Not above half-a-mile from the road, near West-Cene, is an old ruined church, close to which stands a gigantic and venerable tree, which by the people is held sacred; just above the ground the trunk measures 25 feet in circumference; a foot higher it separates into four stems, the largest being sixteen feet in girth. Within two miles of West-

WEST-COVE, a hamlet in the parish of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands at the head of a small creek, on the north side of the Kenmare estuary, and on the new coast-road from Kenmare to Cahirciveen, 4½ miles east-north-east of Derrynane-abbey, and 7 south-west of Sneem. Adjoining it on the west is an old castle. A dispensary here is within the Kenmare Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 13,780; and, in 1839-40, it expended £309 5s., and made 7,000 dispensations of medicine. The hamlet is a coast-guard and a fishing-station; and, in 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within its district 15 half-decked vessels of aggregately 210 tons burden, and worked by 45 men, 30 open sail-boats worked by 150 men, and 200 row-boats worked by 1,000 men.

WESTMEATH,

An inland county in the western part of the province of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the county of Longford; on the north, by the county of Cavan; on the north-east and east, by the county of Meath; on the south, by King's county; and on the west, by the county of Roscommon. Its boundary, measured along series of straight lines, but without including curvatures and small deflexions, is 27½ miles in contact with Longford, 2 with Cavan, 31 with Meath, 32 with King's county, and 10½ with Roscommon. Part of the boundary with Longford consists of the eastward arm of Lough Ree, two stretches of the river Lunny and a small portion of Lough Kinnail, but most of it is artificial; all the brief boundary with Cavan consists of Lough Sheelin, and the short stream thence to Lough Kinnail; the boundary with Meath is partly marked by the small lakes White and Bawn, and by brief stretches of several rivulets, but is, in general, capriciously artificial; nearly all the boundary with King's county is artificial; and the whole of the boundary with Roscommon is constituted by the river Shannon and Lough Ree. The greatest length of the county, in a line drawn south-westward from a point on the boundary with Meath, 4 miles south-west of Kells, through Mullingar, to the point at which the river Shannon takes leave of the county, is 33 miles; its greatest breadth, south-eastward, from Lough Derg, along the middle of Lough Derravaragh, is 16½ miles; its minimum breadth, south-south-eastward, in a line through the village of Ballymore, is 6½ miles; and its area comprises 365,218 acres of arable land, 56,392 of uncultivated land, 8,803 of continuous woods, 628 of towns, and 22,427 of water,—in all, 453,468 acres. Mr. Griffiths reports that about 18,000 acres, consisting chiefly of bog, with some rough pasture, might be advantageously improved for cultivation; that 37,000 may be drained; and that 1,000 are incapable of any improvement.

Surface.—Westmeath was pronounced by Wakefield, and has since been pronounced by some of his slavish copyists, the most beautiful county in Ireland next to Kerry, Fermanagh, Wicklow, and Waterford. But it possesses no characteristic resemblance to any of these counties excepting Fermanagh; it exhibits community of character with even Fermanagh, only in the profusion and lusciousness, but certainly not in the extent and magnificence, of its lake-scenery; it as far excels the highland counties of Ireland, not only Kerry, Wicklow, and Waterford, but also Cork, Galway, Mayo, Donegal, and Tyrone, in the sweetness and brilliance of exulting beauty, as the most languishing districts of "merry England" excel the stern and morose landscapes of the greater part of Scotland; and, while exhibiting not one dash of wildness or sublimity to compete with the great mountain districts, it cannot compare, even in some chief styles of soft landscape, with certain great districts of the low counties,—for example, in park-scenery, with Dublin,—in river and valley scenery, with Tipperary, Limerick, and north-eastern Kildare,—and in intricacy, multitudinousness, and opulence of feature, with the greater portion of Down and Armagh, and a considerable portion of Monaghan and Tyrone. Its surface may, in a general view, be characterized as a luxuriant plain, diversified with swells, gravelly ridges, and a few considerable hills,—sombrely patched, in various large districts, particularly in the south and east, with bog,—and very largely and beautifully gemmed in the north, on the west, and southward through the centre, with handsome and expressive lakes. Mountains do not exist; hills are, for the most part, mutually isolated, and considerably apart, so as nowhere to be exhibitable in groups, as in Queen's county, and the counties of Kilkenny and Clare; swells and undulations exhibit neither the loftiness, the elaboration, nor the commanding frequency of those which prevail throughout Southern Ulster; the plains are less prairie-like, or much more broken and diversified, than those of Limerick, Meath, Louth, and Dublin; the bogs nowhere stretch out into such appalling and chaotic expanses as those of King's county, and the counties of Kildare and Mayo; and the lakes are inferior, in general strength of character and splendour of decoration, only to those of Kerry and Fermanagh. "Westmeath," says Mr. Wakefield, "abounds with lakes, the banks of which are exceedingly beautiful. The substratum here being limestone, the verdure of the fields is remarkably fine, and the sight is still farther gratified by that of the hills, many of which are covered with wood. When I rode through this county, I could not help thinking that a late celebrated statesman, Mr. Fox, if he had seen Westmeath, would have retracted his assertion, that 'no country suited to the feeding of bullocks is fit for a gentleman to live in;' for the largest bullocks graze here in a rich dry soil on the borders of lakes, from which in some places hills gradually raise their sides, clothed with wood, and many of the gentlemen reside in great comfort on their estates, which supply them with abundance of necessaries and afford prospects highly delightful. From Coolure, which stands on the edge of Lough Dereveragh, I made many excursions to survey the beauties of the surrounding country, and always found my labour well repaid. I went from Castle-town-Delvin, to the seat of Lord Sunderlin in Baronstown, through a charming country, richly diversified with lakes, hills, and mountains. I rode to Lord Granard's seat, Clonhugh-lodge, which consists of a delightful cottage with a domain exceedingly well planted, on the edge of Lough Owel. I went from Rochfort to Coolure by High-park, leaving the beautiful wooded hill of Knockdrin on my right, and passing the 'Crooked Wood,' a hill so named from its being once covered with timber, at one end of Lough Derrin, and over a steep hill, called in the neighbourhood the 'Mountain.' There are here commanding views across the lake, having the town of Castle-Pollard in the fore-ground to the right. The whole country appeared to be well-cultivated. I made an excursion to Fore, over a country covered with hills, all cultivated to the summits."

and this basis elevation must, of course, be deducted from the altitude of the various hills in order to a just idea being formed of the degree of prominence with which they figure in the landscape. The principal heights in the western district, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, in the barony of Kilkenny-West, Carrickanelay, 451 feet; in the barony of Clonlunan, Brackagh, 270 feet,—a height 2 miles west of Brackagh, 253 feet; and in the barony of Rathconrath, Ushragh-hill, 802 feet,—Skeagh, 426 feet,—and Rathconrath-hill, 479 feet. The principal heights, in the central and largest district, inclusive of both the north and the south, are,—together with their respective altitudes above sea-level—in the barony of Demifore, Rockland-hill, 601 feet,—a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Rockland-hill, 240 feet,—Black-hill, 575 feet,—Knockeyon, 702 feet,—Ben of Fore, 710 feet,—and a height 2 miles north-north-east of Rockland-hill, 849 feet; in the barony of Corkaree, Frewin-hill, 568 feet,—Crookamore, 491 feet,—and Tyfarnham-hill, 659 feet; in the barony of Moyashe and Magheradernon, Cullen-hill, 444 feet,—and a height 5 miles north-east of Mullingar, 465 feet; in the barony of Moycashel, Knockastia, 660 feet,—a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Tyrrel's-Pass, 393 feet,—a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Castletown, 320 feet,—Knockmore, 404 feet,—and Newtown-Low-hill, 368 feet; and in the barony of Fartullagh, Gallows-hill, 885 feet,—a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Mullingar, 457 feet,—and a height $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east-north-east of Milltown, 318 feet. The principal heights, in the eastern district, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, in the barony of Delvin, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Clonmellon, 350 feet,—and a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Clonmellon, 316 feet; and in the barony of Farbill, Sion-hill, 497 feet,—Knocksheban, 477 feet,—a height half-a-mile south-west of Knocksheban, 503 feet,—a height $\frac{3}{4}$ miles west-north-west of Kinnegad, 381 feet,—and a height $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Kinnegad, 272 feet.

Waters.—The principal lakes of Westmeath are Lough Ree, on the western boundary; Lough Glen or Deerin, on the north-western boundary; Loughs Sheelin and Kinnail, on the northern boundary; and Loughs Dereveragh, Ennel, Owel, Lane, and Iron, in the interior. The summer surface-elevation of Lough Ree above sea-level is 122 feet; of Lough Glen, 206 feet; of Lough Sheelin, 209 feet; of Lough Kinnail, 212 feet; of Lough Dereveragh, 211 feet; of Lough Ennel, 274 feet; of Lough Owel, 326 feet; of Lough Lane, 312 feet; and of Lough Iron, 294 feet. The items which compose the aggregate water area of the county, are, within the barony of Brawney and parish of St. Mary's, 1,206 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches in Lough Ree, and 179 acres, 12 perches in the river Shannon; within the barony of Kilkenny-West, 3,529 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches in Lough Ree, and 23 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches in Lough Creggan, in the parish of Bunown,—535 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches in Lough Ree, and 254 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Kilkenny-West,—and 2,391 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches in Lough Ree, and 181 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches in the river Inny and in small lakes, in the parish of Noughaval; within the barony of Clonlunan, 18 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches in Lough Tolly, in the parish of Ballyloughloe,—22 acres, 2 roods in the river Shannon, in the parish of Killeagh,—23 acres, 12 perches in the parish of Kilcummeragh, and 24 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches in the parish of Kilmanaghan; within the barony of Rathconrath, 91 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches in Lough Sunderlin, in the parish of Ballymore,—8 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches in Lough

Mount-Dalton, in the parish of Churchtown,—49 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches in Lough Sunderlin, in the parish of Killare,—6 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches in the river Inny, in the parish of Piercetown,—and 51 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches in Lough Mount-Dalton, in the parish of Rathconrath; within the barony of Demifore, 898 acres, 26 perches in Lough Dereveragh, and 37 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Faughalstown,—803 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches in Lough Sheelin, 74 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches in Lough Kinnail, and 24 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches in the river Inny, in the parish of Foyran,—89 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches in the parish of Leckla,—644 acres, 6 perches in Lough Dereveragh, and 37 acres, 35 perches in the river Inny, in the parish of Moyne; 47 acres, 22 perches in Lough Gloire, in the parish of Rathgaroe,—1,004 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches in Lough Lane, and 203 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches in small lakes, in the parish of St. Feighin's of Fore,—and 99 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches in Lough Lane, and 100 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches in small lakes, in the parish of St. Mary's of Fore; within the barony of Corkaree, 75 acres, 24 perches in Lough Dereveragh, and 61 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches in the river Inny, in the parish of Lackagh,—175 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches in Lough Owel, 259 acres, 18 perches in Lough Iron, and 23 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches in the river Inny and in small lakes, in the parish of Leuey,—922 acres, 30 perches in Lough Dereveragh, in the parish of Multifarnham,—707 acres, 2 roods in Lough Owel, in the parish of Portloman,—904 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches in Lough Owel, 7 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches in Lough Iron, and 29 acres, 16 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Portnashangan,—106 acres, 36 perches in Lough Dereveragh, and 14 acres, 4 perches in Lough Patrick, in the parish of Stonehall,—14 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches in Lough Dereveragh, in the parish of Taghmon,—and 11 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches in small lakes in the parish of Tyfarnham; within the barony of Moygoish, 252 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches in Lough Iron, and 51 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches in the river Inny, in the parish of Kilbixy,—57 acres, 22 perches in the river Inny, in the parish of Kilmaenevan,—134 acres, 24 perches in Lough Iron, 198 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches in Lough Glen, and 48 acres in the river Inny, in the parish of Rathaspeck,—118 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches in Lough Gort and the river Inny, in the parish of Russagh,—390 acres, 3 roods in Lough Dereveragh, and 156 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches in the river Inny and in small lakes, in the parish of Street,—and 15 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches in Lough Iron, in the parish of Templeoran; in the barony of Moyasbel and Magheradernon, 900 acres, 16 perches in Lough Emel, in the parish of Dysert,—739 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches in Lough Owel, 580 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches in Lough Emel, and 131 acres, 39 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Mullingar,—and 231 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Rathconnel; within the barony of Moycashel, 20 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches in Lough Ennel, in the parish of Castle-town-Kindelan,—and 214 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches in Lough Emel, in the parish of Dysert; within the barony of Fartullagh, 853 acres, 39 perches in Lough Emel, in the parish of Carrick,—223 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches in Lough Ennel, in the parish of Clonfad,—12 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Enniscoffey,—293 acres, 28 perches in Lough Ennel, in the parish of Iyuni,—457 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches in Lough Ennel, and 4 acres, 10 perches in Lough Moylicker, in the parish of Moylicker,—and 21 acres, 12 perches in small lakes in the parish of Pass-of-Kilbride; within the barony of Delvin, 79 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Castletown-Delvin,—24 acres, 1 perch in small lakes, in the parish of Kilmucney,—51 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Killua,—and 46 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Killulagh; and within the barony of Farbill, 20 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Killucan.—The river Inny, one of the chief tributaries of the Shannon, traverses the north-western district, receives the accession of the rivulet Gloire from the central-northern district, and drains all the north and the north-west, and part of the centre and the west; several tiny rivulets, affluents of the Shannon, drain the remainder of the west; the Brosna, another chief tributary of the Shannon, rises in the interior, and drains a large proportion of the centre and all the south into King's county; and the rivulets Stonyford and Deel drain the eastern district into Meath toward a confluence with the Boyne. The eastern district of the county thus belongs to the basin of the Boyne; and all the other districts belong to the basin of the Shannon. The Kilbeggan branch of the Grand Canal penetrates a southern wing of the county to the town of Kilbeggan; and the Royal Canal extends right across the centre of the county, has the whole of its summit-level in the interior, and passes near the village of Killucan, and close to the town of Mullingar and the village of Ballinacarrig.

Minerals.—A yellow sandstone formation, belonging to the lowest member of the carboniferous limestone series of rocks, constitutes a district of about 3½ miles by 2, around the town of Moate, on the southern margin of Westmeath, and partly extending into King's county; and also a tiny district wholly on the margin of Westmeath, at a point 4½ miles west-south-west of Moate. These districts constitute remarkable isolations in the midst of the vast plain of flint limestone; and, though now somewhat satisfactorily referred to the basement of the carboniferous limestone series, were, till quite recently, considered by almost all geologists as belonging to the old red sandstone period. Limestone formations, chiefly of the calp or black shale series, and consisting of alternations of impure, black, argillaceous limestone, with black shale, containing balls of clay ironstone, constitute the surface of rock of all Westmeath excepting the two tiny districts of yellow sandstone. This county, therefore, presents exceedingly less variety of surface rock than any other county of Ireland, and, at the same time, excels every other in the aggregate wealth of the prevailing substrata of its soils. The hillocky ridges, the swells, and even the more elevated heights which diversify its surface, it may easily be inferred, consist of those accumulations of limestone gravel, of whose general character and supposed origin a notice is given in the section 'Minerals' of our General Introduction.

Agriculture.—Mr. Wakefield, who wrote in 1812, and distributed all Ireland as to its agricultural condition into nine districts, classified Westmeath with Meath, Louth, Dublin, Kildare, and Kilkenny, and said respecting the whole district, "What enters into the common course of crops; but the fallows are everywhere bad. The farms here are much larger than in other parts of the country, and farming is pursued according to the English plan, but in a very slovenly manner. It is customary to work oxen intermixed with horses; and the former are placed first, that the pace of the latter may not exceed that of the slower animal. Six are generally yoked together three pair deep, with a plough that would disgrace the most unskilful workman that ever undertook to construct an implement of the kind. Fallows are never ploughed more than three; and so far from the land being really tilled by heavy harrows and good rollers, the former are used only in seed-time, and the latter are totally unknown. Clover has been introduced into this district; but under the bad system of sowing it upon land exhausted and covered with weeds." Among the notes and remarks of Mr. Wakefield which refer exclusively to Westmeath, the most important are the following:—"From Mullingar to Coolure, the divisions between the fields consist of earthen banks, without furze or any other plants growing upon them. The cattle turned into them are all fettered with hay-bands to prevent them from straying beyond the boundaries. Observed people spreading flax (Aug. 16) all the way from Mullingar to Croherip. Parsnips and carrots grow most luxuriantly on Admiral Pakenham's bog." "In reaping, one woman is attended by two men. Potato-oats forward by three weeks than common oats. Black oats superior, both for meal and for straw, but they find no sale at market." "On August 17, observed people sowing rape, and was told that this was the best season for it. Saw at the seat of Lord Longford 3½ acres of flax, the seed of which cost £15. It was sown upon cut-out bog, which had been allowed to rest some time, and was afterwards prepared by paring and burning, at the expense of £1 11s. 6d. per acre. It was then ploughed three times, each ploughing valued at 15s. The crop was sold standing for £12 per acre. Five acres of hemp were sown upon land parcel, burned, and ploughed, at the same expense as the former; the pulling cost £1 per acre; watering, spreading, and drying, 25s.; taking up and tying in bundles, 7s. 6d. But while I was there, the process was carried no farther. The male plant seems to ripen much sooner than the female. Saw carrots on land prepared in the same manner. A crop raised according to this plan produced last year 224 cwt. per acre, and equal in weight to potatoes." "The harvest at this time was general throughout the country. Labour is performed for the most part by the day; if four men, with two women following to bind, reap an acre, it is called a good day's work. I heard of little being done in the task way; when the labourers are paid in this manner, they receive from 9s. 9d. to 11s. 4½d. per acre. The women were carting turf; and, in general, they work as much out of doors as the men. The price of labour is various. Gentlemen who supply their labourers with land, cabins, &c., pay them only 10d. per day the whole year round; farmers, when they employ them, give them 6½d. a day and their victuals. The cultivation of turnips is coming fast into use among gentlemen." "This county has but one absentee possessed of large property, namely, the Marquis of Buckingham, whose income is £7,000 per annum. I am acquainted with no other property exceeding £6,000; but it abounds with gentlemen of moderate fortunes, from £2,000 or £3,000 per annum. It is seen, by records of the year 1641, that not one of the names in the grand-juries of that period are to be found in the list of jurors summoned at the present time. Lord Sunderlin, Lord Longford, Mr. Pollard, Sir Richard Levinge, Mr. Rochford, Sir Benjamin Chapman, and Mr. Daise, may be ranked among those who have the best properties in this county. Leases are now granted for 21 years and a life; formerly they ran for 31 years and three lives. Lord Longford's leases are for 21 years and two lives; those of Sir Richard Levinge, for the same number of years and one life. The late Mr. Reynell of Reynella, let for 21 years and two lives." Considerable improvements have been effected in the practices of husbandry since Mr. Wakefield wrote; but the agricultural condition of the county is still very much inferior to that of the best districts of England and Scotland, and shamefully unworthy of the opulent character of the soil.—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, 4,266 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 4,076 of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,648 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 1,385 of upwards of 30 acres; and, within the civic districts, 43 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 26 of from 5 to 15 acres, 5 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 3 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year, there were, in the whole county, 6,251 male farmers, 308 female farmers, 23,351 male servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 2,245 male servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 2,892 female servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 526 female servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 102 ploughmen, 136 gardeners, 16 graziers, 595 male herds above 15 years of age, 82 male herds under 15 years of age, 12 female herds above 15 years of age, 6 female herds below 15 years of age, 46 care-takers, 6 land-agents, 111 land-stewards, 30 gamekeepers, and 16 dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—The black cattle of Westmeath are among the best in Ireland, and are held in high repute. The horses are, in general, of very superior breeds. The sheep are, for the most part, no great favourites; yet they include some excellent specimens of the long-woolled breed.—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 621 horses and mules, 663 asses, 3,518 cattle, 1,768 sheep, 6,756 pigs, and 64,544 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 987 horses and mules, 469 asses, 3,421 cattle, 2,600 sheep, 3,896 pigs, and 37,306 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 3,209 horses and mules, 255 asses, 7,346 cattle, 7,826 sheep, 5,406 pigs, and 50,207 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 2,451 horses and mules, 86 asses, 6,675 cattle, 10,209 sheep, 3,193 pigs, and 28,486 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 4,767 horses and mules, 166 asses, 23,340 cattle, 55,322 sheep, 3,434 pigs, and 31,631 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 12,035 horses and mules, £96,280; 1,639 asses, £1,639; 44,300 cattle, £287,950; 77,725 sheep, £85,500; 22,745 pigs, £28,431; and 212,194 poultry, £5,305. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £505,105. In the same year, there were, within the civic districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 196 horses and mules, 35 asses, 242 cattle, 49 sheep, 668 pigs, and 1,114 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 18 horses and mules, 3 asses, 52 cattle, 13 sheep, 44 pigs, and 179 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 21 horses and mules, 5 asses, 55 cattle, 88 sheep, 30 pigs, and 158 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 10 horses and mules, 1 ass, 11 cattle, 2 sheep, 11 pigs, and 33 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 10 horses and mules, 22 cattle, 10 sheep, 13 pigs, and 22 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were, 255 horses and mules, £2,040; 44 asses, £44; 382 cattle, £2,483; 162 sheep, £178; 766 pigs, £957; and 1,506 poultry, £38. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £5,740.

Woods.—In 1841, the plantations within the county consisted of 374 continuous acres and 20,463 detached trees of oak, 81 continuous acres and 232,013 detached trees of ash, 3 continuous acres and 12,091 detached trees of elm, 162 continuous acres and 39,562 detached trees of beech, 1,170 continuous acres and 33,298 detached trees of fir, 6,567 continuous acres and 138,909 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 446 continuous acres and 1,573 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 8,803 continuous acres and 477,909 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 2,987 acres, and making with the former a grand total of 11,790 acres. Of the continuous woods, 59 acres of oak, 16 of ash, 2 of elm, 78 of beech, 36 of fir, 1,563 of mixed plantations, and 146 of orchards, were planted previous to 1791: 133 acres of oak, 3 of ash, 32 of beech, 76 of fir, 880 of mixed plantations, and 52 of orchards, were planted between 1791 and 1800; 6 acres of oak, 3 of ash, 2 of beech, 127 of fir, 1,003 of mixed plantations, and 67 of orchards, were planted between 1801 and 1810; 28 acres of oak, 22 of ash, 6 of beech, 146 of fir, 1,188 of mixed plantations, and 67 of orchards, were planted between 1811 and 1820; 11 acres of oak, 34 of ash, 8 of beech, 533 of fir, 1,007 of mixed plantations, and 58 of orchards, were planted between 1821 and 1830; and 137 acres of oak, 3 of ash, 1 of elm, 36 of beech, 232 of fir, 926 of mixed plantations, and 56 of orchards, were planted between 1831 and 1840.—The principal sheets of wood occur at Hill-house, Auburn-house, Retreat, and Liswollen, in the barony of Brawney; at Waterstown-house, East-Hill-house, Ashbrook, Killinure, Auburn-house, Shannonview, Portlick-castle, Lowpark-house, Littleton-lodge, Littleton-house, Darvinton-house, Newgrove, Drumranes, Longfield, Noughaval, and Rockland-house, in the barony of Kilkenny-West; at Carnpark, Belleville, Toryford, Moydrum-castle, Ballinalack-house, Castle-Daly, Glynwood, Hall-house, Riverpark, Ballinahown, and Aghanargit, in the barony of Clonloman; at Killare-house, Mosstown, Umma, Jamestown, Redmonstown, Hallstown, Charleville, Darlington, Corr, Mount-Dalton, Tobberville, Mear's-court, Irishtown, Rathcastle, and Ballinacurra, in the barony of Rathconrath; Pakenham-hall, Kinturk, Coolure, Turbotstown, Sallymount, Benison, Barbavilla, Streamstown, Hilltown, New-castle, and Gartlandstown, in the barony of Demifore; at Ballinagall, Woodland, Clamhagh, Monnt-Murray, Portloman, Donore, Ballinacragh, Ballinamona, and Monintown, in the barony of Corkaree; at Sonna, Baronstown, Newpass, Fairhall, and Kildevin, in the barony of Moygoish; at Lakefield, Ladestown, Greenpark, Levington-Park, Cooksborough, Clonlost, Knockdrin-castle, Killinua, Knockbrack, Edmonstown, and Reuella, in the barony of Moyasbel and Magheradernon; at Rosemount, Ballintobber, Streamstown, Rockfield, Middleton, Benalbit, New-Forest, Donore, Coolalough-house, Corraugh, Lauree, Belmont, Lillieput, Cornaher, and Judgeville, in the barony of Moyasbel; at Toor-house, Guilford, Templeoran, New-castle, Culverstown, Robinstown, Kilbride, Gullstown, Frenchgrove, Belfield, Lemongrove, Dumboden-park, Whitewell, Mahonstown, Gaybrook, Anneville, Rochford, Belvidere, Bloomfield, Clonmoyle, Larkfield, La Mancha, and Fort William, in the barony of Fartullagh; at Drumcree, Crookedwood, Bracklin, Rockview, Clonyn, Mitchellstown, Southill, Rosemead, Ballyhealy, Killua, Heathstown, Ballinlough, and Archerstown, in the barony of Delvin; and Griffithstown, Lowntown, Lisnabin, Huntington, Grangebeg, Riversdale, Derrymore, Wardenstown, Grangemore, and Gradadstown, in the barony of Farhill.

Manufactures and Trade.—The best proximate view of the classification and comparative condition of manufactures and trades in the county is afforded by the statistics of personal industry furnished by the Census of 1841; and, with the exception of the departments of agriculture and professions, these statistics are exhibited in the following digest:—Millers, 104; maltsters, 2; brewers, 3; distillers, 6; bakers, 107; confectioners, 26; saltster, 1; tobacco-twister, 1; fishmongers, 4; egg-dealers, 29; fruiter-

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county of Westmeath are the following:—Athlone, Jan. 23, two days, March 21, May 21, and Sept. 4, three days; Ballinacarrig, May 9, and Oct. 20; Ballinalack, Feb. 15, May 18, Oct. 2, and Dec. 20; Ballymore, Whit-Monday, and Oct. 14; Castlepollard, May 21, Aug. 2, Oct. 10, and Dec. 10; Castletown-delvin, March 17, May 1, and Dec. 1; Clonmellon, Jan. 29, May 2, and Sept. 8; Collinstown, May 8, and Oct. 30; Enpor, May 31; Finea, March 17, May 29, and Sept. 18; Fore, Jan. 30; Kilbeggan, Jan. 6, March 25, June 16, Aug. 15, Sept. 29, and Oct. 28; Killevely, April 10, June 12, Oct. 23, and Dec. 12; Killucan, March 27, May 25, Sept. 29, and Nov. 28; Kinnegad, May 9, and Oct. 8; Moate, April 25, June 22, Oct. 2, and Dec. 15; Moyrove, May 4, Aug. 20, and Dec. 5; Mullingar, April 6, July 4, Aug. 29, and Nov. 11; Multifarnham, March 4, May 13, Sept. 1, and Dec. 2; Rathowen, May 15, and Dec. 12; and Tyrell's-Pass, May 17, and Dec. 17.

Social Condition.—“In 1808,” writes Mr. Wakefield, “I noticed several particulars respecting the manners and habits of the people in this part of the country, which deserve to be mentioned. One circumstance in the neighbourhood of Castle-Pollard shows in a striking manner the uncertain state of property in some districts of Ireland, and how little attention is paid in many cases to private right. A person had hired a number of men from Longford, whom he called Hessians, to dig turf, and assist him in a dispute he had about the possession of a bog. He agreed to pay these auxiliaries 1s. 1d. per day when at work, and 1s. 7½d. when fighting. This may be considered a peace and war establishment. A circumstance which proves the strength and hardness of the women, occurred near Coolure; I saw two or three who had lain in only about four days, carrying into the fields their husbands' dinners; and I was told that this was very common. I remarked the house leek growing on the tops of the houses, and learned that the owners superstitiously believe, that where this plant is so situated houses will be secure against fire. About half-past eleven in the forenoon, I generally saw before the door of each cabin a large iron pot, containing a stone of potatoes, over a turf fire kindled on the ground. When the potatoes were boiled, and the water poured from them outside the door, they were put into a wicker basket in the form of a trencher, and placed in front of the fire, covered with a cloth to keep in the steam, so that the water drained from them till they were dry. At Fore I saw the women carting turf, and they seemed to work as much out of doors as the men. I did not perceive that the people were addicted to drinking. They made a vow of sobriety during the rebellion, and they have become sober from habit. I observed a strong propensity to thieving and perjury; yet persons who do not hesitate to steal or to take a false oath, are scrupulously attentive to the performance of their vows, and the penance enjoined by their priests. I suppose they have some casuistical mode of satisfying their consciences for the commission of crimes. Here the middling sort of people send their wives to market, but they always attend them, walking before in a long trusty. I found the roofs of the cabins in Westmeath without ceiling, supported by two or three props. The walls were constructed of mud or stones, and sometimes of a mixture of both. The roof is formed by two or three couples, over which are laid, in a cross direction, the boughs of trees not stripped of their leaves. These are covered with turf, which is protected from the effects of the weather by a thatching of straw. A hole in the roof gives vent to the smoke, and the bare ground is the floor and the hearth. A hay band, so neatly twisted as to be almost equal to a tow rope, is stretched across the cabin, nearly over the fire-place, for hanging the linen to dry; but as the place is generally involved in thick smoke, it may be readily conceived that it will acquire little improvement in colour. A cat and two or three dogs are commonly lying round the fire. An iron pot, two or three stools of the rudest workmanship, a bad deal table, a dresser with a few plates and dairy vessels, are all the utensils and furniture of the family. Their stock of provision consists of a sack of meal, which is placed in a corner. Many of the tenants here are bound by their leases to carry their oats to their landlord's mill; in this case, the miller takes one stone in sixteen; in other cases, the grist is one stone in twenty. The dress of the women consists of a shift, one petticoat, a kind of stays or bodice, not stiffened with whalebone, and shaped like a man's waistcoat, without sleeves, a neat cotton or linen handkerchief, a jacket fastened round the waist, and a muslin cap, but neither stockings nor shoes. The petticoat, the jacket, and the stays, are made of linsey manufactured from wool, carded and spun by themselves. It is three-quarters wide, and a half a pound of wool makes a yard. The wool costs 18s. per stone of 16

lbs. The spinning is estimated at 3d. per yard, carding at 1½d., dyeing 7d. per lb., and the weaving costs from 4d. to 5d. Wool, carded and spun in a similar manner, makes the frieze used for the dress of the men, and the expense is the same, only that it is dyed and woven for 2½d. Both the linsey and the frieze are thickened at a mill, but I could not perceive the benefit of this operation. Harvest men drink butter-milk, and seem to have little taste for malt liquor. In some gentlemen's houses, potatoes are kept hot the whole day. The servants have oatmeal bread and salt meat, and are therefore supported at a very little expense. In others none of the domestics, the housekeeper excepted, ever taste bread or drink tea. A 'garsoon' in the kitchen does the drudgery of the house, and in many families of the first respectability, a kitchen boy, as he is called, although in many cases he is a grown-up man, is the constant attendant of the cook.

Communications.—The canals which touch or traverse Westmeath have already been noticed in the section entitled "Waters." A proposed line of railway, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, comes up from Dublin in a route a little north of the Royal Canal to Mullingar, crosses the canal on the west side of that town, passes south-westward down the west shore of Lough Ennel, and then proceeds westward to Athlone, thence to pass away to Ballinasloe and Galway. Another railway, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, defects from the preceding at a point 3½ miles east of Mullingar, proceeds north-westward by the vicinity of Multifarnham and Rathowen, to pass away to Longford, Carrick-on-Shannon, Collooney, Ballysadere, and Sligo. A third railway, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, connects the Dublin and Enniskillen railway at Kells with the Dublin and Sligo railway at Longford, and passes across the north wing of Westmeath, immediately south of Lough Sheelin, and in the vicinity of Finea.—The county surveyor of roads was appointed in May 1834; he superintended the formation of only 2 miles of new road from the time of his appointment till the close of 1841; and, at the latter date, he was superintending the formation of 3 miles more, and had under his charge a total of 820 miles. The principal lines of road through Westmeath are the Dublin and Galway mail-road, by way of Kinnegad, Rochfort-bridge, Tyrrel's Pass, Kilbeggan, Moate, and Athlone; the Dublin and Sligo mail-road, by way of Kinnegad and Mullingar; and a branch mail-road from Kinnegad to Castle-Pollard, by way of Killucan, Castletown-Delvin, and Drumcree.

Divisions and Towns.—Westmeath is divided into the baronies of Clonlunan, in the south of the west; Brawney, in the middle of the west; Kilkenny-West, in the north of the west; Rathconrath, in the south of the north-west, or immediately west and north-west of Kilkenny-West; Moygoish, in the middle of the north-west; Demifore, in the north; Corkaree, immediately south of Demifore, and east of Moygoish; Moycashel, in the south, immediately east of Clonlunan; Fartullagh, in the south, immediately east of Moycashel; Moycashel and Magheradernon, in the centre; Delvin, in the north-east; and Farbill, in the south-east. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Killinean from the barony of Farbill to that of Delvin,—pop., in 1841, 16; and one townland of the parish of Durrow from the barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, to that of Ballycowan, King's co.,—pop. 31. The barony of Clonlunan contains the whole of two parishes, and part of two other parishes; the barony of Brawney contains the whole of one parish; the barony of Kilkenny-West contains three whole parishes, and part of another parish; the barony of Rathconrath contains 8 whole parishes, and part of another parish; the barony of Moygoish contains 6 whole parishes, and part of another parish; the barony of Demifore contains 8 whole parishes; the barony of Corkaree contains 8 whole parishes; the barony of Moycashel contains 3 whole parishes and part of 5 other parishes; the barony of Fartullagh contains 8 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Moyashel and Magheraderon contains 1 whole parish, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Delvin contains 5 whole parishes, and part of another parish; and the barony of Farbill contains part of one parish. The towns and principal villages are Moate, in Clonlunan; part of Athlone, in Brawney; Glasheen and Auburn, in Kilkenny-West; Ballymore, Rathconrath, and Moyvore, in Rathconrath; Ballinacarrig and Rathowen, in Moygoish; Finea, Castle-Pollard, Coole, and Fore, in Demifore; Ballinaluck and Multifarnham, in Corkaree; Castletown, Kilbeggan, Ballinagore, and Killavally, in Moycashel; Tyrrel's-Pass, Rochfort Bridge, and Milltown, in Fartullagh; Mullingar, in Moyashel and Magheraderon; Castletown-Delvin, Clonnellan, and Drumcree, in Delvin; and Kinnegad, Killucan, Rsharney, and Rathwire, in Farbill.—In the ecclesiastical divisions, Westmeath lies partly in the diocese of Ardagh, but chiefly in that of Meath. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the number of parishes and churches at respectively 62 and 21, assigns 3 of the parishes and 1 of the churches to the diocese of Ardagh, and all the others to the diocese of Meath.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in Westmeath was 216, of scholars 9,919, of male scholars 5,740, of female scholars 3,820, of scholars whose sex was not specified 359, of scholars connected with the Established Church 1,533, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 5, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 1, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 8,249, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 131; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 216, of scholars 10,097, of male scholars, 5,994, of female scholars 4,057, of scholars whose sex was not specified 46, of scholars connected with the Established Church 1,556, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 5, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 36, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 8,350, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 150. The statistics of educational and ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are returned according to the diocesan divisions; and may be estimated for Westmeath by reference to the article MEATH (DIOCESE OF); which see. At the close of 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 44 schools, conducted by 30 male and 22 female teachers, attended by 2,981 male and 2,591 female scholars, and aided, during the year, with £526 8s. 4d. in salaries, £35 8s. in free stock, and £76 12s. 5d. in school-requisites at half-price. During 1843, the number of persons committed within the county on charges of felony was 389; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 158; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 98. Of the 389 persons committed on charges of felony, 194 were charged with offences against the person, 18 with offences against property committed with violence, 142 with offences against property committed without violence, 4 with malicious offences against property, 4 with offences against the currency, and 27 with offences not included in the above categories; 1 was sentenced to death, 16 were sentenced to transportation, 114 were sentenced to imprisonment, 15 were sentenced to pay fines, 1 was discharged on sureties, 70 were found not guilty on trial, 136 had no bill found against them, and 36 were not prosecuted. On Jan. 1, 1844, the constabulary force of the county consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 4 first-rate sub-inspectors, 2 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head-constable, 6 second-rate head-constables, 44 constables, 204 first-rate sub-constables, 23 second-rate sub-constables, and 8 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining that force, during 1843, amounted to £12,377 1s. 4d. The head-quarters of the constabulary are at Mullingar; and those of the 6 districts and 49 stations into which they are distributed, are at Mullingar, Castle-Pollard, Athlone, Castletown-Delvin, Ballinaluck, and Kilbeggan. The revenue police have stations at Athlone and Kilbeggan. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Castletown-Delvin. A stipendiary magistrate is resident at Mullingar. The county gaol is at Mullingar; a bridewell is at Moate; and the district lunatic asylum, to which Westmeath may send 48 patients, is at Maryborough in Queen's county. The assizes are held at Mullingar; quarter-sessions, at Mullingar and Moate; and petty-sessions, at Athlone, Ballinacarrig, Ballymore, Castle-Pollard, Castletown-Delvin, Collinstown, Clonnellan, Glasheen, Kilbeggan, Killnean, Knockdrin, Rochfort-Bridge, Moate, Mullingar, Multifarnham, and Rathowen. Savings' banks are at Castle-Pollard and Tyrrel's-Pass; and loan funds at Bunowen, Castletown-Delvin, Clonnellan, Collinstown, Kilbeggan, Killucan, Moate, and Tyrrel's-Pass. The county infirmary is at Mullingar; workhouses are at Mullingar and Athlone; a fever hospital is at Castle-Pollard; and dispensaries are at Athlone, Ballinacarrig, Castle-Pollard, Castletown-Delvin, Clonnellan, Collinstown, Drumcree, Glasheen, Kilbeggan, Killucan, Kinnegad, Knockdrin, Milltown, Moate, New-Bristy, Street, and Tyrrel's-Pass. The amount of grand-jury presentments in 1842, was £31,117. The annual value of the property valued for the poor-rate is £300,925; and that of the property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, is £292,531. The total number of tenements valued for the poor-rate is 21,305; and of these, 11,511 are valued under £5,—3,234, under £10,—1,874, under £15,—1,066, under £20,—743, under £25,—491, under £30,—625, under £40,—407, under £50,—and 1,354, at and above £50. The county sent 10 members to the Irish parliament, or two from the county at large, and two from each of the boroughs of Athlone, Mullingar, Kilbeggan, and Fore; and though it continues to send two members to the imperial parliament from the county at large, it now contains no parliamentary borough except part of Athlone. County constituency in 1841, 1,125; of whom, 225 were £50 freeholders, 65 were £20 freeholders, 683 were £10 freeholders, 21 were £20 leaseholders, 105 were £10 leaseholders, 8 were £50 rent-chargers, and 18 were £20 rent-chargers.

Antiquities. — The principal existing military antiquities are, in the barony of Brawney, Coosan-castle; in the barony of Clonlona, Cloghwarechal-castle, Creeve-castle, and other three castles; in the barony of Kilkenny-West, Lissanole-castle, Killini-neen-castle, Ballinacill-castle, Killaughy-castle, and Kilkenny-castle; in the barony of Rathconrath, Clare-castle, Bishop-town-castle, Shingle-castle, Killinbrack-castle, Stremmingstown-castle, Carn-castle, Dundonald-castle, Oldtown-castle, Milltown-castle, Simmonstown-castle, and three other castles; in the barony of Demifore, Carlanstown-castle, Kiltown-castle, Mortimer's-castle, Christian's-castle, and Togher-castle; in the barony of Corkaree, a castle in the parish of Lackan; in the barony of Moygoish, the site of Kilbexy-town, Castle-Hyde, and Empor-castle; in the barony of Moycashel, Kiltobber-castle, Mountrath-castle, Baltrath-castle, and Rathdrish-ogue-castle; in the barony of Fartullagh, a castle in the parish of Lynn; in the barony of Moyashel and Magheradernon, five castles in the parish of Mullingar, the site of a castle in the parish of Rathcounel, and the site of St. Fennor's-castle; in the barony of Delvin, Martinstown-castle, Mulchan's-castle, a castle in the parish of Killulagh, and Billiestown-castle; and, in the barony of Farhill, Heathstown-castle, Rattin-castle, Edmonstown-castle, and another castle. The principal ecclesiastical ruins not monastic are those of a church in Foyran, St. Feighan's church, and a church in Faughalstown, in the barony of Demifore; St. Andrew's chapel, and a chapel in the parish of Taghmon, in the barony of Corkaree; a church in Newtown parish, in the barony of Moycashel; a church in Rathcounel parish, Hopetown church, and Kenny church, in the barony of Moyashel and Magheradernon; and a church in Killulagh parish, Clonauy church, and Archbards-town church, in the barony of Delvin. The principal old monasteries, whether extant or extinct, prominent or obscure, certain or doubtful, are an abbey of regular canons of the order of St. Augustine, at Rathadolear or Rathedha, alleged to have been founded in the 8th century by St. Aid, and subsequently converted into a parish-church; a second abbey of the same order at Mullingar, founded about 1227, by Ralph Petit, bishop of Meath, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir Richard Tuite; a third abbey of the same order, at Tober-Cornac, granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir T. Matthews and Sir Francis Shane; a fourth abbey of the same order at Fore, alleged to have been founded in the 7th century by St. Fechin, converted by Sir Walter De Lacy into a cell of the Benedictine-abbey of St. Taurin in Normandy, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Nugent, Lord Delvin; a fifth abbey of the same order at Tristernagh, founded about the year 1200, by Sir Geoffrey Constantine, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Henry Piers; a sixth abbey of the same order at Tibraid, alleged to have been founded in the 7th century by St. Fechin; a seventh abbey of the same order at Rathenin, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Carthage; a cell of the same order at Cluan Dachran, near Rathenin, alleged to have had, as its first abbot, Mochua MacNeillan in the 7th century; a second cell of the same order at Drumeuilen, near Rathenin, alleged to have been under the abbacy of a person of the name of Barindus about the year 590; an abbey of Gilbertines or Premonstratensian canons, at Ballymore-Lough-Sendy, founded in the 12th century by the family of De Lacy, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Francis Shane; a priory of crutched friars, at Kilkenny-West, founded in the 12th century by the family of Tyrrel, and granted, at the general dissolution, to the Earl of Rosecommon; an abbey of Benedictines, at Fore, transmuted from the abbey of Augustinian canons at that place; an abbey of the Cistercian order, at Kilbeggan, founded in the year 1200 by the family of Dalton, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Oliver, Lord Lambert; a Dominican friary, at Mullingar, founded in 1237 by the family of Nugent, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir Richard Tuite; a Franciscan friary, at Athlone, founded about 1240, by either the family of Dillon, or that of O'Connor, and granted, at the general dissolution, to the former of these families; a Franciscan friary at Multifarnham, founded in the 13th century by William Delamar, and granted, at the general dissolution, to E. Felde, Patrick Clynech, and Philip Penteney; a Franciscan friary at Farrere-Managh; a Franciscan monastery of the third order, at Kilnichael, founded by the family of Petits, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Robert Nangle; and a Carmelite friary, at Ardneeran, founded by Robert Dillon, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Robert Dillon of Newtown.

History. — "Westmeath," says Mr. Brewer, principally on the authority of the manuscripts of the Chevalier De Montmorency, — "Westmeath afforded one of the earliest settlements to the Anglo-Normans in the 12th century, and constituted a portion of the palatinate of Hugh De Lacy, to whom a patent of proprietorship was granted by King Henry II. The O'Melaghlinns were ancient sovereigns of the kingdom of Meath, which territory comprised the district comprising in modern times East and West Meath, with part of the King's county and county of Dublin. Among other ancient Irish proprietors may be named the MacGeogheghans, dynasts of Moycashel, the O'Moelbrenuans, or Brennans, O'Coffys, O'Mulladys, O'Malones, O'Dalys, O'Higgins, Magawleys of Colry, Magans of Dunigan, O'Shanaghan, or Fox, O'Fiailan of Delvin, and O'Cuishin. Many of the descendants of these old proprietors enjoyed considerable estates in this county before the great eras of forfeiture in the seventeenth century, and some traces of them may still be discovered. The Anglo-Norman settlers uniformly derived under Hugh de Lacy, lord and earl of Meath, who partitioned his conquered province amongst his relations and followers, many of whose descendants remain in high consideration at the present time. Of these may be noticed as the principal, the Petits, the Tuites, or De Tuites, the Husseys, or De Hosc (a family of Brittany), the D'Altons, De La Mars, Dillons, De Nugents, Hopes and Wares, the families of De Nangle, or D'Angelo, De Ledwich, De Geneville, Dardis, Gaynor, and De Constantin. In ages subsequent to the first Anglo-Norman settlement, but previous to the Reformation, the following were the chief families who fixed themselves in this county:—D'Arcys, Jones, or Fitz-Johns, Tyrells, Fitzgeralds, the Owens, Shanes, and Piers. Subsequent to the Reformation, the Lambert family obtained grants of church lands, and since the year 1641, grants were made of forfeited estates to the families of Pakenhams, Wood, Cooke, Stoyte, Reynell, Winter, Leviage, Wilson, Judge, Rochford, Handcock, Bonynge, Gay, Handy, Ogle, Middleton, Swift, Burtle, and St. George. The latest settlers in this county are the families of Smith, Featherston, Chapman, Cliborne, Arabin, Browne, O'Reilly (of Ballinlough), Longworth, Pardon, Nagle (of Jamestown), De Blaquiére, and North. Many other families, constituting a respectable class of gentry, have acquired estates in this county by purchase, or by that truly honourable medium the exercise of industrious pursuits, in the course of the last century. Among recent settlers, the family of Nagle alone claim from an ancient proprietor, they having inherited, in the female line, from MacGeogheghan, and removed hither from Cork, where the ancestors of Sir Richard Nagle have been long seated." Some additional notices of the early history of Westmeath may be seen in the article MEATH (PROVINCE OF). —Westmeath gives the title of Marquis, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Nugent, descendants of Christopher, the third brother of Sir Richard Nugent, who accompanied Hugh De Lacy to Ireland. In 1621, Richard Nugent, the tenth Baron Delvin, was created Earl of Westmeath; and, in 1822, George, the eighth Earl, was advanced to the dignity of Marquis of Westmeath. The first marquis still lives; and is colonel of the Westmeath militia, and lord-lieutenant of the county of Westmeath. The family-seat is at Castletown-Delvin.

WESTMORESTOWN, a quondam parish in the barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. It was a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Leixlip, in the dio. of Dublin.

WEST-OF-THE-HILL, a Roman Catholic parish in the county and diocese of Kerry, Munster. Its post town is Castletown. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

WESTOWN, a demesne in the parish of Naul, 4 mile south-west of the village of Naul, barony of West Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. The proprietor and occupant is Anthony Strong Hussey, Esq. The mansion is a respectable structure, and appears to have been erected in the early part of the 18th century. A terrace in front commands a charin-

ing view of the romantic glen of Roehes, enriched with the picturesque ruins of Naul-castle. An extensive lawn spreads away before the terrace; and some ancient timber and several modern improvements decorate the demesne. "Westown was an ancient manor of the family of Bellew, who were residing here in the year 1609, but from whom the property passed by marriage, shortly after that date, to the family of Hussey. Richard Hussey, Esq., dying without legitimate issue, bequeathed one moiety of his estates, comprehending this manor, to his cousin, Gerald Strong of Montin, in the county of Meath, Esq., in consequence of which bequest Mr. Strong assumed the name of Hussey, and, dying in 1811, was succeeded by his son, Anthony Strong Hussey, Esq."

WESTOWN, or WESTOWNPARK, a demesne, 1 mile south by west of Leixlip, and partly in the parish of Adering, barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, and partly in the parish of Donaghcumper, barony of North Salt, co. Kildare, Leinster. It is situated upon the Liffey, possesses a profusion of wood and park embellishment, comprises one of the most exquisitely beautiful and romantic portions of the valley of the Liffey, and boasts the chief honours of the celebrated 'salmon-leap' or waterfall above LEIXLIP: see that article.

WESTPALSTOWN, a parish in the barony of West Balrothery, 3½ miles south of Naul, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, southward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1¼; area, 1,595 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 280; in 1841, 169. Houses 25. The land is all profitable and of good quality. The Portrairie rivulet runs across the interior, and drives a corn-mill. The seats are Westpalstown-house and Newtown-house; and the antiquities are the ruins of the parish-church and the site of Murragh-house. —This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CLONMETHAN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50, and the rectorial for £100; and the latter are appropriated to the vicars-choral of the cathedrals of Dublin. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

WESTPORT, a parochial benefice or ecclesiastical benefice, partly in the barony of Burrischoole, but chiefly in that of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in the dio. of Tuam, takes name from the town of WESTPORT [see next article]; and consists of the vicarages of AUGHAVAL, KILMACLASSER, AGHAGOWER, and KILGEEVER [which see]; but the last of these parishes constitutes the perpetual curacy and the separate benefice of LEWISBURGH: which see. Length, 24 miles; breadth, 12. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of Kilgeever or Lewishburgh, 29,410. Gross income, £272 14s. 6d.; nett, £742 19s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ballinvoher, constituting the corps of the archdeaconry of Ardferit, in co. Kerry. One curate receives a salary of £90; and each of two others receives a salary of £75. Two churches occur in the quoad sacra parts of the benefice, the one at Westport, and the other at Ayle in Aghagower; and three schoolhouses at Nappagh, Sluigen, and Ardygommen, are also used occasionally as parochial places of worship. A Presbyterian meeting-house and a Methodist meeting-house are situated in Westport; Roman Catholic chapels occur at Westport, Leckanvy, Drummin, Kilmaclasser, Aghagower, and Erris; and a schoolhouse, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, is situated at Carrakimmeddy. In 1834, the inhabitants, exclusive of Kilgeever, consisted of 1,221 Churchmen, 58 Presbyterians, 53 other Protestant dissenters, and 30,335 Roman Catholics; and 33 daily schools had in their books 1,360 boys and 753 girls.

WESTPORT,

A post and market town, and nominally a sea-port, in the parish of Aughaval, barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands at the western termination of the Dublin and Westport mail-road, and in the road from the baronies of Burrishoole and Erris to the barony of Morisk and the district of Cumemarna, 1 mile east of Westport Quay, 6½ miles south of Newport, 8½ south-west of Castlebar, 10 east by north of Lewisburgh, 10½ north-west by west of Partree, 15½ north-west of Ballinrobe, 31½ north-west by west of Tuam, and 124½ west by north of Dublin by way of Ballinrobe, but 134½ along the mail-road by way of Castlebar.

The Environs.—The scenery around Westport, at once in its foregrounds, its middle grounds, and its backgrounds, is singularly rich, diversified, piquant, and magnificent. The town's site is part of a small valley, traversed by a mountain stream; the head of Clew bay, with its labyrinths of land and water, lies about a mile to the west; the Marquis of Sligo's demesne occupies the whole of the intermediate distance, and presses close upon both the town and the bay; one band of low ground, narrow but diversified, extends along the south side of the bay, overlooking its hundreds of green islets, to the base of Croaghpatrick; another band of low ground, broader and much more diversified than the preceding, tumultuated with hillocks, traversed by ravines, and torn at the southern margin into numerous little peninsulæ, extends along the head of the bay, to Newport; a gradual descent, resembling a broad band of hanging plain, comes down upon the town, and brings along the Dublin mail-road, over a distance of two or three miles to the east; the sublime and panorama-viewing Croaghpatrick soars aloft on the south side of Clew bay about 5 or 6 miles to the west-south-west; the picturesque and boldly-outlined island of Clare rises up from the ocean, in the middle of the bay's entrance, directly to the west; and the stern and grandly imposing mountains of Morisk and Partree constitute a far-extending perspective along the whole of the south, while the yet sterner and more sublime mountains of Burrishoole form a receding, prolonged, and many-featured barrier along the whole of the north. Approaching Westport from the east, "we pass on the right," says Mr. Fraser, "the small but beautiful lake of Castlebar, on the northern bank of which is Rahans, the seat of Mr. Browne, and several smaller lakes; and soon reach the point of the valley, whence commences our descent to Westport. In no part of Ireland is there such an extraordinary combination of scenery as is here displayed, nor is there any town in it, the view of which strikes the traveller so forcibly as does that of Westport, when first seen under a favourable light from many parts of this road. On the left is that vast aggregation of mountains which stretches southward to the bay of Galway, a distance of 28 miles; on the right, that long range which extends 36 miles westward from Lough Conn to Achill Head. In front is the fine cone of Croaghpatrick, and the town of Westport, flanked by the hills springing from the narrow vale which contains it, and backed by Clare Island and Clew bay, studded with its hundreds of islets.—As a sea-bathing place, the vicinity of Westport offers many inducements, as well from the strength of the waters which roll in from the Atlantic, as from the numerous excursions to which the coast and surrounding mountains invite. Croaghpatrick, or the Reek, as it is often called, springing from the shore, lifts its conical head 2,510 feet above the sea; this is the great feature of the place, and from it magnificent views of the coast and vicinity of Westport are obtained. These views are often enjoyed from the sides of the mountain, its summit being generally wreathed in mist."

The Westport Estate.—The demesne of the Marquis of Sligo is of considerable extent; and, though over every inch, and at a comparatively recent period, reclaimed from a moorland condition, it is wondrously beautiful. Its surface is singularly diversified, and quite replete with character; and its decorations are ample, tasteful, and charming. A small artificial lake almost washes the entrance of the mansion, lies but slightly above the sea-level of high water, and is separated by an embankment from the head of Westport bay. Very fine timber, particularly ash, profusely decorates the demesne; and it exhibits at once agreeable arrangement, noble growth, and extensive variety. The mansion is large and of agreeable character; and commands from its windows most picturesque views. The estate connected with the demesne is of great extent, and displays, on a most imposing scale, the effects of reclamation and georgic skill. Very nearly all of it was, at a recent period, moorish land, either totally waste or of small practical value; but it now includes a large aggregate amount of good arable ground, and a great aggregate extent of profitable and picturesque woodland. The lately deceased Marquis of Sligo resided much at Westport, effected many improvements on the property, and gave large encouragement to his tenants; and the Marquis who preceded him was, for a long period, resident at Westport, and is said to have expended, in improvements on the estate, from £22,000 to £23,000 a-year. "Such a man," remarks Mr. Trotter, in reference to the latter nobleman, "was truly a benefactor to his country; and his memory deserves to be respected for that true patriotic disposition which not only makes 'a blade of corn grow where it did not before,' but erects dwellings, and provides employment for human beings, who might otherwise pine in wretched cottages, with scanty food." The mountains of the estate, however, are naturally dry and absorbent; and the low grounds are either directly superincumbent upon manorial limestone, or within facile distances of spots whence it can be obtained; so that georgical improvement was invited and very powerfully aided by the natural circumstances of the country. "In traversing this tract," says Dr. MacParlan, "the traveller feels refreshed while passing the extensive woods of the Marquis of Sligo. Woods are everywhere delightful; but one of those in particular, the Brackloon Wood, viewed from Davy's stone-rock, and viewed in such a country too, is singularly interesting. To convey any idea of this to one who had not seen the mountain of Croaghpatrick, it must be premised, that its form divides itself into two parts,—the base, which is composed of several irregular mountains rising to a considerable height, upon which rises the second part, in the form of a cone, to a prodigious height among the clouds. In the view taken from Davy's stone-rock, the cone only appears, and one orbicular subordinate hill; the base being in this point completely surrounded by the Brackloon Wood, which sweeps along the windings of the river of that name, reflecting in the smooth parts of its glide, and multiplying, those objects which it seems to boast. This coup-d'œil terminates on the north, in a perspective glance at the bay, and some of the islands of Westport, and on the south, in some high and distant mountains. It is certainly no prostitution of the words sublime and beautiful to apply them here." "As I approached Westport," says Mr. Inglis, in reference to the present condition of the estate, "the country greatly improved in cultivation. More cattle, 'oo, were seen on the hill sides; wood began to assume a respectable growth; and the cottages became frequent.

The linen trade in this district, and most probably in other districts, is the source of all the extras which are obtained beyond the absolute necessities of life. The land is let in very small portions; seven or eight acres is about the usual size of a 'take.' Potatoes are raised for the family consumption; grain, to pay the rent; and the flax is destined for clothing and extras. The decline of the linen trade has produced great want of employment, and the condition of the agriculturists throughout these districts has very much deteriorated. Many much smaller landholders than those I have mentioned were attracted by the linen trade; and now, therefore, the want of employment is the more felt. A man with three children could formerly earn 10s. a-week with ease. Land is generally sufficiently high let in this neighbourhood, except the old takes, which are low. I found a man occupying three acres in the immediate neighbourhood of the town, and paying only £4 for the whole. He told me he had married five daughters, and had given four cows to each as a marriage portion. The poverty of the county of Mayo is chiefly found in the lower parts of it; not so much in the mountainous districts. In these the people are circumstanced much the same as in Cunnemara."

Interior of the Town.—Westport is one of the most neat, regular, well-kept, and aggregately pleasant small towns of Ireland; and would be creditable, and even ornamental, to almost any district of either Leinster or Ulster. Its principal streets were planned by John, first Marquis of Sligo, with considerable taste; and its whole character maintains a similar impress from the care of the Sligo family to that which is so visibly and so beautifully stamped upon Ballinasloe by the care of the Earls of Clancarty. The enclosure wall of the Westport demesne bounds all the west side of the town; the lofty trees which overhang that wall appear to belong almost as much to the town as to the demesne; and as the grand entrance to the demesne opens from a great vista down the very centre of the town, and all the grounds are liberally open to the promenading of the townspeople, all the luxuries of the interior of the demesne, with its beautifully wooded hills springing from the lawn, with the singular shapes and groupings of its surface, and with its superb home-views and its magnificent perspective, practically belong to almost every dwelling-house of the townspeople as truly as to the mansion of the Marquis. A pretty and limpid mountain stream runs from east to west through the centre of the town; two terraces or one-sided streets, called the North Mall and the South Mall, extend along the sides of the stream, and are adorned and shaded with lines of trees; and all the other principal streets go off at right angles from the Malls, or intersect one another in directions somewhat parallel with the Malls. Some of the streets, in consequence of the rapid rise and the inequality of the ground, are inconveniently steep; but the Malls form a level, spacious, and noble vista, and are very respectably edified. The road or thoroughfare which connects the town with its port, called Westport-Quay, leads through Lord Sligo's demesne; and, though delightful to a pedestrian, is unhappily too uneven to be a convenient or facile communication for heavily-laden vehicles.—The parish-church of Aughaval, and mother-church of the benefice of Westport, is a building of appropriate character, but without any remarkable feature, and is situated within the Westport demesne. The Roman Catholic chapel is a large, lumpish, tasteless structure, situated in the lower part of the South Mall. The Presbyterian meeting-house is a neat, small building, erected about 10 years ago. The Methodist meeting-house is a plain, small structure. The barrack is situated on the south side of the town. The workhouse will be noticed in connection with our statistics of the Poor-law union. The bridewell contains the usual accommodation. The inn is a singularly large and noble establishment for such a town as Westport; it is situated in the lower part of the North Mall, opposite the Roman Catholic chapel, and bulks very largely as an architectural feature of the town; it contains 5 sitting-rooms and 24 bed-rooms, and is conducted in a style similar to that of the best hotels of Dublin; and it was built and furnished at the private expense of the Marquis of Sligo, and is held rent free by its tenant, solely that the town may be benefited, and that comfortable accommodation may be afforded to tourists and to mercantile travellers. Nearly all writers have noticed this hotel in superlatives; and Mr. Inglis, in particular, calls it the very best hotel in Ireland, without excepting even 'the Imperial of Cork.' "It is singular," he remarks, "that such an hotel should be found in a town in the extreme west of the remote county of Mayo. I cannot account for this, I only know the fact, and can assure the reader, that he will not find at Greham's in Dublin—scarcely even in the Clarendon—a more recherché dinner than Mrs. Robinson will put before him. It is true, indeed, he will pay something more for his dinner, as well as for his bed-room, than in more ordinary places; but for my part, I was well content to do this, after a fortnight's lent and Jack Joyce's bed-room."

The Poor-law Union.—The Westport Poor-law union ranks as the 113th, and was declared on July 13, 1840. It lies wholly in co. Mayo, and comprehends an area of 341,117 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 77,512. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, Westport, 15,315; Lewisburgh, 9,716; Clare Island, 3,632; Aghagower, 12,025; Clogher, 4,417; Kilmeena, 9,000; Kilmaclasser, 3,444; Newport, 11,761; Achill, 5,277; and Ballyeroy, 2,025. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 26; and of the latter, 5 are elected by the division of Westport, 4 by each of the divisions of Aghagower and Newport, 3 by each of the divisions of Lewisburgh and Kilmeena, 2 by each of the divisions of Clare Island and Achill, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Lewisburgh and Clare Island lie in the barony of Morisk; the divisions of Westport and Aghagower lie partly in the barony of Morisk and partly in that of Burrishoole; the divisions of Kilmeena, Kilmaclasser, Newport, and Achill lie in the barony of Burrishoole; the division of Clogher lies partly in the barony of Burrishoole and partly in that of Carra; and the division of Ballyeroy lies in the barony of Erris. The number of valued tenements within the Burrishoole districts, is 6,707,—within the Carra district, 84,—within the Erris district, 638,—within the Morisk districts, 5,693,—within the entire union, 13,122; and of this total, 11,791 are valued under £5,—953, under £10,—175, under £15,—77, under £20,—42, under £25,—21, under £30,—20, under £40,—13, under £50,—and 30 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £38,875 7s. 7½d.; the total number of persons rated is 13,122; and of these, 2,510 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—4,218, not exceeding £2,—2,006, not exceeding £3,—1,522, not exceeding £4,—and 649 not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in Oct. 29, 1840, —to be completed in April 1842,—to cost £7,800 for building and completion, and £2,000 for the site, and for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 7 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches, subject to an annual rent of £14 3s. 6d.,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 paupers. The total cost of the union up to Feb. 6, 1843,—at which date the workhouse was not opened for the reception of paupers—was £1,612 2s. The medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Westport, Achill, Lewisburgh, and Newport; and, in 1840-41, they received £196 6s. 2d. from subscription, £195 6s. 2d. from public grants, and £30 10s. 10d. from other sources, and expended £229 10s. in salaries to medical officers, £139 7s. 9d. for medicines, and £33 11s. 8d. for contingencies. The Westport dispensary serves for a district of 77,927, with a pop. of 26,345; and, in 1840-41, it expended £169 0s. 1d., and administered to 1,450 patients.

Commerce.]—Though the commerce of Westport belongs rather to Westport-Quay than to the town itself; yet it is always designated after Westport, and properly falls to be noticed in this place. The only vessels registered at the port on Dec. 31, 1843, were 4 sailing vessels of aggregately 83 tons. During the year 1843, 73 vessels of aggregately 6,145 tons entered the harbour coastwise, 151 of aggregately 14,441 tons sailed from the harbour coastwise; 2, of jointly 335 tons, entered from the colonies; and 1, of 210 tons, sailed for the colonies. The exports during 1835 amounted, in estimated value, to £87,805; and their items were 292,485 cwt. of corn, meal, and flour, 1,061 cwt. of provisions, 5,561 gallons of spirits, 11 bales of wool, 7 bales of linen, and 77 bales of flax and tow. The imports during 1835 amounted in estimated value to £28,517; and their principal items were 2,533 tons of coal, culm, and cinders, 250 tons of iron, 30 tons of cast-iron, 20 tons of lead, 166 tons of slates and stones, 1,400 tons of salt, 2,878 cwt. of corn, meal, and flour, 165 cwt. of ashes, 3,200 cwt. of potatoes, 284 cwt. of barilla, 128 tierces of sugar, 1,759 tierces of flax-seeds, 138 casks of tallow, 509 barrels of herrings, 11,172 gallons of spirits, and 260 packages of glass and earthenware. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town consists of 14,000 tons for exportation, 3,375 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 1,000 tons of agricultural produce for the local use of breweries and distilleries, 50 tons of excisable articles not received by direct importation, and 7,000 tons of stone, lime, turf, and other heavy and bulky articles; and the estimated amount of inland carriage from the town consists of 1,800 tons of imported goods, 840 tons of produce of breweries and distilleries, and 900 tons of coal, manure, and other heavy and bulky articles.

Trade.]—A distillery and a brewery unhappily figured as the most prominent appliances of manufacture. Yet Westport was once a very flourishing seat of the linen trade, and may not improbably become a flourishing seat of it again. "The linen trade," said Mr. Inglis in 1834, "was extensively carried on here; and 8 years ago, as many as 900 pieces were measured and sold on a market-day. Now the quantity scarcely averages 100 pieces. Taking the whole district, including Westport, Castlehar, Newportpratt, and Ballinrobe, and the intermediate country, about 500 pieces are sold weekly; and about 30,000 persons are supposed to be less or more employed in the trade. No trade gives such universal employment as this: not fewer than 60 persons are employed, from first to last, in preparing a web of linen." "The day after my arrival in Westport," says the same writer, "chauced to be market-day. The town had an appearance of considerable business; but, with the exception of manufactured linen, this appearance was deceptive. It is true, there were many people in the market, and much buying and selling; but the articles brought to market were, in most cases, of very trifling value. I saw hundreds of women, standing with but a couple of hanks of linen yarn, worth a shilling or two; hundreds with an apron full of wool, worth much less. Some of these bundles of wool, indeed, were the shearings of one or two sheep, the exclusive property of the farmer's wife or daughter, and were sent to be converted into ribbons or gloves; but notwithstanding these exceptions, it is certain that there is much evidence of the poverty of the surrounding country, in the small value of the articles brought to market, and in the great distance which they are carried. I know of three, two, and even one egg, being brought to Westport from a distance of two miles. I saw a girl take her seat in the market with 5 eggs, worth 1½d.; and she had walked an Irish mile and a half to bring them to market." Fairs are held on Jan. 1, May 22, Aug. 6, and Nov. 1. The town is the head-quarters of one of the 9 districts through which the constabulary force of the county are distributed; it is the station of the staff of the South County Militia; it is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions—the latter held on every Thursday; and it has branch offices of the Bank of Ireland and the National Bank of Ireland. The public conveyances in 1838, were a mail-coach to Ballinasloe, there to communicate with the mail-coach from Galway to Dublin; and a car to Tuam.

Statistics.]—Area of the town, 104 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,448; in 1841, 4,365. Houses 589. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 172; in manufactures and trade, 498; in other pursuits, 207. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 60; on the directing of labour, 509; on their own manual labour, 249; on means not specified, 59. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 879; who could read but not write, 238; who could neither read nor write, 609. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 577; who could read but not write, 437; who could neither read nor write, 1,074.—Westport gives the subordinate title of Viscount to the Marquis of Sligo.

WESTPORT-BAY, the south-eastern arm or offset of Clew bay, partly in the parish of Kilmeena and barony of Burrisboole, but chiefly in the parish of Aughaval and barony of Moriak, co. Mayo, Connaught. The south side of the small island of Innisgort, which is surmounted by a lighthouse, and is situated 5½ miles west-north-west of Westport-Quay, marks the entrance to the bay. A narrow and peninsular headland, which projects about a mile north-north-eastward into Clew bay, from the shore at the north-east base of Croaghpatrick, bears 2 miles south-south-east from Innisgort and about the same distance south-south-west from the extremity of a peninsular headland in the parish of Kilmeena, and forms the nearest part of the mainland on the north side of Westport bay; but most of the space intermediate between both headlands and Innisgort is occupied by islets and shoals: so that the practicable entrance on the south side of Innisgort, and the practicable channel inward, thence over a distance of nearly 2 miles, are less than half-a-mile wide. The chief of the islets which cover the harbour from the south side of the entrance southward to the east side of the headland adjacent to Croaghpatrick are Dorinishmore, Dorinishbeg, and Innis-league; and the chief of the islets which flank the north side of the bay, or lie sprinkled athwart its interior, are Innislyre, Illanattagart, Croinish, Innisgowla, Innislaugh, Innisraher, Innisheeny, Cahirivan, and the Annagh Islands. The first of these—Innislyre—has a coast-guard station. The channel, after passing about 2 miles up from Innisgort, expands into a lagoon, nearly 2 miles wide, almost perfectly landlocked, and containing good anchoring-ground; and the bay or harbour, after this lagoon is passed, gradually contracts, up to its termination at the village of Westport-Quay. A very large proportion of the area of the upper part of the bay is dry at low water, so that the navigable channel is there very narrow and comparatively intricate. Westport demesne occupies most of the northern and eastern shores of the bay from the headland in the parish of Kilmeen round to Westport-Quay; and the principal residences upon its shore thence to the base of Croughpatrick, are Villa-lodge, Cherry-lodge, Trafalgar-lodge, Belclare, Prospect, and Morisk-lodge.

WESTPORT-QUAY, a seaport village, in the parish of Aughran, barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated at the head of Westport bay, 1 mile west of the town of Westport; and is the port of that town. The statistics of its shipping and commerce are given in the article WESTPORT: which see. A long line of store-houses at the village presents a lank and rueful appearance; and, with equal ostentation and absurdity, are marked "wine in bond," "tobacco in bond," &c. The village, though small in itself, possesses importance in its connection with Westport, and seems to be bustling and prosperous. Three coast-guard stations in Clew bay may be regarded as more or less connected with Westport-Quay; and occur at Mynish, Islandmore, and Old-Head. In 1836, the fishing craft within the Mynish district consisted of 4 half-decked vessels, worked by 12 men, 6 open sail boats, worked by 18 men, and 100 row-boats, worked by 400 men; those within the district of Islandmore consisted of 1 open sail boat, worked by 4 men, and 94 row-boats, worked by 367 men; and those within the district of Old-Head consisted of 5 open sail boats, worked by 20 men, and 100 row-boats, worked by 400 men. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 547. Houses 98. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 27; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 34; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 30.

WET-MOUNTAIN, a mountain on the mutual boundary of the parishes of Donard and Hollywood, barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Its summit is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of the summit of Slieve-Gadoue, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by east of the village of Donard; and has an altitude of 1,753 feet above the level of the sea.

WEXFORD,

A maritime county in the south-east of the province of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Wicklow; on the east, by the Irish Sea and St. George's Channel; on the south, by the Atlantic ocean; and on the west, by the counties of Waterford, Kilkenny, and Carlow. The boundary-line of its mainland, measured in a series of straight lines and round the great curvatures, but not round minor deflexions and sinuosities, extends 35 miles along the Irish Sea and St. George's Channel, 52 along the Atlantic, $8\frac{1}{2}$ in contact with the county of Waterford, or rather along the east side of Waterford Harbour, 12 in contact with the county of Kilkenny, 21 in contact with the county of Carlow, and 23 in contact with the county of Wicklow. All the boundary with co. Waterford is formed by Waterford Harbour; all the boundary with co. Kilkenny, by the river Barrow; nearly all the boundary with co. Carlow, by the watershed of the Blackstairs and the Mount-Leinster mountains, and by the rivers Slaney and Derry; and more than one-half of the boundary with co. Wicklow, by the watershed of the mountains which separate the middle part of the river-system of the Slaney from the lower part of the river-system of the Ovoca. The county of Wexford is, in consequence, much better defined by natural boundaries than probably any other county in Ireland, excepting Antrim, Clare, and Down. The longest line which can be drawn southward within the mainland of the county, extends 34 miles from the boundary with co. Wicklow, 4 miles west of Arklow to Carnsore Point; the longest line which can be drawn westward, extends 23 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Greenore Point to Waterford Harbour, opposite Cheek Point; the longest line which can be drawn diagonally, so as to indicate the greatest length of the county, extends 45 miles in the direction of south-west by south, from the summit of Croghan-Kinsella to Hook Head; the longest line which can be drawn in the opposite direction of the preceding, so as to indicate the greatest breadth of the county, extends 24 miles from the river Barrow at the influx of the Nore to Carnsore Point; and the shortest line which can be drawn parallel to the preceding, except across tiny wings at the extremities, measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and falls upon the town of Gorey. The area of the county comprises 510,702 acres of arable land, 45,501 of uncultivated land, 14,325 of continuous woods, 2,392 of townships, and 3,668 of water,—in all, 576,588 acres. Mr. Griffiths reports that about 16,000 acres are capable of being drained and enlivened advantageously; that 18,000 may be drained for mountain pasture; and that 11,000 acres, consisting chiefly of the rocky and heathy tops of mountains, are capable of improvement.

Coasts.—The coast, along all the east and all the south, is low, and, for the most part, beachy; and, except in one place, a little south of Kilnihil Point, where Tara-hill immediately overhangs the shore, the whole of even the sea-board is remarkably low. The eastern line of coast trends prevailingly in the direction of south by west, but it slightly projects at Kilnihil Point, near the northern extremity; it slightly and slowly curves inward thence to Cahore Point, situated about third-way from the northern extremity; it trends south-south-westward till near Raven Point, at the north side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour, and then curves round south-south-eastward to that headland; it makes a slight curvature inland between Roslare Point at the south side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour, and Greenore Point $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the southern extremity; and it trends in its prevailing direction of south by west from Greenore Point to Carnsore Point, at the south-eastern extremity of the mainland of the kingdom. The southern line of coast makes a slight curvature inward from Carnsore Point to Crossfarnogue Point, a distance of $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles in a straight line in the direction of west by half south; and it makes a comparatively bold sweep inward between Crossfarnogue Point and Hook Head,—a distance in a straight line of $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the direction of west-south-west. The principal of the minor or subordinate headlands on the coast, are Duffcarrick, Brenogue, Poolshone, and Glasscarrick, between Kilnihil Point and Cahore Point; Crossfarnogue Point, between Greenore Point and Carnsore Point; and Bagenbon Head, Inguard Point, and Nord Point, between Crossfarnogue Point and Hook Head. The principal landing-places, bays, and sea-loughs, are Courtown Pier, between Duffcarrick and Brenogue Point; a fishery landing-place, near the village of Ford; Reilhouse and Blackturf landing-places, between the village of Blackwater and Raven Point; Wexford Harbour, the large and ramified estuary of the Slaney, penetrating inland above the town of Wexford; Greenore bay, the open sweep between Roslare Point and Greenore Point; Lough Ta, or Lady's Island lake, and Tacumshane lake, two lagoons between Carnsore Point and Crossfarnogue Point; Ballyteigue bay, the large open sweep between Crossfarnogue Point and Hook Head; Ballyteigue lough, a lagoon on the east side of Ballyteigue bay; Bannow bay, a ramification northward from the head of Ballyteigue bay; and Housland bay, Patrick's bay, and Slade bay, three small indentations of the east side of the Hook peninsula, a little north-north-east of Hook Head. The principal shoals lying off the coast, at the distance of from a few perches to $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the shore, are Arklow bank, extending southward from co. Wicklow to a mile or two of parallel with the northern part of co. Wexford, and having at its south end a light ship; Glas-gorman's bank, extending south by eastward from a point nearly opposite Kilnichol Point; the Rusk bank, extending southward from the near vicinity of Cahore Point; the Money-weights, two small shoals lying east-south-east of the south end of Rusk bank; Blackwater bank, commencing east-south-east of the Money-weights, and extending in the direction of south-south-west half south; Dogger bank, Holden's bank, and the Bailies, constituting a series of shoals east-south-eastward from Roslare Point; and a bank lying from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles off the shore along most of the distance between Greenore Point and Carnsore Point. The principal of the islets and skerries belonging to the county, are Great Island, Brenst Island, and Mud Island, in Wexford Harbour; the Carricks, the Pollok, the Whilkeen, the Collough, and Fiadale Rock, near the shore between Greenore Point and Carnsore Point; Tuskar Rock, surmounted by a lighthouse, and situated $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Carnsore Point; the Black Rock, the Barrels, and the 'uns, off the coast between Carnsore Point and Crossfarnogue Point; and the Lesser Saltee Island, the Greater Saltee Island, Coningmore, and Coningbeg, lying in a series southward from Crossfarnogue Point, and extending toward a light ship which lies moored $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Carnsore Point.

Surface.—A lofty, magnificent, and boldly-charactered range of mountains extends along most of the boundary with the county of Carlow, and forms an imposing background to a large proportion of the larger landscapes within the county of Wexford. The northern portion of this range consists of Mount-Leinster and its offsets; the southern portion consists of the Blackstairs mountain; and the two portions are mutually separated by a lofty mountain defile, called Sculloge or Scallagh Pass, which affords a transit for the road from Enniscorthy to Goresbridge and Borris. The principal summits on the boundary-line, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Mount-Leinster, 2,610 feet; and four heights of the Blackstairs mountains, 2,409, 1,320, 1,027, and 1,679 feet. The principal summit of the Mount-Leinster group inward from the boundary is Blackrock mountain, 1,971 feet; and the principal summit of the Blackstairs' group inward from the boundary is White mountain, 1,259 feet.—Croghan-Kinshela, the celebrated mountain of the gold mines, lifts its conspicuous summit of 1,985 feet of altitude upon the boundary with the county of Wicklow; several heights connected with that mountain constitute a noble and picturesque barrier upon the same frontier, but are situated principally within Wicklow; and an offset, or prolonged series of them, about $10\frac{1}{4}$ miles in length, but continuing to be connected on the north-west side with the heights within Wicklow, and dissevered in its own progress by intersecting vales, extends south-westward from the south-west side of Croghan-Kinshela, away to the terminating height of Slieveboy, and constitutes a conspicuous and picturesque watershed between the valleys of the Slaney and the Bann. The principal summits of this series, together with their altitude above sea-level, are Annagh-hill, near the north-east end, 1,498 feet; Slievebaun, near the middle of the series, 879 feet; and Slieveboy, at the south-west end, 1,385 feet.—Tara-hill makes a conspicuous figure on the northern portion of the east coast, lifts its summit to an altitude of 826 feet above sea-level, and commands an extensive and brilliant view of both the coast and the interior.—A series of lofty hills, both too broad and too straggling to be called either range, chain, or group, commences $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of New Ross, extends about $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the north-east, and very agreeably diversifies and enlivens a great extent of landscape. The principal summits of this series are Slievekieltor or Slievecolitia, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of New Ross, and having an altitude of 887 feet above sea-level; Lackan-hill, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by north of New Ross, 628 feet; Carrickburn-hill, 5 miles east by south of New Ross, 766 feet; Camorus-hill, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of New Ross, 598 feet; and Killegney-hill, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of New Ross, 537 feet. A prolonged or ridgy hill, called Forth mountain, and lifting its highest summit to the altitude of 774 feet, commences $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west by south of Wexford, extends $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward, constitutes a very conspicuous feature in a wide expanse of landscape, and forms a strong natural barrier between the baronies of Forth and Bargie, on the south, and the great body of the county on the north. The district south of the Forth mountain, and constituting the two baronies just named, is almost a dead level, remarkable for the fertility of its soil, the wealth and abundance of its natural manures, and the ancient as well as modern superiority of its agricultural condition; and the other districts, not immediately included in the various groups and series of mountains and hills which we have enumerated, may be described as a great plain, undulated with swells, and gently tumulated with low and numerous isolated hills. The principal little summits in these districts, together with their respective altitude above sea-level, are a height 4 miles east-south-east of Oulart, 243 feet; a height $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile south-east of Oulart, 329 feet; a height 1 mile north-east of the village of Blackwater, 278 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of the village of Blackwater, 199 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of the village of Blackwater, 381 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Enniscorthy, 293 feet; Vinegar-hill, adjacent to the east side of Enniscorthy, 389 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Enniscorthy, 276 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Wexford, 205 feet; a height 4 miles west of Wexford, 215 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east south-east of Taghmon, 428 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Carrick, 208 feet; a height 2 miles north-east of Duncormack, 184 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Fethard, 214 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Ramsgrange, 257 feet; a height $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile north of Ramsgrange, 256 feet; a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ramsgrange, 276 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Newbawn, 400 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Adamstown, 345 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by east of Ballywilliam, 467 feet; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Ballindagan, 713 feet; Glennamenagh-hill, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Cloghamon, 695 feet; a height 3 miles south-south-east of Ferns, 454 feet; and a height 4 miles east of Ferns, 769 feet.

"With regard to the political division into baronies, and the ecclesiastical division into parishes," remarks the agricultural statist of the county, "no important deduction arises respecting the relative improvement of these nominal divisions of territory. Chance or circumstance long forgotten often have given rise to the bounds of these divisions; other considerations must be referred to in considering the natural geography of a country, in order to found thereon an investigation respecting its present state of improvement, and the means of its future advancement. In this respect, the county of Wexford affords some strong characters of distinction with regard to its capabilities of improvement. In the first place, the whole of its eastern and southern maritime frontier presents a district of great extent, in many parts consisting of a deep alluvial soil, well adapted for tillage, abounding in various species of marl, calcareous sand, and, in some situations, limestone; all of which, together with the sea-weeds thrown upon the coast, are found to afford ample returns for the industry of man, directed even as it is by very little skill, although that skill is exercised with incredible industry, particularly in the southern and south-eastern parts of this district. In the more internal parts of the county, the river Slaney traversing the country in a direction from north-west to south-east, marks out a district of great beauty and fertility on both sides of its verdant banks. The district to the eastward stretches to the sea-coast, abounding in marl, and productive in grain. This district includes the barony of Ballaghkeen, Gorey, and part of Scarawalsh; it is, in a part of the north, low and flat; towards the south, however, it rises into many gently swelling hills, with some beautiful vales. The whole of the rocks are secondary strata, and the low and flat grounds alluvial. This district forms about one-sixth part of the county. We have already mentioned the southern district, separated by the chain of mountainous ground called the Mountain of Forth, from the rest of this county. This includes the baronies of Forth and Bargie, commonly called the English baronies. This district, including both baronies, forms also about one-sixth part of the county of Wexford. The remaining part of the county, consisting of Shelburne, Bantry, and part of Scarawalsh, is not so favourably circumstanced, containing little marl, but it has the advantage of being able to procure limestone from the counties of Kilkenny and Carlow, and it contains abundance of turf, in which the southern and eastern districts are deficient. A very rich marl is also found in the bed of the rivers Suir and Barrow, together with abundance of calcareous or shell sand near Duncannon Fort. The soil is clayey loam, and gravelly, but, when properly under-irrigated and manured with lime, or river mud or sand, produces excellent crops. Some districts, as the Hook, are in a high state of cultivation."

Climate.—The eastern and southern districts of the county of Wexford, in consequence of lying low and quite open to the sea, enjoy a much milder climate than the adjoining counties of Carlow and Kilkenny. In winter, the lands of these districts are cleared of snow, and may be subjected to the plough, while the lands in the interior of the county, 10 miles from the sea, are bound with frost, and those of the mountainous districts on the western frontier are covered with snow. The southern district, however, is subject to so heavy rains in winter, and so severe storms in spring and autumn, that, in order to prevent its rich and well-tilled soil from being washed away, the enclosures require to be made small, and the ridges, particularly for winter crops of wheat and beans, require to be formed high and round. The average climate of the county appears to be somewhat more genial than the average climate of the portions of Wales and England situated within the same parallels of latitude; and the harvests of Wexford are sometimes finished when those of Haverfordwest and Caermarthen in South Wales, and the district around Barnstaple in the north of Devonshire, are only in progress. The peninsula of the Hook, measuring 5 miles in length by 1 mile in breadth, lying but slightly elevated above sea-level, nearly surrounded by sea-water, and possessing a thin layer of soil upon a compact limestone substratum, has always an earlier harvest than the rest of the county, and produces wonderfully luxuriant crops of grass, and singularly excellent crops of barley and wheat. No such excess of moisture or deficiency of heat, as has been popularly but hastily ascribed to all Ireland, prevails in the county of Wexford, to prevent the full ripening of corn on lands properly tilled and matured. "In very moist seasons, no doubt," says the agricultural statist of the county, "the leaf-buds of grass and corn, as well as of trees and perennial vegetables, grow too luxuriantly, and the flowers, and consequently fruits and seeds, are later, and contain more aqueous and less mucilaginous and saccharine matter. On the contrary, in dry seasons the leaf-buds are less vigorous, and therefore in less quantity as to the crops of hay and the quantity of straw; but the fruits and seeds ripen earlier, and are of more grateful flavour and more nutritious. The excess of heat is, however, seldom such in this climate as to be much injurious to vegetation. Last year (1803) there was much heat and a long continuance of drought, so that many of the springs dried up, and even some of the rivulets in different parts of this county. The crops of grass, and particularly of hay, were very deficient, the straw also short; but the crops of corn uncommonly productive, so that in many parts of the baronies of Forth and Bargie, the barley produced 15 and 20 barrels to the Irish acre; whereas, in 1802, which was a wet summer, the same lands did not produce above 12 and 15 barrels. In the harvest of that year, however, I observed that a great part of the deficiency in produce might be ascribed to the crops being very much choked up with the weeds; and in those parts of the barony, as in the parish of Carran, where the farmers take a great care to keep their crops free from weeds, their produce was very little inferior to the produce of the dry season of last year, although the bulk of the corn in the rainy year was much greater."

Water.—The river Slaney flows a brief distance upon the north-western boundary, and then runs south-south-westward through the interior to the head of Wexford Harbour; and it is navigable for river-craft to Enniscorthy. The rivulet Derry comes down from co. Wicklow, and runs a few miles on the north-western boundary to a confluence with the Slaney. The river Bunn rises on the north-eastern frontier; and drains the larger portion of the north-eastern district south-south-westward to the Slaney. The rivulets U'm and Boro and some smaller streams rise among the western mountains, and run eastward to the Slaney. Two rivulets of considerable volume spring up in the eastern district, and run westward to the Slaney. The rivulet Sow rises near the middle of the southern half of the eastern district, and crawls southward to the upper part of Wexford Harbour. The rivulet Awlin-Banna or Owenworrugh rises in the eastern district, and flows north-eastward to the Irish sea, at a point nearly midway between Kilmichael Point and Cahore Point. Various other streamlets, but all of small length and trivial volume, rise in the eastern district, and run to the Irish sea. Various tiny streams, quite similar in character to the preceding, drain the eastern and the central portions of the southern district southward to the Atlantic, or to the sea-loughs which deflect from it upon the coast. Three confluent rivulets, constituting the Corug river, run to the head of Bannow bay. The river Barrow, large in volume, facile for navigation, fluctuating with the tide, and receiving in its progress from co. Kilkenny the magnificent tributary of the Nore, flows along the whole of the boundary with Kilkenny.—The items of the water area of co. Wexford, as exhibited in the Ordnance Survey, are 5 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches in Lough Kilpatrick, in the parish of Kilgorman; 11 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches in small lakes, in the parish of Tacumshane; 382 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches of tideway of the river Slaney, in the barony of East Shelmallee; 353 acres, 1 rood of tideway of the river Barrow, and 35 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches of tideway of the river Slaney, in the barony of Bantry; 80 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches in the river Slaney, in the parish of Ballycarney; 11 acres, 1 rood in the river Slaney, in the parish of Clone; 27 acres, 17 perches in the river Slaney, in the parish of Kilrush; 11 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches in the river Slaney, in the parish of Monart; 24 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches in the river Slaney, in the parish of Moyacombe; 34 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches in the river Slaney, in the parish of St. Mary's of Enniscorthy; 29 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches in the river Slaney, in the parish of St. Mary's of Newtownbarry; 1 acre, 3 roods, 20 perches in the river Slaney, in the barony of Scarewalsh section of the parish of Templeshannon; 8 acres, 1 rood of tideway of the Slaney, in the barony of Scarewalsh; 469 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches of tideway of the Slaney, in the barony of West Shelmallee; 8 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches in Leary's Lough, in the parish of Donaghmore; 21 acres in Leary's Lough, in the parish of Kilmuckridge; 11 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches in the river Slaney, in the Ballaghkeen section of the parish of Templeshannon; 139 acres, 8 perches of tideway of the Slaney, in the barony of Ballaghkeen; and 1,988 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches of tideway of the Barrow, in the barony of Shelburne.

Minerals.—A band of lofty granitic country, forming part of the great granite district of the counties of Carlow, Wicklow, and Dublin, constitutes all the higher portion of the Mount Leinster and Blackstairs mountains within the county of Wexford; a small district of granite lies on the mutual border of the counties of Wexford and Wicklow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of the nearest part of the great granite district; two small districts of granite very nearly connected with each other, lie on the south-east coast adjacent to Carnsore-Point; two penicles of granite occur on the south coast a little west of Lough Tacumshane; and two other penicles of granite lie isolated about 10 miles north-west of Wexford. A band of country consisting of altered rocks in the vicinity of granite, or of what are now commonly called metamorphic rocks, constitutes the lower declivities of the skirts of the Mount Leinster and the Blackstairs mountains. Quartz rock constitutes the Forth mountain, Vinegar Hill, a pendicle $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Enniscorthy, and two considerable penicles south-south-west of Gorey. A large greenstone protrusion, nearly 3 miles in length, occurs $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Gorey. A pendicle of old red sandstone occurs at the neck or commencement of the Hook peninsula, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Fethard. Carboniferous limestone constitutes the surface rock of the Hook peninsula, a considerable pendicle along the head of Tacumshane Lough, a small district south of the town of Wexford, and along the west side of Wexford Harbour, and a pendicle 6 miles west of the town of Wexford. The surface rocks throughout all the vast remainder of the county are of the transition series, and consist principally of clayslate, greywacke, and greywacke slate.—A lead mine is in operation at Cairme; and the ore raised in it is conveyed in boats from Enniscorthy to Wexford, for shipment to the Mining Company of Ireland's smelting works at Ballycorus in the county of Dublin. A lead mine was anciently worked near Barrastown on the river Bannow; and was resumed about the year 1768; but did not prove to be remunerating. A small vein of copper ore, of the kind called malachite, or carbonated green copper ore, occurs at Kirlogue, in the vicinity of Wexford. The chief of the other useful minerals within the county are limestone, various kinds of marls, the calcareous sands of the sea-shore, and the calcareous sediment in the beds of the rivers.

Soils.—“The soil, generally speaking, of the county of Wexford,” says the statist already twice quoted, “cannot boast of the superior degrees of fertility which is found in many other districts in Ireland, being mostly of a cold clayey nature, without containing those substrata of limestone and limestone gravel so frequent in the midland districts of Ireland.” * * “The land declines from the primitive mountains on the north of the county towards the sea, the retreating waters having left it in unequal elevations; and where the depositions of alluvial substances are considerable, towards the south and south-east, the surface is beautifully waving and downy, the whole affording great advantages for draining the lands and aerating the crops of grain, and therefore is much more adapted to agriculture than low and extensive plains. The soil is of course stony and gravelly near the mountains, being more loamy as the depositions subsided towards the sea. In the internal districts among the single hills, are considerable tracts of peaty soil, formed from the deposition of vegetable matter arrested in its progress to the sea. A considerable stratum of clayey soil runs through the barony of Shelburne, from south-east to north-west, but not so adhesive as what in England is denominated stiff clay; it is, however, naturally unfertile, and perhaps the worst soil in the county. The soil in general is diversified in a great degree, even in the same farm, and often in the same field.”

Agriculture.—The county of Wexford and the southern part of the county of Wicklow constitute one of the nine agricultural districts into which Mr. Wakefield distributed the whole of Ireland. The quantity of wheat used for seed in this district he states at 186 lbs. per acre, and the produce at 2,020 lbs.; the quantity of barley used for seed at 295 lbs. per acre, and the produce at 2,614 lbs.; the quantity of oats used for seed at 368 lbs. per acre, and the produce at 2,606 lbs.; the quantity of potatoes used for seed at 2,632 lbs. per acre, and the produce at 21,140 lbs.; and the produce of flax per acre at 896 lbs. “In the baronies of Bargie and Forth,” says he, “farming is pursued under a system different from that generally adopted in this part of Ireland. Beans are introduced into the common course of cultivation, but the mode of treating them is little understood, the hoe being never used, and they are sown in the broad-cast way, whereas they ought to be planted by putting two or three seeds into one hole.” “I came to Newtownbarony from New Ross, over a country which exhibited light land worth about one guinea per acre. Limestone is brought hither from a considerable distance, and large quantities of it are used. The expense is estimated at 3s. per barrel. Furze is employed for hedges as well as for fuel. A great deal of wheat is raised here, and the ploughs commonly used are constructed in a better manner. They have a short beam, but are furnished neither with a cat's head or swill-yard. Paring and burning are practised. "The awkward and rude manner in which the people plough at Enniscorthy is very extraordinary; one man holds the plough, another leads the horses, and as there is no swill-yard, a third presses on the loam to keep it down, yet the rents are enormous." "In the neighbourhood of Wexford I heard of threshing by task-work, at the rate of 6d. per barrel of fourteen stone for barley and oats, 12d. for wheat, twenty stone to the barrel, and fourteen pounds to the stone. Fresh butter sells for 1s. 4d. per pound of eighteen ounces. Salt butter has only sixteen ounces to the pound. The course of crops in this neighbourhood is, 1st, potatoes, 2d, barley, 3d, oats. Marl occasions an expense of about £3 per acre. The cultivation of clover begins to increase. The common price of labour is 9d. and 10d., but in harvest 2s. per day; children get 4d. or 6d., and they all find employment, as there are here so many gentlemen who reside on their estates. The tenures are small, and potatoe acres are sold as in the north. There are here no corn acres, and, in my opinion, this may be ascribed the superiority of the poor in this part of the county. The cottiers hire horses and drill their potatoes. Wages 1s. 1d. per day. A cow will produce £10 per annum."

"The farm-houses and cottages, for they are cottages rather than cabins," said Mr. Inglis in 1834, "are very thickly strewn, and, with few exceptions, the former are substantial, the latter clean and comfortable. The farther I travelled into the district the more striking became its characteristics; and not only did I find the interior of the houses comfortable, but in the flower-pots and little ornamented gardens I recognised the traits I have enumerated. In the husbandry of the district there was everything to recommend. The land was well laboured and clean; the crops of wheat and of beans, the cultivation of which is extensively pursued here—were excellent; and a serviceable plough, with two horses and only one man, showed some knowledge of the economy of labour. In this district few are unable to find employment, though the wages are not higher than in other places, nor consequently the mode of the life differently. The people of Wexford county generally are said to be a money-getting people; and in the system which prevails extensively with regard to marriages among the rural population, there is considerable evidence of this. The disposal of farmers' daughters is matter of regular traffic, acre for acre, or pound for pound; and so great is the difficulty of marrying girls without portions, that it is no unusual thing to find families, who are in comfortable circumstances, living as poorly as the common labourer, or the rack-rented tenant of a few acres, in order that they may save a few hundreds for turning off their girls."

The farms of the baronies of Forth and Bargie vary in extent from 3 to 100 Irish acres; but most range between 7 and 10 acres, and few exceed 20 acres. Most of the fields comprise less area than three-fourths of an acre. Most of the fences are narrow dikes upon high banks, planted with two or three rows of furze. The manures used are farm-yard gatherings, marl, lime, sea-weed, and sea-sand. The produce in most districts is great, and on the sea-board munificent. Wheat, barley, oats, beans, potatoes, and clover, are the usual crops; and hemp and flax are grown occasionally, and in small patches.

Wheat yields, per Irish acre, from 6 to 10 barrels, of 20 stones,—each stone 14 lbs.; barley, from 12 to 20 barrels, of 16 stones; beans, from 10 to 12 barrels, of 20 stones; and potatoes, from 80 to 120 barrels, of 20 stones. The prevailing rotation is, first, wheat upon either lea or stubble land, marled at the rate of 5,000 cwts. per acre; second, either barley or oats, but generally the former; third, either drilled potatoes upon farm-yard manure, or broadcast beans upon a compost of equal proportions of earth and sea-sand, or of earth and dung, or of earth and sea-weed, or of earth, dung, sea-weed, and sea-sand; fourth, barley with either red clover alone, or with red clover and rye-grass; fifth, the clover fed off or mowed,—the seed being frequently saved from the second growth; lastly—and at the same time the commencing crop of a new series—wheat upon the clover lea, relied upon as the surest crop of the rotation. "In some cases" they feed off the clover very early, and marl the lea previously to sowing the wheat, but often sow it without marl, and apply dung to the wheat stubble for drilled potatoes, or manure it with a compost for beans, and so proceed to barley and clover again. Rye-grass is in general sown with the clover, and is usually mown the following season; in very few instances it is kept for the second year, but is broken up in the foregoing rotation. When an old lea of good quality occurs, wheat is sown upon it, once ploughed, harrowed in, and shovelled. Barley is also sometimes, but rarely, taken in this way. In general, nothing can be done without manure, and some of the farmers are even profuse in the application of it. There are some instances of good dairy management, on a scale of from 10 to 24 cows; very few of the latter extent. The improved barrel-churn is made use of, which saves time and labour. The milk is set for only two days, and none but the cream is churned. The butter produced in this way is highly prized, and the skimmed milk is converted to making a palatable, but not very rich, cheese, which sells at 3½d. per pound. Very few indifferent crops of any kind are to be met with. Oats seem to be the worst. They do not rely on this crop to pay the rent, but sow it merely for their horses, and on the worst part of the ground. In certain farms remarkable for producing wheat, that is made the staple grain; but, in general, barley is their favourite and money-making crop, reaping, as they do, from 12 to 15 barrels per acre, and on highly cultivated farms, or in districts near the sea, seldom less than 20 barrels per acre, and occasionally 25 barrels. Their method of putting in the seed is peculiar. They sow one barrel (of 16 stone) under the plough, and a second barrel upon the surface, covering it with the harrow, thereby taking their chance of the upper or lower stratum of seed, or of both, as the soil and season may happen to turn out. It would seem that a crop thus sown could not come up evenly or regularly; but this does not appear to be the case. The heavy barley (previously to shooting into ear) exhibits a surface perfectly level, and apparently solid, from the intense thickness of the crop; and yet sowing under the plough is very unusual elsewhere in a strong and retentive clay. Indeed, that barley should have become the chief crop in such a soil, which is in general considered inimical to its culture, is surprising, yet it succeeds admirably, and may furnish an useful hint to countries similarly circumstanced. One advantage in the barley crop is the late season for sowing it, whereby time is gained to get rid of the superabundant moisture of the winter, and to bring the ground into proper tilth, which is here particularly attended to, the roller being in some instances made use of, but in all, the mell or pounder for breaking the balls or clods of hardened clay. The culture of barley in these baronies owes much of its excellence to the preceding bean crop, which, being sown early and reaped late, interposes its shade to prevent the baking influence of the summer's sun, and to preserve the soil in a certain degree of friability favourable to the production of this grain. In their management of bean husbandry, there are obvious blemishes; but all remonstrance is silenced by the produce, twenty barrels an acre being not unusual, when the crop hits—seldom less than ten. Casualties will sometimes occur, and an occasional blast will disappoint; therefore the farmer relies not upon this crop, but on the following one of barley, for his rent; but when it succeeds, which it does three times out of four, none can pay better, even at a middle price, and at a middle produce. Suppose 15 barrels an acre, at 30s. a-barrel, £22 10s. per acre. The price varies in the market at Wexford from 17s. to 40s. a-barrel. They sow their beans universally broadcast. This system is defended on the principle of the soil being retentive, which they conceive would not be in sufficient order to admit the plough as often as might be necessary; whereas by sowing about Christmas (which is the habit), and trenching up the beds (from 3 to 6 feet wide), no further operation is necessary till they come to pull and harvest the crop. Notwithstanding the profusion of seed made use of in the former cases, an economy too rigid is observed with respect to clover, 18 lb. being the highest, but, almost universally, 14 lb. allowed to the acre. That a common farmer, purchasing expensive seed, should limit his quantity as much as possible, would not surprise; but here, for the most part, he saves his own cloverseed, which would entitle him to sow it liberally. The method by which they save cloverseed is very simple, and has nothing in it of that supposed difficulty which deters the farmer from attempting it, and forces him to relinquish the advantage of this valuable rotation crop, or to procure it by means of foreign seed, at considerable expense. It is merely this. They let the first growth of the clover be fed off, at an early season, in general by the middle of May. The second growth is suffered to run to seed. When fully ripe, particular attention is paid to the careful saving of the hay, which, when perfectly dry, is immediately well thrashed, whereby the ripest of the seed is shaken from the hulls; and the hulls or heads being thus separated from the stalks, and put through the stones of a common oat-mill, all the remaining seed is thereby extracted. Some farmers merely thrash for the prime grain, and sow the hulls under the harrow; nor are they even thus disappointed in the crop. This is a feature in the rural economy of these baronies well worthy of imitation. It is the basis of a rotation system, which would be generally adopted but for the cost of cloverseed."

"Happily," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall in their recent work on Ireland, "Wexford is, in one respect, highly privileged—few of its landed proprietors are absentees. There are no huge estates, over which several agents must of necessity be placed; and as very few of its gentry have involved properties, it follows, as matter of course, that the tenants are in easy circumstances, and are neither rack-rented nor pressed for sudden payments. A list of the good landlords of the county of Wexford would occupy several pages. Many of them have successfully laboured to introduce improvements among the people. A few of them we may not omit to notice:—Courtown, the seat of the Earl of Courtown, is a model of excellent management. Two of the highest improvements in agriculture were first introduced into Ireland under the patriotic directions of the Earl of Courtown. Arthur Young tells us, in his tour in 1778, that the first field of turnips he saw in Ireland was here; and the present peer, whose unceasing care and attention to everything that may be conducive to the prosperity of those around him, is the admiration of all who witness it, has recently introduced the making and burning of DRAINING TILES, that sine qua non in a wet climate, having brought over an experienced kiln-burner from Staffordshire to superintend the works. The new harbour formed at Courtown is also a work of patriotism and humanity. The evergreens at Courtown are remarkable for their enormous size and luxuriance; the extent of garden and ornamented ground is very large, near 40 acres; there is a fine avenue of limes, run up to a great height, the interior of which perfectly represents the aisle of a Gothic cathedral. The Ounavarra meanders through a magnificent glen of two miles in length, the banks of which are clothed with enormous beech, and other fine timber. Of Wells, the seat of Robert Doyne, Esq., the Rev. Mr. Hickey, in his 'Hints to Small Farmers,' thus speaks:—"The extensive demesne exhibits the most perfect system of agriculture on a large scale; the fields, 20 acres in extent, are laid out with mathematical precision; all the fences are preserved and trimmed with English exactness, and the implements of husbandry, cattle, &c., &c., are of the best description." It may be added, that the whole seat has more the character of an ancient English residence than any perhaps in Ireland. The mansion is of red brick, faced with white granite in the rich Tudor style; the hall, staircase, lobbies, and principal apartments wainscoted with old carved oak. Castle Boro, the seat of Lord Carew, was unhappily destroyed by fire about a year ago; but it is rebuilding in a style worthy of the taste and magnificence of its noble proprietor, who deservedly ranks high among the liberal and improving landlords of Ireland. Of Bannow, the estate of Thomas Boyse, Esq., we have spoken elsewhere. There is nothing superior to it in the kingdom. His tenants are, with scarcely an exception, 'men of property.' Wilton, the seat of the late — Alcock, Esq. (the heir is a minor), is one of the most perfect and beautiful examples of a modern castle to be found in the country. In short, there is no district in Wexford that does not exhibit proof of the advantages to be derived from the personal care of resident proprietors."

In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county 5,219 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 6,313 of from 5 to 15 acres, 4,151 of from 15 to 20 acres, and 2,457 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the civic districts of the county, 174 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 90 of from 5 to 15 acres, 14 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 10 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year there were in the entire county 11,903 male farmers, 1,103 female farmers, 27,404 male servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 1,555 male servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 6,225 female servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 512 female servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 304 ploughmen, 193 gardeners, 3 graziers, 83 male herds above 15 years of age, 56 male herds below 15 years of age, 4 female herds above 15 years of age, 7 female herds below 15 years of age, 66 male care-takers, 12 female care-takers, 3 land-agents, 163 land-stewards, 19 gamekeepers, 26 male dairy-keepers, and 91 female dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—In 1807, when Mr. Fraser published his Statistical Survey of the County of Wexford, the condition of live stock throughout the county was very bad. The breeds of black cattle, in particular, were miserably deficient; and though some good cattle of approved breeds had at various periods been introduced by various gentlemen from England, they were not cultivated, but were permitted speedily to die out. The prevailing breed of sheep were of nearly the worst possible kind, long-legged, narrow-backed, large-headed, large-boned, and as wild as deer; yet, in many parts of the county, the new Leicester breed had, during a few years, begun to appear. The prevailing breed of swine were long-legged, razor-backed, large-boned, miserable looking animals, which no quantity of food, even for 3 or 4 years, could fatten to more than 3 cwt.; yet the improved breed of Leicester pigs had recently been introduced to many estates. The poultry of the county was excellent, and was reared in vast quantities, and of nearly every description, by the farmers and even by the cottiers.—In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 776 horses and mules, 859 asses, 1,362 cattle, 2,317 sheep, 9,446 pigs, and 45,824 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 2,179 horses and mules, 537 asses, 2,346 cattle, 3,281 sheep, 6,113 pigs, and 30,159 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 7,908 horses and mules, 362 asses, 9,590 cattle, 11,289 sheep, 15,716 pigs, and 60,038 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 8,316 horses and mules, 456 asses, 15,756 cattle, 15,144 sheep, 20,495 pigs, and 61,709 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 8,895 horses and mules, 677 asses, 26,395 cattle, 33,639 sheep, 19,584 pigs, and 54,134 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 27,474 horses and mules, £219,792; 2,891 asses, £2,891; 55,449 cattle, £300,419; 65,670 sheep, £72,237; 71,354 pigs, £89,192; and 251,929 poultry, £6,298. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £750,829. In the same year there were within the civic districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 439 horses and mules, 72 asses, 265 cattle, 207 sheep, 1,761 pigs, and 3,023 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 87 horses and mules, 8 asses, 213 cattle, 14 sheep, 98 pigs, and 315 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 75 horses and mules, 7 asses, 231 cattle, 86 sheep, 65 pigs, and 248 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 21 horses and mules, 1 ass, 112 cattle, 42 sheep, 12 pigs, and 38 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 35 horses and mules, 3 asses, 197 cattle, 536 sheep, 18 pigs, and 32 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 657 horses and mules, £5,256; 91 asses, £91; 1,018 cattle, £6,617; 885 sheep, £974; 1,954 pigs, £2,442; and 3,656 poultry, £91. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £15,471.

Woods.—In 1841, the plantations within the county consisted of 1,541 continuous acres and 50,580 detached trees of oak, 157 continuous acres and 340,786 detached trees of ash, 257 continuous acres and 107,843 detached trees of elm, 70 continuous acres and 209,043 detached trees of beech, 1,404 continuous acres and 290,693 detached trees of fir, 9,845 continuous acres and 575,237 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 1,051 continuous acres and 10,707 detached trees of orchards; in all, 14,325 continuous acres and 1,602,892 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 10,018 acres, and making with the former a grand total of 24,342 acres of plantations. Of the continuous woods, 1,337 acres of oak, 62 of ash, 3 of elm, 8 of beech, 34 of fir, 3,142 of mixed plantations, and 134 of orchards, were planted previous to 1791; 11 acres of oak, 22 of ash, 23 of beech, 41 of fir, 431 of mixed plantations, and 105 of orchards, were planted between 1791 and 1800; 25 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 3 of elm, 22 of beech, 96 of fir, 1,332 of mixed plantations, and 133 of orchards, were planted between 1801 and 1810; 80 acres of oak, 43 of ash, 4 of elm, 332 of fir, 1,307 of mixed plantations, and 206 of orchards, were planted between 1811 and 1820; 33 acres of oak, 15 of ash, 3 of elm, 2 of beech, 508 of fir, 1,554 of mixed plantations, and 276 of orchards, were planted between 1821 and 1830; and 16 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 2 of elm, 21 of beech, 307 of fir, 2,665 of mixed plantations, and 197 of orchards, were planted between 1831 and 1840.—The principal localities of the woods are Pilltown-house, Tintern-abbey, and Killowen-house, in the barony of Shelburne; Strokestown, Oakland, Maryville, Talbot-hall, Armistown, Carnahouse, Spring-park, Ballinvegge, Robinstown, Pallace, Coolbawn, Castle-Boro, Wilton, Woodbrook, Ballyhighland, Barmount, Sweetfarm, Jamestown, Verona, Grange, Clonmore, and Templeshealin, in the barony of Bantry; Graigue, Kiltara, Barrystown, Harristown, and Ballycross, in the barony of Bargie; Great Clonarl, Cribstown, Rathaspeck, Fairfield, Johnston-castle, and Ballycogly, in the barony of Forth; Rosegarland, Rochestown, Harperstown, Horetown, Coolcliff, Hilltown, Dalton, Raheenduff, Long-Graigue, Carrickbryn, Newbawn, Abbeyville, Scullabogue, Clover-valley, Bricketstown, Killuran, Brookhill, Polehore, and Cullentra, in the barony of West Shelmaher; Saunderscourt, Killowen, Perey-lodge, Newtown, Moate-park, Kyle, Lonsdale, Whitefort, Artramon, St. Edmonds, Arran, and Sudley, in the barony of East Shelmaher; Killoughrim-wood, Monart, Duffry-hall, Solsborough, Clone-wood, Kilbora-wood, Coolpuck-wood, Coolrook-wood, Clobemon-hall, Willmount, Brown-park, Tombrick-wood, Corry-wood, Clohamon, Ryland-wood, Millview, Pamolin-park, Beaufield, Prospect, Ramsford, Drumderry, Newlands, Charlesfort, St. Elan's, Dunishal, and Ballyellis, in the barony of Scarewalsh; Ballinkille, Edermine, Salville, Annfield, Upton, Wells, Peppard's-castle, Merriion-lodge, Ballinastud, Ellendale, Ballycoursey, Anghnagally, and Rosgrove, in the barony of Ballaghkeen; and Mount-George, Courtown, Ballygrove, Barnadown, Woodlands, Millmount, Ramsgate, Knockmullin, Montague, Ballywalter, Moneylawn, Ballinlay, Ballinclare, Melop-hall, Mount-Norris, Hollyfort, Farnhill, Carriekbeg, Glandoran, Kilnabue, Ballingarry, Mount-Nebo, Ballinestragh, Rivulet, Ahare, Borleigh, Hacketstown, Hyde-park, Castletown, Fort-mount, St. Austins, Ballyfad, and Wingfield, in the barony of Gorey.

Manufactures and Trade.—The commerce of probably three-fourths of the county is identical with that of the port of Wexford; and the commerce of the remainder may be estimated by assigning to it a proportion of the exports and imports of New Ross and Waterford. The classification and comparative amount of trades and manufactures may be seen from the following digest of the statistics of personal industry—exclusive of agriculture and the professions—as exhibited in the Census of 1841:—Millers, 214; maltsters, 30; brewers, 4; distiller, 1; bakers, 236; confectioners, 26; saltsters, 3; tobacco-twisters, 17; fishmongers, 9; egg-dealers, 39; fruiterers, 20; cattle-dealers, 48; horse-dealers, 5; pig-jobbers, 34; corn-dealers, 35; seedsmen, 2; flour-merchant, 1; cheesemonger, 1; huxters and provision dealers, 221; butchers, 203; poultryers, 7; victuallers, 96; grocers, 68; tobacconists, 12; wine-merchants, 4; flax-dressers, 34; carders, 80; spinners of flax, 1,376; spinners of cotton,

Fairs.—The following are the principal fairs held within the county of Wexford:—Banoge, June 22; Ballyeamon, Feb. 2, April 24, July 25, Sept. 21, and Nov. 30; Ballyhack, March 25, May 25, June 29, July 25, Aug. 24, and Sept. 29; Blackwater, March 25, June 15, Aug. 10, and Nov. 11; Broadway, May 26, and Oct. 18; Cunolin, Feb. 9, April 4, June 9, Aug. 9, Sept. 21, and Nov. 9; Castle-bridge, Feb. 19, April 11, May 16, June 13, Aug. 8, Sept. 26, Nov. 18, and Dec. 20; Clonroche, Jan. 25, Feb. 13, March 13, April 19, May 15, July 14, Sept. 24, Oct. 24, Nov. 24, and Dec. 26; Cohammon, June 11; Coolgreany, Jan. 24, March 2, May 10, June 12, Aug. 3, Oct. 16, and Nov. 11; Croshue, Jan. 1; Enniscorthy, Jan. 21, Feb. 21, March 21, April 25, May 10, June 7, July 5, Aug. 1 and 26, Sept. 19, Oct. 10, Nov. 15, and Dec. 21; Ferns, Aug. 15, Sept. 4, Oct. 29, Nov. 11, and Dec. 27; Gorey, Jan. 2, Feb. 25, March 11, April 15, May 6, June 1, July 10, Aug. 12 and 31, Sept. 30, Oct. 27 and Nov. 25; Harrow, June 24; Kilmuckridge, June 5, Sept. 8, and Dec. 8; Killinick, April 5 and 17, Sept. 21, and Nov. 30; Lady's Island, Aug. 15, and Sept. 8; Moerury, June 14, and Nov. 7; Mmamullin, March 17, and Dec. 17; Moneyhore, Feb. 24, March 25, May 26, July 18, Oct. 2, and Dec. 6; Nash, June 24, Aug. 15, and Nov. 20; Newtownbarry, Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 1, April 29, May 23, June 13, July 22, Aug. 20, Sept. 26, Oct. 15, Nov. 4, and Dec. 14; New Ross, Jan. 10, Feb. 10, March 17, Easter Monday, May 3, Whit-Monday, July 10, Aug. 10, Sept. 10, Oct. 18, Nov. 10, and Dec. 8; Oulart, Jan. 8, Feb. 28, April 17, May 25, and Sept. 29; Oylegate, March 5, May 21, Aug. 15, and Dec. 10; Ragorey, May 25, and Oct. 28; Ramsgrange, March 17, May 1, Nov. 1, and Dec. 21; Scar, April 23, June 11, Aug. 3, and Nov. 5; Scarewalsh, Aug. 16; Taghmon, Jan. 2 and 16, Feb. 1 and 10, March 1 and 18, April 3 and 15, May 2 and 28, June 20, July 16, Aug. 2, Sept. 7, Oct. 1 and 21, Nov. 4, and Dec. 1; Tombagard, July 20; Tintern, May 12, and Nov. 11; and Wexford, Feb. 25, March 17, May 1, June 3 and 29, Aug. 24, Sept. 29, Nov. 1, and Dec. 8.

Social Condition.—“On crossing the Barrow from the county of Carlow,” remarks Mr. Wakefield, “a striking difference is observable in the manners and customs of the people; on the eastern bank, English is spoken, and Irish scarcely known; a little way interior, it is treated with contempt. The peasantry near the Slaney are a fine race of people, and in a state of improvement. They dress in a superior manner, and the muslin gowns and caps of the women are gratifying to the eye of an Englishman. Here the females have a proper idea of their own consequence in society, and pay more attention to personal cleanliness and neatness than in many other parts of Ireland. This taste is attended with many good consequences, and ought to be encouraged. To those who have never been in a Catholic country, the assembling of the Wexford and Wicklow peasantry on a Sunday afternoon, to amuse themselves with dancing and other recreations, will appear extraordinary. They dress in their gayest attire, and cheerfulness and good humour are in their looks; on such occasions, care is cast aside, and those who delight to see others happy will be highly gratified in travelling through these counties. The labourers are indolent, and it is not without difficulty that they are compelled to perform the business of their employers. The dress of the poor is different to that in some other parts of Ireland. The coat is long, and fits close to the body. In Munster, coats of this kind are uncommon; the loose trusty is universal. So fond are these people of a profusion of clothes, that a man may be seen, like the gravedigger in Hamlet, with half-a-dozen of waistcoats on in the height of summer, and over these is one trusty on his back, while another hangs over his shoulders. It is worthy of remark, that the humbler classes of the Irish display a wonderful hardihood on many occasions, and seem to care very little about wounds. The Wexford peasants have a custom, when at meals, to sit with their doors open, which is an invitation to those who are passing to enter and partake of their homely fare. So innate is their hospitality, that the stranger is always welcome, and I know no trait in the Irish character which is more generally displayed. This benevolent disposition pervades all ranks; in some it is not repressed even by wretchedness and poverty, which are calculated to destroy the generous feelings of the breast. In some parts of Wexford, the people are not inclined to enter into the army. In the barony of Forth, no one has enlisted during the last 87 years. Many, however, are sailors, and there is scarcely a family that has not one of its members absent at sea. In this barony, the women are handsome, and attend to domestic cleanliness. On Saturday they carry tables, chairs, and other furniture, to the nearest ditch or pond, where they are scoured and washed. It is much to be wished that this example were generally followed. The peasantry in this county appear better than any I ever saw in the south. They are not half naked, as in other parts, and all wear stockings and shoes. The women are commonly dressed in long blue coats, with straw bonnets, and sometimes with black worsted stockings. Mantua-makers are employed, and some purchase muslins. According to every account which I could procure, the superior condition of the people in this district arises from the land not being so much divided as in other parts of Ireland. The baronies of Bargie and Forth are peopled by a distinct race, who are said to be descended from the adventurers who accompanied Strongbow to Ireland. Their origin is pointed out by their language, and by their manners and habits, which bear a strong resemblance to those of their Saxon forefathers. The peculiar customs and singular social condition of the baronies of Bargie and Forth, are noticed in the article BARGIE: which see.

Fisheries.—A fishing-ground, in 15 fathoms of water, between Slade and the Saltees, about a league from the shore, abounds in cod, ling, hake, gurnet, whiting, and other fish. A cod bank, in 24 fathoms of water, 5 leagues to the south-south-east, off the same part of the coast as the preceding, abounds in cod, and yields also large quantities of cod, ling, hake, gurnet, and whiting. The Nymph bank, situated about 15 miles south-west of the coast between Templetown Cove and Bannow ferry, is a valuable fishing-ground; but none of the fishing-boats of the district are of sufficient capacity to warrant the fishermen to venture beyond the range of Hook Head and the Saltees. The fishing-grounds nearest the pier of Kilmore, lie about 2 leagues south of the pier, extend about 3 leagues round the Saltees, and yield cod, ling, pollock, gurnet, turbot, mackerel, herrings, and pilchards. A fishing-bank $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the Bar of Lough, is remarkable for pollock and lobsters; and another lying 3 miles from the same place, and bearing south-east to south-south-west, is remarkable for cod, ling, conger, and bream. A bank, about a mile in breadth, in from 10 to 25 fathoms of water, upwards of 2 miles in length, within a mile of the shore, and with its east end situated south-south-east of Carnmore Point, yields bream from June to September. Various fishing-grounds of considerable value lie between 1 mile and 10 miles from Ballygeary,—particularly the New Bank and New Ground, remarkable for cod; Shoal-Rock, for cod and bream; Plough-Rock, for pollock; Sheer, for cod, ling, and bream; the Mead of Tuscar, for a profusion of pollock; and the Mead, about 2 miles outside of Tuscar, for cod, ling, turbot, brit, conger, and skad. Foul ground, extending along most of the coast from Bannow to Greenore Point, is remarkable for lobsters and for all kinds of fish taken with lines; and good trawling-ground extends from Greenore Point to Blackwater Head, comprising both the south and the north bays of Wexford. Fishing-grounds, in from 2 to 18 fathoms of water, situated about 9 miles from the shore, and extending along most of the east coast, abound in trawl-fish, cod, and herrings. Glassgorran Bank, 3 miles from Ballymoney, 4 miles in length, bearing north-east and south-west, in from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 7 fathoms of water, is remarkable for herrings.—The principal fishing-harbours, whether bays, creeks, or mere landing-places, and whether with or without piers, are at Duncannon, Arthurstown, Fethard, Slade, Kilmore, Carnagh, Ballygeary, Wexford Harbour, Coortown, and Poulduff.—New Ross is well supplied with salmon, herrings, small eels, and oysters; but is very badly supplied with any other kinds of fish. At Wexford, the supply of haddock, turbot, brit, and mackerel, is very scarce; of hake, rather scarce; of plaice, very abundant, but inferior in quality; of cod, sole, mullet, gurnet, whiting, and herrings, occasionally abundant; of oysters, abundant; of eels, tolerably fair; and of salmon and lobsters, limited. Some of the salted herrings sold at New Ross are cured at Wexford, and some in Scotland; and most of those sold at Wexford are cured in Ireland, and some in Scotland and in the Isle of Man.—The coast-guard stations of the county, together with the number of fishermen in their respective districts in 1836, are Arthurstown, 161; Fethard, 140; Kilmore, 384; Bar of Lough, 12; Carnmore, 90; Ballygeary, 80; Roselare, 430; Currysloe, 320; Blackwater, 412; Cahore, 217; Glynn, 286; Ballymoney, 186; and Kilmichael, 138.

Communications.—The Barrow navigation is available to the southern part of the western side of the county; and the Slaney navigation is available to the districts around Enniscorthy, and thence down the valley of the Slaney to the sea. A proposed railway, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, is designed to connect the town of Wexford with the Dublin and Kilkenny railway, in the immediate vicinity of Carlow, and to pass up the valley of the Slaney by way of Enniscorthy and Newtown-Barry. Another and extensive system of railway has recently been projected, to connect Wexford on the one hand with Wicklow and Dublin, and on the other hand with New Ross, Waterford, Clonmel, Limerick, Cork, and Valentia; and this, if executed, will place the southern counties of Ireland in easy communication, by Wexford, with the Irish Wales railway,—the distance between Fishguard and Wexford being short, and favourable as to tides and prevailing winds. The principal roads of the county are the Wexford and Dublin mail-road, by way of Enniscorthy, Ferns, Camolin, and Gorey; the eastern post-road from Wexford to Dublin, by way of Oulart; the western post-road from Wexford to Dublin, by way of Newtown-Barry; the Wexford and Waterford mail-road, by way of Taghmon and New Ross; the New Ross and Fethard mail-road, by way of Arthurstown; and the new road from New Ross to Dublin, by way of Newtown-Barry. At the close of 1841, the county surveyor had under his charge 1,544 miles of road.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Wexford is divided into the baronies of Gorey, in the north-east; Ballaghkeen, in the middle of the east; Forth, in the south-east; Bargie, in the middle of the south; Shelburne, in the south-west; Bantry, in the middle of the west; Scarewalsh, in the north-west; West Shelmalier, in the interior, north of Bargie and south of Scarewalsh; and East Shelmalier, in the interior, south-west of Ballaghkeen and north-east of West Shelmalier. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 3 townlands of the parish of Kilnebeg and 1 townland of the parish of Rosminoge from the barony of Scarewalsh to that of Gorey,—pop., in 1841, 284; two townlands of the parish of Monanolin from the barony of Ballaghkeen to that of Gorey,—pop. 177; 1 townland of the parish of Ferns from the barony of Gorey to that of Scarewalsh,—pop. 105. The barony of Gorey, as at present constituted, contains 6 whole parishes, and part of 12 other parishes; Ballaghkeen contains 16 whole parishes, and part of 9 other parishes; Forth contains 32 whole parishes; Bargie contains 12 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Shelburne contains 13 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Bantry contains 16 whole parishes, and part of 6 other parishes;

Scarewalsh contains 9 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; West Shelmalier contains 12 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; and East Shelmalier contains 5 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes. The towns and principal villages are Ballycauew, Coolcraney, and part of Gorey, in the barony of Gorey; Riverchapel, Ballaghkeen, Ballinamuddagh, Blackwater, Oilgate, Ford, Oulart, and parts of Gorey and Enniscorthy, in the barony of Ballaghkeen; Wexford and Broadway, in the barony of Forth; Tullycanna, Carrick, Duncormack, and Kilmore, in the barony of Bargie; Fethard, Churchtown, Slade, Arthurstown, Ballyhack, Duncannon, Ramsgrange, and Saltmills, in the barony of Shelburne; New Ross, Clonroche, and Maudlins, in the barony of Bantry; Ferns, Newtown-Barry, Cloghannon, Watchhouse, Camolin, and part of Enniscorthy, in the barony of Scarewalsh; Taghmon and Foxmills, in the barony of West Shelmalier; and Castle-bridge, in the barony of East Shelmalier.—Dr. Beaufort, estimating the total of parishes and churches within the county at respectively 142 and 42, assigns 2 parishes and 1 church to the diocese of Dublin, and all the other parishes and churches to the diocese of Ferns.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county of Wexford was 380, of scholars 18,769, of male scholars 10,951, of female scholars 7,233, of scholars whose sex was not specified 585, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,908, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 1, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 29, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 15,641, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 103; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 380, of scholars 19,308, of male scholars 11,546, of female scholars 7,592, of scholars whose sex was not specified 230, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,912, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 7, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 40, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 16,351, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 58. The statistics of educational and ecclesiastical matters for 1834 are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be closely estimated for Wexford by reference to the article FERNS: which see. At the close of 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 64 schools, conducted by 50 male and 22 female teachers, attended by 4,843 male and 3,625 female scholars, and aided, during the year, with £654 3s. 4d. in salaries, £59 in free stock, and £111 4s. 8d. in school-requisites at half-price.—During 1843, the number of persons committed on charges of felony was 313; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 239; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 72. Of the persons committed on charges of felony, 74 were charged with offences against the person, 15 with offences against property committed with violence, 152 with offences against property committed without violence, 1 with a malicious offence against property, and 73 with offences not included in these categories; 14 were sentenced to transportation, 161 were sentenced to imprisonment, 12 were sentenced to pay fines, 1 was discharged on sureties, 1 received a respite of sentence, 1 was acquitted as insane, 62 were found not guilty on trial, 44 had no bill found against them, and 19 were not prosecuted. On Jan. 1, 1844, the constabulary force consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 4 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 8 second-rate head-constables, 44 constables, 202 first-rate sub-constables, 13 second-rate sub-constables, and 9 mounted police; and the expense of maintaining that force during 1843 was £12,335 16s. 11½d. The head-quarters of the constabulary are at Wexford; and the head-quarters of the 7 districts and 45 stations into which they are distributed, are at Wexford, Arthurstown, Taghmon, Gorey, Oulart, New Ross, and Enniscorthy. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Wexford. A stipendiary magistrate is resident at Enniscorthy. The county gaol is at Wexford; and bridewells are at Gorey, Enniscorthy, and New Ross. The assizes are held at Wexford; quarter-sessions at Wexford, Gorey, Enniscorthy, and New Ross; and petty-sessions at Bailestown, Clonroche, Duncormack, Enniscorthy, Gorey, Killinick, New Ross, Newtown-Barry, Oulart, Taghmon, and Wexford. Savings' banks are at Wexford and Gorey; and loan funds at Wexford, Gorey, New Ross, Boro, Cloghannon, Clonroche, Enniscorthy, Kilpatrick, Taghmon, and Templeudigan. The district lunatic asylum, to which the county is entitled to send 44 patients, is at Carlow; the county infirmary is at Wexford; workhouses are at Wexford, Enniscorthy, Gorey, and New Ross; fever-hospitals are at Arthurstown, Enniscorthy, Gorey, New Ross, Newtown-Barry, Oulart, and Wexford; and dispensaries are at Arthurstown, Bannow, Bridgetown, Broadway, Camolin, Castle-bridge, Clongeen, Clonroche, Coolraney, Cornwall, Enniscorthy, Ferns, Fethard, Foulke's Mills, Gorey, Killenagh, New Ross, Newtown-Barry, Old Ross, Oulart, and Taghmon. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £443,263; and the amount of grand jury presentments, in 1842, was £41,263. The number of houses valued for the poor-rate is £30,371; and of these, 14,995 are valued under £5,—5,091, under £10,—3,040, under £15,—1,922, under £20,—1,353, under £25,—920, under £30,—1,084, under £40,—589, under £50,—and 1,377, at and above £50. The county sent no fewer than 18 members to the Irish parliament; or two from the county at large, and two from each of the boroughs of Wexford, Enniscorthy, Gorey, New Ross, Fethard, Bannow, Clonmines, and Taghmon; but it sends only 4 to the imperial parliament, or two from the county at large, one from the borough of Wexford, and one from the borough of New Ross. Constituency of the county at large, in 1841, 1,739; of whom 256 were £50 freeholders, 105 were £20 freeholders, 1,229 were £10 freeholders, 23 were £20 rent-chargers, 8 were £20 leaseholders, and 118 were £10 leaseholders.

Antiquities.—Numerous remains of ecclesiastical and military structures occur throughout the county of Wexford, particularly on the sea-board; and some of the latter class are extremely curious, on account of their presenting the earliest examples of the castellated buildings erected by the Anglo-Normans in Ireland. Rathes are numerous; but, in most instances, small. Not a vestige exists of any pillar-tower. The most interesting ruins and fragments, whether for peculiarity of character or artistic excellence of feature, are the abbey of Dunbrody, the abbey of New Ross, the tower of Hook, the abbey of Tintern, the Seven Castles of Clonmines, the church and other vestiges of Bannow, the fifty-nine extant old castles of the baronies of Forth and Bargie, the abbey of Selsker, the castle of Carrick, and the abbey and castle of Ferns. "The county of Wexford," remarks a writer in the Irish Penny Magazine, "is classic ground to the readers of Irish history. On every hand are to be seen those strongholds of other days, built by the first English adventurers, the better to shelter themselves against the sudden and impetuous attacks of the native chieftains, who seldom gave much rest to their strange invaders. Though grey with the hoar of seven centuries, during a long period of which they had been exposed to 'the war of elements,' unprepared and unprotected, it is surprising to see how perfect most of those structures seem. In some of them that I have examined, the walls appeared to be nearly as sound as if built but a few years, giving another proof, if any proof were wanting, of the extraordinary durability of Gothic masonry. But they are now beginning fast to disappear; some being pulled down for their materials,—others deprived of their fairest ornaments to help the construction of buildings in the neighbourhood; and it is not anticipating too much to say, that perhaps, in the course of forty or fifty years, from the emigration of their descendants, and the dilapidation of their castles, every vestige of the chivalrous and gallant Normans will have disappeared from the county of Wexford."

—The old monastic institutions within the county, whether certain or doubtful, and whether surviving in ruin or totally extinct, were six abbeys of regular Augustinian canons, at Drum-Chooin-Cellaigh, Camross, Maghere - Nuidhe, Fien-Magh, Disart-Cheanan, and Ross-MacTreom, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Abban; a seventh abbey of the same order, at Achadalla, alleged to have been founded in the 5th century by St. Finian; an eighth abbey of the same order, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Munnu; a ninth abbey of the same order, on Beg-Erin, in Wexford Harbour, alleged to have been founded in the 5th century by St. Ibar; a tenth abbey of the same order at Cluin-More, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Edon or Maedoc; an eleventh abbey of the same order at Seanbotha, alleged to have been patronized in the 6th century by Colman O'Fiachrach; a twelfth abbey of the same order at Inver-Dagan, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Dagan; a thirteenth abbey of the same order at Selsker, founded in the 12th century either by the Osmen or by the family of Paroches, and granted, at the general dissolution, to John Parker; a fourteenth abbey of the same order at Dune, founded before the Anglo-Norman invasion by the Osmen; a fifteenth abbey of the same order at Ferns, founded about the year 1158, by Dermot MacMurrough, king of Leinster, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir K. Masterson; a sixteenth abbey of the same order at Selsker, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Edan, Edon, or Maedoc, and to have been made the seat of the diocese of Ferns; an establishment of Knights-Hospitalers, at Wexford, founded in the 12th century, by William Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke, and possessing the rank of the grand commandery of the order in Ireland, up to the period when they acquired the property of the Knights-Templars; a second establishment of Knights-Hospitalers, at Kilelogan, founded in the thirteenth century, by the O'Mores, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir Adam Loftus; a third establishment of Knights-Hospitalers, at Ballyheuk, near and subordinate to Kilelogan, granted, at the general dissolution, to William Keating; a Benedictine abbey, designated De Vividi Rupe, at Glasscarrick, founded in the 14th century by Griffith Conden, David Roche, and others, and partly granted, at the general dissolution, to Richard, First Earl of Cork; a Cistercian abbey at Dunbrody, founded in 1182, by Henry de Montemarisco, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir Osh Itchingham; a second Cistercian abbey at Tintern, founded in 1200, by William Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Adam Colclough; a monastery of friars minors at Wexford, founded in the 13th century, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Paul Turner and James Devereux; a second monastery of friars minors at Ross, founded in the 13th century by Sir John Devereux, and granted, at the general dissolution, to the Earl of Ormond; an Observant friary, at Enniscorthy, founded in 1400, by Donald Fuscus Cavanagh, and granted, at the general dissolution, to John Travers; an Augustinian friary at Clonin, founded by the Cavanaghs, and granted, at the general dissolution, to John Parker; a second Augustinian friary at Ross, founded in the 14th century, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Richard Butler; and a Carmelite friary, at Little Horton, founded in the 14th century by the family of Furlongs, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Sir John Delvies.

History.—The Danes, previous to the Anglo-Norman period, held similar possession of the county of Wexford, to that which they held of the counties of Waterford and Dublin. Wexford Harbour was one of the four principal stations which the Danes used for their fleets, and one of the fiords or havens to which they gave permanent designations. The name Wexford is thus a corruption of the Danish Wess-Fiord, signifying West-Haven. The little adventurous advanced body of the army of the Anglo-Norman invasion, under Robert Fitzstephen, Maurice Fitzgerald, and Hugh de Montmorency, landed at Bagenbon-Head near the south-western extremity of the county; they performed, in the vicinity of the headland, the first move in the great work of conquering Ireland; and they speedily afterwards took possession of the town of Wexford, and of most of the territory which now constitutes the county. See BAGENBON and WATERFORD. Dermot MacMurrough, king of Leinster, who invited and aided the Anglo-Norman invasion, had previously the seat of his court and government at FERNS; which see. The barony of Burgie was granted by MacMurrough to Hugh de Montmorency; and the barony of Forth, including the town of Wexford, to Robert Fitzstephen. The former grant was confirmed by Henry II.; but the latter was revoked; and the various districts of the county, inclusive of the barony of Forth, were made a chief part of the palatinate of Leinster, which Henry II. assigned to Earl Strongbow. This palatinate passed by marriage to William, Earl Mareschal; and, at his death, it was portioned among his five daughters, and the Wexford district fell to his second daughter, the wife of Warren de Mountcheney. Part of the territory now constituting the county, was afterwards seized by the Kavanaghs, the descendants of Dermot MacMurrough, quondam king of Leinster. In 1210, the whole territory was erected into a county by King John, but the lordship having afterwards descended to the Earl of Shrewsbury, one portion of it, called the Liberty, was governed by officers and nominees of the Earl, while the remaining portion, called the Cross, was governed by the officers and nominees of the Crown. In the 16th century, the Earl's portion became vested in the Crown under a statute which was enacted respecting absentees; and, thenceforth, the whole territory resumed its character of a sheriffdom or county.

Between the events of the Anglo-Norman invasion, and those of comparatively recent times, only two occurrences of great note figure in the county's history; and these are noticed as follows by a writer already quoted:—"The men of Wexford have been always remarkable in bygone times for their bravery. In the reign of Richard II., irritated by the conduct of their new neighbours, the inhabitants of the northern part of the county, under the command of young Arthur O'Cavanagh, a native chief, attacked, and after a severe struggle, routed all the English generals, and reduced the pale to the verge of destruction. At length the king himself hastened over with an army composed of 30,000 archers, and 4,000 men-at-arms, to take the field, but he too was foiled, and finally beaten by his youthful antagonist. The settlers, thus left at the mercy of the conqueror, were glad to purchase safety by an annual tribute (known by the name of Black Rent), which continued to be paid till the time of the Reformation. Were it not for this gallant leader, the hapless monarch would, in all likelihood, have easily subdued his enemies in the sister country; as the army destined to act against the Irish, with the discomfited remains of which only he returned to his dominions, was of a number sufficient to place him above all danger; in which case England would have been spared the desolating wars of the rival Roses, which afterwards, for so long a period, crimsoned her fairest fields with the blood of the best and bravest of her chivalry. Here also Cromwell, who, on his arrival in Ireland, found her sons engaged in cutting each other's throats with the same blind fury which has so often rendered her energies of no avail, and enabled the common enemy to strike her down with a rod of straw, met with a firm and determined opposition. So fierce indeed was the resistance, that, when it was finally overpowered, and the country overrun by the invincible fanatics of his army, he dispossessed all the descendants of the old Anglo-Norman proprietors, long since become more Irish than the Irish themselves, who thus, after a possession of five hundred years, had to give place to the Barebones and Holdenoughs of that fortunate leader, amongst whom the lands were divided, and in the possession of whose descendants they still remain."

In 1774, the county was disturbed by the illegal associations called Whiteboys; in 1793, it was again disturbed by the illegal associations called the Defenders; and in 1798, it acquired permanent and most painful notoriety as the scene of the busiest and worst acts of the rebellion. "The county of Wexford," says the Rev. James Gordon, rector of Killeghney in this county, and author of a well-known history of Ireland, "had not been otherwise than very imperfectly organized, and many of its Catholic inhabitants had addressed the Lord-lieutenant through Earl Mountnorris, protesting their loyalty, and pledging themselves to arm, if permitted, in defence of government, when occasion should occur. With exception of its yeomen and their supplementaries, about 500 only of the royal army had been stationed in this large and populous county. These were ill-commanded, disorderly, and insolent; more fitted to excite than to suppress the spirit of rebellion. Less obedient than formidable to their officers, many of the yeomen acted in like manner; while some petty men, who could only by violence raise themselves into notice, took advantage of unhappy times, in the suspension of civil government, to treat with cruel indignity objects incapable of resistance or redress. The rumours of the pitched cap, of the miseries of imprisonment, of the house-burnings, the stranglings, and the lash, had excited horrible apprehensions in the people; and when these began to be exercised on themselves, their consternation was inconceivable. Whether the resolution to rebel had not been so determinately fixed as to be preventable by no other means than force, I pretend not to judge; but my opinion is fully decided, that no insurrection would have been attempted, if the military command, with a sufficient force, had been held by an officer who would have enforced a salutary discipline among his troops, and exercised martial law with strict impartiality. The floggings were comparatively neither numerous nor severe, and had not become universal. None had been indicted in the town of Wexford, nor in the neighbouring baronies of Forth and Bargie; and in these baronies no atrocities were committed when insurrection took place. But other outrages, whose extension was dreaded, were exercised by men unauthorized, yet not restrained; as the well-inclined feared, each, by interference, to draw insult on himself. Wanton cruelties were committed on the prisoners in Gorey, quite contrary to the wishes of the humane officer, Lieutenant Swayne, who commanded there, and of a nobleman in the neighbourhood, remarkable for lenity and other amiable qualities, to whom the facts were palliated or not made known. Whatever may have been the immediate cause, the standard of rebellion was hoisted in the night of the 26th of May, by John Murphy, coadjutor or curate to the parish priest of Boulavogue, a man of shallow intellect, fanatical, and ferocious. Instantly, on intelligence of a nocturnal assembly, Thomas Bookey, first lieutenant of the Camolin cavalry, proceeded against it with a part of his troop. To his summons for surrender, he received from Murphy this answer of defiance,—"Come on, you heretic dog;" and, unsupported by his men, he fell a victim to his courage, slain on the spot with one of his associates. The conflagration of his house, distant seven miles from Gorey, served to heighten the alarm which on every side spread with rapidity. The commotion was sudden, violent, and extensive. In the morning of the following day, Whit-Sunday, the 27th, two bodies of armed men appeared on the hills of Oulart and Kiltomas, the former 10 miles to the north of Wexford, the latter 9 to the west of Gorey, an inferior ridge of Slieve-Byee mountain. Their numbers were fast increasing, from reports, too well founded, of men shot on the roads, at work in the fields, and even in their houses, unarmed and unoffending, by straggling parties of yeomen. To dislodge, as soon as possible, and disperse the two armed mobs, each of which was a confused multitude of both sexes, two bodies of royal troops advanced from different quarters with very different success. The insurgents on Kiltomas hill fled in a panic, after some distant volleys of musketry, from between 200 and 300 of yeomen from Carnew, whom they might have surrounded and put to slaughter. The yeomen killed about 150 in the pursuit; and in a march of 7 miles, burnt 100 cabins and 2 Roman Catholic chapels. The event was different at Oulart, where Murphy commanded. Here, from a chosen detachment, from Wexford, of the North Cork militia, under Lieutenant-colonel Foote, the rebels at first fled with precipitation, and were pursued at full speed up the hill. But when their pursuers had arrived near the summit, in confusion and almost breathless, about 300, rallied by their sacerdotal commander, made so furious, close, and sudden an onset with their pikes, that, with the loss of only 3 killed and 6 wounded on their side, they slew the whole detachment except the lieutenant-colonel, a sergeant, and 3 privates. While the country exhibited a miserable scene of commotion, houses in flames, and families flying on all sides for asylum, the loyalists to the towns, others to the hills, the hands of Murphy, flushed with success, marched from Oulart, in the morning of the 28th, with perpetually increasing numbers, to Camolin. Here they found a quantity of fire-arms, which had, at an unlucky moment, been sent by Earl Mountnorris for his yeomen's use. Proceeding to Ferns, and following the fugitive loyalists thence to Enniscorthy, they appeared before the latter at one o'clock in the afternoon, in number about 7,000, of whom about 800 were armed with guns. After a brave but fruitless attempt to defeat the rebels in the field, the garrison, consisting of near 300, mostly yeomen and volunteers, retreated into the town, as they would have otherwise been surrounded. The town, situated on both sides of the Slaney, was, in the course of a fierce but irregular combat, almost encompassed by the assailants, numbers of whom crossed the river, wading to the neck; and was at length rendered untenable by a conflagration of houses, which is said to have been begun by disaffected inhabitants who fired their own dwellings. The burning and the abandonment of the town are noticed in the article ENNISCORTHY [which see]; and the appalling scenes which followed at Wexford and its vicinity, and which speedily issued in the capture of that town, and in horrors of carnage and human butchery, will be noticed in the article WEXFORD (TOWN OF).

"The insurrection in the county of Wexford, which had at first arisen in the middle parts, in a line extending from east to west," continues Mr. Gordon, "had now, by the capture of the capital town, involved the southern. In the northern, about Gorey, no rebels appeared in arms, but the loyalists were so terrified that they fled in a body, men, women, and children, to Arklow, in the morning of the 28th of May. Gorey was for some time in a singular condition. Abandoned by the Protestants, while the Catholics remained close within their houses, it seemed a solitude; and filled with great quantities of goods, brought thither by fugitives who had expected a kind of siege, it presented a tempting object of depredation. An army of women assembled for this purpose, but suddenly dispersed on false information that a Welsh regiment of cavalry was approaching. As their part of the country remained still unmolested, most of the Protestants returned to Gorey within three days, where they were in danger of being surprised, as a body of about 1,000 rebels was approaching within 4 miles on the 1st of June; but these were defeated the same day by a small band of yeomen and militia, under Lieutenant Elliot of the Antrim regiment, and a respite gained of two or three days more. On the 1st of June, also, about 4,000 insurgents, led by several chiefs, among whom was a priest named Kern, a man of extraordinary stature, strength, and ferocity, proceeded in two columns from Vinegar Hill along both the banks of the Slaney, on the western of which lies the beautiful village of Bunclody, lately called Newtown-Barry, the object of attack. They entered the town without opposition, as the garrison, consisting of 500, under Colonel Lestrange of the King's county regiment, immediately retreated. Engaged in plunder and intoxication, this confused and unruly rabble was unexpectedly assailed, and routed with slaughter, by the garrison, which, after a mile's retreat, had been led back to the charge, at the instance of Lieutenant-colonel Westenra, who regarded flight as inglorious, when a few brave loyalists had still remained posted in some houses, with a desperate resolution of defence. A victory at Bunclody might have opened for the rebels a way into the county of Carlow, and might there have excited a dangerous insurrection; but the two main bodies of their force were directed to two other points, Ross and Gorey. Success at the former would lay open to their arms the counties of Kilkenny and Waterford, where thousands were expected to join them; by the latter they might force a passage even to the capital. While a vast number was assembling under a priest named Philip Roche, on the hill of Corrigrua, 7 miles from Gorey, the loyalists of this town were filled with joy at the anxiously expected arrival of an army under General Loftus and Colonel Walpole, on the 3d of June. These leaders marched, on the following day, with 1,500 men, in two divisions, by different roads, with a design to attack, in co-operation with troops from other quarters, the post of Corrigrua. But Roche had received intelligence of their scheme; and, quitting his post, proceeded with his whole force, perhaps between 10,000 and 20,000 in number, directly toward Gorey, meeting half-way Walpole's division alone. The conduct of Roche, in this instance, resembles that of a man incomparably superior, the great Frederick of Prussia, who, when his camp was to be attacked by several armies at once from different quarters, at Leibnitz, in 1700, abandoned silently his station in the night, met and defeated one of the armies, and thus was completely extricated from circumstances of extreme peril. The motions at Corrigrua could not be so silent. A zealous Protestant, Thomas Dowling, a farmer, had got intelligence, and had galloped full speed to Gorey to apprise the royal party; but not only was his account rejected with scorn, he even found himself in danger of imprisonment, if not of death, and was obliged to withdraw in silence from the town. Walpole, less attentive to tactics than the decorations for his person, marched with vain confidence, without scouts or flanking parties, and knew nothing of the enemy till they appeared advancing upon him within a few yards' distance at a place called Tubberneering, near the church and hamlet of Clough. His troops were instantly thrown into confusion by a tremendous fire; and, while with personal bravery, he attempted to arrange them, he received a ball through the brain. They fled in the utmost disorder, leaving their artillery, which consisted of three pieces, in the hands of the foe, and stopped not till they arrived at Arklow, thirteen miles distant. Their loss appears to have been about forty, besides that a detachment of seventy grenadiers from the army of Loftus, sent to their assistance, were surrounded at Clough, and all killed or taken prisoners. Loftus, proceeding in a road nearly parallel, unable to bring his artillery across the fields, and imagining Walpole victorious, made a circuitous march, and knew not the event until he arrived at the place of action. Following thence the rebels toward Gorey, he found them posted on the hill, at whose foot the town lies. They fired on his troops with the captured artillery which they had drawn to the top; and as he could neither attack their post, nor attempt to pass by it to Arklow, with probability of success, he retreated to Carnew, and thence to Tullow in the county of Carlow." On the same day, June 4, the chief division of the rebel forces changed their position from Carrickburn-hill to Corbet-hill; and on the next day, they made their celebrated attack on New Ross, and perpetrated the memorable massacre of Scullabogue. See ROSS (NEW), and SCULLABOGUE.

On June 6, the rebel troops reoccupied their post of Carrickburn; and after a rest of two days, they removed to Slieve-Kielter, 3½ miles south of New Ross, probably with the design of intercepting the navigation between that town and Waterford and Duncannon. "They failed in their engagements with gun-boats," says Gordon, "but captured some small vessels, in one of which was a packet. Here, by a tumultuous election, they chose for chief general Philip Roche, the priest, who had returned from Gorey after his victory at Clough; a man of great stature and boisterous manners, not ill adapted to govern by influence the disorderly bands among whom he acted. Remaining three days only in this station, Roche took post on the hill of Lacken, within two miles of Ross, where his army formed a less irregular encampment than usual, many tents being erected for the lodgment of the officers. Except a fruitless attempt of a detachment sent to Borris to procure arms and ammunition, the insurgents lay here inactive, regaling themselves on the liquors and cattle procured from the neighbouring parts; and so negligent of their safety, that, in any night after the two first, they might have been easily surprised and routed by a detachment from the adjacent garrison. Their associates at Gorey had also remained some days without enterprise, after the defeat of Walpole's troops, and the retreat of Loftus, wasting their time in the burning of Carnew, the trials of prisoners for Orangism, and the plundering of houses. At length assembling at Gorey on the 9th of June, they advanced northward to form a junction with a body of insurgents in the county of Wicklow, for the attack of Arklow, a post which they might have seized without opposition at any time before the very day of the attempt. Here the loyalists who had retreated from the county of Wexford, had been ordered to surrender their arms at the barrack, with promise of restoration; but these arms, on the news of the defeat at Clough, were formed into a pile and burned, to prevent, as was alleged, their becoming a prey to the rebels." But immediately previous to the arrival of the rebels, a royal force arrived at Arklow, sufficiently strong and spirited to give them a warm reception; and, in consequence, the attack upon the town was converted into a severe and disastrous battle, which issued in the death of the priest Murphy, and the repulse of the rebel army. See ARKLOW.

The insurgents of the county of Wexford were soon the only bodies of the Irish rebels who continued in arms; and, after the repulses which they sustained at New Ross and Arklow, they were obliged to act only on the defensive, and could aim at no higher object than to maintain some posts till they should receive succours from France. Yet "some in the meantime among them seemed resolved to annoy their opponents where opportunities occurred. Their chief force about Gorey, marching to Mount-Pleasant, in the county of Wicklow, burned the little town of Tinnehely on the 17th of June, and put to death some Protestants as Orangemen. Many more would have suffered on that imputation, if they had not been saved by the humane interposition of Mrs. Maher, a Catholic lady. The surprisal of Lacketstown, their next object of attack on the eighteenth, was prevented by the arrival of General Dundas with an army, who, leaving as a garrison in this town the yeomen of Tinnehely, styled the True-Blues, pursued the rebels to Tinnehely, and thence to Kilkavan-hill. Here a junction was formed with the troops of Loftus from Tullow, and an attack seemed to be intended against this post; but after a cannonade, with little execution on either side, and tremendous shouts of defiance from the rebels, with their hats raised on pikes according to their constant practice, the royal army retired. In the same night, the 20th of June, the insurgents abandoned the post, and, under Garret Byrne of Ballymanus, a Catholic gentleman of the county of Wicklow, retreated to Vinegar-hill, which was become the prime station of the rebel force. To surround this post on all sides at once, was the plan of Lake, the chief commander, and several armies moved from different quarters for this purpose. Dundas, Duff, and Loftus, from the vicinity of Kilkavan, followed the march of Garret Byrne; Eustace and Johnson advanced from Ross; and Needham from Arklow and Gorey. After its victorious defence of Arklow, the royal army there had continued some time closely in its quarters, sending patrols with great caution on the road toward Gorey. The country about the latter was in a few days evacuated by the rebels, to the no small joy of many loyalist families, who, by the sudden and unexpected defeat of Walpole, had been prevented from escaping, and on whom the enemy had been living at free quarter. Needham's forces marched from Arklow on the 19th of June, and from Gorey on the 20th, toward Vinegar-hill. The movement of the army from Ross was a kind of surprise to the bands of Philip Roche and Lackan, who fled in the utmost confusion, leaving their tents behind, with great quantities of plunder. They might have been pursued with slaughter, if Roche had not practised stratagems. He distributed a number of horsemen with banners displayed, as it were in defiance, which gave the appearance of a force prepared for battle, and intimidated the royal troops from sudden onset, while his infantry were retreating at full speed. Himself was the hindmost in flight from the hill. He overtook his infantry, and marched to the post of Three-Rocks, without loss of a man." The attack on Vinegar-hill was made on the 21st of June, and issued in the capture of the position, and the overthrow of its rebel occupants. See VINEGAR-HILL.

On the evening of the 20th of June, when General Moore, at the head of about 1,200 men, was on his march toward Vinegar-hill, he was intercepted at Goff's Bridge, near the church of Horetown, by Philip Roche, at the head of an army of 5,000 or 6,000 from Three-Rocks. "The forces of Moore in loose array, or disposed in small parties over a wide extent of ground, and the gunnery of the rebels, only 500 in number, maintained a contest, with considerable slaughter, during four hours. From the nature of the ground, the manoeuvres of the soldiery, and their own inattention to the commands of their leaders, the pikemen came not into action; and as their store of powder was at length exhausted, the whole body of insurgents retreated in good order to Three-Rocks. Except at Arklow, the royal troops fought better here than in any other engagement in this rebellion; yet, such military skill and resolution had an undisciplined and unorganized mob acquired in the short space of three weeks, that the combat was long doubtful. Joined by two regiments under Lord Dalhousie, the army took post on the field of battle, and on the morning of the twenty-first was proceeding to Taghmon, when two gentlemen arrived with proposals from the inhabitants of Wexford to surrender the town, on condition that their lives and properties should be guaranteed by his Majesty's generals. To these proposals, which he immediately forwarded to the chief commander, Moore could return no answer on his own authority; but from a change of circumstances, he changed his plan, and, marching directly to Wexford, took post on the Windmill-hill, within a mile of the town." The events of the capture of Wexford fall to be noticed in the article WEXFORD (TOWN OF).

The insurgent peasantry who had poured into the town of Wexford from Vinegar-hill and Three-Rocks, were assured that the same favourable terms which were expected for the townspeople upon surrender should be extended to them, and with the view of preventing the massacre of all who might be deemed hostages, they were persuaded to retire from the town; but, instead of taking post on the Three-Rocks till the expected terms should be ratified, they separated into two bodies,—the one taking station, under Philip Roche, at Sledagh, in the barony of Forth,—and the other taking station, under Edward Roche, Fitzgerald, and Perry, at Peppard's-castle. They confided hastily and too firmly in the mildness of the authorities who should receive their surrender; and, in consequence of their confidence being repelled, they were anew, very unnecessarily, and somewhat wantonly, provoked into infuriated and murderous activity. "Philip Roche," says Gordon, "coming alone to Wexford to settle with his Majesty's generals in the manner in which his troops were to surrender and disperse, was seized, maltreated in a manner quite shocking to human feelings, and committed to prison. As soon as they were made acquainted with their leader's fate, his followers regarding their case as desperate, marched away to the county of Carlow, under the conduct of John Murphy, the priest, who had first raised the flag of insurrection in the county of Wexford. Those insurgents who had withdrawn to Peppard's-castle had resolved, on hearing that no capitulation would be admitted, to march to the Wicklow mountains; but receiving intelligence that a number of yeomen were slaughtering the people about Gorey who were returning to their homes, they directed their course at full speed thither. General Needham had, by express, on the 20th, commanded a few cavalry left in Arklow to march immediately to Gorey, where they should find, he informed them, a large force, with an officer under whose orders they should act. Hearing that their town was protected by a large force, the refugee loyalists of Gorey could not be restrained from returning home from Arklow; but, contrary to the general's promise, no force was there, and they were alarmed on the 22d by the rapid approach of a rebel column. They fled back toward Arklow, whither the small body of yeomen, after a vain attempt to obstruct the progress of the enemy, effected their escape with little loss. Some horsemen of the insurgents pursued 6 miles; and, besides the wounding of others, put 37 men of the refugees to death, in revenge for about 50 of their own denomination, previously slain by the yeomen and supplementaries. Having finished the massacre, from which the denomination of Bloody Friday was given to that day by the people of that neighbourhood, the rebels, after a short repast, resumed their march to the Wicklow mountains.

"The main body at Sledagh, about 1,500, among whom were no longer men of education and property, directed its course to Scollagh Gap, an opening in the great ridge of Mount Leinster, which separates the counties of Wexford and Carlow. Their design was to raise an insurrection in the latter county, and in that of Kilkenny, particularly among the colliers about Castlecomer, who had been in a state of disturbance in 1793. Driving before them the few troops who attempted to oppose their progress, they passed the Gap, burned the little town of Killedmund, forced in like manner the pass of Gore's Bridge, on the river Barrow, and took post on a long mountainous elevation called the ridge of Leinster, 5 miles from Castlecomer. To this town they descended early the next morning, and gained an entrance with the slaughter of about 50 of their opponents. But while a defence was still attempted from some houses, and a number of others were in flames, an army, under Sir Charles Agill, arrived to the townsmen's aid. To avoid the fire of his artillery, which was levelled at the streets, to the danger of the loyal combatants in the houses, as well as of the rebels, the latter retired to a small distance from the town. This afforded an opportunity to the numerous Protestants who had taken refuge here to retire with the army to Kilkenny, but they were obliged to leave their effects a prey to the enemy, who took possession of the place. Having plundered Castlecomer, the insurgents, whose loss in this action may have been about 70, again took their station on the heights. Disappointed in their hopes of raising an insurrection, the spirit of which had now evaporated in these parts,—diminished by desertion to between 4,000 and 5,000,—and, which was far the worst, exhausted of ammunition,—they resolved to return through Soallagh to their own county. In the execution of this plan they were assailed on three sides at once, by 1,700 men, under Agill and Major Matthews, on the 26th of June, in the morning, at a place called Kileomny. They fled with such celerity that they regained the Gap with little loss, except their plunder and cannon, which consisted of ten light pieces. They forced their passage with the defeat of some opposing troops, and directed their march north-eastward by the Dwarf Woods, near Ferns, to the mountains of Wicklow, reduced by desertion to a much less number, and deprived of their leader, Father John, who was taken after the battle, and hanged at Tullow. On their arrival in these mountains, they found that their associates, under Perry and Fitzgerald, had been foiled, on the 25th, in an attack on Hacketstown. These, after the massacre of Bloody Friday, had united with the insurgents of Wicklow, under Garret Byrne, for the storming of this post, as they were destitute of artillery, and suffered a galling fire from the barrack, and from a fortified house, in which Mr. MacGhee, a Protestant clergyman, had placed himself, at the head of a few determined loyalists, they desisted at length, and retired to Blessington, with a loss of perhaps 200 of their number. The loyalists, also, as the town had been burnt, abandoned the place, and retreated to Tullow. On their side were 10 killed and 20 wounded.

"These associated bands were, on the 30th of June, descried on their march to surprise Carnew, and against them were despatched by General Needham, from his post at Gorey, above 200 cavalry, supported by an excellent body of infantry. The rebels, after their utmost efforts to avoid a battle, finding escape impossible, from the ardour of the cavalry, abandoned the highway at the moment when they were overtaken, and poured a fire from behind the hedges on their antagonists. Unsupported by the infantry, whom General Needham had unaccountably recalled, the royal troops could neither, from the nature of the ground, annoy their adversaries, nor find other means of escape than galloping directly onward to Carnew. Their flight was impeded by cars accidentally left in the road, abandoned by their drivers.

Without even wounding any of their enemies, 55 of this detachment were slain. The slaughter would have been still more lamentable, as the rear was surrounded, if a body of yeoman infantry, who happened casually to be near them, had not spontaneously come to their relief. A preconcerted ambuscade, by the rebels at this place of bloodshed, called Ballyellis, is related by Mr. Edward Hay, in his 'History of the Insurrection of the County of Wexford,' but he has been certainly misinformed. 'The garrison of Carnew, who would have otherwise been surprised and put to death, were alarmed by the fugitives, and had barely time to take post in a malt-house, whence they repelled the assailants. Pursued by a body of yeomen on the 2d of July, these insurgents took post on Ballyraheen hill, between Timnehely and Carnew, where they were unadvisedly attacked. Rushing from the upper ground, they in an instant routed the assailants, killing 2 officers and 10 privates. Sixty of the fugitive yeomen took refuge in the house of Captain Channey, one of the slain officers, at the foot of the hill, where they sustained, during 14 hours, the assaults of the enemy. Perhaps among the rebels, who were finally repulsed, near 100 were slain. Of their wild unsystematic mode of warfare, they gave here a strong instance. They set fire to the neighbouring house of Mr. Henry Morton, by the illumination of which their adversaries were enabled to aim at them in the night. After this victory and repulse, they divided into two bodies, one of which took its course to the county of Kildare, the other in an oblique march, apparently without plan, approached the borders of the county of Wexford. The latter, who were observed on the 4th of July, at a place called, from some piles of stones at the foot of Croghan Mountain, the White Heaps, were surrounded in their motion thence, in the morning of the 5th, by three armies at once, from Gorey, Carnew, and Arklow; but in a thick fog, which casually facilitated, though in other circumstances it might have precluded, their escape, as it concealed from their view the motions of their enemies. Coming to an engagement with Sir James Duffe's forces, at a place named Ballygnullin, they fled with their usual celerity, in various directions, with the loss of hardly more than 20, on the arrival of hostile reinforcements, and re-assembled on the hill of Corrigrua. They were annoyed in their retreat by a fourth body of troops, from Ferns; and, as they found themselves hunted on all sides, without a possibility of maintaining any post, they agreed to disperse to their several places of abode. As no opposition to the royal army was afterwards made within its boundaries, the rebellion in the county of Wexford may be considered as terminated here. Yet hostility still was elsewhere maintained by those Wexfordians who had directed their march to the county of Kildare. In the last-named county, a body of insurgents had still remained in arms, and under some chiefs, particularly William Aylmer, had eluded the king's troops, by rapid movements, reciprocally from the Wicklow mountains to the Bog of Allen. Uniting with these, the Wexfordians attempted, on the 11th of July, to pass the river Boyne at Clonard, to penetrate into the western parts, and to raise an insurrection there, but were delayed so long by the defence of Tyrrel, a yeoman lieutenant, in a fortified house, that time was given for the arrival of troops from Kinnegad and Mullingar to frustrate their design. After this repulse, the fierce Wexfordians pursued unaided their plan of desperate adventure, finally separating from their less enterprising associates, against whom before, in consequence of some disputes, they had with difficulty been prevented from turning their arms. Reduced in their numbers to 1,500, and hunted in every quarter by various bodies of the royal troops, who were stationed everywhere around, they made a flying march in the counties of Kildare, Meath, Louth, and Dublin, skirmishing with such parties of the king's forces as overtook or intercepted them, and bearing the various hardships of their peculiar warfare with an amazing strength of body, and a vigour of mind well worthy of a better cause. Totally disappointed of their expected reinforcements in the county of Meath, which had been lately disturbed, they passed the Boyne near Duleek, by a rapid motion in the county of Louth. Assailed on the 14th by two divisions of troops, between this river and Ardee, they made a desperate stand; but overpowered on the arrival of more force, with artillery, they broke, and fled into a bog. Hence a part of them took the road to Ardee, and dispersed; but the main body repassed the Boyne, and were advancing directly toward Dublin, with their usual swiftness, when they were overtaken, in a hot pursuit, by Captain Gordon of the Dumfries light dragoons, at Ballyoghbill, within 7 miles of the capital. As they would soon have been surrounded by detachments from different quarters, they fled, and finally dispersed, severally endeavouring, by devious ways, to reach their homes or places of concealment."

WEXFORD,

A parochial union or ecclesiastical benefice, in the dio. of Ferns, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is ecclesiastically designated St. Patrick's of Wexford. It consists of the rectories of Ardcantrisk, Drinagh, Kildavin, Rathaspick, Maudlintown, Kerlogue, St. Patrick, and St. Tullogue, and the impropriate curacies of Carrig, St. John, St. Peter, St. Ibbrius, St. John, St. Michael of Feagh, St. Bridget, St. Selskar, and St. Mary. Of these, the parishes of ARDCANTRISK, DRINAGH, KILDAVIN, RATHASPICK, MAUDLINTOWN, KERLOGUE, CARRIG, ST. PETER, ST. JOHN, and ST. MICHAEL OF FEAGH, are noticed in their own alphabetical places (see these articles]; and the parishes of St. Bridget, St. Tullogue, St. Iberius, St. Mary, St. Patrick, and St. Selskar, lie wholly within the town of Wexford, possess no emolument for the incumbent, and will be noticed in successive sections of the present article. Length of the union, 10 miles; breadth, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Pop., in 1831, 14,567. Gross income, £791 16s. 0d.; nett, £724 13s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. Three curates—one for Rathaspick and Kildavin, and the other two for the other parishes of the union—receive each a salary of £69 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Three churches are situated in the parishes of Rathaspick, St. Iberius, and St. Selskar; an Independent meeting-house and a Methodist meeting-house, the former attended by 60, and the latter by 100, are situated in the town of Wexford; a parochial Roman Catholic chapel is situated in Kildavin; and a parochial Roman Catholic chapel, and a conventual chapel, the former attended by 8,000, and the latter by the inmates of the convent and a few occasional visitors, are situated in the town of Wexford. In 1834, the population consisted of 2,031 Churchmen, 28 Protestant dissenters, and 12,611 Roman Catholics; and 27 daily schools had on their books 924 boys and 751 girls. In 1843, a male and a female National school in the town were salaried with respectively £33 and £24, and had on their books 407 boys and 237 girls.

Parish of St. Bridget.—This parish lies in the southern part of the town. It is bounded, on the north-west, by St. Peter's; on the north, by St. Peter's and St. Mary's; on the north-east, by St. Mary's and St. Tullogue's; and on all other sides, by St. Michael's of Feagh. Length, southward, 5 furlongs; extreme breadth, 3 furlongs; area, 9 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches. Pop., in 1841, 544. Houses 92. The population returns of 1831 and 1834 are made in cumulo with those of the other five parishes which lie wholly within the town. Pop., in 1831, 4,841. Houses 708. Pop., in 1834, 4,853; of whom 985 were Churchmen, 25 were Protestant dissenters, and 3,843 were Roman Catholics. The schools also are returned in cumulo with those of the other 5 parishes. In 1834, a Sunday school had on its books 50 boys and 40 girls; and 14 daily schools had on their books 340 boys and 274 girls. One of the schools was a boys' boarding-school; one was a girls' boarding-school; one was salaried with £48 a year from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and £85 from subscription; and one was salaried with £22 a year from subscription.

Parish of St. Selskar.—This parish lies in the northern part of the town, and is bounded, on the north and east, by Wexford Harbour, and on the south, by the parish of St. Iberius. Length, south-south-eastward, 1 statute mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a statute mile; area, 21 acres, 18 perches. Pop., in 1841, 1,966. Houses 294. The abbey of St. Selskar will be noticed in our article on the town of Wexford. The parish-church of St. Selskar was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and a loan of £553 16s. 11d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,000; attendance 900.

Parish of St. Iberius.—This parish lies in the middle part of the town. It is bounded, on the north, by the parish of St. Selskar; on the east, by Wexford Harbour; and on the south, by the parish of St. Patrick. Length and breadth, each 5 statute furlongs; area, 15 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1841, 1,445. Houses 210. The church was built in 1766; but at what cost or from what funds is now unknown. Sittings 150; attendance 230.

The Other Parishes.—The parish of St. Patrick lies in the middle part of the town. It is bounded, on the north, by the parish of St. Iberius; on the east, by Wexford Harbour; and on the south, by the parish of St. Mary. Length, west-south-west ward, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute furlongs; extreme breadth, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute furlongs; area, 7 acres, 8 perches. Pop., in 1841, 649. Houses 101.—The parish of St. Mary lies in the southern part of the town. It is bounded, on the north, by St. Patrick's; on the east, by Wexford Harbour; on the south, by St. Tullogue's; on the south-west, by St. Bridget's; and on the west, by St. Peter's. Length, south-westward, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a statute mile; extreme breadth, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute furlongs; area, 11 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch. Pop., in 1841, 413. Houses 75.—The parish of St. Tullogue or Doolough lies in the southern part of the town. It is bounded, on the north, by St. Mary; on the east, by Wexford Harbour; and on the south, by St. Michael's of Feagh. Length, south-westward, 5 statute furlongs; extreme breadth, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ statute furlong; area, 3 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1841, 248. Houses 47. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel is in the parish of St. Peter; and has 4 officiates, and an attendance of 8,000.

WEXFORD,

A post and market town, a seaport, a parliamentary borough, and the capital of the county of Wexford, partly in the parishes of Maudlinton and St. Peter, and comprising the whole of the parishes of St. Bridget, St. Tullogue, St. Iberius, St. Mary, St. Michael of Feagh, St. Patrick, and St. Selskar, barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the west shore of the upper part of Wexford Harbour, 3 miles south by west of Castle-Bridge, 7 east of Taghmon, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Broadway, 9 south by west of Oulart, 12 south-south-east of Enniscorthy, 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ south of Ferns, 18 east of New Ross, 29 east-north-east of Waterford, 32 south-south-east of Newtownbarry, 33 south-south-west of Arklow, and 64 south by west of Dublin.

Environs.—The site of most of the town is low, flat ground along the shore of the Harbour; and the site of the remainder is part of the north-eastern skirts of the Forth mountains. The south end of the seaward face of the town looks 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward to the entrance of the Harbour, and 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-eastward, past Big-Island and Beg-Erin, to the most northerly hook of the Harbour; and the north end looks 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs north-eastward, and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs northward, across a contraction of the Harbour, to the parish of Ardavan. The Harbour, at a point about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile above the town, begins to make a great expansion northward to the vicinity of the village of Castle-Bridge; and at a point about 2 miles west-north-west of the upper extremity of the town, it makes a rapid and final contraction to mere fluviatile breadth, and is there crossed by the romantic bridge of Ferrycarrig. The extensive and superb demesne of Saunderson-Court extends along the north-west side of the upper expansion of the Harbour, from the immediate vicinity of Ferrycarrig to the near vicinity of Castle-Bridge; and at its outskirts adjacent to Ferrycarrig, good views are obtained of the expansions of the Harbour, the northern end of the town, and the high portion of the western environs; while from Ferrycarrig bridge itself, is beheld a landscape of uncommon brilliance, singular combinations, and very striking power. "Above the bridge, the windings of the broad tidal river, with its high and partially wooded rocky banks; below, the expanded estuary, with its cultivated slopes; on either side of the river, the roads which have been cut out of the solid rock, exhibiting the manifold contortions and disruptions of the schistose strata; the long and simple timber bridge, crossing the mouth of the river, and connecting the above roads; the grey and time-honoured walls of the castle of Ferrycarrig, which crowns the steep, and presides over the romantic scene—all combine to arrest the attention of even the most casual observer." The views upon the river, as seen from its own bosom, by persons ascending or descending in a boat between Ferrycarrig and Wexford, are numerous, diversified, and singularly rich. The view of the town, as approached by the road from Ferrycarrig—a thoroughfare which brings down all the traffic from Taghmon, Enniscorthy, Newtownbarry, New-Ross, Waterford, and all other places to the west and north-west, and which also brings down a large proportion of the traffic from Ferns, Dublin, and other places to the north—is very poor and unpromising; but the view from the opposite side of the Harbour is striking and romantic. The western and south-western environs of the town, consisting of the range, offsets, and skirts of the Forth mountain, are broken and picturesque; and they contain many vantage-grounds which command a noble prospect of the town, the harbour, and the circumjacent country. The Raven Rocks, in particular—which form a principal summit of the Forth mountain, and are situated about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of the town, and are approached through a high and picturesquely broken tract—lift the eye of a spectator round a panorama of great extent and not a little beauty. "The views from the summit of the rocks embrace, on the one hand, the whole of that part of the county of Wexford which lies to the south of the Forth hills,—the fertile baronies of Forth and Bargie, their dunes and sea-loughs, with a boundless extent of ocean; and, on the other hand, the greater part of the remainder of the country; more particularly the harbour and coast northward, the estuary and the river, with the various seats along their banks, and in general, the whole of the county, as far as the eye can trace eastward to the mountain limits of Wicklow, northward to those of Carlow, and westward to those of Kilkenny. Those who are anxious to know the character of the country, the bearings of the different points around Wexford,—in fine, the topography of this interesting district, will learn much by perambulating the ridge of the sterile quartz hills of Forth." The principal country residences within about 2 miles of the town are Saunders-court, Sudley-cottage, Arran-cottage, Moreton, Rose-park, Riversfield-house, Richmond-house, Ely-house, Bettyville, Siner-ton, Sallyville, Belvidere-house, Newtown-house, Barntown-house, Belmont, Prospectview, South-hill, Summer-hill, Maryville, Coolross-house, Little Clonard, Newhill-house, Roseville, Great Clonard, Laurel-hill, Cromwell's-fort-house, Mulgannon-house, Rockland-house, Hayestown-house, Rath-aspeck-house, Cristown-house, Fairfield-house, Lamerstown-house, Somerset-house, Hermitage and Rowesmount.

Interior of the Town.—The town consists of a spacious terrace, or one-sided street, called the Quay, and extending about 800 yards south-south-eastward along the harbour, from a point a little above the bridge, to a point not far above the barracks; a street of very various width, and of very crooked alignment, but generally narrow, prevailing of south-south-eastward direction, and nearly 1,000 yards in length, extending from end to end of the main body of the town, at the mean distance of about 130 yards from the Quay; a much narrower street than the preceding, very nearly as crooked, prevailing parallel to it in direction, and extending also from end to end of the town, at the mean distance of about 220 yards from the Quay; about a dozen thoroughfares, principally lanes, connecting the Quay with the great central thoroughfare; nearly the same number of lane-like thoroughfares, connecting the central thoroughfare with the west; a comparatively open and airy edified district of about 450 yards by 130, winging the west side of the middle part of the compact town; a straggling and airy street, curving off from the north-west corner of that district, and extending upwards of 500 yards north-westward, along the Taghmon and New-Ross road, to the obelisk and the vicinity of the Old Wind-mills; a partially edified and quite open street, deflecting from near the further extremity of the preceding, and extending 250 yards north-eastward to the New Gaol, and the vicinity of the Diocesan-school; a scattered and very poor suburb, situated a little south-west of the main body of the town, bisected by the roads to Duncannon and Johnstown, and overlooked from the comparatively high ground to the west by the Female Orphan-house and the College; and a long and important suburb—the suburb of Faithe—consisting principally of one street, very irregular in at once width, direction, and edifying, and extending about 1,120 yards, prevailing to the south, and parallel with the harbour, at the mean distance of about 150 miles from the shore. Our notice of the street alignment of the compact part of the town will easily explain the following statement of its condition during the horrid scenes of the rebellion:—"At that time the town consisted of two almost parallel streets within, and one without, the line of the old wall. The street next the harbour and quays began at the open space called the Faithe at the south end, and was called Barrack-street, near the barracks, but chiefly Main-street, terminating at Artillery-park on the north. About the centre was the Bull-ring; and near this open space were the Court-house and parish-church. Diverging streets led into Back-street and Selsker-street, its continuation, in which was the corn-market, and at the north end Selsker parish-church. John's-lane and Chapel-lane communicated with John-street, containing St. John's parish-church and a Roman Catholic chapel." The Quay and some of the modern parts of the town present an appearance, occasionally respectable, and generally pleasant; portions of even the old streets, contain a number of well-built and respectfully inhabited houses; and several of the scattered and isolated edifices in the outskirts appear cheerful and handsome; yet the town, as a whole, is an ill-paved, filthy, repulsive place, most of its thoroughfares orientally narrow, and multitudes of its houses squalid, disgusting, and pestiferous. No large or second-rate town of Ireland seemed to us so malodorous and generally disagreeable as Wexford, excepting Galway, the Irish town of Athlone, and the English town of Limerick.

Ecclesiastical Buildings.—Much the most interesting and conspicuous ecclesiastical ruin in Wexford, is the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul, usually called Selsker-abbey, and situated in the northern district of the compact portion of the town, yet in the immediate vicinity of the old west gate, and in close juxtaposition with part of the old town walls. It seems to have been founded about the year 1190, for regular canons of the order of St. Augustine; yet is sometimes alleged to have superseded an earlier ecclesiastical pile on the same site, and, even when assigned to the latter part of the 12th century, is ascribed variously to the Ostmen, to a family of the name of Perches, to the Roches who were lords of Fernoy, and to Sir Alexander Roche of Artramont. The probability seems to be that a place of worship previously stood on or near its site, and was built by the Ostmen immediately after their conversion to Christianity; and that the monastic pile was erected by some person of the name of Roche, whose individual identity is obscure in record. The first treaty ever concluded in Ireland with the English, surrendered the town of Wexford to Dermot MacMurrough, and his Anglo-Norman allies, and seems to have been subscribed within the walls of the Danish church which occupied the site of the abbey. A popular tradition which concurs with some antiquaries in assigning the foundation of the monastic pile to Sir Alexander Roche of Artramont, asserts that, when a young man, he became enamoured of a beautiful daughter of a Wexford burgess,—that his parents, in order to prevent his marrying her, induced him to take part in the crusade for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem,—that, during his absence in Palestine, the young woman whom he loved believed him to be dead, and entered a convent as a nun,—and that, on his return, and on learning how she was situated, he took a vow of celibacy, founded and endowed this abbey, dedicated it to the Holy Sepulchre, and became its first prior. Whatever fiction may be in this story, the name St. Selskar, at all events, is admitted to be a corruption of Saint Sepulchre. The ruins of the abbey include a side wall, pierced with four arches; a double gable, pierced with two large arched windows; and a large square tower, much decayed at the top, but well preserved throughout the body, and supported by arches resting on plain piers, one of which is octagonal, and the other square. Attached to the ruin is the modern parish-church of St. Selskar; and surrounding it is the old burying-ground, still in use, and partly enclosed by a portion of the old town wall. A flag, now among the ruins in the burying-ground, and which probably stood in the wall of the abbey under a mural epitaph, bears a curious doggerel inscription in the old English character. Another flag among the ruins bears a sculptured shield of two compartments, with the date 1623; the one compartment exhibiting a tree surmounted by a crescent, and the other a lion rampant over a lizard, and also surmounted by a crescent. "This," says a writer in an extinct Irish periodical, "is a sepulchral flag, which, no doubt, covered the grave of Richard Stafford of Wexford, and Austace his wife, who was the daughter of Leonard Sutton of Ballykeeroe, in the county of Wexford; they died in the year 1622, and were buried in the abbey of St. Peter and Paul. The Staffords were descended from John Stafford, a third son of a Buckinghamshire family, who acquired the estate of Ballynachrane, in the county of Wexford, about the reign of King Henry VII., and from him descended the families of Ballyconnor; George Stafford, who built the castle and hall of Wexford; Richard Stafford above mentioned, who was descended from a second brother of Ballyconnor; and two other branches who possessed considerable property in Wexford in the reign of James I. and Charles I. The family of Sutton were also of very ancient residence and respectability in Wexford and the adjoining counties; they possessed Old Court, as well as Ballykeeroemore, and were of the same original stock as the Suttons of Tipper, in Kildare." Not very many years ago, a very dismal event occurred in the burying-ground. "A mate of a Welsh vessel, then lying at the quay, was taken violently ill at night, and after a few hours' illness, having apparently died, a contagious fever then raging in the town, the fear of spreading the infection caused his speedy interment. A few hours after the funeral had taken place, some children playing in the church-ground declared that they heard a strange noise in the grave. On this story spreading through the town, it induced several persons to attend, when the grave being re-opened, and the coffin examined, it was found that the poor man had actually turned himself round on his face; and from the quantity of blood appearing about the corpse, it was concluded he must have made a most violent struggle, and had the grave, on the first alarm, been opened, there is little doubt but the life of the individual would have been saved. Several persons now living in this town were at the opening of the seaman's grave."—In 1240, a synod was held in the abbey of St. Selskar, by John, bishop of Ferns. In 1418, Sir John Talbot, Lord Talbot of Furneal and Wexford, granted to the abbey of St. Selskar the chapel of St. Nicholas of Carriek. In the first year of Edward VI., the abbey and its appurtenances were granted for ever to John Parker, in capite, at the annual rent of 15s. 0½d.; in the reign of Elizabeth, they were possessed by a gentleman of the name of Devereux; and at a subsequent period, they passed into the possession of Edward Turner. The abbey was richly endowed; and its prior was a lord of parliament.

A priory of Knights Hospitallers was founded by William Marischal, Earl of Pembroke, and stood outside of the walls of the town. Previous to the suppression of the order of Knights Templars, this establishment possessed the rank of the grand commandery of the Knights Hospitallers in Ireland; but immediately after the transference to the Hospitallers of the vast property of the Templars, the preceptory of Kilmainham was made the grand commandery, and the establishment at Wexford began to decline. A friary of Franciscans was founded at Wexford in the reign of Henry III.; and was, in 1486, reformed into an Observantine friary; and this establishment was granted, at the general dissolution of monasteries, to Paul Turner and James Devereux. An hospital for lepers also stood anciently at Wexford.—The old churches of St. Selskar, St. Patrick, St. Mary, St. Bridget, St. John, St. Peter, and St. Maud or Maudlintown, were destroyed in 1649, by Oliver Cromwell,—who, "not satisfied with levelling these various places of worship, together with the plate belonging to the priory of St. Selskar, took possession of a very fine ring of bells, which he shipped for Chester, but which, being of a superior description, were removed a few years afterwards to the Old Church, near River-street, in Liverpool, where they remain to this day." The principal vestige of the destroyed churches still existing is the ruin of St. Mary's; and this exhibits some traces of plain semicircular arches, and also a row of pointed arches, supported by round columns, with capitals of a simple and somewhat ancient construction.—The present parish-church of St. Iberius is a plain edifice, with rusticated quoins, and surmounted by a small cupola. The present parish-church of St. Selskar is connected by a small vestibule with the massive tower and other architectural remains of the old abbey, and is a somewhat small structure, in the early English style of architecture. The meeting-houses for Presbyterians, Independents, and Methodists, are plain buildings. The Roman Catholic chapel of St. John, and the chapel attached to the Franciscan friary, are unornamental structures. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel of St. Peter stands on high ground in the western outskirts of the town, and is an unique modern Gothic structure, with a very large rose window, of elaborate design, in its east end. The existing monastic establishments are a Franciscan friary and a Presentation nunnery; the former having 5 friars as inmates, and the latter having attached to it a school for girls. St. Peter's college adjoins the parochial Roman Catholic chapel of St. Peter on Summerhill, rises conspicuously over the general elevation of the town's architecture, and forms an arresting feature in the general landscape of the town and environs. "This building," said Mr. Fraser in 1844, "is to form a quadrangle—the eastern front of which is nearly finished. It exhibits a square tower in its centre, with octagonal turrets at each angle, which is to be surmounted by a spire, 140 feet high." The college is under the patronage and inspection of the Roman Catholic bishop of Ferns, and is conducted by a president and three professors. The course of education pursued in it comprises Latin, Greek, French, Italian, Logic, Mathematics, Navigation, Mensuration, and English literature; it prepares students for entering the college of Maynooth; and it trains boarders for secular destinations, on an annual fee of £25.

Civil Public Buildings.—Some of the walls and parts of five of the towers which formerly defended the town, are still in existence; and the principal portion of them encloses the burying-ground of St. Selskar, and shows the walls to have had a height of 22 feet, and to have been strengthened along the side by an earthen rampart 22 feet thick. The bridge of Wexford is in itself an interesting and picturesque object; but, in consequence of having been the scene of the most atrocious butcheries in the rebellion of 1798, it cannot be seen by a stranger without associations of disgust and horror. The pile was originally built altogether of timber, by Lemuel Cox, in a similar manner to the bridges of New Ross and Waterford; but a small part of it has been rebuilt of stone. The communication at present consists of two raised causeways of respectively 650 and 188 feet in length at the ends, a timber bridge of 733 feet in length in the middle, and a draw-bridge, for admitting vessels up and down the Slaney, near the town end. This bridge and that at Ferry-Carrig were built in terms of an Act which was passed in the 34th year of George III., and which authorized subscriptions to the amount of respectively £12,000 and £7,000 to be made for their erection, and ordained that the subscribers should constitute two corporate bodies, under the designations of 'The Commissioners for building a bridge over the river Slaney, at or near the town of Wexford,' and 'The Commissioners for building a bridge over the river Slaney, at or near the Ferry of Carrig.' Two Acts passed in the 53d year of George III. sanctioned an increase in the rates of pontage upon the bridges, and authorized the two bodies of Commissioners, after defraying the costs of the Acts, and discharging the current expenses of maintaining the bridges, to appropriate to themselves and their heirs all surpluses of pontage.—The county court-house faces the bridge; and is an excellent building, erected after a design by R. Morrison, Esq. The custom-house is a small structure. The poor-law union workhouse occupies a conspicuous site near the northern entrance of the town; and is a handsome building. The old gaol, noted for the conspicuous figure it made in the sanguinary scenes of the rebellion, was, a good number of years ago, converted into an asylum for paupers. The present gaol is situated in the north-western outskirts of the town, between the thoroughfare to New Ross and that to Enniscorthy; and, during the years 1843-44, was in the course of receiving a great and important addition, with the view of amply facilitating the adoption of the newest and most approved practices of prison discipline. Its accommodation, irrespective of this addition, comprises 47 cells, 9 day-rooms, 9 yards, 2 hospital-rooms, a chapel-room, and a very small kitchen; and the increased accommodation contained in the addition, comprises work-rooms, 72 separate cells, a new hospital, and a new chapel. The official report of the state of the prison in 1843, says, "Seven large stalls, under a shed, have been ingeniously contrived by the master of works, to employ the prisoners at trades, and these have been found very valuable, by enabling that officer to carry on industry and instruction. There are six classes of males and two of females nominally kept up, as to day-rooms; but, in point of fact, anything like a strict classification of crime, or separation by day and night, is utterly impossible at present; and, to add to this difficulty, a class of idiots and lunatics is necessary, from the number now confined, (viz., 16,) which would alone disturb an otherwise well-ordered prison. A great exertion has been made, under the order of the Board of Superintendence, to establish employment and industry in the gaol, and it has succeeded to a considerable extent, though not, as yet, very profitable." During 1843, the maximum number of prisoners was 127; the average number was 105; the total number, including debtors, was 505; the number of recommitments was 83; and the total expenditure was £1,465 14s. 9½d. The magnificent monumental column on Carrig-a-Dagon, adjoining the mail-road to New Ross, though not properly belonging to the town, is too arresting a feature to be unworthy of incidental notice. It is a copy of the celebrated Pompey's Pillar at Alexandria in Egypt; and was erected by General Brown Clayton, to commemorate the conquest of Egypt by the army under Sir Ralph Abercromby,—the 12th Dragoons in that army having been under General Clayton's command.

The column, including its capital, is of the Corinthian order, 94½ feet in height, and constructed of the choicest cut granite; and it was erected according to the designs and under the direction of Mr. Coblen, an architect of London, and was completed in 1841. The principal schools in the town and its immediate outskirts, are the Diocesan school, St. Peter's college, Erasmus Smith's school, the parochial school of St. Patrick's, the Redmond Female Orphan-house, the National schools, and the school connected with the Presentation nunnery. The county infirmary contains 38 beds, and is capable of containing 50; and, in 1839-40, it received £3 3s. from subscription, £1,086 1s. 10d. from public grants, and £44 4s. 7d. from other sources,—expended £213 1s. 8d. in salaries to medical officers, 488 6s. 2d. for medicines, and £661 0s. 10d. for contingencies,—and admitted 200 intern patients, and made 6,571 dispensations of medicine to extern patients. The fever hospital is also a county establishment; it is a very superior institution; it usually contains about 40 beds, but is capable of containing 64 during the prevalence of epidemics; it is attended by three physicians; and, in 1839-40, it received £243 11s. 7½d. from subscription, £500 from public grants, and £13 9s. 7d. from other sources,—expended £135 in salaries to medical officers, £37 2s. 7d. for medicines, and £719 1s. 5d. for contingencies,—and admitted 708 patients. The only other noticeable public buildings are the house of correction, the town-hall, and the barrack.

The Poor-law Union.—The Wexford Poor-law union ranks as the 109th, and was declared on June 10, 1840. It lies wholly in the county of Wexford, and comprehends an area of 111,200 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 48,602. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Wexford, 12,735; Ardcolm, 3,652; Kilpatrick, 2,152; Killurin, 3,515; Rathaspeck, 2,884; Moyglass, 2,076; Roslare, 2,062; Lady's Island, 2,019; Tacumshane, 1,658; Kilmore, 3,289; Mulrankin, 3,461; Taghmon, 4,643; Ambrosetown, 2,480; and Bannow, 2,176. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 24; and 6 of the latter are elected by the division of Wexford, 2 by each of the divisions of Ardcolum, Killurin, Kilmore, Mulrankin, and Taghmon, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The Wexford division comprises all the borough of Wexford, and also extends into the baronies of Forth and Shelmalier; the division of Kilpatrick lies wholly in the barony of Shelmalier; the division of Ardcolum lies partly in the barony of Shelmalier, and partly in that of Ballaghecken; the division of Killurin lies partly in the barony of Shelmalier, and partly in that of Bantry; the division of Taghmon lies partly in the barony of Shelmalier, and partly in that of Bargie; the divisions of Ambrosstown, Bannow, Kilmore, and Mulrankin, lie wholly in the barony of Bargie; and the divisions of Rathaspeck, Moyglass, Roslare, Lady's Island, and Tacunshane, lie wholly in the barony of Forth. The number of valied tenements in the borough of Wexford is 2,165,—in the Ballaghecken district, 68,—in the Bantry district, 359,—in the Bargie districts, 2,502,—in the Forth districts, exclusive of the borough of Wexford, 2,426,—in the Shelmalier districts, 2,315,—in the entire union, 9,835; and of this total, 5,415 are valued under £5,—1,561, under £10,—713, under £15,—518, under £20,—369, under £25,—297, under £30,—333, under £40,—186, under £50,—and 443, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £113,097 5s.; the total number of persons rated is 9,890; and of these, 1,857 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,528, not exceeding £2,—1,014, not exceeding £3,—663, not exceeding £4,—and 498, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for about Nov. 1840,—to be completed in Jan. 1842,—to cost £5,780 for building and completion, and £1,120 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £58 16s.,—and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was July 25, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,360 12s. 6d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,164 9s. 8½d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 290. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary and the county fever hospital at Wexford, and dispensaries at Bannow, Bridgetown, Broadway, Castle-Brigge, and Taghmon; and in 1839-40, they received £355 9s. 1½d. from subscription, £1,912 13s. 4d. from public grants, and £63 10s. 7d. from other sources,—expended £708 1s. 8d. in salaries to medical officers, £298 0s. 1d. for medicines, and £1,462 2s. for contingencies,—and admitted 908 intern patients, and administered to 7,253 extern patients.

Shipping and Commerce.—We reserve a notice of the past and present condition of the Harbour as the subject of a short separate article. The vessels registered at the port on Dec. 31, 1843, consisted of 37 sailing vessels, each under 50 tons, and aggregately of 1,376 tons,—66 sailing vessels, each above 50 tons, and aggregately of 6,855 tons,—and 1 steam-vessel, of 228 tons. During 1843, 653 sailing vessels, of aggregately 36,662 tons, entered the port coastwise; 460 sailing vessels, of aggregately 23,873 tons, cleared coastwise; 82 steam-vessels, of aggregately 14,542 tons, entered coastwise; 83 steam-vessels, of aggregately 14,770 tons, cleared coastwise; 10 British vessels, of aggregately 2,165 tons, entered from the colonies; 7 British vessels, of aggregately 1,592 tons, cleared for the colonies; 2 British vessels, of jointly 231 tons, entered from foreign ports; and 1 British vessel, of 280 tons, cleared for a foreign port. In 1835, the exports amounted, in estimated value, to £312,136; and, excepting miscellaneous articles amounting in estimated value to £16,000, the items were 486,485 cwt. of corn, meal, and flour, 18,000 cwt. of butter, 4 cwt. of feathers, 50,000 lbs. of wool, 20 crates of eggs, 480 gallons of spirits, 3,000 head of cows and oxen, 20 head of horses, 7,500 head of sheep, and 2,200 head of swine. In the same year, the imports amounted in estimated value to £621,417; nearly one half of them, amounting in estimated value to £307,000, are returned as miscellaneous or unclassified articles; and the items of the remainder were 29,000 tons of coals, culm, and cinders, 750 tons of iron, 180 tons of cast iron, 500 tons of foreign iron, 280 tons of lead, 750 tons of stones and slates, 250 tons of oak bark for tanners, 55 tons of mahogany and other wood, 54 cwt. of hops, 1,050 cwt. of British refined sugar, 9,845 cwt. of sugar, 812 cwt. of tallow, 650 cwt. of hides, 40 cwt. of brass and copper, 35 cwt. of ashes, 450 lbs. of cotton yarn, 50,500 lbs. of cotton wool, 80,000 lbs. of tea, 2,500 lbs. of coffee, 1,245 lbs. of pepper and other spices, 2,200 lbs. of tobacco, 600 barrels of herrings, 650 bushels of salt, 140 bushels of flax-seeds, 900 gallons of rum and other foreign spirits, 13,500 gallons of wines, 61,600 gallons of spirits, 30,000 yards of linen, 280 boxes of tinued plates, 350 packages of cotton manufactures, 600 packages of woollen manufactures, 700 packages of haberdashery and apparel, 240 packages of leather, 4,000 packages of wrought iron and hardwares, and 1,500 packages of glass and earthenware. Weekly communication is maintained with Liverpool by steam-navigation. The shipping interest of the port has been much promoted by Mr. J. E. Redmond's opening of a ship-building-yard, and erecting of a patent slip. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town comprises 30,000 tons of exportation, 9,000 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 5,000 tons of agricultural produce for the local use of breweries and distilleries, 300 tons of exciseable articles not received by direct importation, and 9,000 tons of stones, lime, turf, and other heavy and bulky articles; and the estimated amount of inland carriage from the town comprises 10,200 tons of imported articles, 1,300 tons of produce of breweries and distilleries, and 22,400 tons of coals, manure, and other heavy and bulky articles. The import duties paid at Wexford in 1835, amounted to £4,917; in 1839, to £8,401; and in 1844, to £9,501.

Manufactures and Trade.—The malting and distilling of corn were formerly very considerable, but have been much lessened in consequence of the spread of the temperance principles. The shops of the town are good; and the retail trade is very extensive. The local supply of provisions is excellent; poultry, in particular, is very abundant; general farm produce is plentiful; and fish is numerous in kinds, and aggregately sufficient in quantity. "There are many good shops in Wexford," says Mr. Inglis, "and I heard no complaint of want of trade; and the best illustration I can give of the comfortable condition of the people of Wexford is, that during two days that I stopped in Wexford, I was not once asked for charity. I do not mean to say there is not a pauper, or a person out of employment in Wexford, but it may be said that Wexford is a flourishing town. I only saw one thing to contradict this opinion, two or three unroofed or half-roofed houses, which must have remained long in that condition, as the walls and window-ledges were covered with wallflower. Wexford is a cheap place of residence. When I visited it, beef was 4d. per lb., mutton 5d., veal 2d., pork 2½d., fine chickens 1s. a couple, and butter 9d. per lb. A fine turkey may be bought during the season for 3s., and other poultry in proportion; and there is a very plentiful cheap fish-market." In 1842, the Wexford savings' bank had 1,202 depositors. In 1843, the Wexford loan fund had a capital of £2,077, circulated £7,446 in 1,844 loans, realized a nett profit of £3 1s. 3d., expended for charitable purposes £25, and belonged to 29 proprietors. The town has branch offices of the Bank of Ireland, the National Bank, and the Provincial Bank. Markets are held on every Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on Feb. 25, March 17, May 1, June 3 and 29, Aug. 24, Sept. 29, Nov. 1, and Dec. 8. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a car to Bannow, a car to Bridgetown, a car to Churchtown, two coaches and a mail-coach to Dublin, two cars to Duncormack, four cars to Enniscorthy, two cars to Kilmore, a mail-car to New Ross, two cars to Taghmon, and a mail-coach to Waterford. White's Hotel in Wexford is one of the best appointed and best conducted establishments in the provinces. Two newspapers are published in Wexford—the Independent and the Conservative—both twice a-week, on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Municipal Affairs.—Wexford seems to have been made a borough in 1317, by charter of Adamar de Valencia, as Earl of Pembroke and "Lord of Weiseford and Montiniac;" it has royal charters of 12 Henry IV., 7 James I., and 3 James II.; and it was one of the boroughs which came under the New Rules of 25 Charles II. The corporation, according to charter, was styled "The Mayors, Bailiffs, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town or Borough of Wexford;" and consisted of a mayor, 2 bailiffs, 21 other free burgesses, and a body of freemen; and its officers, in 1833, were a mayor, a deputy-mayor, two bailiffs, a mayor of the staple, a town-clerk, a weigh-master, a water-bailiff, and three sergeants-at-mace. A recorder formerly officiated in the town; but none has been appointed for many years; and the recorder's court may, in consequence, be regarded as extinct. The mayor's court has jurisdiction to an unlimited amount, and ought, according to charter, to be held once a fortnight. A court of conscience is held by the mayor or his deputy, under the provisions of the Act 34 George III., cap. 26, for the recovery of debts of less amount than 40s. The assizes for the county, and courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions, are held in the town,—the latter on every Wednesday. The mayor is ex-officio a magistrate of the county. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary; and the town is the headquarters of that force, the residence of its county inspector, and also the head-quarters of one of its districts, comprising the stations of Wexford, Castle-bridge, Crossabeg, Killinick, Moyglass, Rathaspeck, and Taggart. The corporation, when they had sufficient funds for the purpose, formerly granted £100 or £105 a-year toward the support of the Diocesan school; and, jointly with the incumbent of the benefice of Wexford, and the churchwardens, they are the administrators of a bequest amounting in value to about £50 a-year, and laid wholly out in bread to all classes of the poor. The corporation have landed property which produces about £276 a-year; and they formerly derived from tolls a revenue of about £900 a-year,—and sometimes so much as from £1,000 to £1,200; but they were then a close body, and seemed to have expended most of the revenue in self-appropriations or in salaries to their own officers; and they eventually found themselves resisted in their claim to the tolls, totally without support from public opinion, and obliged to relinquish their ill-applied property. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament, and was under the joint "patronage" of Mr. Neville and the Marquis of Ely; but it sends only one member to the imperial parliament; and previous to the operation of the Reform Bill, the two "patrons" alternately nominated the member. Freemen were admitted without the payment of fees. Constituency of the borough in 1841, 301; of whom 106 were freemen, and 195 were £10 householders.

Statistics.—The proportion of county cess levied within the borough has been about £9 or £10 a-year. The number of tenements valued for the poor rate is 2,165; and of these, 1,192 are valued under £5,—434, under £10,—160, under £15,—99, under £20,—72, under £25,—79, under £30,—61, under £40,—36, under £50,—and 32, at and above £50. Area of St. Iberius' section of the town, 15 acres, 2 roads, 10 perches; of the St. John's section, 525 acres, 10 perches; of the St. Mary's section, 11 acres, 2 roads, 1 perch; of the St. Michael of Feagh's section, 99 acres, 2 roads, 25 perches; of the St. Patrick's section, 7 acres, 8 perches; of the St. Selskar's section, 21 acres, 18 perches; of the St. Bridget's section, 9 acres, 1 road, 13 perches; of the St. Tullogue's section, 3 acres, 3 roads, 17 perches; of the St. Peter's section, 22 acres; of the Maudlinton section, 46 acres. Females who could read and write, 2,220; who could read but not write, 1,589; who could neither read nor write, 1,860.

History.—The late Mr. Beaufort, in a manuscript communicated to Mr. Brewer, but without any due notation of ancient authorities, asserts that Wexford was founded in the 9th century by a colony of Ostmen, Danes, or Frisians, and adds, "Waesford, or, as it is now corruptedly written, Wexford, was long the emporium of the south-east of Ireland, and the port of passage between England and Ireland. Here the slave-merchants assembled their slaves, which they had purchased in England. Here might be seen, says a monkish writer, whole ranks of fine young men and beautiful women, exposed to sale in the slave market on the hill. They were sold in part to the Irish nobles and herdsmen, while others fell to the share of foreign merchants, and were exhibited in the slave marts of Rome and Italy. Since the arrival of the English in the 12th century, the inhabitants of Wexford have been principally composed of the descendants of Frisians, Anglo-Saxons, Anglo-Normans, and a few Welsh, but no Irish. Even at the present day, the port and countenances of the inhabitants often designate their origin, especially among the females, many of whom, if dressed in the garb of the Netherlands, might be taken for veritable Dutch women."

Dermot MacMurrough, in his agreement with the Anglo-Norman chiefs who led the van of the Anglo-Norman invasion of Ireland, ceded to Fitzstephen and Fitzgerald the entire dominion of the town of Wexford, and an extensive circumjacent territory. Soon after Fitzstephen landed, he and MacMurrough moved toward the town, menacing it with capture. On their approach, the garrison, composed of Ostmen and Irish, marched intrepidly to meet them; "but, struck with the new and unexpected sight of horsemen sheathed in shining armour, and troops advancing to the charge with unbroken ranks, in steady silence and composure, they retired within their walls, burning the suburbs and adjacent hamlets, to deprive the assailants of shelter. A vigorous and well-conducted assault was opposed with so determined courage by the garrison, that Fitzstephen was repulsed, with the loss of 18 of his men. Heedless of the inconsiderate exultation of the foe, and the dejection of his allies, this valorous leader took his measures for victory with cool resolution. Retiring to the sea, and burning his vessels, to give his men the sole alternative of death or conquest, he advanced again to the assault, after an inspiring harangue, and the solemn ceremony of divine service. Many of the inhabitants, particularly the clergy, dreading the consequences of obstinate resistance against such desperate resolution, persuaded the garrison to capitulate; and, after a delay of three days, caused by the pride and insolence of Dermot, their proposals were accepted, to swear allegiance to this prince, to enter into his service, and to give as hostages for their obedience four of their principal citizens. Der-mod immediately, according to promise, invested Fitzstephen, jointly with Fitzgerald, though the latter had not yet arrived, with the lordship of Wexford and its territory." Fitzstephen raised for his security the strong castle of Carrick or Carrig, at the point of the Slaney now called Ferry-Carrig; and after he had detached the greater portion of his men to assist Earl Strongbow in defending Dublin, and was residing at Carrick with only a feeble garrison, he was besieged in it by the revolted Wexfordians, yet made successful resistance, till he became the dupe of one of the basest combinations of perfidy and perjury which ever disgraced the history of Ireland, or obtained, by excess of courtesy, the designation of a stratagem. See CARRICK. The Wexfordians, on obtaining possession of the fortress, murdered some of the garrison, maimed and tortured others, threw Fitzstephen into chains, set fire to Wexford, retired with their surviving prisoners to an inlet in the harbour, sent a message to Earl Strongbow that, if he should attempt to disturb them, they would instantly put all the prisoners to death, and were not eventually brought into subjection till Henry II. arrived in person at Waterford. In 1173, King Henry, on leaving Ireland, is said to have embarked at Wexford; but he really took shipping, not at the town, but on the seaward side of the entrance of the Harbour. At Wexford was celebrated, with much festivity, yet in the midst of alarms and warfare, the marriage of Raymond le Gros, ancestor of the families of Grace and Fitzmaurice, to Basilea De Clare, sister of Earl Strongbow.

The next great event in the history of the town occurred during the intestine wars of the 17th century. Cromwell, soon after his sanguinary reduction of Drogheda and his immediately subsequent successes, marched toward Wexford, to attempt its capture. The garrison of the town had been strengthened with 2,000 Roman Catholic soldiers from the army of the Marquis of Ormond; active measures had been adopted for making a vigorous defence; but the town was hastily surrendered by treachery, and became the scene of a most horrible carnage. "One Stafford, governor of the castle," says Leland, "had been suspected by Ormond; but, as he had the merit of being a Catholic, the Commissioners of Trust would not consent to remove him. No sooner had Cromwell's batteries began to play, than this man admitted his soldiers into the castle upon conditions. The citizens were suddenly confounded at sight of his colours waving on the battlements, and their own cannon pointed against the town. In the first tumult of terror and consternation, they sent commissioners to treat with the enemy; but the townsmen were impatient of delay; the soldiers ran tumultuously from the walls; every man consulted only his own safety; and thus were all destroyed. The enemy gained the city without further resistance, and proceeded to put all to the sword who were found in arms, with an execution as horribly deliberate as that of Drogheda." The spot on which Cromwell planted his cannon, is still pointed out as a memorable object at the south end of the town, and bears, both popularly and topographically, the name of Cromwell's Rock.

The third and last great figure which Wexford makes in history is the awfully conspicuous and bloody share which it had in the scenes of the rebellion of 1798. Its townspeople beheld in the distance the smoke of the conflagration of Enniscorthy; and, while the agitated fugitives from that place were only on their way hither, two attempts were made in reference to the rebels, the one to retard or avert their approach by persuasion, and the other to prepare for their reception by a vigorous military defence. "Three gentlemen of the county were then in the jail, arrested on private information, Beauchamp Bagehal Harvey, John Henry Colclough, and Edward Fitzgerald. The two latter, at the instance of some officers, undertook to address in person the insurgents at Enniscorthy, for the purpose of persuading them unconditionally to disperse, and return in peace to their several homes. The rebels had taken post on Vinegar-Hill, an eminence at whose foot stands the town of Enniscorthy, and were found by the two gentlemen, in the afternoon of the 29th, in a state of confusion, distracted in their councils, without leaders of general influence and without a plan. Different objects of attack had been proposed by different persons, unsupported by general concurrence; and the greater part were dispersing to defend their houses, as they said, from Orangemen. But when shouts, repeated from group to group, announced the arrival of the gentlemen prisoners, as they were styled, from Wexford, the straggling bands collected from all sides into one body; and retaining Fitzgerald as a leader, formed immediately the resolution of marching to Wexford. Colclough was dismissed with this intelligence, and the insurgents took post that night on the eminence of Three Rocks, the termination of a long, but not high, ridge, called the mountain of Forth, the northern limit of the Bargy and Forth baronies. As General Fawcett was expected from Duncannon with a considerable force, in the way of whose march this post, distant from Wexford two miles and a half, was situate, the garrison took a position outside the town, on the morning of the thirtieth, at the dawn, ready to co-operate with the general in a double attack. This officer had advanced to Taghmon the preceding night; but informed next morning that his vanguard of eighty-eight men had been surprised and destroyed, under Three-Rocks, by the rebels, he retreated with the rest of his forces precipitately to Duncannon. Colonel Maxwell, of the Donegal militia, commander of the garrison, receiving advice of this disaster, made a motion toward the enemy, hoping to retake two howitzers captured from the slaughtered troops, and still expecting the arrival of General Fawcett; but seeing no probability of success, he returned into Wexford, having lost, by a shot from the outpost of the rebels, Colonel Watson, a brave and skilful officer. In a council of war a resolution was formed to evacuate the town; Harvey, at the request of the officers, wrote a letter of entreaty to the rebels to act with humanity; and two gentlemen of the name of Richards, members of a yeoman company, undertook the dangerous task of delivering this letter, and announcing to the insurgents the surrender of the place. The retreat was in shameful disorder. Some companies abandoned their posts and fled; and their example was followed by others, inasmuch that almost the whole garrison was gone before the design was known to the inhabitants. Thus numbers were left to the mercy of the rebels, even some of the armed yeomanry, who had expected a retreat in a military way, and would have accompanied the troops in their march to Duncannon. These disorderly troops might have been put to total rout and slaughter if they had been pursued, as was strenuously recommended by one of the rebel chiefs. Their course through a country, which had as yet remained perfectly quiet, was marked with devastation, the burning of houses, and shooting of unarmed peasants. Though the rebel army at Three-Rocks may have amounted to 15,000, yet, with orderly soldiers, the town might have been safely defended, as its old walls were entire, and its garrison little less than 1,200 men. The chiefs of the insurgents had, on the arrival of the two deputies with Harvey's letter, consented that the lives and properties of the townspeople should be protected, in case of a stipulation that all the arms and ammunition should be delivered into their hands; but Fitzgerald, who went with this proposal, found the town abandoned by the troops, and no stores of this sort left behind. Enraged at this disappointment and the violence of the soldiery, the ungovernable multitude, when they poured into Wexford, could with difficulty be restrained from the committing of general massacre and conflagration. Horrible beyond conception would have been the effects. Great numbers of both higher and lower classes would have been victims. Ships in the harbour crowded with fugitives, who had hoped an escape to England, all returned except two, when summoned by boats from the rebels, and relanded their passengers."

The town, thus completely under the power of the rebels, remained entirely in their possession till the 20th of June, when General Moore took post on the Windmill-hill. See WEXFORD (COUNTY OF). "In Wexford, which had been now three weeks in the hands of the insurgents," says the authority already quoted, "a great number of Protestants were confined, inhabitants of the town, and refugees, and prisoners brought from several parts of the country. Of these, 260 were imprisoned in the jail and some other public places of confinement; the rest were immured in private houses; and all were under perpetual apprehensions of being shot, piked, or starved to death. To save them, exertions were constantly made by gentlemen among the rebels; but these gentlemen themselves, particularly such as were Protestants, were in perpetual danger from the caprices of an ungovernable multitude which they had unwisely hoped to command. Some of low education, bearing the rank of officers in this multitude, were more inclined to incite than control a sanguinary temper in their followers. Such was Thomas Dixon, who, from a master of a trading vessel, had become a self-commissioned captain of the rebels; a man who, like Robespierre and other unfeeling monsters in the French revolution, would be ready, in case of success on the side of the insurgents, to raise himself to eminence by instigating the lowest of the rabble, under the mask of zeal for their cause, to the murder not only of all who had not acceded to their party, but also of the then existing chiefs of the insurrection. A general slaughter of the prisoners, to which the townspeople of Wexford were quite averse, was twice in vain attempted by Dixon at the head of bands of peasants. He was magnanimously opposed, first by one Hore, a butcher, and next by one Scallion, a nautical trader; the former with a sword, the latter with a pistol, defying him to single combat, and insisting that he should 'show himself a man' before he should dare to put to death defenceless people. At length, on the 20th of June, when the greater part of the garrison had been drawn to Three-Rocks to reinforce the army preparing to march against General Moore, Dixon, with a multitude of peasants, to whom he distributed whisky, took possession of the town, and proceeded to the work of butchery. A mob, absurdly credulous, ferocious, and previously irritated by severities, he was enabled to inflame beyond all opposition by the assistance of two Protestant prisoners, who, to save themselves, pretended to be Orangemen, and to turn informers against others of that fraternity. One of these was Charles Jackson, who afterwards published in England a narrative of the cruelties committed in Wexford, a most scycophantic performance, such as might be expected from one who had sacrificed the lives of innocent men to his own safety. The massacre would probably have been committed immediately at the places of confinement, if the wife of Dixon, a disgrace to her sex, a worthy associate of a murderous coward, had not requested that the prisoners should be conducted to the bridge, to afford to the people the pleasure of seeing the execution. The persons denounced were brought in successive parcels to this fabric, which, from the beauty and gaiety of its appearance, was ill fitted for such a scene. The execution was deliberately performed. Concerning each victim successively, a question was asked aloud whether any one could particularize a good action which might entitle him to mercy? On silence of the crowd, or an unfavourable answer, he was put to death. A few were shot, but most were transfixed with pikes, in a manner much more painful than the mere extinction of life required. The executioners immediately threw the bodies into the river, without allowing themselves time to strip them of their clothes, or even to rifle their pockets. At length, about seven o'clock in the evening, a stop was put to the massacre by a concurrence of circumstances. Mr. Corrin, a priest of Wexford, after a failure of entreaty, commanded the people to pray, and having thus caused them to kneel, dictated a prayer, 'that God would show the same mercy to them which they should show to the surviving prisoners.' Esmond Kyan and Edward Roche, two chiefs, by great exertion snatched some from death; and even many of the common people interfered for individuals. The approach also of the royal armies to Vinegar-hill was announced, and a reinforcement demanded under Edward Roche. The Catholic clergy of Wexford are blamed for not having interposed more early or effectually; but in proportion to my examination of the subject, I am less inclined to favour the charge. The number massacred on this occasion has been commonly believed to be ninety-seven, but is positively asserted by others to have been not more than thirty-six.

When Wexford was cleared of the multitude of peasants, who, about eight o'clock in the evening of the massacre, were led away by Edward Roche to reinforce the post of Vinegar-hill, a design was conceived of a peaceable surrender to his Majesty's generals, to save the town and its inhabitants from destruction. On one side were approaching ships of war and gun-boats, and several armies were near whose arrival might soon be expected. The place with all its people had been abandoned by an irregular surrender to the rebels by the royal troops, and a compulsory defection could hardly be an unpardonable crime. Lord Kingsborough, colonel of the North-Cork militia, was a prisoner in the town, preserved from all violence by the efforts of some gentlemen, notwithstanding the character which he had acquired by the infliction of lashings of the cruellest kind; but these had been inflicted elsewhere, and were in general not known to the Wexfordian peasantry. He had been absent from his regiment at the commencement of the rebellion; had sailed from Arklow to Wexford, not imagining that this post could have fallen into the hands of the insurgents; and had been taken at the harbour's mouth on the second of June. To this officer was committed the command of the town by a resolution of the inhabitants, assembled very early in the morning of the twenty-first; and three deputations were sent of two gentlemen each to the approaching armies. By these Lord Kingsborough wrote to the generals, that on the surrender of the place to him, he had most solemnly pledged his honour for the safety of all those, in persons and property, who had been in the town during the rebellion, with the exception of the perpetrators and instigators of murder, and hoped the ratification of his contract, as the men of Wexford had not been concerned in massacre. Proposals were also carried in the name of the inhabitants of all religious persuasions, that, on condition of security to their persons and properties, they were ready to surrender their arms, return to their allegiance, and use their utmost influence with the people of the country in general to follow their example. * * Of Lord Kingsborough's despatch, Lake, the chief general of the royal forces, deigned not to take any notice. To that of the townsmen he replied, that he could pay no attention to the proposals of rebels in arms; but to the deluded multitude he promised 'pardon on the delivery of their leaders into his hands, the surrender of their arms, and their returning with sincerity to their allegiance.' On his arrival at Wexford on the twenty-second, he found that General Moore had taken possession of the town, which was a fortunate circumstance, since Moore, actuated by humanity, and the honourable spirit of a true military officer, had used his utmost exertions to restrain his licentious troops. Thus the place, little damaged by either party, displayed a contrast to other towns in the county, which had felt the devastating violence of both. As the surrender had taken place, in reliance on Lord Kingsborough's engagements, before the return of the messengers with the answer of Lake, those chiefs of the rebels, who were conscious of having acted with humanity, returned to their homes, or remained in the town, secure, as they imagined, under the faith of capitulation. Thus these all fell into the hands of the army and suffered death; while the murderers, among whom was Dixon, escaped the vengeance due."

WEXFORD HARBOUR, an estuarial lagoon in the baronies of Forth and East Shelmalier, co. Wexford, Leinster. It communicates with the Irish sea by a mouth only 7 furlongs wide, between Roslare Point, in the barony of Forth, on the south, and Raven Point, in the barony of East Shelmalier, on the north; and it is elsewhere separated from the sea by two long and very narrow peninsulas of sandhills, which appear to have been formed by the conflict of the tidal currents from without, and the fluviatile currents from within. Roslare peninsula extends 4 miles in length, with a maximum breadth of about 1 mile; but over the 2 or 2½ miles of its central and terminating portion, it has a mean breadth of only two or three perches, and extends in the direction of north-north-east; and it terminates in a tiny headland, whose summit has an altitude of only 32 feet above sea-level, and in the immediate vicinity of which are a coast-guard station, a boat-house, and the site of Roslare fort. Raven peninsula extends almost due southward, measures 2 miles in length, gradually increases in breadth from 1 or 2 perches to about 5 statute furlongs, and terminates in a small headland, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 29 feet. The distance from the mouth of the harbour direct to the town of Wexford is only 3½ miles; but the distance from the extreme north to the extreme south is 6½ miles,—the northern wing gradually decreasing to a breadth of about a mile, and the southern wing possessing a minimum width of ¾ of a mile at a point about 1½ mile from the southern extremity. Most of the expanse of this great lagoon, except along a belt from Wexford to its mouth, swept by the fluviatile and the tidal currents of the Slaney, is so very shallow as to be dry at low water; and it has in its south wing an islet deposition called Mud Island, and, in its north wing, the islands called Big Island, Beg Erin, the Breast Islands, and the Ridge. An interior expansion of the Harbour between the town of Wexford and Ferry-Carrig bridge, is noticed in the section "Environments" of our article on the town; but this inner lagoon is seldom, in popular parlance, regarded as any part of Wexford Haven. So high a bar stretches across the mouth of the Harbour, that vessels of more than 200 tons burden cannot cross, even at high water of spring tides, without being lightened of port of their cargo. But for this serious evil, Wexford would certainly be adopted as the great thoroughfare between England and the south of Ireland, and might speedily become one of the most flourishing ports of the kingdom. The evil, however, has very long been of acknowledged magnitude, Giralduus Cambrensis specially noticing, in regard to the embarkation of Henry II., that "he took shipping without the bar;" and it seems too consolidated and resistive to be easily removed. Yet the removal of it is obviously practicable, if not by private enterprise, at least, by a comparatively moderate expenditure of public capital, and not only would greatly enhance local trade, and much facilitate general intercourse with England, but would also involve the reclamation of so very large a tract of land from the tide, as might eventually make ample compensation for the whole expenditure. All the affairs of the Harbour at large, of the shipping quay at the town, and of local pilotage, ballast, and even street-cleansing and municipal supply of fresh water, are under the management of a body of public Commissioners appointed by an Act of 34 George III.; and the expenses of these are defrayed almost exclusively out of funds levied from vessels frequenting the port. The Harbour Commissioners consist of the mayor, bailiffs, burgesses, and town-clerk of the Corporation of Wexford, the collector of the port, the members of parliament for the town and the county, and 36 other persons chosen by a majority of the members in attendance when vacancies occur. The Act under which this body of Commissioners was constituted, recited that the bar or entrance into the Harbour of Wexford was exceedingly dangerous and unsafe by reason of the shallowness of the water therein, whereby many vessels had been lost or much damaged, which might be remedied by confining the water and deepening one channel or channels, and the trade of the said town would be much benefited by the erecting and extending one or more quay or quays over the river Slaney; and thereupon after some recitals, it enacted, That the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of the town of Wexford for the time being, the collector of the port, the representatives in parliament for the county of Wexford and for the borough of Wexford for the time being, 36 individuals named in the act, and the town-clerk of the said town, or corporation of Wexford, for the time being, should be, and were thereby appointed a body corporate for carrying into execution the purposes of the act by means of the corporation for improving the bar, town, and Harbour of Wexford."

WHALEY-ABBEY, the seat of R. W. Whaley, Esq., in the parish of Ballykine, barony of South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the side of a hill, in the valley of the Avonbeg, 3 miles south-south-west of Rathdrum. The mansion is a large edifice, and was erected on the site of an ancient abbey, every trace of which has disappeared. Archdall—whose opinion, however, is of small value—thinks the ancient abbey was originally the abbey of Ballykine, and that the founder of it was a brother of St. Kevin, probably St. Dungan.

WHERRY, WHEERY, KILLAGALLY, or FERBANE, a parish in the barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It contains the greater part of the town of FERBANE: which see. Length, north-westward, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 17,556 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches,—of which 8 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches are in Lough Boora. Pop., in 1831, 3,555; in 1841, 3,841. Houses 636. Pop.

of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,054; in 1841, 3,326. Houses 545. The river Brosna and the Grand Canal pass across the interior; and the small lake Boora lies on part of the south-eastern boundary. About 3,240 acres of the surface are bog,—principally in the south-east; and the remainder of the surface consists of good meadow-land near the Brosna, and good arable land for corn and potatoes in the other districts. A height among the bogs in the south-east has an altitude of 209 feet above sea-level. The general appearance of even the best parts of the parish is flat and tame; and that of the boggy districts is not a little repulsive. The principal country residences are Ballylin-house, Moyclare-house, and Killymore-house; and the chief antiquaries are the ruins of Coole and Kilcolgan castles. The roads from Banagher to Clara and Tullamore pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Meath. The vicarage is part of the benefice of TESSAURAN: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £138 9s. 2d.; glebe, £282. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £138 9s. 2d.; and are inappropriate, in equal proportions, in Messrs. King and Armstrong. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Salary payable by the vicar, £55 7s. 8d.; glebe, £21. Gross income, £90 7s. 8d.; nett, £74 10s. 6d. Patron, the incumbent of Tessaurean. The church was built in 1804, by means of £327 2d. raised by parochial assessment, and £134 10s. 0s. 6d. raised by private subscription; and a belfry was erected in 1819, at an unreported cost, provided partly by assessment and partly by subscription. Sittings in the church, 200; attendance, from 100 to 130. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,300 to 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tessaurean. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 275 Churchmen, 17 Protestant dissenters, and 3,293 Roman Catholics; a hedge-school at Creggan was usually attended by about 30 scholars; and 2 daily schools at Ferbane, and 2 hedge-schools at respectively Endrim and Semore, had on their books 102 boys and 82 girls.

WHIDDY, an island near the head of Bantry bay, barony of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. It extends south-westward, or in the direction of the bay itself; it lies at the distance of from half-a-mile to $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the south-east coast; and a point near its middle is situated directly opposite the town of Bantry. Its length is $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its extreme breadth is a little upwards of 1 mile. Various islets lie almost close upon its shores; the sound between it and the town of Bantry is Bantry Harbour, and contains well-sheltered anchoring-ground; and the nearest part of the mainland is a rich portion of Lord Bantry's demesne. The island presents a softly undulated surface, and possesses a very fertile soil. Part of it is enclosed as a deer-park for Lord Bantry, and the remainder supports about 450 inhabitants. "The island of Whiddy, anciently Fucida Insula," said Dr. Smith in the course of last century, "is a pleasant spot of a triangular form; and the soil is excellent. In it Richard White, Esq., whose property it is, has a deer-park, where are both a fresh and salt water lake, at no great distance from each other. The deer are very fat, and this island produces as large mutton as any in the county of Limerick, where the largest in Ireland is said to be; it is not unpleasant to see the small Bantry mutton, which is exceeding fat and good in its kind, compared to this of Whiddy Island, and bears no proportion to it as to bigness. In this island are good orchards, and also a profitable hop-yard; it abounds with hares, as the owner suffers none to be killed." The forts erected for the protection of Bantry bay are situated on Whiddy Island, and have a fierce appearance. A coast-guard station is situated also at the south-western extremity of the island.

WHITECASTLE, a hamlet in the parish of Upper Moville, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the shore of Lough Foyle, and on the road from Londonderry to Moville, 1 mile north-north-east of Carrowkeel, and 5 north-north-east of Muff. The vestiges of the old castle whence it has its name can still be traced.

WHITECHURCH, a parish, formerly in the baronies of Fermoy and East Muskerry, and in the county of the city of Cork, but now in the baronies of Cork, Barretts and Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated $\frac{5}{8}$ miles north-north-west of the city; and is traversed by the road thence to Mallow. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the barony of Cork section, 7,150 acres, of the Barretts section, 2,624 acres, of the Barrymore section, 741 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,856; in 1841, 3,368. Houses 462. Pop., in 1831, of the Fermoy section, 587; of the East Muskerry section, 208; of the county of the city of Cork section, 2,061. Pop., in 1841, of the Barretts section, 696; of the Barrymore section, 273; of the barony of Cork section, 2,399. Houses, in 1841, in the Barretts section, 102; in the Barrymore section, 39; in the barony of Cork section, 321. The Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108 and 109, transferred the county of the city of Cork section to the barony of Cork; and the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of North Dromgariff, South Dromgariff, North Gordotia, South Gordotia, Knockanroe, Lisheen-owen, Longstone, Raheen, Slievoditia, Shanlyre, and Tullig, from the barony of Fermoy to that of Barretts; and the townlands of Ballycaslin, East Ryefield, and West Ryefield, from the barony of East Muskerry to that of Barrymore. The surface is much diversified, and has a tumulated outline. Excepting some farms in the barony of Cork section, the land is of poor quality. The Dunbulloge and Whitechurch dispensary is within the Cork Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,490; and, in 1839-40, it expended £107 8s., and administered to 1,324 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Title composition and gross income, £784 12s. 4d.; nett, £734 12s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Aghabullogue, in the dio. of Cloyne, and the office of vicar-general and commissary-special of that dio.; and is non-resident in Whitechurch. A curate receives a salary of £90. The church was built in 1801, by means of an unreported sum raised by subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 120; attendance 28. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Garrycloyne. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 2,857; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 7 scholars; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 a-year from the rector—had on their books 75 boys and 31 girls. In 1843, a National school at Whitechurch was salaried with £11 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 56 boys and 33 girls.

WHITECHURCH, a parish in the barony of Rathdown, $\frac{1}{8}$ mile south of Rathfarnham, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the villages of BALLYBODEN and EDMONSTOWN: which see. Length, north-north-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{8}$; area, 2,873 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,705; in 1841, 1,375. Houses 239. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 987. Houses 163. The southern district consists of a mountain whose summit rises 1,339 feet above sea-level, and of a portion of the declivities of the Two-Rock and the Three-Rock mountains; and the central and northern districts consist of fine arable land, brilliantly picturesque in natural feature, gorgeously ornate in sylvan decoration, and very largely disposed in villa-plots and demesne grounds. Two rivulets, tributaries of the Dodder, run down respectively the western boundary and the eastern border; and the vale of the former is traversed by the military-road from Dublin and Rathfarnham to Glencree, Glendalough, and Aughavanagh; while the glen of the latter is the picturesque Glen-Southwell or Little Dargle, commencing in a ravine on the north-west side of the Three-Rock mountain, passing down the exquisite demesnes of Glen-Southwell and Marlay, presenting a series of delightfully picturesque and romantic close views, and deriving its name of Little Dargle from its supposed miniature resemblance to the grandly romantic glen of the Dargle in the north-east of co. Wicklow. A new road commences at the hamlet of Grange, close to Glen-Southwell, passes across the declivities of the Dublin mountains at a sufficient elevation to command a view of all the plain below, crosses to the Dublin and Enniskerry road, and joins the cross road which leads from Stillorgan to Leopardstown. The view from this road includes all the city, the bay, and the environs of Dublin, reveals with minute distinctness most of the larger villas on the south side of the city, is free from any considerable extent of bleak foreground, and—excepting a view from a rustic seat in the demesne of Holly-Park, which is also in the parish of Whitechurch—is probably the best composed and the most nearly perfect of the many prospects which the summits and skirts of the Dublin mountains afford of the superb country stretching away from their base. Glen-Southwell-house is the occasional residence of Mr. Ponsouby; and in the grounds of the demesne are the displaced stones of a cromlech. Holly-Park-house, the seat of Simon Foote, Esq., is situated only about $2\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs west of Glen-Southwell-house; and is remarkable at once for the elegance of the edifice itself, the brilliance of its grounds, and the gorgeousness of its extensive views. "Holly-Park," remarks Mr. Fraser, "is remarkable for its elegant mansion, the extent and disposition of the beautiful groups and masses of holly from which it so deservedly takes its name, its position on the side of the Dublin mountains, and the magnificent views of the city and environs which it affords. From no part of the high grounds which surround the metropolis, are the city and suburbs presented in such interesting and picturesque points of view, as from the demesne of Holly-Park." Marlay-house, the fine residence of David Latouche, Esq., is situated $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north of Holly-Park-house; and among the extensive, beautiful, and venerable woods which adorn its grounds, are a remarkably large Luconbe oak, and some of the largest cedars of Lebanon anywhere to be seen in Ireland. The plantations of Glen-Southwell, Holly-Park, and Marlay, mutually adjoin; and they form a conspicuous and very pleasing mass of wood along the base and lower declivities of the Dublin mountains. The principal residences, additional to the three we have noticed, are St. Thomas, Marymount, Kilmashogue-house, Larch-Hill, Tibradene-house, Cloragh-cottage, Edmonstown, Edenfield, Hermitage, Willmount, and Catherine-Park. The present parish-church is a handsome, small, modern structure, in the pointed style of architecture, situated $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile north-west of Holly-Park-house, and on a site of 441 feet of altitude above sea-level; and the ruins of the old church stand on the neighbouring high grounds. The hamlet of Newtown and a cloth-mill are situated on the western margin of the parish, nearly a mile south of Ballyboden. The hamlet of Whitechurch stands north of the centre of the parish, about $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile west of Marlay-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarage forms part of the benefice of TALLAGHT: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £69 7s. 3d., and the rectorial for £148 3s. 10d.; and the larger portion of the latter, compounded for £96, belongs to impropricators, while the smaller portion, compounded for £52 3s. 10d., is appropriated to the deanery of Christ-church cathedral. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Gross income, £75; nett, £25. Patron, the incumbent of Tallaght. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d., and a loan of £1,107 13s. 10d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 250 to 300. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 260, and the Roman Catholics to 1,336; a parochial daily school was supported by collections at the church, and had on its books 34 boys and 36 girls; an infant school was also supported by collections at the church, and had on its books 18 boys and 20 girls; and 2 other daily schools—one of which was aided with 5s. a-week, collected in the parish by the Roman Catholic clergyman—were usually attended by about 80 scholars.

WHITECHURCH, a parish in the barony of North Naas, 24 miles north of Kill, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, 24 miles; extreme breadth, 14; area, 3,165 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 16 acres, 12 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1831, 279; in 1841, 320. Houses 50. The surface is low, consists of good land, and borrows embellishment from the woods of the adjoining parish of Straffan. The Liffey performs a beautiful stretch along the northern boundary. The principal residences are Turnings-house, Lower Turnings-house, and Lady-castle; and the chief antiquities are vestiges of a castle and a church. The interior is traversed by the road from Naas to Maynooth.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILL. [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £60, and the rectorial for £50; and the latter are impropriate in the Earl of Mayo. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 272; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

WHITECHURCH, or CASTLANE, a parish in the barony of Iverk, 2 miles north-west of Pilltown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 24 miles; extreme breadth, 14; area, 2,186 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 778; in 1841, 837. Houses 122. The surface lies on the south-western verge of the county, and extends along the Linane or Lingam rivulet to within $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile of the Suir, and to about 1 mile from Carrick-on-Suir. The land, in a general view, is good. The principal residences are Annaborough-house, Ballycastlane-house, Castle-town-house, Whitechurch-house, Ballyheneboy-house, and Killonerry-house; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of Kilcleran church and Killonerry-castle. The hamlet of Scogh is situated in the north, and the bridge of Scogh, in its vicinity, spans the Linane rivulet.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Rectorial tithe composition, £147 6s. 8d.; vicarial tithe composition, also belonging to the incumbent, £73 13s. 4d.; glebe, £40 2s. 6d. Gross income, £264 2s. 6d.; nett, £231 10s. 9d. Patron of the rectory, the Crown; of the vicarage, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilbroderan, in the dio. of Limerick; but is resident in Whitechurch. The church was built in 1766, partly by means of a gift of £184 12s. 3d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 50. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 720; a pay daily school was usually attended by about 160 scholars in summer, and 67 in winter; and 3 other daily schools—two of which were supported wholly by Mrs. Cox, and one chiefly by the rector and Lord Besborough—had on their books 60 boys and 79 girls.

WHITECHURCH, a parish in the barony of West Iffa and Offa, 3 miles south-west of Cahir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 14; area, 3,921 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,218; in 1841, 1,274. Houses 209. The surface descends south-eastward, from the watershed of the Galtee mountains to a point about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the river Suir; and its northern and central districts are mountainous, while even its southern district consists, on the average, of indifferent land. Two summits on the northern boundary have altitudes above sea-level of 1,782 and 1,577 feet; a rivulet, which traces part of the eastern boundary, and then runs along part of the eastern border, descends, in connection with the parish, from an elevation above sea-level of 1,146 feet; and a rivulet, which rises and runs a little beyond the western boundary, yet in one place touches that boundary, descends from an elevation of 1,533 feet. The principal residences are Millgrove-house, Tincurry-house, Garryroan-house, and Scartan-house. The central district is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Cork by way of Cahir.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TURNID [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £65 16s. 74d., and the rectorial for £108 18s. 54d.; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery of Lismore. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 27 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 1,249 Roman Catholics; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 113 boys and 42 girls.

WHITECHURCH, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Druin, 44 miles west-north-west of Dungarvan, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, southward, 44 miles; extreme breadth, 32; area, 9,951 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,176; in 1841, 3,403. Houses 495. Part of the southern border is occupied by a portion of Slievebrian or the Drum mountain; part of the western border consists of a portion of the valley of the Phinisk river; and most of the remainder is a conspicuous and characteristic portion of the great and beautiful dingle which extends from Dungarvan toward Cappoquin, and lies between the Drum mountain on the south, and the Cimmeragh and Knockmeledown mountains on the north. A summit on the southern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 867 feet; and the Phinisk rivulet while connected with the parish, descends from an elevation of 104 feet to one of 43 feet above sea-level. The mail-road from Waterford to Cork enters Whitechurch parish immediately west of Carriglea-house, and does not leave it till within 24 miles of Cappoquin; and its route within the limits is noticed as follows by Mr. Fraser: "At 3 miles from Dungarvan, pass on the left Carriglea, the seat of John O'Dell, Esq., where a handsome house, in the Tudor style, has been lately built; at two and a half miles on the right, the road to Clonmel, which runs up the beautifully wooded glen of the Colligan river, branches off; at five miles past Cappagh, the seat of Richard Usher, Esq., which is well defined by the extensive plantations covering the surrounding heights; at six miles on the right, Rockfield, the seat of Pierce Hely, Esq., pleasantly situated on the Finisk; and on the left, Whitechurch, the seat of Robert Power, Esq. On the acclivities of Slievegrian, to the left, the plantations, regular enclosures, and handsome farm-houses, mark out Ballintaylor, the improved estate of Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart.; and the ruins of Knockmoan-castle, an ancient seat of the Osbornes, picturesquely situated on a tall insulated rock, rising from an extensive flat surrounding tract, has a very striking effect." Knockmoan-castle, thus referred to, is one of the most picturesque buildings in the district, commands a large and beautiful panoramic prospect, and is so strong in position, both from surmounting the tall insulated rock, and from being quite surrounded by a deep morass, that it would be esteemed a post of great value by a soldier or a strategist. This fortress sustained a siege in the rebellion of 1641, and was afterwards taken, and probably reduced to nearly its present ruinous condition, by the forces of Cromwell. The principal residences, additional to those noticed in the extract from Fraser, are Clonkerdin-house, Johnstown-house, and Mount-Odell-house. "In the parish of Whitechurch," says the Rev. R. H. Ryland, "are two immense caverns, situated near each other. One of them, called Oon-a-glour, is of great size, and is divided into two chambers. In the inner one may be seen a small stream, which sinks under ground at Ballinacourty, and after passing through this cave, is seen again above ground at Knockane, after performing a subterraneous course of nearly a mile in length. The other cavern, called Oon-na-mort, is likewise divided into many chambers, and has been occupied more than once as a place of religious retirement." A black marble, without the least intermixture of white, occurs near Kilcrump. A fair is held at Whitechurch on Aug. 5. —This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £175, and the rectorial for £350; and the latter are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The vicarages of Whitechurch and LICKORAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Whitechurch. Gross income, £200 12s. 6d.; nett, £189 7s. 5½d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The incumbent is non-resident; and a curate receives a salary of £90. The church was built in 1827, by means of a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 22. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 560; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to chapels in the parishes of Aghish and Ardmore. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 29, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 3,273, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 3,822; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year and other advantages from John Musgrave, Esq.—had on their books 147 boys and 81 girls; and there was also a daily school in Lickoran. In 1843, a National school at Ballintaylor had on its books 54 boys and 33 girls.

WHITECHURCH, a parish, 4½ miles south by west of New Ross, and partly in the barony of Bantry, but chiefly in that of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Bantry section, 765 acres, 15 perches; of the Shelbourne section, 4,577 acres, 32 perches. Pop., of the whole, in 1831, 1,328; in 1841, 1,384. Houses 200. Pop. of the Shelbourne section, in 1841, 1,205. Houses 177. The surface extends along the river Barrow, and forms a very beautiful portion of the conjoint environs of New Ross, Ballyhack, and Waterford. Slieve-Cailtia, or Slieve-Kielter, on the eastern border, soars up from the plain to an altitude of 888 feet above sea-level; and forms a very remarkable feature in a great extent of country, and a magnificent background to the immediate scenery of the Barrow. The sides of the mountain are variously arable land, pasture, and bog; and the summit is an extended tableau which serves as a good sheep-walk. This mountain was one of the temporary stations of the rebel force, during the rebellion of 1798. See WEXFORD (COUNTY). The demesne of Stokestown, principally the seat of J. Deane, Esq., but including also two other seats, spreads out a large and beautiful sheet of wood, athwart all the Bantry section of the parish, and along a great bend of the river Barrow. Pilltown, the seat of Mr. Glascott, is in the south; and Killowen, the seat of another Mr. Glascott, is on the Barrow, a little south of the centre. The three seats in the Stokestown demesne are Stokestown-castle, Stokestown-house, and Landscape-house. A black mould, resembling tin ore, occurs in several places. Some good quarries of stone and slate are worked. The soil is, in general, light; and the principal manures are seaweed and the silt of the Barrow. The principal antiquity is the old church of Stokestown. The principal hamlets are Whitechurch, Barrack-village, Dunganstown, Oldcourt, and Ballyleskin. The road from New Ross to Duncannon passes through the interior. —This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £348 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £3. The rectories of Whitechurch and KILMOKEA [see that article] constitute the benefice of Whitechurch, and the corps of Whitechurch prebend. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 2,553. Gross income, £679 3s. 1d.; nett, £607 13s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £70. The church is situated at the hamlet of Whitechurch, but is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 150; attendance from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapel of Whitechurch has an attendance of from 800 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmokea. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 87, and the Roman Catholics to 1,311; the Protestants of the union to 122, and the Roman Catholics to 2,533; 3 daily schools in the parish had on their books 96 boys and 70 girls; and there were also 3 daily schools in Kilmokea. One of the schools in the parish was parochial, and was aided with some advantages from Mr. Glascott, and £8 a-year from subscription; one was situated at Ballyly, and was supported with £12 a-year from the National Board, and £13 from local subscription; and one was situated at Stokestown, and was endowed with a house, two acres of ground, and £50 a-year of salary, from a legacy of the late Mrs. Paul of Stokestown.

WHITECHURCH, co. Down. See BALLYWALTER.

WHITECHURCH-GLYNN, a parish, 2½ miles north by east of Taghmon, and partly in the barony of West Shelmallee, but chiefly in that of Bantry, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, north-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the West Shelmallee section, 22 acres, 24 perches; of the Bantry section, 7,165 acres, 2 roads, 13 perches. The Shelmallee section is uninhabited. Pop. of the Bantry section, in 1831, 1,738; in 1841, 1,960. Houses 355. About 500 plantation acres are unprofitable; but the remainder of the surface consists, for the most part, of good land. The principal seat is Bricketstown-house, and is situated in the south; the principal hamlets are Barry's Cross Roads, Bloody-Gap, and Glynn,—the last situated on the eastern verge; and the principal antiquities are a cromlech, the ruins of a church, and the sites of two other churches. The north road from Wexford to New Ross, and the road from Taghmon to Enniscorthy, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KILLURIN [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £214 13s. 9d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £45 7s. 4½d., and are impropriate in Lord Portsmouth. A Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Glynn, but within the parish of Killurin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 1,700; and there was no school.

WHITECROSS, a hamlet in the parish of Ballymore, barony of Upper Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands at the north-eastern extremity of the barony, and at the intersection of the road from Market-hill to Forkhill, with that from Newtown-Hamilton to Poyntz-Pass, 2 miles south of Mount-Norris, and 3½ north-east of Newtown-Hamilton.

WHITEGATE, a large fishing village in the parish of Aghada, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the east side of Cork Harbour, 2 miles north of Roche's Point, 2½ south-east by south of Cove, and 5 south-west of Cloyne. In its vicinity are Carlisle Fort, one of the two fortifications for defending the entrance of Cork Harbour; Corkbeg, the beautifully situated demesne of Mr. Fitzgerald; Whitegate-house, the closely adjoining residence of Mrs. B. Fitzgerald; and several other neat villas. The village occupies a delightful situation, and shares the luxuries and the superb views of Cork Harbour. Area of the village, 71 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,129. Houses 212. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 75; in manufactures and trade, 108; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 52; on their own manual labour, 155; on means not specified, 20.

WHITEGATE, a hamlet, and the site of a dispensary, within the Kilkenny Poor-law union, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 6,506; and, in 1839, it received £81 14s., and expended £87. But the Commissioners report it as having seemingly been instituted rather for the getting up of a salary to a surgeon, than for the actual benefit of the poor.

WHITEHALL, a village in the parishes of Shankill and Kilmacohill, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. See PAULTOWN.

WHITEHEAD, a headland in the parish of Templecorran, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It screens the north side of the entrance of Belfast Lough; and is situated 2 miles south-south-west of Black Head, and 4 east-north-east of Carrickfergus.

WHITEHILL, a considerable elevation on the mutual border of the baronies of Lower Slane and Upper Slane, about 4½ miles north-north-west of the town of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, and commands an interesting prospect of the surrounding country. "Near us are some of the fairest portions of Louth and Meath, and at a distance the higher parts of Monaghan and Cavan. In summer this fertile tract of low, round smiling hills, with the narrow valleys winding around them, is exquisite, but when autumn spreads her treasures to the sun, it is rich beyond comparison."

WHITEHILL, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clogher, and on the north-eastern border of co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Its post town is Lowthers-town; and its chapels are situated at Whitehill, Coagh, and Castle-Archdall.

WHITEHORSE, a small fishing harbour in the parish of Durrus, barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the south-east side of Bantry bay, 4½ miles south-west of the town of Bantry. It is a coast-guard station; and, in 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within its district, 8 half-decked vessels with 40 men, and 218 row-boats with 1,075 men.

WHITEHOUSE, a demesne, a manufacturing locality, and a group of three villages, in the parish of Carrumoney, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. The central point of these places is situated on the north-west side of Belfast Lough, and on the road from Belfast to Carrickfergus and Larne, 3½ miles north by east of Belfast, and 4½ south-west of Carrickfergus. The demesne is the seat of Mr. Stewart; and, with its cheerful expanse of wood, forms an agreeable feature on the shore. The manufactory is a large cotton-mill, first erected in 1784, and then the earliest which existed in Ireland; and it now belongs to Messrs. Grimshaw, sons of the gentleman by whom the cotton trade was introduced.

See BELFAST (TOWN or). One of the three villages is usually called White-abbey, though its proper name is Whitehouse-abbey; it is situated to the west of the road from Belfast to Carrickfergus; and it acquired its name from a monastic pile, whose history is obscure or lost. "Of White-abbey," says the Rev. John Dubourdieu, "there are considerable remains, but no records. In Lord Macartney's papers, it is said to have been the daughter of some other religious house not in that part of the country. As there was a Premonstrat or White friars abbey at Dryburgh in Scotland, and as this was of the same order, probably it was from it that it took its rise, as was the case with Woodburn, near Carrickfergus. It is much more likely that White-abbey was that named Druin La Croix, than the other, because there are accounts of the latter to 1326, whilst of the former there are none; for a paper granting a lease of certain lands is dated from Woodburn in the year above mentioned." The other two villages are called respectively Lower Whitehouse and Upper Whitehouse. A church was recently built at Whitehouse by the Church-extension Society. The Whitehouse dispensary is within the Belfast Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 2,191 acres, with a pop. of 6,000; and, in 1839, it expended £88 17s. 9d., and administered to 2,191 patients. A court of petty-sessions is held at Whitehouse on the third Thursday of every month. The picturesque, romantic, and far-seeing mountain of Cave-hill, overlooks the south-west side of the Whitehouses; a series of beautiful villas, beginning with Green-castle, occupies nearly the whole of the intermediate distance to Belfast; and the entire vicinity is replete with fine combinations of picturesque natural features, and rich artificial decorations. Area of the village of Whitehouse-abbey, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 391; in 1841, 650. Houses 82. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 23; in manufactures and trade, 101; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 50; on their own manual labour, 79; on means not specified, 3. Area of Lower Whitehouse, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 256. Houses 34. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufactures and trade, 14; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 16; on their own manual labour, 20; on means not specified, 12. Area of Upper Whitehouse, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 825. Houses 111. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 44; in manufactures and trade, 74; in other pursuits, 12. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 46; on their own manual labour, 80; on means not specified, 1.

WHITE MOUNTAIN, one of the eastern summits of the Blackstairs mountains, on the mutual border of the parishes of St. Mullins and Templeudigan, barony of Bantry, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is situated 3 miles north-east of the junction-point of the counties of Wexford, Carlow, and Kilkenny, and has an altitude of 1,259 feet above the level of the sea.

WHITE MOUNTAIN, one of the Sperrin mountains on the mutual border of the baronies of Kenauht and Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It overhangs the south-west side of the Pass of Glenshane, midway between Maghera and Dungiven; it is confronted by Carnthorpe on the opposite side of the Pass; and its summit has an altitude of 1,996 feet above the level of the sea.

WHITEPOINT, a village in the parish of Clonmel, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on Great Island, in the vicinity of Cove Area, 18 acres. Pop., in 1841, 401. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 19; in manufactures and trade, 20; in other pursuits, 56. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 13; on their own manual labour, 43; on means not specified, 28.

WHITE-RIVER, a rivulet of the county of Louth, Leinster. It rises on the east side of Belpatrick mountain, in the parish of Collon, and runs 5 miles east-north-eastward, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ northward, to a confluence with the Dee, in the vicinity of the hamlet and demesne of Drumcar. In the latter part of its course, it waters the village of Dunleer.

WHITEROCKS, a small harbour in the parish of Killinchy, barony of Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the west side of Lough Strangford, about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the village of Killinchy; it has a pier, and accommodates vessels of considerable burden; and it is a place of shipment for corn and other agricultural produce.

WHITETOWN, a village in the parish of Carlingford, barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. It is situated on the sea-board of the extremity of Carlingford peninsula, 1 mile west-south-west of Bellagran Point, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-east of Cooley Point, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of the town of Carlingford. In its vicinity are Willmount-house and Mount-Dobbin-house. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 370; in 1841, 334. Houses 62. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38; in manufactures and trade, 14; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 13; on their own manual labour, 45; on means not specified, 3.

WHITE-STRAND, a beautiful little bay in the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated on the north-west side of the Kenmare estuary, 7 miles south-west of Sneem. About a mile from it is WEEZ-CORR: which see.

WHITEWATER (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. It rises on the northern verge of the barony, within $\frac{1}{4}$ mile of the source of the Bann, and runs about 7 miles southward and 1 mile westward to the head of a small estuarial expansion of Lough Carlingford, on the boundary between the barony of Mourne and that of Upper Iveagh. It flows principally among the Mourne mountains, and through the noble demesne of Mourne-Park, and down the brilliant sea-board of Carlingford Lough; and is, in consequence, a stream of powerful attractions to a lover of the picturesque.

One of its chief tributaries among the mountains bears the name of Yellow-Water.

WHITEWATER (THE), one of the tributary streamlets which issue from among the Fewes mountains, co. Armagh, Ulster.

WHITFIELD, the beautiful demesne of William Christmas, Esq., in the parishes of Kilmeaden and Lisnaskill, barony of Middlebird, co. Waterford, Munster. It adjoins the Waterford and Cork railroad, 1 mile south of the river Suir, and $\frac{1}{4}$ miles west-south-west of Waterford. A quarry of roofing slates was worked to some extent on the Whitfield estate; but, in consequence of the smallness of the slates, it was relinquished. In the vicinity of Whitfield were discovered, about 30 years ago, two stone chambers, somewhat resembling, though on a small scale, the wonderful monument of New-Grange, in co. Meath. See NEW-GRANGE. "On the removal of a vast heap of stones which lay for ages on the side of the road, and from which portions were taken away from time to time, to be used in repairing, a large flag was observed, which, when removed, discovered a circular opening into an arched or vaulted apartment, constructed in the shape of a beehive. It was composed of flat stones, the higher projecting beyond the lower, and tapered into a point, which was covered with a flag. On entering into it, a narrow passage was discovered, leading from one side, but it was almost filled up with rubbish and clay; another chamber was found at no great distance. These buildings are about five or six feet high, and are supposed to have been used as tombs." [Ryland's Waterford.]

WHITING-BAY, a bay in the parishes of Ardmore, Lisgenan, and Kinsalbeg, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Ardogianna Head, which screens the east side of its entrance, is situated 2 miles west of Rann Head, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of the village of Ardmore; and the headland which screens the west side of its entrance is situated $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of the entrance of Youghal Harbour, or the mouth of the Blackwater. It measures $\frac{1}{2}$ mile across the entrance, penetrates the land $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile northward, has a nearly semicircular outline, and presents a beautiful sweep of shore, agreeably featured with several small bathing lodges. An official paper, published in 1836, says, "Whiting bay requires a landing-place for the fishing-boats which resort to it with sea-nets in summer, when shoals of sprat, skad, and mackerel, are seen off the bay: a small quay might be erected at little expense."

WICKLOW,

A maritime county of the province of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Dublin; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the county of Wexford; on the south-west, by the county of Carlow; and on the west, by the county of Kildare. Though streams and watersheds constitute a very large aggregate of the landward boundary-lines, yet they so frequently break one another, and are so very often interrupted by stretches of artificial boundary, that they cannot be regarded as characteristically indicating the county's limits. With exceptions of no great comparative magnitude, however, all the landward boundaries may be pronounced nearly identical with the abutments or terminating ramparts of a vast congeries of lofty uplands on the middle of the east division of the province. The political boundaries, measured in a series of straight lines, but without including minor curvatures, co-extend 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles with the county of Dublin, 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ with the Irish sea, 23 $\frac{1}{2}$ with the county of Wexford, 25 $\frac{1}{2}$ with the county of Carlow, and 24 $\frac{1}{2}$ with the county of Kildare. The longest line which can be drawn within the county due southward, extends along the sea-board, falls upon the southern extremity of the coast-line, and measures $26\frac{1}{2}$ miles; the longest line which can be drawn due westward, extends from Wicklow Head, and measures $27\frac{1}{2}$ miles; the longest line which can be drawn in any direction, extends south-west by southward from the northern extremity of the coast-line to the west side of Slieveboy, and measures $34\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and the longest line which can be drawn in a direction at right angles with the preceding, falls upon the southern extremity of the coast-line, and measures 26 miles. The area of the county comprises 280,393 acres of arable land, 200,754 of uncultivated land, 17,600 of continuous woods, 341 of towns, and 1,090 of water,—in all, 500,178 acres. Of the unimproved land, 130,000 acres have an elevation exceeding 1,000 feet; about 20,000 may be drained and advantageously cultivated; 70,000 may be improved for pasture; and 111,000 acres are unimprovable.

Coasts.—The coast-line, from the boundary with co. Dublin to Wicklow Head, extends 14 miles, and trends prevailing in the direction of south by east; and that from Wicklow Head to the boundary with co. Wexford, extends $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and trends prevailing in the direction of south-south-east. The whole coast, generally viewed, is inhospitable to navigators; it offers no better retreat to even the smallest craft than the poor harbours of Wicklow and Arklow; it presents to the sea not one salient angle, and scarcely even a considerable projection; it exhibits, for the most part, two sweeps of shore which deviate from the straight line only by gentle curvatures; it suffers no indentation from the sea in the form of either bay or considerable creek; and, though of no great average altitude in itself, it is immediately overlooked, from end to end, by such a series of hills and mountains, of very various height and very diversified character, as render its scenery both powerfully and beautifully picturesque. Bray Head, near its northern extremity, is a most imposing object, and rises to the altitude of 791 feet above sea-level; Wicklow Head derives conspicuousness and importance from being the elbow of the whole line of the east coast of Ireland south of Dublin bay; and it has an altitude of 268 feet; Maugher or Ardmore Point is situated $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Wicklow Head, and has an altitude of 84 feet; Mizen Head is situated 4 miles south-south-west of Maugher Point, and has an altitude of 41 feet; and Arklow Rock is situated 2 miles from the boundary with co. Wexford, forms a conspicuous object, and has an altitude of 411 feet. The principal features between the boundary with co. Dublin and Bray Head, are two martello towers, a landing-place, and Periwinkle Rocks; between Bray Head and Wicklow Head, two coast-guard stations, Greystones, Cobbler's Bulk, the Branches, Leemore-Strand, Six-Mile-Point, Five-Mile-Point, the mouth of the river Vartrey, and Bride's Head; between Wicklow Head and Maugher Point, two lighthouses, Long Rock, and Seapark Point; between Maugher Point and Mizen Head, Jack's Hole, a coast-guard station, Brittas bay, North Copple, and South Copple; and between Mizen Head and Arklow Rock, a coast-guard station and the mouth of the Ovoca river. A series of shoals or sand banks flanks the greater part of the coast, at the distance of from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and includes, on the north, a small part of the great bank of Kish,—on the south, the greater part of Arklow bank,—and between these extreme banks, those of Bray, Codling-Ridges, the Holes, South Ridge, and the India Grounds.

the county, to the mean breadth of between 4 and 5 miles, is a brilliant band of tumulated ground, constantly changeful in feature, decidedly mountainous in the extreme north, merely hill over most of the centre and the south, everywhere abounding in abrupt transitions, now nearly subsiding into plain and now almost claiming to be mountainous, generally rich in hollows, woodlands, and villa-grounds, and magnificently crossed, in respectively the north, the centre, and the south, by the Glens of the Dargle and the Downs, the Devil's Glen, and the vale of the Ovoca. The central district, extending from the extreme north to near the extreme south, with a breadth of from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 13 miles, is grandly mountainous, abounds in the stern and sublime features of alpine landscape, embosoms multitudes of savagely picturesque and beautifully romantic scenes, and consists of a lofty central summit-line, crossed in but five places by roads, and ramifying along both sides, but particularly along the east, into masses and ridges of lateral mountains, more or less parallel in direction, and enclosing series of profound vales and glens. Three of the gaps or alpine defiles, through which roads cross the summit-line of this great district, are Sally Gap, near the north, with an elevation of 1,631 feet above sea-level; Wicklow Gap, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Sally Gap, with an elevation of 1,569 feet; and the gap at the south side of Table Mountain, 3 miles south-west of Wicklow Gap, with an elevation of 2,266 feet. The principal glens on the east side, are Glencree, extending eastward toward the glen of the Dargle, and toward the gorgeously-featured hollow of Powerscourt; the glen of the Avonmore, extending southward from above Lough Tay and past Lough Dan; Glenmacnass, extending south-south-eastward to a convergence with the glen of the Avonmore; Glendasan and Glendalough, extending respectively south-eastward and eastward to a convergence near the foot of Glenmacnass; and Glenmalur, extending south-eastward from the gap at Table mountain, to a convergence with the glen of the Avonmore at "the Meeting of the Waters." The principal glens on the west side of the great summit-line, are the upper part of the glen of the Liffey, winding circuitously in the north; the glen of the King's river, extending northward to a convergence with the vale of the Liffey; and especially the glen of Imaile, extending westward from a series of small but stupendous ravines on the west side of the monarch-mountain, Lugnaquilla. The northern part of the western district of the county has a small average breadth, and consists of the beautifully-featured and pleasantly hill-screened vale of the Liffey, with the convergence upon it of the vale of the King's river; the central part of the western district has an extent of only a few square miles, and consists of a far-extending ramification of the great mountain-region of the county, here having for its chief feature the summit of Slieve-Gadoue, and acting as a watershed between the river-system of the Liffey and the river-system of the Slaney; and the southern part of the western district measures about 9 miles in length, and about $4\frac{1}{2}$ in mean breadth, consists principally of the valley of the Slaney, and is featured with comparative softness, yet with considerable beauty. The south-western district is nearly identical with the barony of Shillelagh, forms a wing or projecting district of the county, differs very perceptibly in character from all the other districts, and may be described as an irregular and flowingly-outlined series of pleasant vales and lofty hills.

The principal summits of the county, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Kippure, on the northern boundary, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles west

by south of Bray, 2,473 feet; a height on the boundary, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west-north-west of Kippure, 2,364 feet; Butter mountain, $\frac{4}{5}$ miles north-east of Blessington, 1,459 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile east-north-east of Butter mountain, 1,532 feet; a height $\frac{3}{4}$ miles east-north-east of Butter mountain, 2,033 feet; a height on the boundary, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-east by north of Kippure, 1,716 feet; a height on the boundary, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-north-east of Kippure, 1,607 feet; a height 2 miles east-north-east of Kippure, 1,225 feet; a height $\frac{3}{4}$ miles west of Enniskerry, 1,047 feet; a height $\frac{2}{4}$ miles west of Enniskerry, 807 feet; a height on the boundary, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles west-north-west of Enniskerry, 1,927 feet; a height on the boundary, $\frac{2}{4}$ miles west-north-west of Enniskerry, 1,825 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west-north-west of Enniskerry, 1,482 feet; a height on the east side of the Scalp, on the boundary, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north of Enniskerry, 912 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south by west of Bray, 1,126 feet; Sugarloaf mountain, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-south-east of Enniskerry, 1,631 feet; Bray Head, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-south-east of Bray, 791 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-west of Sugarloaf mountain, 1,073 feet; the source of the Liffey, $\frac{2}{4}$ miles south-east of Kippure, 1,715 feet; Djouce mountain, 4 miles south-east of Kippure, 2,384 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-west of Djouce mountain, 1,056 feet; a height $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-south-east of Kippure, 1,056 feet; Sorrel-hill, 3 miles south-east by east of Blessington, 1,975 feet; a height 3 miles east by south of Sorrel-hill, 2,364 feet; Sally Gap, 2 miles south-south-east of Kippure, 1,631 feet; a height $\frac{2}{4}$ miles south-east by east of Sorrel-hill, 2,783 feet; a height $\frac{5}{4}$ miles west by south of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 1,764 feet; a height $\frac{4}{4}$ miles west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 1,705 feet; a height $\frac{4}{4}$ miles west-south-west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 1,581 feet; a height 2 miles south-west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 1,183 feet; a height 2 miles south by west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 1,122 feet; a height $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-south-west of Sorrel-hill, 1,551 feet; Thonelagee, $\frac{6}{4}$ miles south-east of Blessington, 2,693 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-north-east of Thonelagee, 2,307 feet; Slieveroe, on the boundary, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west-south-west of Blessington, 1,093 feet; Slieve-Gadue, $\frac{5}{4}$ miles south-south-west of Blessington, 1,791 feet; a height 4 miles south by west of Slieve-Gadue, 1,037 feet; a height 4 miles south-west of Slieve-Gadue, 861 feet; a height $\frac{2}{4}$ miles south-west of Thonelagee, 1,930 feet; Comaderry mountain, $\frac{2}{4}$ miles south of Thonelagee, 2,296 feet; Lugduff mountain, 2 miles south-east of Comaderry, 2,148 feet; a height $\frac{2}{4}$ miles east-north-east of Comaderry, 1,833 feet; Troopers-town-hill, $\frac{6}{4}$ miles west of Wicklow, 1,407 feet; Carrikmore, 4 miles west of Wicklow, 1,252 feet; Knockree, 3 miles south-east of Lugduff, 1,559 feet; Lugnaquilla, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-east of Rathdangan, 3,039 feet; Croghan, 4 miles south-east of Lugnaquilla, 2,175 feet; a height $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south by west of Troopers-town-hill, 704 feet; Collon-hill, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-south-west of Wicklow, 782 feet; Bola-hill, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south of Carrikmore, 894 feet; Cushlawn, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south of Knockree, 1,318 feet; Mount-Culdeen, 5 miles east of Baltinglass, 2,143 feet; Tinorin on the boundary, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west by south of Baltinglass, 1,023 feet; Knockpatrick on the boundary, 2 miles south-west of Baltinglass, 851 feet; Knockree, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-east by east of Baltinglass, 593 feet; Slievenamoe, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-south-east of Lugnaquilla, 1,478 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south by west of Slievenamoe, 865 feet; a height 5 miles south of Slievenamoe, 1,416 feet; a height $\frac{6}{4}$ miles south-south-east of Rathdangan, 1,312 feet; Croghan-Kinshela, on the southern boundary, 6 miles west of Arklow, 1,985 feet; Arklow Rock, 1 mile south of Arklow, 411 feet; a height $\frac{2}{4}$ miles west of Arklow, 410 feet; and Kilkenny-hill, on the southern boundary, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-east of Carnew, 1,063 feet.

Waters.—The river Liffey, and its tributary, the King's river, drain the north-western district into the counties of Kildare and Dublin; the river Slaney, and its tributaries, the Derreen and the Derry, drain the south-western district into the counties of Carlow and Wexford; the Ovoca, formed by the large indigenous rivulets, Avonmore, Avonbeg, and Aughrim, drains the central and the south-eastern districts into the sea at Arklow; five or six small rivulets drain part of the eastern district into the sea between Arklow and Wicklow Head; the Vartrey river drains a chief part of the eastern district into the sea at Wicklow; and the Bray river drains the north-eastern district into the sea, on the boundary with co. Dublin, at Bray. The principal lakes, together with their respective surface-elevation above sea-level, are Lower Lough Bray, 1,225 feet; Upper Lough Bray, 1,458 feet; Lough Tay, 897 feet; Lough Dan, 685 feet; Lough Ouler, 1,829 feet; Lough Nahangan, 1,384 feet; the lower lake of Glendalough, 411 feet; and Broad Lough, the estuarial expansion of the Vartrey parallel to the sea above the town of Wicklow. The items of the water-area of the county exhibited in the maps of the Ordnance Survey, are 10 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches of water in the parish of Ballinacor, 5 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches of water in the South Ballinacor section of the parish of Knockrath, 207 acres, 3 roods of Broad Lough in the parish of Rathnew, 99 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches of water in the parish of Calary, 506 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch of water in the parish of Derrylossory, 2 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches of water in the North Ballinacor section of the parish of Knockrath, 16 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches of tideway in the parish of Arklow, 59 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches of tideway in the parish of Kilbride, 38 acres, 25 perches of water in the parish of Boystown, 35 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches of water in the parish of Burgage, 13 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches of water in the parish of Hollywood, 64 acres, 3 roods of Lower Lough Bray, and 28 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches of Upper Lough Bray in the parish of Powerscourt.

Climate.—The climate of the county of Wicklow is, on the whole, very healthy. The eastern district, in all such portions as want local shelter, is cold during the prevalence of the easterly winds of spring; yet it does not appear to suffer injury in its vegetation, but presents the most luxuriant verdure on its hills, and an utter profusion of wood and beauty in its numerous vales. The bogs upon the tabular grounds of the mountains, and in some low situations toward the south, contain the only instances which occur of stagnant water; and even these bogs are totally unlike the marshes of England, sending up no pestiferous exhalations, producing no agues or other acute disorders, occasioning no putrefaction, but, on the contrary, possessing an astringent principle which preserves shrubs, trees, and even organized bodies, which are deposited in them, from decay. Nothing more seems wanted than an increase of sylvan shelter to render the county of Wicklow, in the aggregate character of its climate, equal to any and superior to most other districts of the kingdom.

Minerals.—Granitic rocks constitute a conspicuous district of the county, about $\frac{8}{4}$ miles in mean breadth, extending south-south-westward from the middle of the northern boundary, and comprising a principal portion of the great granitic tract of Leinster, or of the counties of Dublin, Wicklow, Carlow, Wexford, and Kilkenny. Metamorphic rocks, altered from their original character by the chemical action of the granite, and consisting principally of clay slate passing into greenstone or greenstone slate, or serpentine, or crystalline micaceous slate, or micaceous shining slate, or flint slate, constitute considerable bands of country along both sides of the granitic district, and also several small isolated tracts within that district, particularly in the vicinity of Lugnaquilla. Transition rocks, consisting principally of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate, constitute the platform of all the other districts of the county, and also by far the greater part of the hills by which that platform is variegated. Quartz rock constitutes two or three pendicles amidst the granitic territory, and nine or ten pendicles, several of them rather considerable in magnitude, in the districts of the transition rocks. Nine or ten protrusions of greenstone, most of them rather small, occur through out the south-east of the county; and a portion of a greenstone protrusion of considerable extent lies within the north-western boundary.

The principal mines worked within the county in 1838, were the Luganure lead mines, employing from 150 to 300 men, and annually producing from 1,200 to 3,600 tons, worth £15 per ton; the Ballymurtagh copper mine, annually producing from 5,000 to 6,000 tons, worth £4 per ton; the Cronebane and Tigroney copper mines, annually producing from 4,000 to 5,000 tons, worth £4 per ton; the Connoree copper mine, annually producing from 1,000 to 1,500 tons, worth £5 per ton; the Ballygahan copper mine, annually producing from 200 to 300 tons, worth £4 per ton; and the Glenmalur lead mine, annually producing from 180 to 200 tons, worth £15 per ton.

"The principal features of the Wicklow district of copper mines," says Dr. Kane in his recent work on the Industrial Resources of Ireland, "have been so accurately described by Mr. Weaver, who was for many years principal conductor of the mines, that I shall do little more than abridge his description, and add thereto such facts as I have been able to collect illustrative of their subsequent progress and their present condition. The metalliferous clay-slate district occupies but a small space, being very narrow in breadth, and not more than ten miles long, from Croghan-Kinshela on the south, towards west Acton on the north. Metallic substances are diffused throughout the entire space, in slight layers, in contemporaneous veins, and in massy beds, which last are principally composed of copper pyrites and iron pyrites. The line of the excavations of the works in Connoree and Tigroney extended in 1819 upwards of 1,000 fathoms. At various depths in the mass of the clay-slate occur beds of what is technically termed soft ground, which consists of decomposed slate of various tints, abounding in particles of pyrites of iron, and sometimes copper and arsenic, and usually accompanied by a considerable body of greyish or yellowish-white clay. When brought to the surface and exposed to the action of the air, these bodies rapidly decompose, and absorbing oxygen form alum, sulphate of iron, and sulphate of copper. A similar decomposition takes place under ground, and hence the drainage water of the district contains a very sensible quantity of copper, which has been, and indeed is, economized by conveying the water as well from the lower as from the upper mines into tanks, where the muddy particles are allowed to subside. The clean water is then run into pits containing scrap iron, which causes the precipitation of the copper and dissolves in its place. An idea of the quantity of copper thus saved from waste, may be formed from the fact that during Mr. Weaver's management there were 442½ tons of impure precipitated copper sold, the value of which was £12 12s. per ton. The quantity of iron consumed was 429 tons 14 cwt. Each bed of soft ground contains one or more layers of copper pyrites, or mere iron pyrites, varying in thickness, and sometimes acquiring a breadth of several fathoms. Five of such beds are met with, one in Connoree, two in the old or upper mine of Cronebane, one in the new or lower mine, and one in Tigroney. That in Connoree contains a bed of ore about four feet thick, consisting of a fine-grained intermixture of galena (sulphuret of lead), grey ore (sulphuret of antimony), and blende (sulphuret of zinc), with pyrites of copper, iron, and arsenic. A similar compound occurs in the second bed of the upper mine of Cronebane. The more southern bed contains much iron pyrites, and has yielded at different periods some thousand tons of grey copper ore, which, in the greater depth of the mine, passes into copper pyrites. The third bed, in Cronebane, situated on the western side of the hill, has proved the most valuable, the greater part of its width being occupied by copper ore, which in the upper part consisted principally of grey ore, but at greater depths passed into copper pyrites with iron pyrites. The bed of solid ore has varied from one to three fathoms in breadth; no quartz or spar of any kind attend these beds. The more productive parts of the bed have, in several instances, yielded from ten to fifteen tons of merchantable ore per cubic fathom, the average produce of which has varied from five to seven per cent. of copper. The bed in Tigroney had yielded only iron pyrites when Mr. Weaver wrote. Beds of iron pyrites, from a few feet to some fathoms in thickness, have appeared in the firm and flinty slate, as in the deep levels of Tigroney and Cronebane. In the flinty slate are found also several contemporaneous veins of quartz, having rich copper pyrites, accompanied sometimes by azure copper ore, and whose average produce is from 10 to 12 per cent. of copper. These veins range with the slate, ramifying, and where they coalesce, forming a body sometimes twelve feet wide, with four or five feet of solid ore, but they seldom continue productive for more than thirty fathoms in length. Small veins of this description are very numerous. The mines of Connoree, Cronebane, and Tigroney, so often mentioned above, are situated on the north bank of the Ovoca river. The structure and circumstances of the southern side, on which are the mines of Ballymurtagh and Ballygahan, are precisely similar. It is, therefore, unnecessary to enter on a description, which should be mainly a repetition of what has been already said. The quantity and value of the ore raised in this district at various periods, may be inferred from the following numbers. In the twelve years ending 1799, the mines of Cronebane yielded 7,533 tons of ore, containing 9 per cent. of copper. In the 12 years ending 1811, the produce was 1,934½ tons, containing 5½ per cent. of copper. After this period, owing to many conspiring causes, very little ore was raised for many years. Mr. Griffith states, that in 1826 the copper ore raised in Cronebane sold in Swansea for £12,354 14s., and the ore raised at Ballymurtagh sold for £373. The latter was worked by the Hibernian Mining Company on a single metallic bed, containing copper pyrites with some blende. The lode (vein) at eighty fathoms depth yielded four tons of dressed ore, of 5½ per cent. produce per fathom of driving. The ore he calculates cost the Company, when finished, £7 per ton, and certainly left little, if any, profit.

"The following tables, illustrative of the actual condition of the mines of this district, have been extracted from the notes of sales at Swansea, and from notices published in the Mining Journal. The quan-

ties of copper ore from each mine, which was sold at Swansca, and its value, was in 1836:

It would hence appear, that the quantity of ore raised in this district had very much diminished since 1836, but such is not actually the case; on the contrary, the activity of industry in those mines, as well as the profits to their undertakers, is, as I understand, steadily on the increase. The quantity of ore sold at Swansca has, however, fallen off very much, as is shown by the above returns, owing to the copper being now extensively smelted in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, and also to the poorer ores of the Wicklow district being extensively exported to various localities of chemical manufacture, where the sulphur, as well as the copper which they contain, is economized. The true produce of this district at present may be judged by the following table of the ores raised and sold from the Ballymurtagh mine, worked by the Wicklow Copper Mining Company, for which I am indebted to the kindness of Mr. Wright.

In this table is given the quantity of iron pyrites sold by the Company; its price is included in the gross values given. It is here seen that the industry of this region has acquired a vast development within the last ten years. This arose from another branch of mining industry coming into play, the trade in iron pyrites as a source of sulphur. In the Wicklow district the copper ore is associated with such vast quantities of iron pyrites, that in order to raise it, it is necessary to quarry the latter to a large amount, which very much enhanced the cost. But when there arose an outlet for the bisulphuret of iron, the mining for the copper ore became much more remunerative, and hence the vast quantities which have been sent to market since that period. It has been seen, that by the operations of the Ballymurtagh mine, about £12,000 is annually distributed in wages to about 700 persons. Including the other mines, the total number of persons deriving employment from the mineral industry of the Ovoca district, may be considered as brought up to about two thousand."

"The granitic district of Dublin and Wicklow," says the same author in reference to the lead mines of Wicklow, "is intersected by a great number of veins containing ores of lead; they lie along its eastern boundary, and cross, in an oblique direction, the juncture of the granite with the mica-slate. Veins have been worked along this line at Dalkey, and Killiney, on Ballycorus, at Powerscourt, Djouce, Lough Bray, Lough Dan, Glensane, Glendalough, Glenmalur, and Shillelagh. Of these many have been found ultimately unproductive, and the only portions of this district which it is necessary to describe in detail, are those of Glendalough, of Glenmalur, and Ballycorus. The mountains which enclose the lake and ruins of the Seven Churches, consist of granite, through which run numerous veins of quartz, associated with which are found the ores of lead, and in some instances, traces of copper. Their general distribution is as follows. At the head of Glensane, a little above the junction of the granite and mica-slate, a vein of quartz six feet wide, with blende, galena, and some copper pyrites, passes nearly from east to west, and were it continuous would join the vein of Luganure. The latter, the most important in the district, runs altogether in granite. It crosses the mountain Comaderry, and has been accurately traced through a course of 900 fathoms; its ascertained depth being 180 fathoms. This vein is usually five feet wide, but in one place it expands to twelve feet. The principal vein-stone is quartz. The granite in contact with the lower surface of the vein is generally soft and decomposed to a depth of from one to three feet. This vein has yielded, according to Mr. Weaver, in some portions of its course, per cubic fathom, from three to four and a-half tons of galena, which is found either in layers parallel to the walls or in disseminated masses. White lead ore is not uncommon. There are also found sulphuret of zinc, copper pyrites, and phosphate of lead. The produce of this vein usually yielded seventy per cent. of metallic lead. A few fathoms west of this is another vein in the granite; it is three feet wide, and consists of quartz with galena and white lead ore. The Glendalough vein ranges east and west, crossing the glen obliquely. Its course is down the southern flank of Comaderry, and it reappears high on the mountain of the opposite side, south of the waterfall. Its line has been traced for about half-a-mile, it appears to range far into the granite on the western side, but not to penetrate much into the mica-slate. Its width varies from five to seven fathoms. The great mass of it is quartz. It contains numerous minerals, principally galena, with copper pyrites, sparry iron, and sulphate of barytes. The lead ore of this vein produces 70 per cent., and the copper ore gave from 10 to 15 per cent. of metal. In the waterfall and ravine at the head of Glendalough are smaller veins, in which lead and copper ores have been found, but on which no workings have been carried on. On the Lughanure vein, and on some smaller veins discovered on both sides of Glenasane, and which are probably outliers from it, a number of shafts have been sunk and very extensive workings made. The old Lughanure mine, as well as the Hero mine, have ceased to yield any produce; but the mine of Ripplagh, on the east, and one on the western side of the glen, lately opened at the base of Lughanure mountain, are now actively worked by the Mining Company of Ireland, and yield a very fair quantity of ore. They are termed the Lughanure mines. The state of activity of their operations and their amount of produce are shown by the quantity of dressed ore obtained, which was,

In 1843,	547½ —

The ore raised is dressed by hand labour and by machinery, to which motion is given by water-power derived from the rivulet which passes through the glen. To this Lough-nahagan serves as a copious reservoir, which has been rendered fully available to the purposes of the dressing works. The dressed ore is brought on cars to the Company's smelting works at Ballycorus, where it is worked up along with ores from other sources by processes to which I shall, after a little, return. The metallic lead is manufactured into sheet or pipe, so as to suit the markets in which it may be sold. The lead mine situated on the hill of Ballycorus, contains two lead veins, which at the surface are nearly parallel, and cross the junction of the granite and mica-slate, which takes place on the summit. In the workings these veins have been found sometimes to diverge, and at others to coalesce, and were then in every case found to yield valuable bunches of ore. These veins have latterly, however, become unproductive, and although some limited explorations are still carried on by the Mining Company, this mine cannot be reckoned as being at the present time in action. In its vicinity are situated the Mining Company's smelting works, to which all their lead ores are brought for the purpose of their reduction and manufacture. On the northern side of Glenmalur, where the granite and mica-slate join in Lugduff mountain, a powerful metalliferous vein presents itself, forming an acute angle with the course of the valley. It has been traced for above 400 fathoms, but probably extends much farther. The vein, as described by Mr. Griffith, is on an average fifteen feet thick, and excepting where there are bunches of ore, is divided into five parts. There are three feet of a soft slaty vein containing much talc, then a vein of white quartz, from one to three feet thick, which usually contains ore, next three feet of soft talcy matter similar to the first, then two feet of quartz, in which most of the ore has been found, finally, a third layer of the soft talcy matter extends to the opposite wall of the lode. The lead ore of this mine is considered to be unusually free from zinc and antimony. It has yielded very abundant produce, several large bunches or masses of ore having been met with in the course of the workings. The productiveness has, however, latterly diminished. The number of persons employed on it is at present but about thirty. On the same and on the opposite side of Glenmalur, several other veins, containing indications of lead, have been discovered, but no serious trials of them have been made."

The gold mines of Wicklow, situated in a vale among the declivities of Croghan-Kinshela, on the southern margin of the county, have already been noticed in the article CROGHAN-KINSELA: which

see. A few years ago, a London Company leased the district, and renewed the operations which had been relinquished by government as altogether unremunerating; but they conducted their researches in an imperfect and even trifling manner, and, finding them comparatively unproductive, finally abandoned them. The localities in the vale which have yielded the largest quantities of gold are Ballinvally, Ballintemple, and Killahurler. "The gold is associated with magnetic ironstone, sometimes in masses of half a hundred weight; also iron pyrites, brown and red hematite, wolfram, manganese, and fragments of tinstone in crystals, together with quartz. From the nature of these attendant minerals, of which most are known to occur in the quartz veins of the adjacent mountain, it was hoped that by tracing up the rivulets to their sources, and laying bare in various directions the underlying rock, the metalliferous veins might be discovered, from the disintegration of which the sand and soil of the streams had been produced. All such trials proved useless, and the question as to the source from whence the gold of those streams in Wicklow has been derived remains still unanswered."—Particles of native gold have been found, but never in any considerable quantity, in other localities of the county, particularly Croghan-Moira, Ballycrea, and Ballinacpogue.—Native silver was at one time found in a bed of iron ochre, in the upper ground of Cronebane; it was auriferous to the degree of 30 grains of gold in each ounce; and it occurred in exceedingly minute particles, and was extracted by fusion with lead and subsequent cupellation; but the deposit of it was long ago exhausted.—Tinstone is disseminated through the auriferous soil of Croghan-Kinshela, but not in such quantity as to be anywhere workable.—Bisulphuret of iron occurs in vast beds in association with the copper lodes of the clay-slate district; and though it was long considered not merely valueless, but absolutely a hindrance to the working of the copper mines, yet, about 9 years ago, it suddenly acquired both value and importance. "The government of Naples placed an exorbitant price on the sulphur, with which the manufacturers of England had previously been supplied from the volcanic districts of Sicily, and being driven to obtain a substitute at a cheaper rate, they had recourse to the deposits of iron pyrites in Wicklow. The mines which produce the iron pyrites, are those of Ballymurtagh, Ballygahan, Tigrony, Cronebane, and Connoree; they all contain the same sulphur course, as it is termed by the miners, which traverses them in a north-eastern and south-western direction. This mineral occurs immediately at the surface, and is raised in large quantities down to the depth of fifty feet, the lode varying in width from four to thirty-six feet, and in bunches according to the purity of the ore. The iron pyrites is indeed seldom absolutely pure; besides an intermixture of clay-slate or other rock in various proportions, it is associated with other metallic sulphurets in small quantity, and frequently with the arseniuret of iron or arsenical pyrites. These impurities influence the value, and the products, of the sulphur ore in a very sensible degree. Thus the presence of copper renders it more valuable. Mr. Barnes, in his letters on this district, shows, that the sulphur and copper ores are in no way distinct, but graduate insensibly into each other. Thus the copper ore of Ballymurtagh contains at least 30 per cent. of sulphur ore, and the greater part of the pyrites workings in the same mine, contains about 2½ per cent. of copper. The presence of from ½ to 1 per cent. of copper in the sulphur ore of commerce is not unusual. When this ore is burned in the kilns for the manufacture of sulphuric acid, the sulphuret of copper passes by oxidizement, to sulphate of copper, which may be extracted by lixiviating the slags with water, and either crystallized, or, as is more usual, decomposed by fragments of old iron, and the copper precipitated in the metallic state. When the ore contains sulphuret of zinc, this forms by the roasting, sulphate of zinc, which may be similarly extracted and crystallized. The presence of the arsenical iron is very injurious, for owing to the volatility of the arsenic, which accompanies the sulphur in all its stages of manufacture, the iron pyrites becomes unfit for the preparation of sulphur or sulphuric acid, wherever those bodies are to be applied to form medicinal substances, or that they are required pure for chemical uses; but it is yet perfectly applicable for all manufacturing and technical uses, and although the price of the Sicilian sulphur has now fallen very low, the pyrites trade has by no means diminished in proportion. During the interruption of the Sicilian trade, the quantity of pyrites annually exported from the Wicklow district, is considered to have reached 100,000 tons. It is now, however, considerably less. The returns already given for the produce in copper ore and pyrites of the Ballymurtagh mine enable a general idea to be formed of the present extent of this branch of mining. It is highly gratifying, that the favourable position in which the mines of the Avoca valley were placed by the force of the sulphur monopoly in Naples, has been sustained up to the present day by the judicious enterprise of the proprietors, and the steady improvement of the produce. Mr. Roper states the number of persons employed in this district to be about 2,000, and that from 500 to 1,000 carts are daily employed in bringing the ore to Wicklow and to Arklow for exportation."—[Kane's 'Industrial Resources of Ireland.']. Porcelain clay, of various degrees of fineness, formed by the decomposition of the felspar of granite, constitutes the agricultural soil of some tracts of the county; and kaolin of fine quality, occurs at Kilranelagh, in the vicinity of Balinglass. —Roofing-slates of excellent quality are quarried at Glamore, and in the vicinity of Rathdrum; they are identical in geognostic position and character with the roofing-slates of Bangor; and their character, for economic purposes, and as an important source of domestic industry, may be regarded as established.

Soils.—Bog of considerable depth, and covered with heath, overlies a large part of the great granitic district; and is usually incumbent on a coarse gravel of disintegrated granite, the quartz, the mica, and the felspar, intermixed in various proportions. "By forming drains down to this substratum, the intervening ground can be freed from superabundant moisture, and rendered fit for improving the surface, by burning, or such modes as may be found to be best adapted to destroy the heath, and generate those grasses best calculated for the soil and surface." Vast numbers of the rounded summits and curving acclivities of the granitic mountains are either quite bare rock, or so thinly covered with soil as to possess the most meagre vegetation. The soil of a large proportion of the other mountainous grounds of the country, like the substratum of the bog on the granite mountains, consists simply of the disintegrations of the underlying rocks, and varies in nature according to the character of these rocks, and to the degree of humus which the disintegrations have acquired. A large proportion of even the low grounds are carpeted with the detritus of the neighbouring heights; and some, as already noticed, possess rich soils of kaolinic clay, formed by the complete decomposition of the felspar of the neighbouring granite; yet very large tracts of the valleys, including most of those of the north-eastern district of the county, from the boundary with co. Dublin to a point 3 miles south of the town of Wicklow, consist of a diluvium, which bears profuse and happy evidence of having been swept hither from the breaking up of a limestone country. "This phenomenon," says the agricultural statist of the county, "arises from an infinity of rounded and blunted pebbles of limestone, found in the strata of the earth, bedded generally in low marsh, and in gravel, of which the chief part is small limestone of various granular dimensions; sometimes the marl is found more compact and indurated. These blunted and rounded pebbles of limestone have every appearance of being so formed by attrition, after having been broken off from some mass of limestone; and as they are found at very considerable height up the mountains, it might be supposed that they have been broken off from some mountains of limestone in the internal parts of the district. Yet certain it is, there is no limestone rock whatever to be found in the whole of the county of Wicklow, nor any vestige of such rock in the internal parts of the mountains. To the eastward of the mountains, until within two or three miles beyond the town of Wicklow, this pebble limestone and marl is found in greater or less quantities; and whatever has been its origin, it is probable the state in which it appears must have arisen from the retreating of the waters, as in all the grass pits and banks, where the strata are laid open, you see regular and alternate layers of sand and gravel intermixed with these rounded limestones, most likely occasioned by modern depositions long after the formation of the adjacent mountains. From whatever cause the origin of these calcareous strata is to be derived, it is to be acknowledged as a gracious present to that part of the country in which they are deposited." The soil of the lowlands of the barony of Upper Talbotstown—which will be exhibited in next section as the specimen-district of the agricultural condition of the whole county—is sometimes a yellow clay; but generally a light black mould, very various in quality, but for the most part good, and superincumbent on a subsoil of gravel or sand; and the mountains of that barony "are generally composed of a 'green flag quarry' stone in large blocks underneath, and smaller pieces near the surface, covered with a small depth of moory or peat soil, dry in most places, but springy and wet in some spots."

Agriculture.—The barony of Upper Talbotstown is treated, in the voluminous reports of the Commissioners of Poor Inquiry, published in 1836, as a specimen district of the entire county; and it is the subject of an agricultural digest in these reports, from which we made some important extracts in our article on the barony.—and of a vidimus of evidence submitted to the Commissioners, from which we shall now call a few passages. "The chief class of farmers in the district are dairy and cattle stock farmers on a small scale. The produce of the district is, on the whole, much greater than formerly, from so much land having been reclaimed or improved, from the improvement in rural economy, from the increased exertions of the farmer to meet high rents and low prices, and from the increase of population, which both cause a greater demand for food, and facilitate the production of it by the increased supply of labour. The course of crops usual in this district is as follows:—first year, after breaking up the grass lay, oats are grown; second year, potatoes manured; third year, wheat, barley, or oats, after which the land is laid down to grass either immediately, or after first repeating the crops of potatoes and corn. This rotation is carried on over every part of the farm except the wet or moory bottoms, which are not dry enough for tillage. The smallest class of occupiers here (as everywhere else in this part of Ireland), only let as much remain in grass as is sufficient to furnish hay and grass for their little stock, and even sometimes have to hire land for that purpose, keeping most of their ground under potatoes and oats. Only a few large farmers keep sheep, except on the mountain farms, some of which consist chiefly of sheep-walks. The farmers are generally careful as to the time of reaping their crops, but some let them stand till much riper than others, and in some cases many think too long. The peasantry very often, while labouring for hire, defer the cutting of their own crops, and thus incur considerable loss. They also defer their spring work too long, especially as to potatoes, sometimes for the sake of earning money by labour, but more frequently from the want of seed, and of money to buy any. They are very seldom taken away from their own work by the necessity of working for their landlords. The corn is generally thrashed immediately after harvest to satisfy various demands and expenses, of which rent is the chief. A great many farmers, however, are allowed to remain a year or more in arrears, now that corn has fallen to so low a price. The tenants who are obliged to sell their corn early, have generally sold at a considerable loss, from the large quantity thrown at once into the market. Clover is cultivated here to a considerable extent, and some vetches and trefoil are grown by the larger farmers. Only one or two gentlemen grow turnips or mangels, and this to a very small extent. The peasantry have little or no knowledge of the advantages of an alternation of crops, and they cultivate no artificial grasses but clover, which they are now beginning to grow. Deficiencies in the potato crop are not of frequent occurrence here. The farmers and the peasantry generally change the seed from heavy to light soils among each other, but seldom seek it from a distance. The small holders are often deficient in money to procure seed, and are made to pay for it the highest price which the market has attained on any one day during the season. The small farmers grow 'cups' for their own consumption, and the labourers 'lumpers'; the latter, because, although the coarsest kind, are the most productive. The labourer never grows potatoes for sale, and the lowest class of occupiers very seldom. Where the latter do so, they usually grow the same kind for that purpose that they do for their own use. The refuse, or small potatoes, are kept for pigs and fowls. The 'lumpers' are grown as the most productive kind, and the 'cups,' because combining to the greatest extent, both quantity and quality of produce. The cultivation of potatoes has increased considerably since the composition of tithes, and from the quantity of land that has been reclaimed from the introduction of lime and peat as manures, and of drill husbandry, &c., but little from stall-feeding. Old grass land is commonly broken up for con-acre. In grass it is worth about £2 per acre; when broken up for con-acre, from £8 to £10 per acre is charged, for the first and second crops of potatoes, without manure; it is then generally laid down to grass with the first crop of oats, but poverty or avarice sometimes induces the small farmer to grow two or three successive crops of oats. The successive crops are found to deteriorate in the proportion of about 5 barrels an acre. The land, if laid down with the first crop of oats, is generally found to have improved; but if more than one crop of oats has been taken, it becomes deteriorated. The con-acre tenant gets possession in March, and gives up the land in November. There is no difference in the management of dairies in the mountain and in the lowland districts. The dairy farmer employs about 4 men to every 100 acres. The butter produced here is sent to the Carlow market, where it is considered of the first quality. It is packed after each churning where they have sufficient to fill a cask at once, but, as few have, they generally wait for two or more churnings, in order to have the contents of the firkin of the same colour. The houses occupied by dairy farmers are not in any way different from those occupied by other farmers. No attention is paid to the erection of the dairy; it usually consists of a room adjoining the kitchen, but where there is no convenience in the house, one of the best of the out-buildings is used for that purpose. The same want of attention is shown to ventilation, convenience for the utensils and business of the dairy, cleanliness, and other matters, which are considered in other countries absolutely necessary to insure success in dairying. The manures in use are animal manure, lime (which is increasing of late), and some bog-stuff. The practice of burning the land no longer exists. The farmers procure their animal manure principally from their own stock, little or none from the towns. Considerable attention is paid to the collecting of other materials for manure, as earth, mud, fern, furze, heath, and lime. There is no sea-weed here, and neither bones, salt, soot, rape, nor malt dust, is used as manure. The fences are single or double ditches, with furze or quick hedges, but more usually furze; and in many cases, they are mere banks with a few straggling furze plants growing on the top or sides. The meetings are made generally by the tenants; now and then they may happen to be made by the landlord. The imperfect state of the fences gives rise to frequent litigation and breaches of the peace. In some cases the trespass of cattle occasions considerable loss; but, as trespasses are more generally committed on pasture, they usually occasion little or no damage." "I found rents in Wicklow," says Mr. Inglis in 1834, "such as, for the most part, could never be paid by the produce of the land; and the small farmers, as well as labourers, barely subsisting. High rent was the universal complaint, and the complaint was fully borne out by the wretched manner in which I found the people—Catholic and Protestant—living. And if the question be put to them, why they take land at a rent which they know it will not bear? the reply is always the same—how were they to live? what could they do? From which answer we at once arrive at the truth—that competition for land in Ireland is but the outbidings of desperate circumstances." In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, 2,620 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 2,922 of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,891 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 2,000 of upwards of 30 acres; and, within the civic districts, 23 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 7 of from 5 to 15 acres, 3 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 1 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year there were within the entire county 5,762 male farmers, 449 female farmers, 18,315 male servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 1,130 male servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 2,210 female servants and labourers above 15 years of age, 250 female servants and labourers below 15 years of age, 128 ploughmen, 179 gardeners, 2 graziers, 265 male herds above 15 years of age, 197 male herds below 15 years of age, 7 female herds above 15 years of age, 8 female herds below 15 years of age, 110 male caretakers, 12 female caretakers, 4 land-agents, 138 land-stewards, 17 gamekeepers, 42 male dairy-keepers, and 53 female dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—The breed of cattle has been greatly improved. The native breed is still preferred on mountain-farms on account of its hardy habits, and of its superior adaptation to the exposure, bleakness, and poor pasture of the situation; and the Durham or short-horn breed is generally in most request on lowland farms, on account of the symmetry of their shape, their early maturity, and their great disposition to fatten. Few Ayrshire or Kerry cows are used. The breeds of sheep in most request are the native mountain breed on the upland farms, and the large old Irish breed, crossed and improved by the Leicester breed, upon the lowland farms. "The lowland breed is not so high on the legs, but is much heavier in the carcase than formerly. The lowland breed weighs about 24 lbs. per quarter, and the mountain about 15 lbs." There has been a considerable improvement in the breeds of both the lowland and the mountain sheep, effected chiefly by crossing with the Leicester. The improvement has taken place in the quantity and quality of both meat and wool, and in the earlier maturity of the sheep. They are seldom fattened, but the mountain wethers are usually sold to the graziers for feeding at 4 years old, and the lowland wether lambs at 1½ or 2 years old. Most of the farmers keep their own rams. No small farmers keep sheep except a few in the mountains."

—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 859 horses and mules, 636 asses, 2,528 cattle, 3,726 sheep, 4,875 pigs, and 29,096 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 940 horses and mules, 307 asses, 2,490 cattle, 5,382 sheep, 1,902 pigs, and 13,032 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,590 horses and mules, 274 asses, 7,271 cattle, 13,982 sheep, 3,172 pigs, and 20,640 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 2,582 horses and mules, 185 asses, 8,750 cattle, 13,478 sheep, 3,171 pigs, and 18,180 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 5,373 horses and mules, 515 asses, 23,983 cattle, 39,175 sheep, 6,228 pigs, and 39,777 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 12,314 horses and mules, £98,512; 1,917 asses, £1,917; 45,022 cattle, £292,643; 75,743 sheep, £83,317; 19,348 pigs, £24,185; and 120,785 poultry, £3,019. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £503,593. In the same year, the live stock within the civic districts consisted, in numbers and in estimated value, of 224 horses and mules, £1,792; 38 asses, £38; 271 cattle, £1,761; 48 sheep, £53; 603 pigs, £751; and 1,044 poultry, £26. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £4,421.

Plantations.]—In 1841, the plantations within the county consisted of 3,205 continuous acres and 62,981 detached trees of oak, 300 continuous acres and 184,985 detached trees of ash, 24 continuous acres and 20,158 detached trees of elm, 75 continuous acres and 104,386 detached trees of beech, 1,243 continuous acres and 280,284 detached trees of fir, 12,361 continuous acres and 358,785 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 392 continuous acres and 3,722 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 17,600 continuous acres, and 1,015,301 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 6,345 acres, and making with the former a grand total of 23,945 acres of woods. Of the continuous woods, 3,003 acres of oak, 245 of ash, 5 of elm, 9 of beech, 45 of fir, 4,583 of mixed plantations, and 78 of orchards, were planted previous to 1791; 37 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 5 of elm, 14 of beech, 59 of fir, 948 of mixed plantations, and 38 of orchards, were planted between 1791 and 1800; 88 acres of oak, 18 of ash, 5 of elm, 11 of beech, 101 of fir, 798 of mixed plantations, and 63 of orchards, were planted between 1801 and 1810; 37 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 3 of elm, 11 of beech, 462 of fir, 1,445 of mixed plantations, and 66 of orchards, were planted between 1811 and 1820; 24 acres of oak, 7 of ash, 4 of elm, 9 of beech, 269 of fir, 1,922 of mixed plantations, and 62 of orchards, were planted between 1821 and 1830; and 16 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 2 of elm, 21 of beech, 307 of fir, 2,665 of mixed plantations, and 83 of orchards, were planted between 1831 and 1840. The principal sheets of wood occur at Powerscourt demesne, Charleville demesne, Bushypark, Giltspur, Bellmount, Newcourt, and Bellevue, in the barony of Rathdown; at Ballygannon, Tinnypark, Nassau, Bromley, Hollywell, Springmount, Woodstock, Bellfield, Easthill, Mount-John, Kiltimon, Sweetbank, Grange, Killoughter, Glenmore, Ballycurry, Clonmannan, Rosama, Cronroe, Upper Tinnakelly, Lower Tinnakelly, Ballygree, Hollywood, Cronybirne, Glenwood, and Close-house, in the barony of Newcastle; at Shilton-abbey, Gleumercastle, Kilpool, Seapark, Ballymoney, Bonabroca, Rockfield, Dunganstown, Oakland, Woodville, Fairview, West-Acton, Castle-Howard, Kingstown, Millmount, Sheepwalk, Ballyarthur, Ballyrain, Lamberton, and Cooladangan, in the barony of Arklow; at Luggelaw, Annamoe, Derrybawn, Roundwood, Glenane, Ballyteigue, and Avondale, in the barony of North Ballinacore; at Roddenagh and Rockingham, in the barony of South Ballinacore; at Coronation, Downshire, Talbotstown, Russborough, Russellstown, Ballyboys, Burgameoyle, Tullfaris, Murphysstown, Willmount, and Kippure, in the barony of Lower Talbotstown; at Goldenford, Grangecon, Ballinure, Rathsallagh, Brewers'-hill, Tynte-park, Ballyhook, High-park, Hume-Wood, Kilvaue-lagh, Stratford, and Slaney-park, in the barony of Upper Talbotstown; and at Toomanmoge, Ballykelly, Brownwood, Coolattin, Bramingall, Kilbrook, Woodmount, Bellmount, Money, Knocklow, Killinure, Ballard, Hillbrook, Toombreen, Cronyhorn, Springfield, Urelands, and Ballingate, in the barony of Shillelagh.

Manufactures and Trade.]—The commerce of the county of Wicklow is of small extent, and is chiefly conducted through the ports of Wicklow and Arklow. The most considerable seat of manufacture is the small town of Stratford-on-Slaney. A very large aggregate of productive industry is concentrated upon mining, and has already been noticed in the section upon minerals. The following digest of the statistics of occupations, as exhibited in the Census of 1841, affords a somewhat minute view of the kinds and comparative amount of labour:—Millers, 67; maltsters, 2; brewers, 6; bakers, 156; confectioners, 13; saltsters, 17; tobacco-twisters, 6; fishmongers, 37; egg-dealers, 14; fruiterers, 5; cattle-dealers, 19; horse-dealer, 1; pig-jobbers, 21; corn-dealers, 6; huxters and provision-dealers, 135; butchers, 93; victuallers, 39; grocers, 41; tobacconist, 1; flax-dressers, 7; carders, 70; spinners of flax, 326; spinners of cotton, 5; spinners of wool, 920; spinners of unspecified classes, 835; winders and warpers, 19; factory-workers, 3; wool-dressers, 5; weavers of cotton, 102; weavers of linen, 15; weavers of woollen, 39; weaver of lace, 1; weavers of unspecified classes, 164; manufacturers of lace, 2; bleachers, 6; dyers, 2; clothiers, 5; cloth-finisher, 1; calico-printers, 4; skimmers, 2; curriers, 8; tanner, 1; leather-dresser, 1; brogue-makers, 59; boot and shoe makers, 777; tailors, 501; sempstresses, 678; dress-makers, 449; milliners, 65; stay-makers, 6; knitters, 782; hatters, 51; bonnet-makers, 152; straw-workers, 34; gloves, 5; hair-dresser and barber, 1; leather-dealers, 8; wool-dealer, 1; hoisiers, 6; haberdashers, 3; drapers, 12; linen-drafter, 1; woollen-drafter, 1; vendors of soft goods, 50; dealer in old clothes, 1; rag and bone dealers, 14; architects, 6; builders, 13; brick-makers, 4;

Fairs.—The following are the principal fairs held within the county of Wicklow:—Arklow, Jan. 11, March 22, April 19, May 15, June 28, Aug. 9, Sept. 25, and Nov. 15; Ashford, April 27, June 24, Sept. 8, and Dec. 16; Baltinglass, Jan. 9, Feb. 2, March 17, April 19, May 12, July 1, Aug. 18, Sept. 12, Oct. 18, and Dec. 8; Blessington, May 12, July 5, and Nov. 12; Bray, March 1, May 1, July 1, Aug. 15, Sept. 20, and Dec. 14; Carnew, second Thursday in Feb., April 1, third Thursday in May, July 1, third Thursday in Aug., Oct. 1, third Thursday in Nov., and Dec. 22; Coolatin, Feb. 26, May 20, Aug. 26, and Nov. 26; Coolboy, Wednesday before Feb. 1, Patrick's-day, May 1, June 24, Aug. 1, Oct. 1, Nov. 1, and St. Thomas's-day; Cronrea, May 12 and Oct. 2; Donard, Jan. 31, April 29, Aug. 12, and Oct. 13; Down's-hill, Jan. 12, May 4, Aug. 5, and Nov. 12; Dunlavin, March 1, second Tuesday after May 12, first Friday after July 12, Aug. 21, second Tuesday after Old Michaelmas-day, and Nov. 30; Hollywood, Feb. 1, May 3, Aug. 1, and Nov. 1; Kilcoole, June 5 and Sept. 4; New-castle, April 1, July 10, Sept. 1, and Dec. 6; Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Feb. 2, April 18, June 29, Aug. 15, Oct. 30, and Dec. 21; Rathdangan, Feb. 1, March 8, April 28, June 20, Sept. 2, Nov. 2, and Dec. 17; Rathdrum, Jan. 2, Feb. 16, March 13, April 5, May 25, June 19, July 5, Aug. 31, Oct. 10, Nov. 11, and Dec. 11; Rathsalagh, April 23 and Sept. 4; Redcross, Jan. 6, March 17, May 6, June 20, Aug. 5, Sept. 23, and Dec. 15; Roundwood, Jan. 3, March 14, April 12, May 25, June 21, July 26, Aug. 23, Sept. 19, and Nov. 8; Tinnehely, first Wednesday in Jan., Feb. 7, third Wednesday in March, second Wednesday in April, May 8, June 4, Wednesday after June 24, third Wednesday in July, Aug. 7, first Wednesday in Sept., first Wednesday in Oct., Nov. 7, and second Wednesday in Dec.; and Wicklow, March 28, May 25, Aug. 12, and Nov. 24.

Fisheries.—Fishing-grounds, in from 5 to 17 fathoms, extend along nearly all the coast, from within pistol-shot of the shore to the Kish Bank. The Scallop Bed, bearing east-north-east from Greystones, distant about 5 miles, about one square league in extent, and having an average depth of 14 fathoms of water, is the most particular spot in the range. Haddock, cod, and whiting, formerly abounded on this bank; and the other fish taken on the coast are herrings, mackerel, soles, plaice, pollock, whiting, salmon-trout, and salmon. Arklow bank is remarkable for herrings and oysters, and yields a small quantity of cod and ling. A fishing-ground, remarkable for cod, herrings, and oysters, having a depth of from 2 to 18 fathoms of water, bearing from Arklow east-north-east and south-south-west, and lying at the mean distance of about 8 miles from the shore, extends from the vicinity of Wicklow Head in co. Wicklow, to the vicinity of Cahore Point in co. Wexford.—The fishermen of Wicklow, though distributed along most of the coast, have nowhere any harbour except at the mouth of the Ovoca; and even there they have no quay or pier, and must contend with serious obstacles in approaching and entering the river. The coast-guard and fishing districts are Bray, Greystones, Five-mile-Point, Wicklow Head, Jack's Hole, and Arklow; and, in 1836, the fishing-craft belonging to these six districts comprised 39 decked vessels, of 1,174 tons, worked by 156 men,—153 half-decked vessels, of 1,425 tons, worked by 858 men,—57 open sail-boats, worked by 246 men,—and 14 row-boats, worked by 38 men. Arklow market is very badly supplied with haddock, hake, turbot, brit, mackerel, salmon, eels, and lobsters, but is abundantly supplied with cod, plaice, soles, herrings, and oysters. The market of the town of Wicklow has a rather limited supply of haddock, hake, plaice, sole, mackerel, mullet, and lobster; a fair supply of cod, gurnet, whiting, and herrings; a tolerably plentiful supply of salmon and white trout; a scanty supply of eels; and an abundant supply of oysters. Shoals of mackerel and herrings pass through the bay of Wicklow without being taken, for want of means.

Communications.—A line of railway has been proposed to connect Bray with the Dublin and Kingstown railway. The line of railway from Wexford to the Kilkenney and Dublin railway at Carlow, passes near the south-western boundary of the barony of Shillelagh. The principal roads of the county of Wicklow are the Dublin and Wexford mail-road, by way of Bray, Delgany, Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Ashford, Rathdrum, and Arklow; the military road from Rathfarnham to Aghavaugh, by way of Gleneree, Laragh, and Drumgoff; the mail-road from Rathdrum to Carnew; the mail-road from Blessington to Naas; the mail-road from Castle-Dermot to Hacketstown, by way of Baltinglass; the road from Dublin to Glendalough, by way of Enniskerry, Roundwood, and Annamoe; the road from Dublin to Newtownbarry, by way of Blessington, Hollywood, Stratford-on-Slaney, and Baltinglass; and the road from Rathdrum to Baltinglass, by way of Rathdangan. During the years 1834—41, the county surveyor superintended the formation of 19 miles of new road.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Wicklow is divided into the 8 baronies of Rathdown, in the north-east; Newcastle, in the middle-east; Arklow, in the south-east; North Ballinacor, in the north-centre; South Ballinacor, in the south-centre; Lower Talbotstown, in the north-west; Upper Talbotstown, in the middle-west; and Shillelagh, in the south-west. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 10 townlands of the parish of Dunlavin, 2 townlands of the parish of Tober, and 2 townlands of the parish of Rathtoole, containing a pop. of 978, from the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, to the barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow; and one townland of the parish of Baltinglass, containing a pop. of 88, from the barony of Upper Talbotstown to that of Rathvilly, co. Carlow.

The barony of Rathdown contains 4 whole parishes, and part of another parish; the barony of Newcastle contains 5 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; the barony of Arklow contains 9 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; the barony of North Ballinacor contains 1 whole parish, and part of 3 other parishes; the barony of South Ballinacor contains 5 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; the barony of Lower Talbotstown contains 7 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Upper Talbotstown contains 7 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; and the barony of Shillelagh contains 3 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes. The towns and principal villages are Enniskerry, Delgany, Killinacraig, and part of Bray, in the barony of Rathdown; Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Glenealy, Downs, Kilcoole, Kilkenny, Newcastle, Ballinalee, Rathnew, and part of Wicklow, in the barony of Newcastle; Arklow, Redcross, and part of Wicklow, in the barony of Arklow; Rathdrum, in the barony of North Ballinacor; Tinnehely, in the barony of South Ballinacor; Dunlavin, Blessington, and Donard, in the barony of Lower Talbotstown; Baltinglass and Stratford-on-Slaney, in the barony of Upper Talbotstown; and Carnew and Shillelagh, in the barony of Shillelagh.—Dr. Beaufort, estimating the total of parishes and churches in the county at respectively 58 and 21, assigns 49 parishes and 17 churches to the diocese of Dublin, 6 parishes and 3 churches to the diocese of Leighlin, and 3 parishes and 1 church to the diocese of Ferns.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in co. Wicklow was 258, of scholars 11,333, of male scholars 6,377, of female scholars 4,671, of scholars whose sex was not specified 285, of scholars connected with the Established Church 3,606, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 29, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 2, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community, 7,270, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 366; and according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 258, of scholars 11,817, of male scholars 6,622, of female scholars 4,940, of scholars whose sex was not specified 235, of scholars connected with the Established Church 3,874, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 13, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 2, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 7,799, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 127. The statistics of educational and ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are returned according to the diocesan divisions; and may be proximately estimated for co. Wicklow by reference to the section on the diocese of Dublin, in the article on Dublin City. At the close of 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 41 daily schools, conducted by 26 male and 16 female teachers, attended by 2,397 male and 2,418 female scholars, and aided during the year, with £454 1s. 8d. in salaries, £35 10s. in free stock, and £49 0s. 5½d. in school-requisites at half-price.—During 1843, the number of persons committed on charges of felony was 306, of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions 146, of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 14. Of the 306 committed on charges of felony, 93 were charged with offences against the person, 19 with offences against property committed with violence, 136 with offences against property committed without violence, 2 with malicious offences against property, and 56 with offences not included in these categories; 1 was sentenced to death, 5 were sentenced to transportation, 109 were sentenced to imprisonment, 3 were sentenced to pay fines, 24 were not sentenced or were discharged on sureties, 1 was acquitted as insane, 104 were found not guilty on trial, 36 had no bill found against them, and 20 were not prosecuted. The constabulary force of the county, on Jan. 1, 1844, consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 extra-rate sub-inspector, 1 second-rate sub-inspector, 3 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head-constable, 5 second-rate head-constables, 31 constables, 145 first-rate sub-constables, 25 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining that force during 1843, was £9,904 14s. 2d. The constabulary are distributed through 32 stations, in the five districts of Bray, Baltinglass, Blessington, Rathdrum, and Tinnehely; and they have their county head-quarters at Bray. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Arklow. The assizes are held at Wicklow; quarter-sessions are held at Wicklow, Arklow, Baltinglass, Bray, and Tinnehely, and petty-sessions are held at Arklow, Baltinglass, Blessington, Bray, Carnew, Coolkenno, Dunlavin, Enniskerry, Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Rathangan, Rathdrum, Rathnew, Redcross, and Tinnehely. The county gaol is at Wicklow; a bridewell is at Baltinglass; and the district lunatic asylum, to which the county of Wicklow is entitled to send 27 patients, is in Dublin. Infirmarys are at Wicklow and Baltinglass; fever hospitals are at Arklow, Bray, Delgany, Enniskerry, Stratford-on-Slaney, and Wicklow; workhouses are at Baltinglass, Rathdrum, and Shillelagh; and dispensaries are at Annanoe, Arklow, Aughrim, Calary, Blessington, Bray, Carnew, Dunlavin, Enniskerry, Kiltegan, Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Rathdrum, Redcross, Shillelagh, Tinnehely, and Wicklow. Savings' banks are at Arklow and Bray; and loan funds are at Baltinglass, Blessington, Bray, Carnew, Imale, Kiltegan, Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Moyne, Powerscourt, Preban, and Wicklow. The amount of grand jury presentment, in 1842, was £25,882. The annual valuation of property valued for the poor-rate is £314,578. The total number of tenements valued is 18,073; and of these, 8,496 were valued under £5.—2,841, under £10.—1,740, under £15.—1,091, under £20.—741, under £25.—560, under £30.—734, under £40.—467, under £50.—and 1,397, at and above £50. The county of Wicklow sent ten members to the Irish parliament, or two for the county at large, and two for each of the boroughs of Wicklow, Blessington, Baltinglass, and Carysfort; but it sends to the imperial parliament only two members,—those for the county at large. Constituency in 1841, 1,503; of whom, 856 were £10 freeholders, 102 were £20 freeholders, 339 were £50 freeholders, 105 were £10 leaseholders, 40 were £20 leaseholders, 1 was a £50 leaseholder, 53 were £20 rent-chargers, and 7 were £50 rent-chargers.

Antiquities.—One of the finest groups of ruins in the United Kingdom, and incomparably the best in the county of Wicklow, is the group of Glendalough. The chief of other antiquities are Bray-castle, Killegar church, Annabaskyth church, Knock-sink moat, Churchtown church, a cromlech in Powerscourt parish, Kilnacanogue church, Kindlestown-castle, a church in Kilnacanogue parish, and Rathdown-castle, in the barony of Rathdown; St. Mary's church, a church in Rathnew parish, three churches in Killiskey parish, the castle of Newcastle, a castle in Killiskey parish, and Gleeney church, in the barony of Newcastle; the Black-castle of Wicklow, a church in Castle-Macadam parish, a church in Kilbride parish, Kilbride church, Mizen-Head-Tower, Arklow-castle, Castletimon church, a church in Dunganstown parish, a church in Kilcommon parish, MacDermot's-castle, and Kilmanogue church, in the barony of Arklow; a church in Calary parish, Castle-Kevin, and Ballyboy-house, in the barony of North Ballinacor; Castle-Laurence, in the barony of South Ballinacor; the site of a castle in Blessington parish, Downshire-house, Templebodin church, a church in Hollywood parish, two churches in Donard parish, Castlebank and Dunlavin church, in the barony of Lower Talbotstown; Tober church, Grangecon-castle, Stratford-castle, sites of three castles and a church in Donaghmore parish, a church in Balinglass parish, and Rampreece chapel, in the barony of Upper Talbotstown; and Kilcavan church, in the barony of Shillelagh. The old monastic institutions of the county, whether certain or doubtful, conspicuous or obscure, extant, in ruin, or completely obliterated, are three abbeys of regular Augustinian canons at Glendalough, alleged to have been founded in the 6th century, by St. Kevin; a Cistercian or Bernardine abbey at Balinglass, founded in 1148 or 1151, by Dermot MacMurrough, King of Leinster, and granted, at the general dissolution, to Thomas Eustace, Viscount Balinglass; a Dominican friary at Arklow, founded in 1264, by Theobald Walter, and granted, at the dissolution, to John Travers; and a Franciscan friary at Wicklow, founded in the 13th century, by the O'Byrnes and O'Tooles, and granted, at the dissolution, to Sir William Harrington.

History.—Ptolemy places in such parts of the country now termed Wicklow, as are to the north of the river Ovoca, the tribe, or nation, of Cauci; in which circumstance of appropriation he is followed by Richard of Cirencester. Before this territory was reduced to share ground, the northern division comprised the ancient Dalmaescoe, which was subdivided into two principalities, Crioc-Cuolan and Tyr-Tuathal. The first consisted of a narrow tract, between the mountains and the sea, or the modern baronies of Rathdown, Newcastle, and Arklow; of which territory, at the arrival of the Anglo-Normans, O'Cullan was the reigning dynast, his domain extending to Naas, in the county of Kildare. O'Toole ruled the rest of the country; the Dames holding certain possessions about Bray, Wicklow, and Arklow; and the sept of the O'Byrnes inhabiting the mountains. The septs of O'Toole and O'Byrne, enwrapped in the natural fastness of their woods and mountains, maintained themselves against the power of the English government until the termination of the sixteenth century. The predatory descents of these warlike mountaineers form frequent subjects of disastrous detail in the annals of Dublin, 'over the neck of which city,' to use the words of Spencer, 'they continually hung.' Wicklow, which had previously been considered by the English as part of the county of Dublin, was made a separate county, under its present appellation, in 1603. This district was the scene of many sanguinary transactions during the troubles of the year 1798. [Brewer's Ireland.] The principal action of the rebels of 1798 within the county occurred at Arklow, and is noticed in our article on that town. Several bands of the insurgents, after the general power of the rebellion had been broken, found refuge among the fastnesses of the Wicklow mountains, and continued for some time to disturb the peace; and their conduct occasioned the opening up of the district, and the permanent protection of it, by the formation of the military road. See article MILITARY ROAD, and the section 'History' of the article on the county of WEXFORD.

WICKLOW, a parochial union or ecclesiastical benefice, in the middle of the sea-board or eastern district of co. Wicklow, Leinster. It comprises the rectory of DRUMKEY, the vicarage of KILPOOLE, and the chapelries of KILLSKEY, GLANEALY, RATHNEW, and KILCOMMON: see these articles. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 8. Pop., in 1831, 10,799. Gross income, £512 16s. 8d.; nett, £373 11s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes of the chapelries of the benefice, compounded for £766 13s. 4d., are appropriated to the prebend of Wicklow, in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin; and the rectorial tithes of Kilpoole, compounded for £60, are inappropriate in Earl Fitzwilliam. Three curates for respectively KILLSKEY, GLANEALY, and the town of Wicklow, have each a salary of £70. Three churches are situated in KILLSKEY, GLANEALY, and DRUMKEY,—the last in the town of Wicklow; and have an attendance of respectively from 200 to 250, from 100 to 120, and about 500. A schoolhouse at Rathnew is also used as a place of worship in connection with the Establishment, and has an attendance of from 20 to 30. A Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of about 25. A Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 50 to 60. Three Roman Catholic chapels are situated at Wicklow, Glanealy, and Killiskey; and have an attendance of respectively from 1,000 to 1,200, about 600, and from 1,200 to 1,400. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 2,614 Churchmen, 18 Presbyterians, 54 other Protestant dissenters, and 8,839 Roman Catholics; 9 daily schools made no proper returns of their attendance; and 18 other daily schools had on their books 406 boys and 476 girls.

WICKLOW,

A post and market town, a sea-port, the county town of Wicklow, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parishes of Drumkey and Kilpoole, barony of Arklow, and partly in the parish of Rathnew, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the estuary of the Vartrey, and at the head of a small bay, 2 miles north-west of Wicklow Head, 2 south-east of Rathnew, 3½ south-east of Ashford, 8 east-north-east of Rathdrum, 10½ south south-east of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 11½ north-north-east of Arklow, 15½ south by east of Bray, and 25½ south-south-east of Dublin.

Enviroms.—The tract of country lying immediately around the town is one of the most fertile and softly beautiful in the county. The localities around Rathnew, Ballinalea, Ashford, Newrath-bridge, and Rosanna, and along the lower vale of the Vartrey river, though from 2 to 3½ miles distant from the town, all properly belong to its environs, and are practically associated with it, not only by tourists, but by gentlemen attending the assizes. See ASHFORD, ROSANNA, NEWRATH, BALLINALEA, RATHNEW, and LEITRIM. The estuary of the Vartrey, called the Broad Lough, and comprising an area of 207½ acres, comes down in a long belt, parallel with the sea-shore, to the north side of the town; and the narrowed continuation of it, now of ordinary river breadth, and bearing the name of the Leitrin river, sweeps eastward to the sea, cutting off a suburb of the town from the main body. A low and flat peninsular tract, of the nature of a salt marsh, but celebrated for its summer grazing, comes down to the town between the sea and the Broad Lough, bears on its extremity the suburb cut off by the river, and has, at the distance of 400 yards, the town's race-course and stand-house. See MURROUGH. A rich valley extends west-north-westward from the town, and takes up the public road to Rathnew, there to connect with the mail-road from Wexford to Dublin. A range of hills commences at Wicklow Head, and extends westward, past the immediate outskirts of the town, and along the south side of the valley, to connect with the hills of Glanealy; and, in consequence of their fertility and their flowing outlines, they constitute a very agreeable and striking feature. The summit nearest the town is situated only ¾ of a mile to the south, has an altitude above sea-level of 614 feet, and, in common with various parts of the declivities of the hill, commands a noble view of the town, the valley, the Broad Lough, the Murrough, and the whole sweep of coast away to Bray Head. "From these heights," remarks Mr. Fraser, "you also command a prospect of the beautiful tract of land lying along the shore, and of the secondary range of mountains, which generally hold a parallel course with the beach, and limit this the richest portion of the county of Wick-

low. This view is much finer than that which is obtained of the same tract of country, looking southwards from Bray Head." The only noticeable rural residences in the immediate vicinity of the town are Boyview and Marlton-house, both situated to the south-west. Wicklow Head, whose altitude above sea-level is 268 feet, commands the same rich view to the north, which is seen from the hill behind the town, and also overlooks a long reach of shore to the south, and a horizon-limited expanse of the Irish sea. Three lighthouses surmount the headland,—two of them lighthouses in proper use, and the other serving as a beacon-tower. "The two lighthouses," says Mr. Fraser, "occupy a prominent position on the low rocky promontory, called Wicklow Head. The third tower, or old lighthouse, which is also seen from many points along the coast, is now only used as a landmark. The road leading to the lighthouses is hilly and bad; and to those who have seen similar structures, there is nothing in the promontory on which they stand, nor in the country around it, sufficient to repay them for the time and trouble necessary for such a detour." Beneath the promontory, however, are several very curious caves, excavated in slute rock by the action of the sea. The cost of maintaining the two lighthouses during 1840 was £1,514 16s. 1d.; and during 1843, was £622 5s. 8d.

Streets and Buildings.—The streets are narrow, irregular, badly-aligned, and ill-adapted to either business or comfort; and they may be regarded as but a degree superior to a group of lanes. The town, in an architectural view, is the poorest of the assize-towns of Ireland; and even in general insignificance, is exceeded only by Lifford. The parish-church of Drumkey stands on the Leitrin river, at the northern extremity of the town, and is a commodious and well-preserved building, erected in 1777, by the Eaton family. At its west end is a square tower; and on its south side is a round-headed doorway, with ornamental mouldings worked in rude and slight relief. Wicklow church was formerly the head of a rural deanery; and, in 1467, it was constituted a prebend of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated in the western outskirts of the town; and is a plain building, with a belfry. The ruins of the Franciscan friary, founded in the reign of Henry III. by the O'Byrnes and the O'Tooles, stand a little north-east of the Roman Catholic chapel, opposite to the parsonage-house, but in a garden which formerly belonged to the family of Eaton, but is now attached to the house of the Roman Catholic parochial clergyman; and, together with some old yews and other trees which shade them, they are carefully preserved. An old fortalice, popularly called the Black-castle of Wicklow, is situated immediately east of the town, on the east side of the mouth of the Leitrin river. The fortalice has an extraordinary appearance, and consists of a promontorial rock, whose summit is surrounded by a fortified wall, with battlements and buttresses. The original castle—or rather the artificial portion of it—was built by Maurice Fitzgerald, the ancestor of the Duke of Leinster; and the present fortifications were constructed, in the reign of Edward III., by Sir William Fitzwilliam. A stone bridge of 8 arches spans the Leitrin river at the middle of the town; and connects the main body of the town with the suburb on the Murrough. The county gaol is situated in the middle of the south-east part of the town; it lately received a considerable addition; and it now contains 77 single cells, 6 day-rooms, 4 yards, a public kitchen, a minutely divided chapel for 70 prisoners, a tread-wheel, an hospital of three wards, and a laundry. Forty of the cells are large, and fit for separation at work. In 1843, the average number of prisoners was 73; the greatest number was 93; the total number, including debtors, was 323; the number of recommitments was 22; and the total expenditure was £1,087 11s. 5d. The infirmary is a very well managed institution, and possesses sufficient capacity for the wants of the eastern portion of the county; and, in 1839-40, it received £714 5s. 4d., expended £573 6s. 21., and admitted 303 patients. The fever hospital serves for the district around the town, and admits every fit case which offers; and, in 1839-40, it received £292 17s. 5d., expended £325 19s. 11d., and admitted 376 patients. The other public buildings are the Methodist meeting-house, the Quakers' meeting-house, the diocesan and parochial schoolhouses, a barrack, and the county court-houses; and all are plain structures.

Trade.—The harbour of Wicklow, in ordinary tides, admits vessels drawing between 7 and 8 feet of water; but it is a bar harbour, with a very narrow entrance in any state of the tide, and perfectly inaccessible at low water. In 1761, and the two following years, several sums, amounting in all to £8,000, were granted by government for the improving of the harbour, but with very little good effect. A report, by the celebrated engineer, Mr. Nimmo, states that the harbour is very capable of improvement, chiefly by the erection of a pier, and that it might be made an asylum for large vessels at an expense of £35,000.* The small bay outside the harbour, and extending to Wicklow Head, is completely sheltered from all southerly, westerly, and north-westerly winds. Harbour dues are exacted by the Corporation of the town from every vessel of upwards of 20 tons burden; but they amount to only 1s. for a sloop, and 2s. 2d. for a square-rigged vessel, and produce only about £3 a-year. The affairs of the pilotage of the harbour are likewise under the control of the town's Corporation. Though the port, as regards its connection with the circumjacent country, is advantageously situated for commerce, yet, in consequence chiefly of the very limited capacity of its harbour, it possesses comparatively little business. In 1835, the exports comprised only 12,614 tons of copper ore, and 74,641 cwt. of corn, jointly amounting in estimated value to £86,565 18s.; and the imports comprised 7,296 tons of coals, culm, and cinders, 354 tons of salt, 178 tons of British iron, 42 tons of foreign iron, 605 tons of wood, 16 tons of potatoes, 1,140 cwt. of meal and flour, 12 bhd. of sugar, 42 chests of tea, 15 casks of wines, and 8 packages of glass and earthenware, aggregately amounting in estimated value to £15,671.

The quantity of trade in the shipment of ores from the mines of the county has of late been increasing, and is likely to experience still further increase. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town in 1838 comprised 16,000 tons for exportation, 2,025 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 250 tons of agricultural produce for the local use of breweries and distilleries, 600 tons of exciseable goods not received by direct importation, and 2,025 of stones, lime, turf, and other heavy and bulky articles; and the estimated amount of inland carriage from the town comprised 700 tons of imports, and 5,800 tons of coals, manure, and other heavy and bulky articles. A coast-guard station at Wicklow Head gives name to the district in which the fisheries immediately adjoining the town are included; and, in 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within that district 40 half-decked vessels, aggregately of 560 tons, and worked by 240 men.

* We have not seen Mr. Nimmo's report itself, but have gathered the above notice of it from the reports of the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations; and we observe that Mr. Fraser states the cost estimated by the engineer at £80,000.

A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on March 28, May 25, Aug. 12, and Nov. 24. The town has a savings' bank and a loan fund; and, in 1843, the latter had a capital of £4,782, circulated £24,128 in 4,075 loans, realized a nett profit of £571 16s. 9d., expended for charitable purposes £714 15s. 5d., and belonged to 36 proprietors. Two small inns in the town, the Acton Arms and the Green Tree, let cars and post-horses; but the beautifully situated hotel at Newrath Bridge, is a principal resort of even business visitors to the town during the sitting of the assizes. In 1838, the only public conveyances from the town were two caravans to Dublin; but the Wexford and Dublin mail-coach, though not coming nearer the town than 2 miles, may also be regarded as one of its public conveyances.

Municipal Affairs.—Wicklow was constituted a borough by charter of 11 James I.; and it also received a charter of 4 James II. The borough limits excluded the Castle of Wicklow, with the peculiar privileges belonging to it; but, in other respects, they included the entire town, and a district described upon a radius of a mile from its centre. The Corporation, according to charter, consisted of a portreeve, 12 free burgesses, and a commonalty; and the constituency for sending two members to the Irish parliament consisted of the portreeve and the free burgesses. Freemen were admitted on right of birth, apprenticeship, or marriage, or by special favour; and, in 1833, they amounted to about 44. Only one Roman Catholic is known to have been admitted to the freedom previous to 1829; but several were admitted between that year and 1833. A recorder formerly acted within the borough, but there ceased to be any about the year 1816. A portreeve's court is held every Tuesday, and adjudicates in cases of debt not exceeding £3 6s. 8d. Irish. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. William Tighe, Esq., was 'patron' of the borough at the period of the Legislative Union, and he received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement. The landed property belonging to the Corporation comprises an area of between 200 and 300 acres. In 1829, the annual income of the Corporation was £65 6s. 9½d.; and, in 1833, it amounted to about £115. About 40 acres of the public property is commonage in the Murrough; and to this each freeman is entitled to send a horse or a cow.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 128 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,472; in 1841, 2,794. Houses 421. Area of the Kilpoole section, 49 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,643; in 1841, 2,257. Houses 348. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 140; in manufactures and trade, 185; in other pursuits, 121. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 23; on the directing of labour, 192; on their own manual labour, 184; on means not specified, 47. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 441; who could read but not write, 183; who could neither read nor write, 335. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 344; who could read but not write, 275; who could neither read nor write, 375. Area of the Rathnew section, 67 acres. Pop., in 1831, 829; in 1841, 514. Houses 70. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 10; in manufactures and trade, 42; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 41; on their own manual labour, 24; on means not specified, 6. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 154; who could read but not write, 14; who could neither read nor write, 50. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write,

History.—Wicklow was anciently called Wick-enloe by the Danes, and Kilmantan by the Irish. The name Wicklow means 'the low creek,' and seems to have been given to the town in allusion to its situation upon the little estuary of the Vartrey. Harris thinks that this name was given to the place by a German tribe, called the Cauai, whom he supposes to have colonized the vicinity. The Danes were early inhabitants of Wicklow, as of most other parts upon the east and south-east coasts of Ireland; and the Anglo-Normans took possession of it, when overrunning the country at the conquest. Maurice Fitzgerald, ancestor of the Duke of Leinster, obtained from Earl Strongbow the manor of Wicklow, and—as we have already seen—constructed the original fortress of the Black Castle. William Fitzaldelm, progenitor of the house of De Burgh, shortly after the foundation of the fortress, procured this estate in exchange for Ferns-castle, in the county of Wexford. The building falling to decay, was restored, in the reign of Edward III., by Sir William Fitzwilliam, whose successors of the house of Merion were long constables of this castle. This was a post of more danger than honour. Situated in the vicinity of mountain septs, who were inaccessible to open warfare, the castle was often taken and retaken by the O'Tooles, the O'Byrnes, the O'Kavanaghs, and the English. In the early part of the 16th century, it was possessed by the sept of O'Byrne; but, in 1543, was, together with the town of Wicklow, by them surrendered to the king. In the year 1641, Luke O'Toole, at the head of his mountaineers, laid siege to Wicklow, but was compelled to retire, by an English force under Sir Charles Coote." The victory of Sir Charles, however, was sullied by a wanton and indiscriminate slaughter of the townspeople.—Wicklow gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Howard. In 1778, Ralph Howard, Esq., member of parliament for the county of Wicklow, and eldest son of Robert Howard, Lord Bishop of Elphin, was created Baron Clonmore; and in 1785, he was advanced to the dignity of Viscount Wicklow. In 1793, the lady of this nobleman, and only daughter and heiress of William Forward, Esq., of Castle-Forward, in the county of Donegal, was created Countess of Wicklow; in 1807, her eldest son, Robert, succeeded as Earl of Wicklow; and, in 1818, William, the present Earl, succeeded to the title. The family-seats are, Shelton-Abbey in co. Wicklow, Castle-Forward in co. Donegal, Cavendish-row in Dublin, and Cavendish-square in London.

WICKLOW GAP, a lofty mountain defile in the parish of Derralossory, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It cleaves the summit-line of the central mountain-range of the county, at a point between Glendasson on the east and the glen of the King's river on the west; and it is traversed by the road from Laragh to Hollywood,—one of the central thoroughfares between the eastern and the western divisions of the county; yet its highest part has an elevation above sea-level of not less than 1,569 feet. Nearly two miles north of the Gap, the summit of Thonelagee soars to the altitude above sea-level of 2,684 feet; and about the same distance to the south, the summit of Comaderry rises to the altitude of 2,296 feet.

WICKLOW (GARDEN OF), the popular name of a rich tract of country in the centre of the sea-board of co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated partly in the barony of Arklow, but chiefly in that of New-castle; and is limited, on the north, by the mountain of Dunran,—on the east, by the sea,—and on the south and west, by the continuation of the secondary range of hills which run from Dunran to the Avonmore river near Rathdrum.

WICKLOW-HEAD, a promontory in the parish of Kilpoole, barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. See sections 'Environs' and 'Trade' of the article on the town of Wicklow.

WILKINSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilberry, barony of Morgallion, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Clones, 2 miles west of Windy Harbour, and 5 north by west of Navan. Within about a mile of it are the seats of Arch-hall and Kingston, and the hamlets of Clynch and Balsaw. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 218. Houses 46.

WILLESTON. See CARRIGARSON.

WILLIAMSTOWN, a village in the parish of Booterstown, and partly in the barony of Dublin, but chiefly in that of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the south shore of Dublin bay, on the road from Dublin to Kingstown, and closely adjacent to the Dublin and Kingstown railway, 2 miles north-west of Kingstown, and 3½ south-east of Dublin. It extends along the road in almost a continuous manner from the village of Booterstown to that of Blackrock, so as to be nearly a fusion of these places into one town; and it constitutes a not inconspicuous portion of the chain of architecture which extends along most of the south shore of Dublin bay, and which nearly connects Dalkey with the city. The principal of the numerous villas within a mile of the south side of Williamstown, and between the parallel of Booterstown and that of Blackrock, are Stillorgan-house, Stillorgan-park, Mountainville, South-hill, Chesterfield, Frecate, Marino-house, the Priory, Landsend, and Brocklawn. Williamstown has a station on the Dublin and Kingstown railway. Area of the Rathdown section, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 355. Houses 61. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 19; in manufactures and trade, 16; in other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 28; on their own manual labour, 12; on means not specified, 8. Area of the barony of Dublin section, 30 acres. Pop., in 1841, 220. Houses 33. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 9; in manufactures and trade, 18; in other pursuits, 23. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 25; on their own manual labour, 7; on means not specified, 4.

WILLIAMSTOWN, a village in the parish of Templetoher, barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the road from Castlere to Dunmore, 4½ miles west-south-west of Ballymoe, and 7 north-east by north of Dunmore. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, and is a neat and comparatively well-built place. Within about a mile of it are Springfield-house, the seat of Mr. MacDermott, and the hamlets of Kilnalag, Pollanyster, Corralough, Croaghill, Derrywood, and Forty-acres. A dispensary in Williamstown is within the Castlere Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 20,097 acres, with a pop. of 7,082; and, in 1839-40, it expended £121 0s. 10d., and administered to 1,027 patients. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, Easter Monday, Whit-Monday, and Sept. 8. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Friday of every month. Pop. returned with the parish.

WILLOWBROOK, a hamlet in the parish of Cloone, barony of Mohill, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the southern border of the county, 3½ miles south-south-east of the town of Mohill. A loan fund at Willowbrook or Willsbrook, in co.

Leitrim, had, in 1843, a capital of £314, and belonged to two proprietors; and during that year, it circulated £1,527 in 788 loans.

WILLOWBROOK, a demesne in the parish of Calry, barony of Carbery, 2½ miles north-east of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is situated at the south-west base of Cullogenboy mountain, whose summit has an altitude of 1,430 feet above sea-level; and adjacent to it are the seats of Wellsborough, Wynnesfort, and Dunally,—the last the residence of Sir William Parke. Willowbrook is the seat of W. R. Ormsby Gore, Esq.; but is at present occupied by his agent.

WILLSBROOK, co. Roscommon. See ANAGH.

WILLSBROOK, co. Leitrim. See WILLOWBROOK.

WILSON'S HOSPITAL, an extensive charitable institution in the parish of Lackan, barony of Corkaree, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands ½ a mile north of the transit of the Dublin and Sligo mail-road, 2 miles south-east of Ballinalack, and 6 north-west of Mullingar. It is a large edifice, and occupies elevated ground in nearly a central position between Loughs Iron, Owbel, and Dereveragh; and it, in consequence, is a conspicuous feature in an extensive landscape. The institution was founded, in the last century, by the Rev. Mr. Wilson of Shinglass-house, for the support of 16 old men, and the maintenance and education of 16 boys. Protestants of Westmeath; it was endowed by its founder with estates which yield an income of nearly £4,000 a-year; and its affairs are at present under the trusteeship of the archbishops of Armagh and Dublin, and the bishops of Meath, Tuam, and Kilmore. On Sept. 6, 1798, a sanguinary engagement occurred between a detachment of the army of Lord Cornwallis, and a body of insurgents, who took post at the hospital; and during the conflict, the original edifice was destroyed,—the present structure being a re-edification. Mr. Brewer gives, from original authority, an account of the insurgents, which possesses interest in conveying clear ideas of the character of the infatuated people who dared to rush into rebellion. "The body of insurgents which figured on this occasion," says he, "was composed of ignorant and headstrong men of the lowest order, who had withdrawn, on the foregoing night, from a considerable assembly of resident farmers and peasantry, which had collected from the adjacent baronies, through the various motives of terror, self-defence, or disloyalty, on the hill of Skeg, near Moyvare, in the barony of Rathconrath. The greater number of those assembled at the hill were armed with pitchforks, spades, and cudgels. Some appeared with pikes, and others (but not many) carried guns and pistols. Thus equipped for war, these deluded people abandoned their homes and families, and flocked joyously to the place of rendezvous, as if to a fair. Parties of the most efficient among their numbers were despatched, to arrest and conduct to the main body such of the resident gentry and respectable inhabitants as they could lay their hands upon. Among the persons thus arrested, was a gentleman belonging to a distant county, formerly an officer in a foreign service, who was at that time on a visit to a relative in the neighbourhood. This gentleman they conducted to what they termed their camp; namely, the bleak summit of the hill of Skeg, where was neither tent, nor shed, nor enclosure of any kind. A pitiable apathy, or stupid insensibility of danger, appeared to prevail, mixed with a restless anxious curiosity. A thirst of news, hope, suspicion, expectation, agitated the minds, and visibly influenced the manners and motions of the multitude.

The name and rank of the gentleman in question caused a great sensation in the throng, and his compulsory arrival was greeted with a shout of welcome from end to end of the massy but irregular line. When silence was obtained, he summoned around him the principal of their insignificant leaders, reasoned with them on the impracticable character of their schemes, and forcibly exhibited to them, on the credit of his military experience, the certainty of destruction that hung over their heads, if they persisted in resistance. Fortunately, the address of ——— was received with conviction by the majority of his auditors. They prepared to disperse, whilst he clapped spurs to his horse, and quickly disappeared. The most unruly of the insurgents, a small part only of the assembly, pursued their dangerous course, in contempt of this good advice, and directed their march on Wilson's Hospital, where they were attacked by the king's troops the following day, and mostly cut to pieces."

WILTON, a hamlet in the parish of Moybollogue, 2 miles south by east of Bailieborough, barony of Clonchee, co. Cavan, Ulster.

WILTON, the seat of H. Alcock, Esq., in the parish of Clonmore, barony of Bannry, 3 miles south-west by south of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. The original mansion is old, but has recently been renovated in the castellated style of architecture. The rivulet Boro traverses a beautiful glen within the demesne, and contributes charming features to the home-views from the mansion. Part of the small quartz hill of Bree is within the demesne, and shares in the luxury of its plantations.

WINDGAP, a village in the parish of Kilmory, barony of Kells, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the western border of the county, 2½ miles west of Kilmaganny, and 5 south of Callan. A summit immediately adjoining its north-west side has an altitude of 602 feet above sea-level. The village has a Roman Catholic chapel, a school, and a constabulary barrack; and it gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ossory, which has also a chapel at Tullaught. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 104. Houses 21.

WINDGATE, a hamlet and a hill, in the parish of Delgany, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The hamlet stands on the coast road from Dublin to Arklow, ¾ of a mile south-west of the extremity of Bray Head, and 2 miles south by east of the town of Bray. The hill is a ridgy prolongation or offset of Bray Head, connecting it with the heights in the interior, and particularly with the Little Sugarloaf mountain; it separates the series of low grounds within the catchment basin of the Bray river from those of the coast adjacent to the Glen of the Downs; it has an altitude of about 500 feet above sea-level, and is crossed by the road from Dublin to Arklow; its northern declivities command a brilliant view of the rich vales and beautiful mountains to the south-west of Bray, and of the demesne and deer-park of Kilruddery, inclusive of the Little Sugarloaf mountain; and from its summit deflect two noble prospect-viewing roads,—the one leading to the crown or cap of Bray Head, there to reveal a magnificent extent of coast to the south, and the other leading to the upper entrance to Bellevue, and the villas of Rathdown, Belmont, and Templecarrig, there also to command charming and expansive views of coast and sea-board.

WINDY-HARBOUR, a village in the parish of Taney, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Enniskerry, ¾ of a mile north of Dundrum, and 2½ miles south-east of Dublin. Within ¾ of a mile of it are the villas of Roebuck-house, Springfield, Richview, Woodview, Belview, Mount-Dillon, Farreyboley, Roebuck-grove, Roebuck-hall, Roebuck-park, Castleview, Bellfield, Lindhurst, Woodville, Churchtown, Landscape, Newtown-house, Newtown-cottage, Woodpark, and Rathgar; and within the same distance, on the river Dodder, is a calico printing factory. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 235. Houses 40.

WINDY-HARBOUR, a hamlet in the parish of Rathkenny, barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Navan to Drumcondra, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south-west of the village of Rathkenny, and $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-west by west of Slane. Pop. not specially returned.

WITTER, a parish, consisting of a main body and a detached district, in the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. The main body lies at the extremity of the Ardes peninsula, 2 miles south-east of Portaferry. Length, southward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. The detached district lies $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Portaferry; and its nearest point about a mile north of the upper extremity of the main body. Length, westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, 1. Area of the whole, 2,529 acres, 2 roads, 23 perches; of which 17 acres, 1 perch are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,116; in 1841, 1,053. Houses 184. The average quality of the land is rather good. Lough Ballyfarnagh lies on the western boundary of the detached district; and contains the parochial water-area. On the east shore of the main body are Quintin bay, Millin bay, a coast-guard station, a rabbit-warren, Tara bay, Temple-Corey, and an old burying-ground; at its extremity is Ballyquintin point, which screens the north side of the entrance of Lough Strangford; and on its west coast are Angus rock, Green island, and Barhall bay. The principal residence is Bar-hall.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LINC [which see], in the dio. of Down. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £79, and the rectorial for £158; and the latter are inappropriate in John Echlin, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardkeen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 33 Churchmen, 298 Presbyterians, 8 other Protestant dissenters, and 800 Roman Catholics.

WOBURN, a small fishing harbour, in the parish of Donaghadee, 3 miles south-south-east of the town of Donaghadee, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. "Here," says Mr. Nimmo, "a little cove in the Skerry rocks has been cleaned out, and the sides formed into a sort of quay for boats; the whole space is only 100 feet long, 60 feet wide at high-water mark, and 12 feet wide at the entry, where is 9 feet at high water. In this little place, I found 5 snawks and 4 yavels, the largest about 25 tons, which I understand are very well sheltered in this little cove, a strong proof of the value of constructing harbours of the smallest description." Adjacent to the harbour are Woburn-tower and Woburn-house.

WOODBURN (THE), a rivulet of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. Though small it is of comparatively great economical importance, and possesses as much natural beauty as any stream in Ulster. "It rises from several springs in the western part of the county, and consists of two branches, both bearing the same name, and uniting about 1½ mile from the sea. The scenery on the banks of these streams is truly charming; being, in many places, covered with a profusion of natural shrubbery, and each having a fine cascade. That on the northern branch is particularly picturesque; the stream falling down a ledge of infracted rocks, whose summits are clad with shrubs entwined with the clambering ivy. As the sheet of water which supplies this fall is not very large, it does not send forth that stunning noise which renders some cascades rather disagreeable; it is, to use the words of a certain writer, 'a uniform murmur, such as composes the mind to pensive meditation.' Besides those we have noticed as the principal, there are several lesser falls; so that, of these cascades it may be said,—

With wild infracted course and lessened roar,
They gain a safer bed, and steal, at last,
Along the mazes of the quiet vale.'

This river turns in its course a large cotton-mill, and supplies two cotton print-fields with water, then empties itself into the sea a little south-west of the town. At the southern fall are two caves hewn in a rock; the upper one is called Peter's cave; they can be entered with some difficulty, but are not spacious. In the bed of this river is found the sea urchin, petrified into flint, which as yet has only been found in a fossil state; it is commonly called the horse elf-stone. The star-stone is also found in the river, near its entrance into the sea. Being a mountain stream, this river, after heavy rains, rises considerably, and runs with great rapidity."

WOODBURN, a manufacturing locality, in the county of the town of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the Woodburn rivulet and on the road from Carrickfergus to Ballinure, 2 miles north-west of Carrickfergus. In its vicinity are the residences of Woodburn-lodge, Prospect, Thornfield, and Burleigh-hill. Extensive calico print works were erected at this place, on the corporation lands of Carrickfergus, by Mr. Stewart Dunn; and during a number of years preceding 1823, they afforded employment to about 80 or 100 persons, and annually bleached and printed about 15,000 pieces of calicoes, shawls, and muslins. The cotton factories of Woodburn, though distant 2 miles from Carrickfergus, are usually ranked among the manufactures of that town. See article CARRICKFERGUS, and section "Manufactures" of GENERAL INTRODUCTION. A Premonstratensian priory was founded at Woodburn, in 1242, by the family of Bisset; and in 1542, it was surrendered by Gillerath MacCowan into the hands of Henry VIII.'s Commissioners. The property of the priory comprised the rectorial tithes of Entroia, Crolille, and Carnmoney, 16 townlands of Killaboy, and two townlands of Island-Magee.

WOODEN-BRIDGE, a retreat of tourists at the confluence of the Ovoca and the Aughrim, or Second Meeting of the Waters, barony of Arklow, 3¼ miles north-west of the town of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The Wooden-bridge or Putland-arms hotel at this place, is the most crowdedly frequented by tourists of all the hotels or inns of the county, excepting Quin's hotel at Bray.

WOODFORD (THE), a small river of the county of Leitrim, Connaght, and of the counties of Cavan and Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises among the south-eastern declivities of the Slieve-an-Ierin mountains in co. Leitrim, and flows about 17 miles eastward, past Ballinamore, through Lough Garadice, across the north-west wing of co. Cavan, past Ballyconnel, and along the boundary between co. Cavan and co. Fermanagh, to the head of the west side of Upper Lough Erne. Woodford demesne, around a dilapidated seat of the Gore family, is situated at the northern extremity of the parish of Carrigallen, and in the northern vicinity of the village of Newtown-gore, partly along the shore of Lough Garadice, and partly along the right bank of the Woodford river.

WOODFORD (THE), a rivulet of the parish of Ballinakill, barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. It rises among the Slieve-Baughta mountains, on the southern verge of the county, and runs about 4 miles east-north-eastward to the village of Woodford, and about the same distance east-south-eastward and south-eastward to the head of a small bay of Lough Derg. The early part of its course is upland; the middle part of its course is beautified with wood; and the later part of its course drains a comparatively large aggregate of bog.

WOODFORD, a village in the parish of Ballinakill, barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the Woodford rivulet, and on the road from Loughrea to Mountshannon, 8 miles south-west by west of Portumna, and 10 south-east by south of Loughrea. The portion of the vale and screens of the Woodford rivulet which immediately adjoins it, is largely enriched with wood; and the country lying immediately to the west and the south climbs speedily into the acclivities, and toward the summits, of the Slieve-Baughta mountains. The village contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a National school, a bridewell, a small court-house, a constabulary barrack, and a loan fund. The bridewell, though serviceable for a very large district, does not possess the legal amount of accommodation; and, according to the official report of it published in 1844, was about to be superseded by the new bridewell of Portumna. A court of petty-sessions is held once a fortnight. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £1,056, circulated £2,354 in 725 loans, realized a nett profit of £20 16s. 3d., and belonged to 13 proprietors. Fairs are held on March 18, May 12, June 24, Oct. 2, and Dec. 26. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clonfert takes name from Woodford, and has chapels here and at Clonea. Area of the village, 35 acres. Pop., in 1841, 396. Houses 68. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 27; in manufactures and trade, 39; in other pursuits, 11. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 47; on their own manual labour, 24; on means not specified, 1.

WOODFORT, a demesne in the valley of the Clydagh, in the south-western environs of the town of Mallow, and on the mutual confines of the baronies of Duhallow and Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. At the time when Dr. Smith wrote his history of Cork, this demesne was occupied by Simeon Marshall, Esq., surveyor-general of Munster; and included a handsome mansion, elegant plantations, and considerably large orchards. "To the south of the house," says Dr. Smith, "is a circular hill, covered over with trees, except some vistas that are cut through them. On the top of this mount is a turret, whence the eye may be feasted with a luxurious prospect of a great tract of country, with the adjacent town of Mallow, and the high mountains of Waterford, Limerick, and Kerry. Near the foot of this mount runs the river Clydagh, in delightful meanders, through groves of evergreens, and soon loses itself in the Blackwater."

WOODHOUSE, co. Waterford. See STRAD-BALLY.

WOODHOUSE, a hamlet in the parish of Kilbroney, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the shore of Lough Carlingford, 1½ mile south of Rostrevor.

WOOD-ISLAND, an inhabited islet in the parish of Tullynakill, barony of Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It lies on the west side of Lough Strangford, ¼ of a mile west-north-west of Island-Magee, and 2 miles north-north-east of the village of Killinchy. The tide entirely forsakes it at low water.

WOODLANDS, the beautiful demesne of Col. Thomas White, in the parish of Clonsillaigh, barony of Castleknock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It is situated on the left bank of the river Liffey, 1½ mile north-east by north of Lucan; and its east gate is distant only 2½ miles from White's gate of the Phoenix-park. Its general character, as to cheerfulness, elevation, and opulent prospect, closely resembles that of the ducal demesne of Carton; but, in consequence of lying 3½ miles farther east, it comes more into blending with the rich environs of the metropolis, and with a full perspective of the Dublin and Wicklow mountains. The southern verge of the demesne, for the most part, stoops rapidly down to the Liffey, occasioning the great expanse of the grounds to possess, in a mimic sense, a tabular elevation; but this margin, and the portion of the demesne adjacent to it, are, in several places, picturesquely cloven with small, narrow, steep-sided ravines. "Through one of these, which we may here term a glen, the approach from the low road to the house has been carried; and, while much has been done to improve this delightful glen, its naturally wild character has been happily preserved. The charms of this romantic little glen are much enhanced by a brook which issues from the artificial lake on the higher grounds, and runs through it—here forming little cataracts, there winding, concealed, through the thickets, and again spreading out its limpid stream on the little levels formed by the stratified rocks." The mansion is a spacious and elegant castellated pile, and occupies a charming and commanding site on the higher part of the tabular grounds. The original structure was built by Lord Corhampton, the former proprietor of the demesne; and the present was almost re-edified by Luke White, Esq., the purchaser of the property from Lord Corhampton, and the father of the present proprietor. The estate was granted, in the reign of King John, to the family of Luttrell; it continued in their possession till purchased by the late Mr. Luke White; and, in common with the hamlet of Clonsillaigh, it bore the name of Luttrellstown.

WOODLAWN, the beautifully wooded seat of Lord Ashdown, in the parish of Killan, barony of Kilconnel, 3 miles west of the village of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. Adjacent to its north side is the Trench monument,—a conspicuous feature in the landscape.

WOOLLY, one of two denominations of a bog in the barony of Killan, 3 miles north-west of Mount-Talbot bridge, co. Galway, Connaught. The other denomination is Castle-Kelly. "This tract of bog," reported Mr. Griffith in 1813, "is situated to the south of Mount-Mary; it is composed of a number of small bogs, which are all connected by narrow stripes of low, grassy bog. The general discharge for the waters of these bogs, is directly into the river Suck. Mr. Kelly of Castle-Kelly has drained and improved some bog near the edge of his domain; part of it has been planted with Scotch fir, larch, and alder, which appear in general to have succeeded extremely well." Area of the bogs, 5,354 acres; average depth, 20 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £5,364 4s.

WOOD'S CHAPEL, or CHAPEL-IN-THE-WOODS, a quoad sacra parish in the quoad civilia parish of Artrea, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,361 acres, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 7,471. It consists of 16 townlands of Artrea, and extends from the northern limits of that parish south-westward to the vicinity of Moneymore; yet though exhibited by the Commissioners of Public Instruction as comprised within these limits, it, at the same time, figures in their reports as including the whole or part of the towns of Magherafelt and Castle-Dawson, —the former situated in the parish of Magherafelt, and the latter in the parishes of Magherafelt and Ballyscullion. The surface is part of the low rich district which skirts the lower extremity of Lough Neagh and the Ban, thence to Lough Beg; and its northern district is watered eastward by the rivulet Moyola. The prevailing character of the land is light, with interspersions of very fertile pendicles and tracts. A principal feature is the Moravian settlement of Gracefield.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Gross income, £89 4s. 7½d.; nett, £65 4s. 7½d. Patron, the incumbent of Artrea. The church was built in 1730, at a cost unreported; and enlarged in 1825, by means of a loan of £415 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 300. The Presbyterian meeting-house at Magherafelt has an attendance of 400. The Presbyterian meeting-house at Castle-Dawson has an attendance of 317. The Moravian meeting-house has an attendance of 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in the parish of Magherafelt. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,408 Churchmen, 908 Presbyterians, 382 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,075 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, held in the Sessions-house, was aided with £20 a-year from the landlords, and books from the Sunday School Society, and had on its books 254 boys and 300 girls; 6 Sunday schools, at Ballyrouan, Aughrim, Ballymaldey, Ballinagaroe, Ballyreff, and Creagh-Magola, were also aided with books from the Sunday School Society, and were usually attended by about 479 scholars; a Moravian Sunday school at Ballynaquigal was usually attended by about 39 scholars; a Roman Catholic Sunday school at Deregarrive had on its books 61 boys and 43 girls; and 2 daily schools at Aughrim, and 8 at respectively Ballymagaghan, Lisnamorrow, Annahoush, Ballymudey, Ballyrouan, Ballygillen, Ballyheriff, and Ballyriff, had on their books 477 boys and 189 girls. One of the Aughrim schools was in connection with the National Board, that at Lisnamorrow was salaried with £4 4s. a-year from the rector; that at Annahoush was in connection with the Kildare Place Society; that at Ballymudey was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board; and that at Ballyrouan enjoyed some small advantage from Sir R. Bateson and the Marquis of Londonderry.

WOODSTOCK, the magnificent demesne of W. F. Tighe, Esq., in the parish of Innistogue, barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The mansion is situated less than a mile south of the picturesque little town of Innistogue; and is a substantial and commodious structure, built after the designs of David Bindon, by Sir William Fownes, the maternal grandfather of the late William Tighe, Esq., the distinguished author of the able and voluminous Agricultural Survey of the County of Kilkenny. The brilliantly featured and tastefully wooded grounds attached to the mansion extend two miles along the right bank of the river Nore, southward from the outskirts of the town of Innistogue, and a little upwards of a mile westward from the Nore to the summit of Mount Alto,—situated at an altitude of 812 feet above sea-level, crowned by a tower, and commanding an extensive and superb view of the valley of the Nore and part of the great central plain of the county, with the lofty Mount Brandon in the east and the diversified hills of Knocktopher in the west. The trees on the lower grounds are large and lofty; and even those on the hilly grounds have attained a considerable height. The surface of the demesne is constantly and most picturesquely diversified; it is rich in at once suddenness of transition, strength of feature, excellence of grouping, multitudinousness of close scenes, brilliance of vista-views, and grandeur of river landscape; and its drives and walks—which are liberally open to the public—"lead to those points where the beauties of the demesne, the scenery of the valley, or the windings of the deep and 'stubborn' Nore, are best displayed." No one, however, who takes merely an interior view of the demesne, can form a fair idea of either its character or its extent. "To see Woodstock, it is necessary to drive for a couple of miles along the new road from Innistogue to New Ross; and from that road, or from the adjacent summits, it is seen in all its length, in all its breadth, and in all its height, and there it appears to be one of the most imposing of all our country residences." "There are few seats in Great Britain," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "so richly and gracefully endowed by nature, or so improved by science and taste, as that of Woodstock. The rarest shrubs of various foreign lands are skilfully mingled with old 'patrician trees,' that have been rooted there for centuries, while the 'plebeian underwood,' that fills every sequestered nook, seems 'in place,' in the midst of cultivation, for it prevents the eye from discovering a single spot of nakedness. Into the broad river that skirts the banks, a score of tributary streams are rushing; now and then as miniature cataracts down lesser precipices; occasionally forming a placid basin, where the trout may be seen basking or at play; or rippling onwards, through or beneath overhanging boughs, making the sweet and gentle music, that, more than any other earthly sound, cheers and calms at once. Little valleys and small hills, undulating slopes and rough precipices, steps formed by the roots of aged oaks, rocks shaped by the hand of time into forms grotesque,—such are a few of the varied gifts with which nature has bountifully enriched Woodstock. Art has been busy among them, but with so rare a skill, that it seems to have laboured always under the direction and control of nature. On two or three of the heights, and also immediately skirting the river, graceful and picturesque cottages have been erected; the former command magnificent views of the distant mountains and the adjacent valleys, while from the windows of the latter may be seen the salmon leaping—literally—"in shoals." The gardens that adjoin the house are happily contrasted with the natural luxuriance of the ground; the beds are formal, and of artificial character, but filled to abundance with flowers from all parts of the world. It is impossible for either the pen or pencil to render justice to this fascinating place." Mrs. Mary Tighe, the well-known authoress of Psyche, spent many years and composed some of her sweetest poems at Woodstock; and, in the spring of 1810, she here breathed her last. A mausoleum of Italian statuary marble, executed by Flaxman, and "representing the fine form of the deceased reclining on a couch, in the tranquil sleep of death, whilst attending angels are waiting her resurrection," has been erected to her memory.

WOODSTOCK (THE), a rivulet of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It rises on the east side of the Douce mountain, and runs about 7 miles east-south-eastward through the parishes of Calary, Upper Newcastle, and Lower Newcastle, to the Irish sea at the Breaches,—the only outlet for drainage between the Three-Trouts' Stream at Delgany, and the mouth of the Leirtrim or Vartrey river at Wicklow. The rivulet waters in its progress the demesnes of Altadore, Hermitage, Glendaragh, Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and Woodstock.

WOODSTOCK, the picturesque demesne of Lord Robert Tottenham, in the parish of Lower Newcastle, barony of Newcastle, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of the village of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The mansion crowns a beautiful knoll, at an undulating junction of hilly grounds to the north with a flat tract of sea-board to the south-east; and it is a handsome structure, and, in common with various vantage-grounds in the demesne, commands an extensive view of the Irish sea, over a foreground of woodlands, which conceal the tame, flat features of the immediate shore. The demesne, though quite destitute of the great strength and boldness of feature which characterize numerous pleasure grounds in the north-eastern section of the county, exhibits much diversity of surface, possesses a fine blending of natural attractions with artificial decorations, and includes portions of two highly improved and delightfully picturesque small glens.

WOODSTOCK, an old castle in the parish of Churchtown, barony of West Narragh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the right bank of the river Barrow, in the northern environs of the town of Athy. "From its vicinity, Woodstock-castle has partaken of nearly all the changes that befell Athy. Standing on the western bank of the river Barrow, it was designed to command the principal ford on this part of the river in conjunction with White's-castle, situated on the opposite bank, a little lower down, the ford lying between. The time this castle was built is unknown. Tradition assigns it to about the year 1290, and that a descendant of the Earl of Pembroke was its first master; whilst our antiquaries, with more reason, seem inclined to attribute the erection of the present structure to Thomas Fitzgerald, lord of Offaly, and afterwards seventh Earl of Kildare, who, on marrying Dorothea, the daughter of Anthony O'Moore of Leix, received in dower the manors of Woodstock and Rheban, in which family it still remains. The plan of the building was originally a regular square; in aftertimes an addition was made to it of a square tower, joining the south side, and built in uniformity with the front facing the river. The walls are of great thickness, and, considering the attacks they have been exposed to, in good preservation. The millioned windows are much admired, and were elegantly executed. In viewing the interior from what can be collected from the remains, we are struck with the curious arrangements of ancient architecture. A fine arched gateway and part of the outer court wall yet remain. Some short time since, a stone was discovered in the ruins, and carefully preserved by Holmes Bigham, Esq., the present occupier of the adjoining land; it is the only piece of sculpture of interest that has, even in a mutilated state, survived, from the barbarous taste of disfiguring pleasure grounds and grottoes with relics, that can be only useful where they were rendered interesting by time. The ford which the castle commanded, and from which Athy derives its name, was called Athelechac, or anciently Athlegar, 'the ford towards the west,' also, Ath-trohan, or 'the cattle ford.' It was here the great battle was fought in the third century, between the people of Munster and those of Leix, under Laviseagh Cean Mordha. In 1642, the Marquis of Ormond took Woodstock from the rebels; and subsequently, in 1647, Owen Roe O'Neil surprised it and put the garrison to the sword; his victory, however, was but of short duration, for Lord Inchiquin compelled him, in a little time after, to surrender it and Athy. The lordship of Woodstock and Castlemitchell was set by the Earl of Kildare to Daniel Hutcheson, alderman, for ninety-nine years, from May 1st, 1657, at £100 the first forty-one years, yearly, and £200 a year during the rest of the lease, with 6 fat wethers or £3."

WOODSTOWN, a hamlet, a seat, and a bay, on the east coast of the barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. The hamlet is situated in the parish of Kilmacomb, $\frac{1}{4}$ a mile from the shore, 3 miles north of Dunmore, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Waterford. The seat—the handsome marine residence of Lord Carew—is situated 3 furlongs north-east of the hamlet, on the mutual border of the parishes of Kilmacomb and Crooke. The bay is a curving indentation of Waterford Harbour, making a long sweep, but a small average projection, between Newtown Head and Creaden Head, in the parishes of Crooke, Kilmacomb, Kill St. Nicholas, and Killea. The whole of it is a strand, and forms the southern half of the long strand which extends southward from Cheek Point. In the slightly abutting headland of Knockavellish, at the south end of the bay, and adjoining the isthmus of Creaden, are several large caves, some apartments of which are elegant and symmetrical.

WOOLLEN-GRANGE, or MOLL-GRANGE, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 3 miles north-north-west of Thomastown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 21 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,663 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 83 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches lie detached a little to the east, and 20 acres, 12 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, 373; in 1841, 328. Houses 50. The river Nore traces the whole of the western boundary; and the road from Thomastown to Kilkenny passes across the south-east wing, and coincides with a long stretch of the eastern boundary. —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BURNCURCH [which see], in the dio. of Osory. Tithe composition, £188. In 1834, all the inhabitants were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school. The First Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, assigns jointly to Woollen-Grange and Blackrath-Grange, the pop. in 1831, which the Census and the Report of the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Revenues assign wholly to Woollen-Grange.

WOOLSTAN, or WOLSTAN (ST.), the beautiful demesne of Richard Cane, Esq., in the parish of Donaghcumper, barony of South Salt, co. Kildare, Leinster. It is situated on the right bank of the Liffey, about a mile north-east of Celbridge. "A priory," says Archdall, "was founded here in the year 1202, for canons of the order of St. Victor, by Adam de Hereford, in honour of St. Wolstan, bishop of Worcester, then newly canonized. Richard was the first prior to whom de Hereford granted the lands on the river Liffey, and the church of Donaghcumper. At the suppression of religious houses, it was granted to Allen of Norfolk, Master of the Rolls, in the year 1538, and afterwards Lord Chancellor; in whose family it continued to the year 1752, when, by a decree of the court of Exchequer, it was sold and purchased by Dr. Robert Clayton, bishop of Clogher, by whom it was bequeathed to his niece Anne, wife of Dr. Thomas Bernard, Bishop of Killaloe. The present house was built by one of the Allens, a man well-known for his skill in architecture; he planned the noble house at Sigginstown, in this county, intended for the unfortunate Earl of Stafford; considerable alterations and additions have been made by the Right Reverend owner, and St. Wolstan is now an elegant edifice. The ancient priory was of considerable extent; but now there only remain two towers and two large gateways arched."

WORM-DITCH, the remains of an ancient embankment, chiefly in the parish of Currin, barony of Dартry, co. Monaghan, Ulster. They extend $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in a sinuous line from east to west, principally on the southern margin of the county of Monaghan, and partly on or near the boundary with the county of Cavan. The remains are conspicuously exhibited in both the Geological and the Ordnance maps. WYSES-POINT. See BALLINACORTY.

YAGOE. See JAGO (ST.).

YELLOWFURZE, a village in the parish of Painestown, barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on a cross road, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Slane, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ east-north-east of Navan. It contains a neat Roman Catholic chapel; and within a mile of it are the seats of Thurstanstown-house, Beaupark, Dollardstown-house, Seneschalstown-house, Hay's-house, and Greenhills-house. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 146; in 1841, 127. Houses 23.

YELLOW-RIVER (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It rises on the north-west margin of the county, and in the northern district of the parish of Killassar, at an elevation of about 450 feet above sea-level; and it runs about 6 miles south-westward and north-westward, and past Church-village, to a confluence with the Moy, at a point about 3 miles below Foxford.

YELLOW-RIVER (THE), a rivulet of the north-eastern district of King's co., Leinster. It rises in a morass adjoining the north-west side of the hill of Croghan, at a point $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-west of Philipstown; and it flows 8 miles east-north-eastward, through the baronies of Lower Philipstown and Warrenstown, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward along the boundary with the county of Meath, to a confluence with the river Boyne, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Elenderry.

YELLOW-RIVER (THE), one of the small feeders of Lough Garadice, in the barony of Carrigallen, co. Leitrim, Connaught.

YOUGHAL, a bay at the mouth of the river Blackwater, on the boundary between the counties of Cork and Waterford, Munster. See article on the parish of YOUGHAL.

YOUGHAL, a bay on the east side of Lough Derg, co. Tipperary, Munster. It projects from the main body of the Lough at a point east by north of the opposite projection of Scariff bay; it commences with a breadth of rather more than a mile, and very gradually contracts to a breadth of one-third of a mile; it penetrates the land in a south-easterly direction, and to the extent of 2 miles; it is politically distributed among the parishes of Monsea and Dromineer, in the barony of Lower Ormond, and the parishes of Castletownarra and Youghalarra, in the barony of Ownay and Arra; and it is regarded as one of the finest fresh-water bays in the whole course of the Shannon.

YOUGHAL, a rivulet, a hamlet, and a demesne, in the parish of Youghalarra, barony of Ownay and Arra, co. Tipperary, Munster. The rivulet rises at an elevation of several hundred feet, among the Arra mountains, on the southern border of the adjoining parish of Castletownarra, and pursues a tumbling, trotting, and merry course of about 5 miles north-eastward to a point near the head of the south-west side of Youghal bay. The hamlet stands on the rivulet about a mile above its embouchure, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Nenagh. The demesne adjoins the north side of the hamlet, and extends away thence along part of the bay.

YOUGHAL, or ST. MARY'S OF YOUGHAL, a parish, containing the borough of Youghal, on the eastern border of the barony of Imokilly, and of the county of Cork, Munster. Length, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 4,830 acres. Pop., in 1831, 11,327; in 1841, 12,054. Houses 1,627. The surface extends along the Blackwater and its estuarial expansion, to the middle of the west side of Youghal bay; it exhibits much diversity and great aggregate beauty of contour; it boasts a terminating portion of the immediate banks of the Blackwater, in good keeping with the prevailing brilliancy of the central and the lower sections of that river's valley; and it consists, in an aggregate view, of excellent land. Youghal bay, though extending southward beyond the limits of the parish to Ring Point and Cable Island, and placing the whole of its length upon the boundary-line with the county of Waterford, cannot be advantageously treated apart from the parish and the town. The inner portion of this bay constitutes Youghal harbour, comprises strictly the small estuary of the Blackwater, has nowhere a width of more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, opens between East Point on the coast of co. Waterford and the southern extremity of the town of Youghal on the coast of co. Cork, and may be regarded as $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and about 5 furlongs in mean breadth. The outer portion of the bay extends southward from the lower extremity of the town to Cable Island, measures $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, is thoroughly screened along all the west, but has no immediate screen on any part of the east, makes a curved indentation to the extent of a little upwards of a mile upon the lower part of the west shore, and possesses a tolerably well-sheltered anchoring-ground immediately behind Cable Island. A large proportion of the bay is alternately sea and strand under the fluctuations of the tide; and some interesting notices of this strand, of the adjoining coast, and of their vegetable and animal remains, were written in last century by Dr. Smith, and still retain much of their informational value. "The large extended strand of Youghal, as far as the lowest ebbs uncover it, and probably much farther," says he, "is no other than a common turf bog, covered over with sand and pebbles; from whence not only good turf is dug every season, but also great quantities of timber trees, as fir, hazel, &c., are found. Some years ago, a skeleton of a monstrous animal was discovered in this strand; I saw one of the shoulder bones in Youghal; it is $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet long, and weighs above 100 weight. The remainder of the skeleton, and (as I am informed) another of the same kind, lie still buried in the strand; but I could hear of nobody that knew the very spot they were buried in.

When they were first discovered, it happened to be a very low ebb; but the sea soon flowing over the place, covered it up with sand and gravel, so that it could not be again readily found. These bones lay in a turfy soil, not far from the surface; they undoubtedly belong to some fish of the cetaceous kind; which seems the more probable from their being thick, short, and ponderous; and not to an elephant or land animal, as was conjectured by those who discovered them. About 18 years ago, this strand was entirely divested of all its sand and gravel; and being left quite bare by violent high winds, great quantities of roots of various trees then lay exposed to view. The sea has greatly encroached on this part of the coast, and is likely to gain more ground, as the land within the strand lies low and flat. At the entrance of the harbour of Youghal, may be seen the remains of the foundation of a mill standing on a rock, which shows that the ocean has greatly exceeded its limits on this shore. A considerable tract of ground was lately banked in by a vast buttress built of very large stones, at the charge of the Earl of Burlington, whose estate it is, but the sea being very tempestuous hereabouts, especially with south-west winds in winter time, no mound that art can form, seems to be capable of resisting its fury. Near Ring Point, several large horns were dug up in this strand (which belonged to the moose deer) by Mr. Hayman, near Youghal. This strand, to the land, is terminated by a large extended bog, which was continued, before it was encroached upon by the ocean, a great way beyond the lowest ebb. Clay-castle, on this strand, is a very bold, sudden rising ground, or rather a small promontory, composed of a loose sandy clay, which has also been encroached upon by the sea, very considerably, within these few years. This hill stands about a mile south-west from the town of Youghal, and affords a very entertaining scene to the curious naturalist; for the pieces of the bank, which break off and are washed down by the sea, are by degrees petrified into a very hard firm grit, as solid as any stone. This grit, which is a species of freestone, is composed of a mixture of fine sand, and a yellow loam or clay, tempered by the sea water which beats against the hill. I have taken up several pieces half clay, half stone, and the sand adhering thereto. The hill seems perfectly dry, nor is there any spring in which this petrifying quality can reside; but whatever it be, it seems to exist entirely in the clay. Wood and several other things daubed over with this clay, are also petrified on the spot. An ingenious gentleman sent me an account, that he had a formed stone resembling a petrified mushroom, which was found on this strand. At the extreme point of Ring, which terminates this shore to the south-west, is a most extensive point of view, from which may be seen a great part of Youghal bay, and the coast as far as to Ardmore Head, in the county of Waterford; as also Ballycotton bay and island."

In the years 1796, 1797, and 1801, were seen from the west shores of Youghal bay, some most imposing specimens of the fata morgana; and a lengthened account of the phenomena, which appeared in the 13th volume of the Philosophical Magazine, is abridged as follows by Mr. Brewer:—"The first of these exhibitions was seen on the 21st of October, 1796, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the sun shining clearly. There appeared on a hill in the adjoining county of Waterford, a walled town, with well defined houses, a round tower, and spired church; the Waterford hills being seen distinctly in the background. In a short time, the spire and round tower became capped with domes, and another tower became a broken turret; all the houses then became ruins, their fragments seeming to be scattered about; and in little more than an hour the whole disappeared, the hills sinking to the real level of the field. On the 9th of March, 1797, at about eight in the morning, a similar phenomenon was observed on the sea, to the south-west of the town. This also presented a hill supporting a walled town; on one side were houses, and a castle in ruins; in the middle were two broken towers, on one of which was a flag flying; and between them and the castle were more houses in ruins; the scene was terminated to the south by a round tower and walls. The hill was of a green and brown colour; the buildings were purple and brown; and the whole had a clear and brilliant appearance, like a transparent painting. How long it continued is not known. The most beautiful example of these splendid exhibitions of nature, described as occurring here, was seen at about five o'clock on a fine morning in June 1801. All the coast opposite the river of Youghal on the Waterford side, being covered with a dense vapour, presented on the right, next the sea, the objects of an alpine region; in the background were snow-capped mountains, while woods and a cultivated country appeared in front. The snow was presently seen to roll down the sides of the mountains into the subjunct valleys, and disclosed to view the grey specks it had invested; and as the solar-rays increased in power, the vapour disappeared with its deceitful prospect. That which covered the river and adjacent country to the left, exhibited a scene entirely different. It represented a country laid out in lawns and pleasure-grounds, in which were situated three gentlemen's seats, which were well defined, and even appeared in detail, with some of their windows open, and knockers on the doors. Before the houses were clumps of fine forest trees; behind them were beautiful shrubberies, which were succeeded by forests of pines, and the view was closed by distant mountains. In about half-an-hour, two of the houses vanished, the clumps in front also disappearing, and a fine oak sprung up; which, upon the refraction of the vapour by the augmenting activity of the sun, was the last to fade away of all the constituents of this aerial picture."

Youghal parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £521 3s. 3d. Gross income, £536 17s. 7d.; nett, £469 9s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Clonmult, in the dio. of Cloyne, but is resident in Youghal. Each of two curates receives a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The parochial church was built about the year 1460, by the then Earl of Desmond. Sittings 1,700; attendance, about 700. The chapel-of-ease was built in 1821, at the cost of £1,228 10s. 7d., of which £830 15s. 4d. was a gift from the late Board of First Fruits, £92 6s. 1d. was a donation from the Duke of Devonshire, and the remainder was raised by private subscription, and the sale of pews. Sittings 200; attendance, about 80. The Independent meeting-house is attended by from 50 to 100; the Friends' meeting-house, by from 30 to 40; the Wesleyan meeting-house, by about 150; and the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by about 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 6,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonpriest. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,810 Churchmen, 100 Protestant dissenters, and 9,670 Roman Catholics; and 19 daily schools had on their books 910 boys and 875 girls. Two of the schools were boarding and daily schools for young ladies; one was a boarding and daily school for boys; two were classical schools; one was the Devonshire endowed school, attended by 18 boys; one was the male and female general free school, supported by subscriptions and collections, to the amount of £25 a-year to each of two teachers, and attended by 92 boys and 56 girls; one was the Youghal united school, managed by a committee, yielding salaries to a master and a mistress of respectively £35 and £20, and attended by 56 boys and 23 girls; one was the National school, salaried with £30 a-year from the Board, aided for contingencies with collections at the door of the Roman Catholic chapel, and attended by 527 boys; one was the Convent school, conducted gratuitously, and attended by 600 girls; and one was the infant school, supported by private contributions, and attended by 36 boys and 44 girls.

YOUGHAL,

A post and market town, a sea-port, a parliamentary borough, and the practical capital of the south-eastern district of the county of Cork, in the parish of Youghal, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on Youghal Harbour, or the estuary of the Blackwater, and on the road from Cork to Waterford, 8½ miles east by north of Castle-Martyr, 10½ south-south-east of Tallow, 12 south of Cappoquin, 12½ south by east of Lismore, 13 east of Middleton, 13½ south-west by south of Dungarvan, 23½ east of Cork, 35½ south-west of Waterford, and 112½ south-west by south of Dublin.

Environ.—The estuary of the Blackwater, usually called Youghal Harbour, and sometimes Youghal bay, commences about 3 miles above the town, extends 1½ mile southward, with a mean width of between 2 and 3 furlongs, descends thence south-eastward to the town with a mean width of about three-fourths of a mile, sweeps past the town in the direction of south by east, with a mean breadth of about ¼ a mile, and, at 5 furlongs below the extremity of the town, suddenly expands into an open outer bay, 3½ miles in length, 7 miles in terminating width, and screened on the Waterford side by Ardmore Head, and on the Cork side by Cable Island and Ring Point. The shores of the outer bay, in a general view, are boldly featured, exhibit picturesque outlines, and blend with the adjacent portions of the coast-line of the province; and the shores of the estuary or harbour, though broken, tumulated, and otherwise much diversified, rise, for the most part, so speedily up from the water's edge into hill or upland, as to render the basin enclosed by them a sort of large water-filled dell, close in its interior scenes, and very limited in its low-ground prospect. Yet the slopes of the hills on the north command a noble view of the town and most of the estuary; the rising grounds to the east command a charming front view of the town and its immediate environs; and the sweep of shore round the west side of the mouth of the estuary, forms a delightful promenade for the townspeople, and commands refreshing prospects of the sea and coast. "On passing Garryduff, and in descending to the estuary of the Blackwater," observes Mr. Fraser, "we obtain an extensive view of the bay, coast, town of Youghal, and country around it."—"I was greatly pleased," says Mr. Inglis, "with the first distant view of Youghal, across the bay, situated under a jutting, wooded hill, and appearing to stand partly in the water; with the gap beyond, through which the broad Atlantic is seen. . . . I scarcely know anywhere a finer promenade than the Cork road, just on leaving the town, with the sea directly below the parapet, and commanding views of the strikingly-beautiful entrance to the bay, and of the wide ocean beyond."—"The vicinity of Youghal," remarks Mr. Fraser again, "is highly interesting, particularly along the banks of the Blackwater. One and a half mile above the town is the wooden bridge, the largest structure of the kind yet erected in Ireland. A little beyond the wooden bridge, on the road leading to Tallow, the river Touro is crossed. This river, which is one of the Blackwater's tributaries, runs through the valley lying to the north of Youghal, and is navigable for barges for a short distance. Two miles above Youghal, the estuary of the Blackwater assumes the river character, and which character it strongly maintains upwards, as far as it is influenced by the tide water, and thence to its source. The breadth of the river, the height of its banks, which are either covered with wood or adorned with demesne and cultivated lands, and the depth and romantic character of its lateral glens, enlivened by their little streams, all combine to render the embouchure of the Blackwater very attractive."

Interior of the Town.—The town forms a sort of oblong, and extends south-south-eastward between the west margin of the estuary of the Blackwater, and the east base of a long and steep hill. The road from Waterford and Tallow enters it close by the estuary on the north; the new road to Cork leaves it close by the estuary on the south; the old road to Cork goes off at right angles from a point about 150 yards south of its northern extremity; and a country road, leading up by what is called Windmill Lane, goes off from a point 900 yards south of the preceding, and makes a parallel ascent with it up the overhanging hill. The chief communications with the town are by the Waterford and the new Cork roads at the ends; and the secondary communications are by the old Cork road over the hill to the west, and by a ferry across the harbour to a peninsular projection on the east. The principal street is nearly straight, and about ⅓ of a statute mile in length, and extends south-south-eastward at the distance of from 50 to 220 yards from the shore,—the variations in the distance being occasioned solely by sinuosities and other irregularities in the shoreline. Another street extends 740 yards, nearly parallel to the central and southern parts of the principal one, at the mean distance of about 90 yards to the east; but, in three distinct stretches, amounting in the aggregate to about 300 yards, it is immediately washed on one side by the estuary, so as to be there rather a terrace than a street. Two principal cross streets, each about 320 yards in length, cross the preceding streets at right angles, and extend nearly parallel to each other, quite from side to side of the town, or from the margin of the estuary up to the slopes of the hill. Several minor streets, and a considerable number of lanes, also extend from east to west, either connecting the two principal streets, or making ascents upon the hill; and two rather large suburbs, of strictly cabin character, overlook and wing the old road to Cork, and the road leading up to Windmill Lane. Vestiges of the old town walls enclose the central district of the town, and an adjacent portion of the hill slopes; and these jointly extend 600 yards from north to south, and about 550 from west to east. An old and unique structure, called the Clock-gate, and consisting of a wide archway, a broad square tower of four stories, and a small, squat, terminating clock-lantern, occupies a conspicuous site in the thoroughfare of the principal street, and divides the town into two sections, north and south. "Youghal," said Dr. Smith—in a description written nearly a century ago, and still in a great measure correct—"consists mostly of one street, intermixed with new and old houses. This street, towards the south end, is crossed by an high square tower, called the Clock-gate, from one being underneath, and a clock placed thereon; so that it is divided into upper and lower. The upper, which is the greater part, extends north, and the base town (as Camden calls it) to the south. The whole is situated on the side of a hill, on an arm of the sea, with a tolerable good harbour before it. The walls on the west side extend the entire length of the town ranged along the hill; they are flanked with some old towers, which, with the wall, were weak and ruinous, till lately repaired, as were also the gates. On the side of the hill, beneath the town wall, are a range of pleasant gardens, that considerably add to the beauty of the prospect, which the town makes from the opposite side of the river. "Youghal," said Mr. Inglis in 1834, "has all the appearance of being, what it is, an old town. The houses, however good, have an old look about them. There are exceptions of course; for every town, however old, has its modern quarters; but the general character of the town is antiquity. In the chief street, we see an old grey tower—one of the ancient defences of the town. Mounting towards the hill, one stumbles upon massive fragments of the old wall; and here and there houses are seen in a ruined state, betokening, I fear, not antiquity only, but decay also. From many points one catches a fine view over the bay, the town, and the surrounding country; amongst others, from the pleasure-grounds attached to a building called the College, and also from a garden contiguous to it. The college, although the property of the Duke of Devonshire, is in a sadly neglected condition; but I believe his grace's title is disputed, which partly accounts for this. The suburbs of Youghal are large and bad; they extend in every direction up the hill, behind the old town wall, and contain many very miserable cabins." A considerable improvement upon the town has recently been effected, in the re-edification of several old and tottering buildings, the erection of a good inn, the building of one or two good public edifices, the introduction of gas, the regular cleansing and paving of the streets, and several other beneficial changes.

The Parish-Church.—The church of Youghal, situated in the north-west part of the town, and usually called the Collegiate church, displays, in its modern alterations and its present features, an incongruous mixture of parts and tastes, but was, in its original condition, one of the finest specimens in all Ireland of that beautiful variety of the pointed architecture which is now technically known as the decorated English style. The pile was cruciform, and consisted of nave, chancel, and transepts, with a large square tower attached to its north side. The nave is used as the present parish-church, and is the only part of the structure in good preservation; it is adorned with side aisles, formed by six pointed arches resting on massive piers; it measures 135 feet in length, and 66 in width; and, but for the monstrous disfigurement resulting from modern restorations and 'improvements,' it might possess a highly imposing character. The chancel measures 29 feet in width; but is unroofed and in ruins. The large eastern window of this portion of the pile was originally the finest feature of the whole edifice; and though now 'curtailed of its fair proportions,' and partially built up from below, it still exhibits its original symmetrical outline, and possesses enough of ornament to challenge admiration. It is divided into two compartments, each displaying two slender mullions, surmounted by open tracery, and terminating in a trefoil ornament. "These compartments become one by the outside line of their arches uniting in a common point over the double massive mullion, which is thus made a centre; and this diamond-shaped space is occupied by a St. Catherine's wheel." The transepts are now used principally as cemeteries;

but, though possessing some noble monuments and interesting associations, they are utterly neglected, and seem fast hastening to decay. The southern transept was originally a chantry; but, in 1606, was purchased from the corporation of the town by the Earl of Cork, and repaired and fitted up as a tomb-house for himself and his family. A gorgeous monument was erected here by the Earl himself, so loaded with effigies and escutcheons, and so amply illustrated by explicit and copious inscriptions, as to present a series of heraldic and genealogical memoirs. Its architectural parts are composed chiefly of marble, and its figures of alabaster. The Earl himself forms the principal figure, and is represented in armour, lying on his left side, supporting his head with his left hand; nine of his children are figured below; at his head and feet are effigies of his two wives, both in the attitude of prayer; and in the upper part is the figure of his mother, Joan Naylor, lying on her left side, her arm leaning on a bible. The taste in which the monument is executed is bad,—displaying a redundancy of decoration, and borrowing the silly aids of gilding and gaudy painting; but it may be pronounced the fault, less of the Earl of Cork as an individual, than of the age in which he flourished. A curious epitaph, now partly hidden by a wall, appears in the south transept, is of older date than that at which the place was purchased by the Earl of Cork, and seems designed for Sir Edward Villiers, Lord-president of Munster, who died in 1626. Many monumental stones of considerable antiquity exist in the flooring of the north transept and the nave; several of these are enriched with ornamented crosses; and two or more appear to have originally had recumbent effigies. Some remains of ancient monuments occur also among the ruins of the chancel. The tower attached to the north side of the church is about 50 feet in height, and seems to have been erected originally for defence, but was afterwards transmitted to the character of a belfry.—"The collegiate church of Youghal was founded in 1464, by Thomas, Earl of Desmond. This foundation was afterwards confirmed by his son James, in 1472, and subsequently by his brother Maurice, in 1496. The church is of prior date, but was rebuilt and beautified by the Earl of Desmond soon after the erection of the college, and repaired at a later period by the Earl of Cork. The community of the college consisted at first of a warden, eight fellows, and eight singing men, who had a common table, together with other necessities, and a yearly stipend allowed to them,—the whole donation being originally worth £600 per annum. It was endowed with several vicarages and parsonages in different parts of the county of Cork. The foundation charter and the several appropriations were confirmed at various periods by the bishops of Cloyne, Pope Julius, Pope Paul, and other pontiffs. "This church enjoyed its revenues and privileges for some time after the Reformation; for in the year 1587, Dr. Witherhead was collated to the wardenship by the then Bishop of Cork and Cloyne. He was succeeded by Nath. Baxter, who, finding his tenure precarious, and that this was likely to share the fate of other monastic institutions, privately authorized Godfrey Armitage, Edmund Harris, and William Parker, to dispose of the college revenues, who accordingly demised them and the college house to Sir Thomas Norris, then Lord-president of Munster. Dr. Meredith Hamner, the author of the Chronicle of Ireland, succeeded Baxter in the wardenship, and renewed the lease made by his predecessor, by demising the college revenues, &c., to William Jones, in trust for Sir Walter Raleigh, reserving, however, the parsonage of Carrigaline and the rectory of Mal-

low. About the year 1602, Sir George Carew took the college for the purpose of residing in it, and obtained a grant of the college and revenues from James I. He afterwards sold his estate in it to Richard Boyle, who purchased Jones's interest when he purchased the Raleigh estate. Sir James Fullerton, having obtained a patent for concealed church lands, laid claim to the property of this college. His title, or pretended title, was also purchased by the Earl of Cork, who contrived to obtain possession until the year 1634, when Sir William Reeves, the then Attorney-general, exhibited charges against him with respect to the mode in which he obtained possession of the college; all these, together with other charges of rapacity brought against him by Strafford, the Earl says he satisfactorily answered. Be that as it may, he was fined £15,000 by the award of Strafford, who prevailed upon him to refer the matter to his decision." Some domestic parts of the buildings belonging to the collegiate establishment were repaired and altered into a private dwelling-house for the use of a succession of proprietors; and, under the title of Sir Walter Raleigh's House, they will form the topic of a subsequent section of this article.

Ancient Monasteries.—An abbey for Dominican friars was founded at Youghal, about the year 1268, by Thomas Fitzgerald, surnamed the Ape.* The mortal remains of the founder were buried in the church either in 1296 or 1298; and general chapters of the Dominican order in Ireland were held here in 1281 and 1304. The ruins of the church still exist in the northern part of the town, but they possess little architectural interest, and consist principally of a window-pierced gable, and some adjoining pieces of side-wall. The grounds immediately around them are now a popular burial-place, kept with great neatness, and so thickly planted with trees, that an exterior view of the ruins embraces only their summit, and cannot be obtained except from the higher slopes of the overhanging hill.—A monastery for Franciscans was founded in the southern part of the town, in 1224, by Maurice Fitzgerald, who was twice Lord-justice of Ireland; it was the earliest foundation for Franciscans in the kingdom, and was the meeting-place of several provincial chapters of the order; and it was completed by Thomas, the second son of the founder, and became the burial-place of several noblemen of the house of Desmond. No vestiges of the buildings now exist. The founding of this monastery is traditionally said to have been occasioned by the following romantic circumstance:—"Maurice Fitzgerald was about to erect a castle on this site, and the workmen, who were employed in digging the foundation, begged, on the eve of some festival, a piece of money, to be spent in drinking to the welfare of the new undertaking. He directed his eldest son to grant their request; but the son, instead of so doing, abused the workmen. Maurice, says this idle tradition, was so greatly concerned or disheartened by such an impediment to the good wishes of the workpeople, that he altered his design, and founded a monastery where he had intended to erect a castle."

Other Public Buildings.—The Chapel-of-Ease

stands at the southern extremity of the town; and is a rather neat looking structure, in a style of hasty Gothic. The Roman Catholic chapel is a large and elegant edifice, with a handsome spire. The chapels of the Protestant dissenters do not present any remarkable feature. The convent of Presentation nuns stands adjacent to the chapel-of-ease, and is a modern plain structure, of considerable size, and free from architectural pretension. The grounds on which the convent and the chapel-of-ease stand were formerly occupied by the Franciscan monastery and its accompanying cemetery; and when the excavations were made for founding the chapel-of-ease, two stone coffins and a vast quantity of human bones were discovered.—The wooden bridge of Youghal was commenced in 1829, and completed in 1832. It measures 1,875 feet in length, and has in connection with it a causeway of 1,732 feet,—the two constituting a viaduct of the great length of 3,607 feet. The bridge itself is composed of 47 bays, and has a breadth of 22 feet, and a height above high water of 10 feet. Its architect was Mr. Nimmo; the resident engineer, who superintended its erection, was J. E. Jones, Esq.; and the cost of constructing it was between £17,000 and £18,000. This great structure connects Youghal with the large peninsular district east of the estuary of the Blackwater, and presents a short and easy path of communication with the town of Dungarvan. Previous to its erection, the southern part of the great and rich barony of Imokilly could communicate with the county of Waterford only by a dangerous ferry of nearly half-a-mile in front of the town of Youghal, or by an enormously circuitous route of 16 miles of detour by the bridge of Lismore,—a route which, for the sake of touching the towns of Tallow, Lismore, and Cappoquin, is still pursued by the Cork and Waterford mail.—The remains of the town walls, already incidentally noticed, chiefly exist as boundary-lines to the gardens of some houses of a superior description along the face of the hill, or western margin of the town. An evidence, long and often adduced, of the mildness of the climate around Youghal, is that, in these gardens, the myrtle grows with great luxuriance, and sometimes attains the height of 20 feet. "On digging close to the town-walls 5 or 6 years ago," writes Mr. Crofton Croker, "four curious pieces of stamped pewter were turned up, which appear to have been used as coins, or promissory counters, but are without any inscription or mark that might determine their history and use. Two of these pieces were of a triangular, and two of a circular shape, the largest of the latter about the size of an old half-crown, the other nearly that of a shilling, and the triangular bits seemed to be two quarters of a large circular one. With them was also found a very small base metal coin, of that kind technically named by collectors black, or maille money. On the obverse it has, in an oval, a full-faced head, with a mitre, and the inscription 'Patricius'; the reverse has the common cross, with a single pellet in each quarter, something like those found on most of the coins of our Edwards and Henrys, and some legend, probably the moneyer's name, which I am unable to decipher. This coin appears to be one of those called Turney's, a corruption of the word Tournois, from being struck at Tours in France, which circulated generally in Ireland, until forbidden by Edward III. in 1338. Many monkish remains have been occasionally found at Youghal. I remember seeing amongst others a hollow bronze cross, about 7 inches in length, which opened, and was divided into several compartments or chambers, for the deposition of relics."—A dilapidated circular tower stands near the entrance of the harbour, and is supposed to have originally stood

* This ugly and ridiculous soubriquet is said to have arisen from a romantic incident which occurred to Fitzgerald in his infancy. "When he was about 3 months old, an ape, which was kept in his father's family, took him from the cradle, and ascended with him to the top of the castle, or, according to some traditions, of the priory, of Tralee, and, after playing with him there for some time, safely descended, and restored him to the cradle. The Fitzgeralds of the house of Leinster, as principal and immediate descendants of this Thomas the Ape, bear monkeys for their supporters and crest, in grateful remembrance of his preservation."

attached to an ancient nunnery, but was afterwards used as a harbour lighthouse.—An infantry barrack is situated in the north-west outskirts of the town, near the old road to Cork. The other public buildings are a fever hospital, a town-house, an assembly-house, a custom-house, a prison, several almshouses, a lying-in hospital, numerous schools, two good inns, and various municipal offices and markets.

Sir Walter Raleigh's House.—The dwelling in which the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh resided at Youghal is still in a state of good preservation; it immediately adjoins the parish-church and a portion of the old town walls; and it often popularly shares, or rather disputes, with the church the name of the College. Either itself or a building which preceded it is supposed to have been the residence of the warden, the fellows, and the other officiates of the collegiate church of Youghal; but the present structure exhibits, in the aggregate, the ordinary style of the old English manor-house of the time of Elizabeth and James I.; it was repaired, in 1602, by Sir George Carew, Lord-president of Munster,—and again, very thoroughly and at considerable expense a few years later, by Sir Richard Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork; it had previously been reduced almost to destruction in the course of the Desmond rebellion; and it has unfortunately undergone various modern changes, misnamed improvements, yet is carefully preserved by its present occupant as much as possible in a condition to call up the memory and suggest associations of the great Sir Walter. It was used as a residence successively by Sir Richard Norris and Sir George Carew, Lord-presidents of Munster,—by Sir Richard Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork,—and by occasionally its modern proprietor, the Duke of Devonshire; and it has, for some time past, been in the occupation of Colonel Faunt. Its walls are nearly 5 feet in thickness; its interior retains the original arrangement, and is everywhere wainscotted with Irish oak, in excellent preservation; its panels, in some of the rooms, are richly carved, and, in one apartment, are as black as ebony; its drawing-room chimney-piece, reaching from floor to ceiling, and consisting also of Irish oak, is an exquisite specimen of elaborate workmanship, and displays a variety of grotesque emblems and figures; and its roof, likewise of Irish oak, has remained untouched by man, and almost undamaged by time; but unhappily, the whole of its interior, excepting the principal apartment, has, by the bad taste of former proprietors, been defaced by a coating of green paint. At a somewhat recent disturbing of some of the panelling of one of the rooms, several books which had belonged to Sir Walter Raleigh were found. In the villa-grounds attached to the residence flourish many beautiful and luxuriant myrtles, some fine specimens of the arbutus unedo or strawberry tree, and several other delicate shrubs in more luxuriant condition than plants of their species usually display in the gardens of England; and, in compliment to the extreme beauty of the first of these classes, the modern name has been given to the place of Myrtle-grove. In the garden is a group of four aged yew trees, alleged by tradition to have been planted by Raleigh, and their tops so matted into one another as to form a sort of huge bower. "In this spot, beyond question," remark Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "has often been read portions of the Fairy Queen, long before the world became familiar with the divine conception,—

* At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept."

For here, certainly, the immortal bard held commune with his 'dear friend' and brother poet, whom he described as 'the summer nightingale,'

'Himself as skilful in that art as any.'

Here, too, doubtless, were composed some of those exquisite works which must have been the produce of ease and quiet, and have preserved the name of Raleigh for the honour of posterity. He is conspicuous in history as 'the noble and valorous knight,'—a man of astonishing energy, who combined almost every variety of talent; whose acquirements in science were marvellous; whose heroic courage and indomitable perseverance are almost without parallel; whose enterprise was unchecked by difficulties and unchilled by failure; and who, while excelling in feats of arms and strength of council, surpassed also in those arts which are the more exclusive produce of retirement and peace,—history, oratory, philosophy, politics, and poetry. It is impossible to visit this spot, in which his comparatively few days of tranquillity were spent, without a sigh for his unhappy fate." Either in the garden attached to the house, or in some plot of ground in the vicinity, Sir Walter is believed to have planted some potatoes which he brought from America, and which were the first ever grown in Ireland. A current tradition asserts that the man intrusted with the care of the garden in the absence of Sir Walter, supposed that the apple or seed was the esculent part of the new vegetable; that on finding this unpalatable, he threw it away, and pronounced the crop useless; and that only when digging the ground in preparation for some other crop, did he turn his attention to the root, and discover it to be pleasant and wholesome food. Seemingly trivial as was the planting of a few exotic tubers upon this plot of ground, it constituted the permanent introduction of the potato into Ireland, and has eventually proved of more real consequence to the country than the sum total of all the political and public events of a series of reigns.

"When Raleigh first visited Ireland," says a brief epitome of his life in an extinct Irish periodical, "he was a mere soldier of fortune." At an early age, he had discovered a more than ordinary share of talent, and was pursuing his studies at Oriel College, at Oxford, when the wars of the Low Countries and France holding out an irresistible temptation to one of his adventurous disposition, he embarked as a volunteer, with a troop of 100 gentlemen, which, by the permission and approbation of Elizabeth, were then proceeding to the aid of the Huguenots. The knowledge of military tactics which he there acquired, speedily brought him into notice in this country, where he first landed in 1579, as a captain in a levy of troops, sent over from England to the Deputy, Lord Grey de Wilton, to assist in quelling the rebellion of the Desmonds, excited by the intrigues of Philip II. of Spain. The intrepidity and skill of the young soldier recommended him to the attention of the Lord-deputy and the Earl of Ormond, by whom he was quickly promoted to posts of considerable importance. The Desmonds having been reduced to submission, Raleigh, to whom a life of inactivity would have been intolerable, hastened back to England to push his fortunes there, under the auspices of his patron at court, the gay and profligate Dudley, Earl of Leicester; enriched, however, by a grant of a considerable tract of the former territory of the Desmonds, which having become forfeited to the Crown by their rebellion, had been parcelled out among the soldiers of Elizabeth's army as a reward for their services. Sir Richard Cox, and others following him, have said that Raleigh had but 12,000 acres granted to him, being led into this error by its having been declared in the 'plot of the queen's offer for the peopling of Munster,' that no person was to be an undertaker for more than that quantity of land. It, however, appears, that Raleigh had interest enough to procure a warrant of privy seal, dated February 3, 1585-6, granting him three seignories and a half in the counties of Cork and Waterford; and, accordingly, letters-patent were passed, dated the 16th October, 29 Eliz. (1586), whereby the same were confirmed to him. The privy seal and letters-patent above-mentioned were preserved among the papers of the Boyle family at Lismore-castle. It is said that, in point of territory and power, the Earl of Desmond was one of the greatest subjects at that time in Europe. Independent of his vassals, he had 500 gentlemen of his kindred and surname; and his attainder was followed by the confiscation of 574,628 English acres. At the court of England, it would appear, that, even at this time, Raleigh bore no undistinguished or ignoble character. The discovery of that part of America which he named Virginia, in honour of his royal mistress, brought him into great favour, and obtained for him the distinction of knighthood, her distribution of which, it is well known, was neither indiscriminate nor profuse. We find, also, that at the time of the expected invasion of England by the Spanish fleet, which history informs us had been pompously but vainly designated by the title of the Invincible Armada, he was called to take an active part in the councils of the queen. But the breezes of court favour have long been proverbially uncertain, and it is supposed that some difference with Essex, who, after the death of Leicester, held the highest place in the favour of Elizabeth, was the cause of Sir Walter's paying a visit to his estates in Ireland. How long he remained here is not well ascertained, and can only be conjectured from his having resided some time in his house at Youghal, and from his having founded a free school at Lismore, the castle and manor of which formed part of his possessions in this country. He also spent some time on a visit with Spencer, at Kilkoman-castle, which had been allotted to the poet as his share of the spoil at the suppression of the Desmond rebellion,—and on his return to England, Raleigh brought Spencer with him, and introduced him at court, where he presented and dedicated to the Queen, the three first books of his poem. Although Raleigh was much engaged both with his foreign expeditions and attendance at court, where he filled the office of captain of the guard to Elizabeth, he, notwithstanding, continued to expend considerable sums upon the lands which had been granted to him in Ireland; which, as well from the mountainous nature of the tract, as from the turbulent and unsettled state of the country, proved any thing but productive. At length, in 1602, he was induced to dispose of the entire of his Irish estates to the well known Richard Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork, who, coming over to England, presented to him a letter from Sir George Carew, the president of Munster, in which he drew such a picture of the state of that province, that Raleigh made little difficulty in concluding the bargain with the politic Boyle. The deed of sale bears date the 7th of December, 1602. "The Earl has been accused—apparently not without some reason—of having overreached Sir Walter in the bargain; and he rather lamely vindicated himself from the charge, in a letter to Carew Raleigh, Sir Walter's son. Sir Walter sailed from Cork on the 6th of August, 1617, on his last and fatal voyage. The greater portion of the estates which belonged to him are still possessed by the Earl of Cork's descendants.

Trade, &c.—The portion of the estuary of the Blackwater, which properly constitutes the harbour of Youghal, extends from East Point to Ferry Point, and measures about a mile in length, and one-third of a mile in breadth; it is nearly as safe as it is commodious, and would seem to offer fine facility for steam-boat communication with England; yet it is greatly depreciated in value by the existence of a bar across its entrance, and, though usually stated to admit vessels of 500 tons burden, it is altogether inaccessible at low water, and cannot admit vessels drawing more than 12 feet of water except at flood of spring tides. The port is a dependency of Cork, and therefore possesses no separate statistics of shipping; but, in 1834, it was known to have, in addition to fishing-hookers, 37 sailing-vessels, varying in burden from 30 to 315 tons. The exports in 1835 amounted, in estimated value, to £215,316, and consisted of 10,328 cwt. of provisions, 444,284 cwt. of grain and meal, 613 gallons of spirits, 100 cows and oxen, 434 sheep, and 6,429 swine; and the imports of that year amounted, in estimated value, to £28,310, and consisted of 37,992 tons of coal, culm, and cinders, 334 tons of stones and slates, 72 cwt. of British refined sugar, 104 cwt. of tallow, 150 barrels of herrings and other fish, 12,000 bushels of salt, and 835 tierces of beer and ale. The dealers in groceries, British manufactures, and miscellaneous goods, receive their supplies from Cork; but were steam-boat communication opened between Youghal and England, they not only would receive their own supplies direct from Bristol, but might become wholesale distributors to the shopkeepers of Tallow, Dungarvan, Lismore, and other towns. A steamer from Youghal would have the great advantage of getting out to sea 5 minutes after weighing anchor, and would, in a great proportion of her voyages to Bristol, reach her haven a tide earlier than if she sailed from the harbour of Cork. The estimated amount of annual inland carriage to Youghal comprises 23,000 tons for exportation, 7,500 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 900 tons of exciseable articles not received by direct importation, and 7,500 tons of stone, lime, turf, and other bulky articles; and the estimated amount of inland carriage from the town comprises 200 tons of imported goods, and 32,500 tons of coals, manure, and other bulky articles. The markets of the town are, in general, well supplied with provisions. The salted herrings sold in the markets and shops are imported from Scotland. The supply of fresh fish from the neighbouring fishing-grounds is, on the whole, indifferent and precarious. The supply of haddock, cod, plaice, sole, mackerel, gurnet, whiting, and herring, is by no means abundant; that of hake is tolerably plenty; that of turbot, brit, and mullet, is very scarce; that of salmon is limited; that of eels is very meagre; that of oysters is abundant; and that of lobsters is scarce. The fishing craft within the district of the Youghal coast-guard station in 1836, consisted of 16 half-decked vessels, of aggregate 260 tons burden, and 53 row-boats, worked by 327 men. "In a town so large as Youghal," remarked Mr. Inglis in 1834, "there must be very considerable want of employment, and a large quantum of destitution,—the result of age and infirmity. Here, too, as in every sea-port, there is a class of fishermen, whose precarious calling frequently places them within the reach of pauperism. At the same time, there are worse towns in these respects than Youghal.—A strong disposition to emigrate has been of late manifested in Youghal and its neighbourhood; and, in fact, it may be said of this part of Ireland, as of many others, that emigration is limited only by the lack of means among the lower classes. From the beginning of the year 1834 to the 15th of June, 568 emigrants had left the port of Youghal.—a greater number than had emigrated in any preceding year. They were chiefly agriculturists, and not of the lowest class." Markets are held on every Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs on the first Thursday of every month, on Ascension-day, and on Oct. 18. The principal inns are the Devonshire Arms and Campbell's, both of which contain good accommodations, are under good management, and let post horses and carriages. The banking offices are branches of the Bank of Ireland, the Provincial Bank, and the National Bank. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Dungarvan, and a mail-coach in transit between Cork and Waterford.

Public Charities.—One class of almshouses in Youghal was established by the first Earl of Cork, and is still maintained by the Duke of Devonshire; and another class was established by an ancestor of the Ronaynes of De Loughtane, in the county of Waterford, and is still maintained by that family. A fund, amounting to £567 Irish, is lodged by bequest in the hands of the corporation; and the interest of it is annually paid to the rector for distribution among the poor. The town has an institution for aiding the accouchment of poor married women, a ladies' association for providing employment to poor females, and a fever hospital and dispensary within the poor-law union of Middleton. The two latter institutions seem to serve for a district strictly commensurate with the parish of Youghal; but no statistic returns of them appear in our official documents. In 1843, the Youghal loan fund had a capital of £2,007, circulated £10,541 in 3,535 loans, realized a nett profit of £88, expended for charitable purposes £350, and belonged to 23 proprietors. In 1842, the Youghal savings' bank had 1,118 depositors.

Municipal Affairs.—Youghal is believed to have been a borough by prescription; it is supposed to have received a charter of incorporation from King John; and it possesses charters or similar documents of 31 Edward III., 49 Edward III., 3 Richard II., 20 Richard II., 22 Richard II., 5 Henry IV., 2 Henry V., 2 Edward IV., 1 Richard III., 2 Richard III., 12 Henry VII., 1 Elizabeth, 27 Elizabeth, 29 Elizabeth, 7 James I., 15 James I., 15 Charles II., and 4 James II. The ancient liberties appear to have been co-extensive with the parish of Youghal; but they are recognised by the local authorities, only for the purposes of local jurisdiction. The limits of the ancient town may be said to have consisted of the town walls, and the included portion of the shore. The boundaries of the present parliamentary borough include very little more than the actual modern town. The corporation consists of mayor, bailiffs, burgesses, and freemen, and is styled "The Mayor, Bailiffs, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Youghal." The mayor claims and exercises an exclusive right of proposing candidates for admission to the freedom. A person needs no special qualification for the freedom, and pays £5 of fees on being admitted. A de facto patronship of the borough—amounting in practice to the appointment of all the corporate offices, and the paramount control of all the corporate affairs—was possessed up to 1822 by the Earls of Shannon, and subsequently to 1822 by the Duke of Devonshire. The freemen, in 1833, amounted to 198, of whom 40 were resident within the borough, 20 were resident within 7 statute miles of the borough, and 138 were entirely non-resident,—2 were Methodists, 6 were Quakers, 3 were Roman Catholics, and 187 were members of the Established church. "There is," says an official report of that year, "a great degree of consanguinity and relationship amongst the resident members of the corporation; the sons, sons-in-law, or other relatives of the aldermen and burgesses being the persons usually admitted, and nearly all the non-resident members or persons in the confidence of the patron or his agent. This exclusiveness operating to the prejudice of several respectable residents of different religious persuasions, has naturally produced much and well-grounded dissatisfaction in the excluded. Though no right to the freedom at large is now recognised, such was not always the practice." The council of the old corporation consisted of the mayor, the bailiffs, and the burgesses; and the other officers were a recorder, a town-clerk, a clerk of the crown, a clerk of the peace, a treasurer, a sword-bearer, a chief constable, a gaoler, two sergeants-at-mace, a beadle, a water-bailiff, a clerk of the market, a pound keeper, and a weigh-master. The gaol of the borough is used for the custody of persons committed for trial at borough sessions, of persons under sentence of imprisonment from these sessions, of prisoners on their transit to the county gaol, of deserters apprehended within the borough, and formerly of debtors arrested under process from the borough civil court. This gaol was built, and is maintained at the expense of the corporation; and though sufficiently commodious in its interior fitting-up, it has not any court-yard, or any of those other accommodations which are considered essential to the health and cleanliness of the inmates of a prison. A court of quarter-sessions is held four times a-year, by the mayor, bailiffs, and recorder, as justices for the borough, and has jurisdiction in all offences committed within the town and liberties, yet actually tries no other offences than larcenies and misdemeanours, and inflicts no other punishments than fines and imprisonments. A court of pleas, called the court of record, is held before the mayor and bailiffs, and, in cases of importance, has the recorder as assessor; it possesses jurisdiction to an unlimited amount; and it has adjudged a case to the sum of nearly £1,000, and very frequently disposes of cases to the amount of from £100 to £200. The borough charters exclude the magistrates of the county of Cork from any jurisdiction within the borough, and place the sole jurisdiction within the town and liberties in the borough's own mayor, bailiffs, and recorder. No court of petty-sessions used formerly to be held, each magistrate taking information separately, or two or more magistrates consulting only at their own pleasure; but a court of petty-sessions is now held on every Thursday. A body of borough police, consisting of a chief constable and 8 constables, is appointed at each October sessions; and a body of county police, belonging to the Middleton district, is also stationed in the town, and ready to act in conjunction with the borough police. Youghal is likewise a coast-guard station. The productive property of the corporation yields about £454 8s. 1d. of rents from houses and lands, £400 of annuity from the Commissioners of the bridge across the Blackwater, and £60 of proceeds of tolls and customs,—in all, £914 8s. 1d.; and their remaining property comprises some commons, stripes of land, and buildings, which are either used by the public, or possess little or no actual value. The annual public expenditure consists of about £496 of salaries to corporation officers and servants, £200 of stated or stated miscellaneous outlay, and about £208 of incidental expenses,—the last employed, for the most part, in repairing the streets and the quays. "The town is lighted and cleansed by commissioners appointed under the general Act of the 9th Geo. IV. c. 82. The gas-works were originally erected at an expense of £2,800, of which a sum of £1,600 was borrowed, and is still due. The income of the commissioners amounts to nearly £800 per annum; of this the corporation contribute £50, and the Duke of Devonshire £80, the balance being assessed on the inhabitants. A portion of this annual sum is applied in paying instalments on the loan, the residue in the lighting and cleansing of the town. The only supply of water for the public is afforded by two or three pumps, which are maintained by the corporation, though an abundant supply could, as represented to us, be procured at a small expense." The borough formerly sent two members to the Irish parliament; and it now sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 498,—of whom 80 were freemen, 2 were £10 freeholders, and 416 were £10 householders.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 341 acres. Pop., in 1831, 9,608; in 1841, 9,939. Houses 1,283. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 516; in manufactures and trade, 1,010; in other pursuits, 592. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 115; on the directing of labour, 932; on their own manual labour, 797; on means not specified, 274. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,857; who could read but not write, 591; who could neither read nor write, 1,370. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,491; who could read but not write, 909; who could neither read nor write, 2,582.—Number of tenements valued for the poor-law, 1,651; of which 938 were valued under £5,—261, under £10,—151, under £15,—113, under £20,—76, under £25,—35, under £30,—34, under £40,—23, under £50,—and 20 at and above £50.

History.—Youghal, though evidently a very ancient town, is not known to early record, and makes an obscure figure in even mediæval history. In the 13th century, it acquired a monastery from the zeal of Maurice Fitzgerald; in the reign of Edward IV., it obtained an important charter, through the power and patronage of Thomas Fitzgerald, often called the great Earl of Desmond; at a subsequent date it acquired a second monastery, and a collegiate church establishment from others of the Fitzgeralds; and, in a general view, from the dawn of record down to the wilder outbursts of Desmond turbulence, it existed under the immediate auspices of the Fitzgerald family, and experienced the full consequences of both their favour and their restlessness. In 1579, the then Earl of Desmond, while in rebellion against the crown, laid siege to the town which his family had so long fostered; and on the surrender of its garrison, he gave the whole place, inclusive of its religious foundations, to indiscriminate plunder. So disastrously and sweepingly was the work of spoliation performed, that all the inhabitants, excepting one poor friar, fled. The seneschal of Imokilly, a kinsman of the rebel Earl, garrisoned the deserted town, and held it for some time, in favour of the rebellion; but, in consequence of a want of sufficient provisions, he was compelled to relinquish it. The Earl of Ormond now took possession of it, garrisoned it, and publicly hanged its mayor, Coppinger, who had surrendered it to the rebels. In 1582, the seneschal of Imokilly attempted to retake it, and succeeded in scaling its walls; but he was eventually repulsed, with the loss of 50 of his followers. In the prolonged and disastrous rebellion which broke out in 1641, Richard Boyle, first Earl of Cork, selected Youghal for his public quarters, and was appointed by government to protect it from the rebels; and he had assigned to him for this service 1,000 foot and 60 horse; but, when he entered upon this duty, he was in infirm health, and while discharging it in Sept. 1643, he died. In 1645, an Irish army, under the Earl of Castlehaven, lay before Youghal during nearly 10 weeks; but they were unprepared for making a regular siege, and on the arrival of aid to the garrison from Lord Broghill, they retired. Oliver Cromwell captured You-

Richard Boyle, first Earl of Cork, who figured so prominently in the history of many parts of the county, and whose influence upon Munster was so powerful, and continues to be felt to the present day, had probably closer connection with Youghal than with any other place, and, at all events, was interred here within the magnificent mausoleum which he had himself erected. "This nobleman was the second son of Mr. Roger Boyle, who was descended of a Herefordshire family, but who lived in circumstances of no great affluence, near Feversham, in Kent. The son Richard became a student in the Middle Temple; but finding his means unable to support him at the Inns of Court, he entered at the service of Sir Richard Manwood, lord-chief-baron of the exchequer, as one of his clerks. 'Perceiving,' to use his own words, 'that this employment would not raise a fortune,' he repaired to Ireland, then the scene of enterprise with many Englishmen, who had more courage and talent than property or prospect of success in their native country. He arrived at Dublin on the 23d of June, 1588; at which time his whole wealth consisted of £27 3s. in money; two tokens given him by his mother, namely, a diamond ring and a bracelet of gold; his wearing apparel; and his rapier and dagger. The era was propitious to adventure, but he quickly found that more for his personal advantage was to be done by politic schemes and cool speculation, than by the rapier and dagger, in a country torn by faction, and in which defeat was invariably followed by forfeiture. The manner in which an adventurer, so destitute of connections in his own country, and possessing no more than £27 3s. and his rapier and dagger, when he landed in Ireland, could, without a profession, amass a fortune so large as that of the Earl of Cork, is one of the wonders of the times in which he flourished. He has left written by himself, what he terms his true remembrances, for some account of his life, up to the year 1632. From this account we find that he acquired with his first wife, who died shortly after her marriage, an estate of £500 per annum; but this slender though curious piece of autobiography throws little light on the means by which he obtained any other parts of his great fortune. By certain law officers, and officers of state in Ireland, he was accused to Queen Elizabeth of having used the purse of some foreign prince to supply him with money. But this accusation was not made good; and we are therefore in justice to suppose that the suspicion arose merely from the very natural surprise generally expressed, that a man apparently without resources should be enabled to make purchases so extensive. After his triumphant justification of himself against this serious charge, employments of state and titles of honour fell thickly upon him. In 1616, he was created Lord Boyle, Baron of Youghal; and in 1620, Viscount Dungarvan, and Earl of Cork. His activity in the defence of his large territories, like most efforts at individual benefit, assuredly proved of service to the public cause. The improvements he effected at his different towns, would have been equally valuable in themselves, and useful as examples, if they had not been made in a spirit of intolerance, as regarded religious opinions, that was discredit to him as a man, and was chiefly calculated to foment fresh wars and new forfeitures; for a part of the success with which he maintained his great power, and acquired, indeed, a continuous augmentation of political and personal consequence, he was indebted to a circumstance that would have oppressed him, if confined to the humble sphere of life in which he commenced his career,—that of having a numerous family. His sons were chiefly of a martial character, well suited to the temper of the times; and, as may be seen from his monumental inscriptions, his daughters strengthened the roots of his prosperity, by marrying into noble and powerful houses. His fifth son, Robert Boyle, is the favourite of posterity, as an experimental philosopher of the highest class; and many descendants of this 'great earl' have reflected lustre on the peerage."

YOUGHALARRA, a parish in the barony of Ownney and Arra, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, northward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,356 acres, 24 perches,—of which 560 acres, 13 perches are in Youghal bay. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,352, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 4,247; in 1841, 3,321. Houses 572. The southern district, to the extent of 1,100 acres, consists of part of the Arra mountains; and the other districts consist, in a general view, of good arable land. A summit on the south-western boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,127 feet; and two summits immediately beyond the southern boundary have altitudes of 1,206 and 1,517 feet. The Newtown rivulet rises among the uplands in the south, at an elevation above sea-level of upwards of 600 feet; and pursues a north-easterly and a northerly course, through the greater part of the interior, to the head of Youghal bay. The Youghal rivulet comes in from Castletownarra, and flows across the southern district, to Youghal bay, a little below the mouth of the Newtown rivulet. The celebrated slate quarries of the Royal Irish Mining Company, popularly misnamed the slate quarries of Killaloe, are situated within Castletownarra, very nearly on the boundary with Youghalarra, and may be fairly regarded as shared by the latter. The principal hamlets are Youghal, Muragh, and Coumbebeg; the principal seats are Youghal-house, Monroehouse, and Kyleban; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of Conlan's church, Pallas church, and Monroehouse's castle, and the site of another castle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition and gross income, £416 6s. 2d.; nett, £390 13s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Droghda, in the cathedral of Clonfert, and the sinecure prebend of Islandeady in the cathedral of Kilmacduagh. Previous to 1833, the rectory of Youghalarra was episcopally united to the rectories of Castletownarra and Burgessbeg; and the place of worship for its Protestant inhabitants is still the church of Castletownarra. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Kyleban, and has an attendance of about 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Burgessbeg. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 4,387; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 292 boys and 188 girls.
